out ſundrie Ilands alſo adioining vnto it, and the inner moſt ſea not deſtitute of manie, as by experience hath béene of late confirmed. Furthermore, whereas our deſcribers of the earth haue made it ſuch in their deſcriptions, as hath reached litle or nothing into the peaceable ſea without the Antartike circle: it is now found by Theuet and others, that it extendeth it ſelfe northwards into that trace, by no ſmall number of leagues, euen in maner to the Equator, in ſo much that the weſterlie part thereof from America, is ſuppoſed to reach northward ſo far from the Antartike article, as Africa doth ſouthwards from the tropike of Cancer, which is no ſmall portion of ground; & I marueil why not obſerued by ſuch as heretofore haue written of the ſame. But they excuſe themſelues by the ingratitude of the Portingals and Spaniards, who haue of purpoſe concealed manie things found out in their trauell, leaſt they ſhould ſéeme to open a gap by doing otherwiſe, for ſtrangers to enter into their conqueſts. As for thoſe Ilands alſo which lie in the peaceable ſea, ſcattered here and there, as Iaua the greater, the leſſer Sumatra, Iapan, Burneo: &c. with a number of other, I refer them ſtill vnto Aſia, as before, ſo as they be without the compaſſe of 90. degrées eaſtward from the line of longitude, & not aboue 180. as I doo the Ile of S. Laurence, and a number of other vnto Africa within the ſaid proportion, wiſhing ſo litle alteration as I may: and yet not yéelding vnto any confuſion, whereby the truth of the diuiſion ſhould hereafter be impeached.

And whereas by Virgil (ſpeaking of our Iland) ſaith;

Et penitus toto diuiſos orbe Britannos,

And ſome other authors not vnworthie to be read and peruſed, it is not certeine vnto which portion of the earth our Ilands, and Thule, with ſundrie the like ſcattered in the north ſeas ſhould be aſcribed, becauſe they excluded them (as you ſée) from the reſt of the whole earth: I haue thought good, for facilitie ſake of diuiſion, to refer them all which lie within the firſt minute of longitude, ſet downe by Ptolome, to Europa, and that as reaſon requireth: ſo that the aforeſaid line ſhall henceforth be their Meta & partition from ſuch as are to be aſcribed to America; albeit they come verie néere vnto the aforeſaid portion, & may otherwiſe (without préiudice) be numbred with the ſame. It may be that ſome will thinke this my dealing either to be ſuperfluous, or to proceéd from (I wot not what) ſolish curioſitie: for the world is now growne to be very apt and readie to iudge the hardeſt of euerie attempt. But forſomuch as my purpoſe is to leaue a plaine report of ſuch matter as I doo write of, and deliuer ſuch things as I intreat of in diſtinct and vpright order; though method now and then doo faile, I will go forward with my indeuour, referring the examination of my doings to the indifferent and learned eare, without regard what the other doo conceiue and imagine of me. In the meane ſeaſon therefore it ſhall ſuffice to ſay at this time, that Albion as the mother, and the reſt of the Ilands as hir daughters, lieng eaſt of the line of longitude, be ſtill aſcribed vnto Europa: wherevnto ſome good authours heretofore in their writings, & their owne proper or naturall ſituations alſo haue not amiſſe referred them.

Into what portion Britaine is referred.

Of the poſition, circuit, forme and quantitie of the Ile of Britaine.

Cap. 2.

How Britaine lieth from the maine.

BRitannia or Britain, as we now terme it in our Engliſh tong, or Brutania as ſome pronounce it (by reaſon of the letter y in the firſt ſyllable of the word, as antiquitie did ſometime deliuer it) is an Ile lieng in the Ocean ſea, directlie ouer againſt that part of France which conteineth Picardie, Normandie, and thereto the greateſt part of litle Britaine, which later region was called in time paſt Armorica, of the ſituation thereof vpon the ſea coaſt, vntill ſuch time as a companie of Britons (either led ouer by ſome of the Romane Emperours, or flieng thither from the tyrannie of ſuch as oppreſſed them here in this Iland) did ſettle themſelues there, and called it Britaine, after the name of their owne countrie, from whence they aduentured thither. It hath Ireland vpon the weſt ſide, on the north the maine ſea, euen to Thule and the Hyperboreans; and on the eaſt ſide alſo the Germane Ocean, by which we paſſe dailie through the trade of merchandize, not onlie into the low countries of Belgie, now miſerablie afflicted betwéene the Spaniſh power and popiſh inquiſition (as ſpice betwéene the morter and the peſtell) but alſo into Germanie, Friezeland, Denmarke, and Norwaie, carrieng from hence thither, and bringing from thence hither, all ſuch neceſſarie commodities as the ſeuerall countries doo yéeld: through which meanes, and beſides common amitie conſerued, traffike is maintained, and the neceſſitie of each partie abundantlie releeued.

The longitude and latitude of this Ile.

It containeth in longitude taken by the middeſt of the region 19. degrees exactlie: and in latitude 53. degrées, and thirtie min. after the opinions of thoſe that haue diligentlie obſerued the ſame in our daies, and the faithfull report of ſuch writers as haue left notice thereof vnto vs, in their learned treatiſes to be perpetuallie remembred. Howbeit, whereas ſome in ſetting downe of theſe two lines, haue ſéemed to varie about the placing of the ſame, each of them diuerſlie remembring the names of ſundrie cities and townes, whereby they affirme them to haue their ſeuerall courſes: for my part I haue thought good to proceéd ſomewhat after another ſort; that is, by diuiding the lateſt and beſt chards each way into two equall parts (ſo neere as I can poſſiblie bring the ſame to paſſe) whereby for the middle of latitude, I product Caerliſle and Newcaſtell vpon Tine, (whoſe longeſt day conſiſteth of ſirtéene houres, 48. minuts) and for the longitude, Newberie, Warwike, Sheffield, Skipton, &c: which dealing, in mine opinion, is moſt eaſie and indifferent, and likelieſt meane to come by the certeine ſtanding and ſituation of our Iland.

Longeſt day.

The compaſſe of Britaine.

Touching the length and breadth of the ſame, I find ſome variance amongſt writers: for after ſome, there are from the Piere or point of Douer, vnto the fartheſt part of Cornewall weſtwards 320. miles: from thence againe to the point of Cathneſſe by the Iriſh ſea 800. Whereby Polydore and other doo gather, that the circuit of the whole Iland of Britaine is 1720. miles, which is full 280. leſſe than Cæſar doth ſet downe, except there be ſome difference betwéene the Romane and Britiſh miles, as there is indéed; wherof hereafter I may make ſome farther conference.

Martianus writing of the breadth of Britaine, hath onlie 300. miles, but Oroſius hath 1200. in the whole compaſſe. Ethicus alſo agreeing with Plinie, Martianus, and Solinus, hath 800. miles of length, but in the breadth he commeth short of their account by 120. miles. In like maner Dion in Seuero maketh the one of 891. miles: but the other; to wit, where it is broadeſt, of 289. and where it is narowſt, of 37. Finally, Diodorus Siculus affirmeth the ſouth coaſt to conteine 7000 furlongs, the ſecond; to wit, à Carione ad Promontorium 15000. the third 20000. and the whole circuit to conſiſt of 42000. But in our time we reckon the breadth from Douer to Cornewall, not to be aboue 300. miles, and the length from Douer to Cathneſſe, no more than 500. which neuertheleſſe muſt be meaſured by a right line, for otherwiſe I ſée not how the ſaid diuiſion can hold.

The forme.

The forme and faſhion of this Ile is three cornered, as ſome haue deuiſed, like vnto a triangle, baſtard ſword, wedge, or parteſant, being broadeſt in the ſouth part, part, and gathering still narrower and narrower, till it come to the farthest point of Cathnesse northward, where it is narrowest of all, & there endeth in maner of a promontorie called Caledonium & Orchas in British Morweydh, which is not aboue 30. miles ouer, as dailie experience by actuall trauell doth confirme.

Promontories of Britaine.

The old writers giue vnto the three principall corners, crags, points, and promontories of this Iland, three seuerall names. As vnto that of Kent, Cantium, that of Cornewall, Hellenes, and of Scotland, Caledonium, and Orchas; and these are called principall, in respect of the other, which are Taruisium, Nouantum, Epidium, Gangacum, Octapites, Herculeum, Antiuestæum, Ocrinum, Berubium, Taizalum, Acantium, &c: of which I thought good also to leaue this notice, to the end that such as shall come after, may thereby take occasion to sathe out their true places, whereof as yet I am in maner ignorant, I meane for the most part, bicause I haue no sound author that doth leade mée to their knowledge.

Britaine vnder the Celts 341. yeares.

The distãce from the maine.

Further more, the shortest and most vsuall cut that we haue out of our Iland to the maine, is from Douer (the farthest part of Kent eastward) vnto Calice a towne in Picardie 1300 miles from Rome, in old time called Petressa and Scalas, though some like better of blackenesse where the breadth of the sea is not aboue thirtie miles. Which course, as it is now frequented and vsed for the most common and safe passage of such as come into our countrie out of France and diuers other realms, so it hath not beene vnknowne of old time vnto the Romans, who for the most part vsed these two hauens for their passage and repassage to and fro; although we finde, that now and then diuerse of them came also from Bullen, and landed at Sandwich, or some other places of the coast more toward the west, or betweene Hide and Lid; to wit, Romneie marth, which in old time was called Romania or Romanorum insula) as to auoid the force of the wind & weather, that often molesteth seafaringmen in these narrowe seas, best liked them for their safegards. Betweene the part of Holland also, which lieth nére the mouth of the Rhene and this our Iland, are 900. furlongs, as Sosimus saith; and besides him, diuers other writers, which being conuerted into English miles, do yeeld 112. and foure od furlongs, whereby the iust distance of the neerest part of Britaine, from that part of the maine also, doth certeinlie appéere to be much lesse than the common maps of our countrie haue hitherto set downe.

Of the ancient names or denominations of this Iland. Cap. 3.

IN the diligent perusall of their treatises, who haue written of the state of this our Iland, I find that at the first it seemed to be a parcell of the Celtike kingdome, whereof Dis otherwise called Samothes, one of the sonnes of Iaphet was the Saturne or originall beginner, and of him thencefoorth for a long while called Samothea. Afterward in processe of time, when desire of rule began to take hold in the minds of men, and ech prince endeuoured to enlarge his owne dominions: Albion the sonne of Neptune, Amphitrite surnamed Marioticus (bicause his dominions laie among the Ilands of the Mediterran sea, as those of Plutus did on the lower grounds nere vnto shore, as contrariwise his father Iupiter dwelled on the high hils nérer to heauen) hearing of the commodities of the countrie, and plentifulnesse of soile here, made a voiage ouer, and finding the thing not onelie correspondent vnto, but also farre surmounting the report that went of this Iland, it was not long after yer he inuaded the same by force of armes, brought it to his subiection, in the 29. yeare after his grandfathers decease, and finallie changed the name thereof into Albion, whereby the former denomination after Samothes did grow out of mind, and fall into vtter forgetfulnesse. And thus was this Iland bereft at on time both of hir ancient name, and also of hir lawfull succession of princes descended of the line of Iaphet, vnder whom it had continued by the space of 341. yeres and nine princes, as by the Chronologie following shall easilie appeere.

Dis, Samothes.

Neptunus Marioticus.

The first conquest of Britaine.

Goropius our neighbor being verie nice in the denomination of our Iland, as in most other points of his huge volume of the originall of Antwarpe lib. 6. (whom Buchanan also followeth in part) is brought into great doubt, whether Britaine was called Albion of the word Alb, white; or Alp an hill; as Bodinus is no lesse troubled with fetching the same ab olbijs, or as he wresteth it, ab Albijs gallis. But here his inconstancie appeareth, in that in his Gotthadamca liber. 7. he taketh no lesse paines to bring the Britaines out of Denmarke, whereby the name of the Iland should be called Vridania, Freedania, Brithania, or Bridania, tanquam libera Dania, as another also doth to fetch the originall out of Spaine, where Breta signifieth soile or earth. But as such as walke in darkenesse do often straie, bicause they wot not whither they go: euen so do these men, whilest they séeke to extenuate the certeintie of our histories, and bring vs altogither to vncerteinties & their coniectures. They in like maner, which will haue the Welshmen come from the French with this one question, vnde Walli nisi a Gallis, or from some Spanish colonie, do greatlie bewraie their ouersights; but most of all they erre that endeuour to fetch it from Albine the imagined daughter of a forged Diocletian, wherewith our ignorant writers haue of late not a little stained our history, and brought the sound part thereof into some discredit and mistrust: but more of this hereafter.

Now to speake somewhat also of Neptune as by the waie (sith I haue made mention of him in this place) it shall not be altogither impertinent. Wherfore you shall vnderstand, that for his excellent knowledge in the art of nauigation (as nauigation then went) he was reputed the most skilfull prince that liued in his time. And therfore, and likewise for his courage & boldnesse in aduenturing to and fro, he was after his decease honoured as a god, and the protection of such as trauelled by sea committed to his charge. So rude also was the making of ships wherewith to saile in his time (which were for the most part flat bottomed and broad) that for lacke of better experience to calke and trim the same after they were builded, they vsed to naile them ouer with rawe hides of bulles, buffles, and such like, and with such a kind of nauie (as they say) first Samothes, & then Albion arriued in this Iland, which vnto me doth not séeme a thing impossible. The northerlie or artike regions, do not naile their ships with iron, which they vtterly want, but with wooden pins, or els they bind the planks together verie artificiallie with bast ropes, oziers, rinds of trées, or twigs of popler, the substance of those vessels being either of fir or pine, sith oke is verie deintie & hard to be had amongst them. Of their wooden anchors I speake not (which neuertheless are common to them, and to the Gothlanders) more than of ships wrought of wickers, sometime vsed in our Britaine, and couered with leather euen in the time of Plinie, lib. 7. cap. 56. as also botes made of rushes and réeds, &c. Neither haue I iust occasion to speake of ships made of canes, of which sort Staurobates, king of India fighting against Semiramis, brought 4000. with him and fought with hir the first battell on the water that euer I read of, and vpon the riuer Indus, but to his losse, for he was ouercome by hir power, & his naule either drowned or burned by the furie of hir souldiers.

Neptune God of the sea.

The maner of dressing of ships in old time.

But to proceed, when the ſaid Albion had gouerned here in this countrie by the ſpace of ſeauen yeares, it came to paſſe that both he and his brother Bergion were killed by Hercules at the mouth of Rhodanus, as the ſaid Hercules paſſed out of Spaine by the Celtes to go ouer into Italie, and vpon this occaſion (as I gather among the writers) not vnworthie to be remembred. It happened in time of Lucus king of the Celts, that Leſtrigo and his iſſue (whom Oſyris his grandfather had placed ouer the Ianigenes) did exerciſe great tyrannie, not onelie ouer his owne kingdome, but alſo in moleſtation of ſuch princes as inhabited round about him in moſt intollerable maner. Moreouer he was not a little incouraged in theſe his doings by Neptune his father, who thirſted greatly to leaue his yrkſom ſonnes ſettled in the mightieſt kingdoms of the world, as men of whom he had alreadie conceiued this opinion, that if they had once gotten foot into any region whatſoeuer, it would not be long yer they did by ſome meanes or other, not onelie eſtabliſh their ſeats, but alſo increaſe their limits to the better maintenance of themſelues and their poſteritie for euermore. To be ſhort therefore, after the giants, and great princes, or mightie men of the world had conſpired and ſlaine the aforeſaid Oſyris, onelie for that he was an obſtacle vnto them in their tyrannous dealing; Hercules his ſonne, ſurnamed Labin, Lubim, or Libius, in the reuenge of his fathers death, proclaimed open warres againſt them all, and going from place to place, he ceaſed not to ſpoile their kingdomes, and therewithall to kill them with great courage that fell into his hands. Finallie, hauing among ſundrie other ouercome the Lommini or Geriones in Spaine, and vnderſtanding that Leſtrigo and his ſonnes did yet remaine in Italie, he directed his viage into thoſe parts, and taking the kingdome of the Celts in his waie, he remained for a ſeaſon with Lucus the king of that countrie, where he alſo maried his daughter Galathea, and begat a ſonne by hir, calling him after his mothers name Galates, of whom in my ſaid Chronologie I haue ſpoken more at large.

In the meane time Albion vnderſtanding how Hercules intended to make warres againſt his brother Leſtrigo, he thought good if it were poſſible to ſtop him that tide, and therefore ſending for his brother Bergion out of the Orchades (where he alſo reigned as ſupreame lord and gouernour) they ioined their powers, and ſailed ouer into France. Being arriued there, it was not long yer they met with Hercules and his armie, neare vnto the mouth of the riuer called Roen (or the Rhodanus) where happened a cruell conflict betweene them, in which Hercules and his men were like to haue loſt the day, for that they were in maner wearied with long warres, and their munition ſore waſted in the laſt viage that he had made for Spaine. Herevpon Hercules perceiuing the courages of his ſouldiours ſomewhat to abate, and ſeeing the want of artillerie like to be the cauſe of his fatall daie and preſent ouerthrowe at hand, it came ſuddenlie into his mind to will each of them to defend himſelfe by throwing ſtones at his enimie, whereof there laie great ſtore then ſcattered in the place. The policie was no ſooner publiſhed than hearkened vnto and put in execution, whereby they ſo preuailed in the end, that Hercules wan the field, their enimies were put to flight, and Albion and his brother both ſlaine, and buried in that plot. Thus was Britaine rid of a tyrant, Lucus king of the Celts deliuered from an vſurper (that dailie incroched vpon him, building ſundrie cities and holds, of which ſome were placed among the Alps & called after his owne name, and other alſo euen in his owne kingdome on that ſide) and Leſtrigo greatlie weakened by the ſlaughter of his brethren. Of this inuention of Hercules in like ſort it commeth, that Iupiter father vnto Hercules (who indeed was none other but Oſyris) is feigned to throw downe ſtones from heauen vpon Albion and Bergion, in the defenſe of his ſonne: which came ſo thicke vpon them, as if great drops of raine or haile ſhould haue deſcended from aboue, no man well knowing which waie to turne him from their force, they came ſo faſt and with ſo great a violence.

Strabo lib. 4.

But to go forward, albeit that Albion and his power were thus diſcomfited and ſlaine, yet the name that he gaue vnto this Iland died not, but ſtill remained vnto the time of Brute, who arriuing heere in the 1116. before Chriſt and 2850. after the creation of the world, not onelie changed it into Britaine (after it had beene called Albion, by the ſpace of about 600. yeares) but to declare his ſouereigntie ouer the reſt of the Ilands alſo that lie ſcattered round about it, he called them all after the ſame maner, ſo that Albion was ſaid in time to be Britanniarum inſula maxima, that is, The greateſt of thoſe Iles that beare the name of Britaine, which Plinie alſo confirmeth, and Strabo in his firſt and ſecond bookes denieth not. There are ſome, which vtterlie denieng that this Iland tooke hir name of Brute, do affirme it rather to be ſo called of the rich mettals ſometime carried from the mines there into all the world as growing in the ſame. Vibius Sequeſter alſo ſaith that Calabria was ſometime called Britannia, ob immenſam affluentiam totius delitiæ atque vbertatis, that was to be found heerein. Other contend that it ſhould be written with P (Pritannia.) All which opinions as I abſolutelie denie not, ſo I willinglie leaue vnto none of them in peremptorie maner, ſith the antiquitie of our hiſtorie carrieth me withall vnto the former iudgements. And for the ſame cauſe I reiect them alſo, which deriue the aforeſaid denomination from Britona the nymph, in following Tertor (or Prutus or Prytus the ſonne of Araxa) which Britona was borne in Creta daughter to Mars, and fled by ſea from thence onelie to eſcape the villanie of Minos, who attempted to rauiſh and make hir one of his paramours: but if I ſhould forſake the authoritie of Galfride, I would rather leane to the report of Parthenius, whereof elſewhere I haue made a more large reherſall.

It is altogither impertinent, to diſcuſſe whether Hercules came into this Iland after the death of Albion, or not, although that by an ancient monument ſeene of late, as I heare, and the cape of Hartland or Harcland in the Weſt countrie (called Promontorium Herculis in old time) diuers of our Britiſh antiquaries do gather great likelihood that he ſhould alſo be here. But ſith his preſence or abſence maketh nothing with the alteration of the name of this our region and countrie, and to ſearch out whether the ſaid monument was but ſome token erected in his honour of later times (as ſome haue beene elſewhere, among the Celts framed, & thoſe like an old cripple with a bow bent in one hand & a club in the other, a rough ſkin on his backe, the haire of his head all to be matted like that of the Iriſhmens, and drawing manie men captiue after him in chaines) is but ſmallie auailable, and therefore I paſſe it ouer as not incident to my purpoſe. Neither will I ſpend any time in the determination, whether Britaine had beene ſometime a parcell of the maine, although it ſhould well ſeeme ſo to haue beene, becauſe that before the generall floud of Noah, we do not read of Ilands, more than of hils and vallies. Wherfore as Wilden Arguis alſo noteth in his philoſophie and tractation of meteors, it is verie likelie that they were onelie cauſed by the violent motion and working of the ſea, in the time of the floud, which if S. Auguſtine had well conſidered, he would neuer haue aſked how ſuch creatures as liued in Ilands far diſtant from the maine could come into the arke, De ciuit. lib. 16. cap. 7. howbeit in the end he concludeth with another matter more profitable than his demand.

As for the ſpeedie and timelie inhabitation thereof, this is mine opinion, to wit, that it was inhabited ſhortlie after the diuiſion of the earth. For I read that when each captaine and his companie had their portions aſſigned vnto them by Noah in the partition that he made of the whole among his poſteritie, they neuer ceaſed to trauell and ſearch out the vttermoſt parts of the ſame, vntill they found out their bounds allotted, and had ſeene and beheld their limits, euen vnto the verie poles. It ſhall ſuffice therefore onelie to haue touched theſe things in this manner a farre off, and in returning to our purpoſe, to proceed with the reſt concerning the denomination of our Iland, which was knowne vnto moſt of the Grecians for a long time, by none other name than Albion, and to ſaie the truth, euen vnto Alexanders daies, as appeareth by the words of Ariſtotle in his De mundo, and to the time of Ptolomie: notwithſtanding that Brute, as I haue ſaid, had changed the ſame into Britaine, manie hundred yeares before.

Yet Timeus, Ephorus, and ſome of the Grecians, know the name Britannia, as appeareth alſo by Diodorus, &c. before the comming of Cæſar.

After Brutus I doo not find that anie men attempted to change it againe, vntill the time that Theodoſius, in the daies of Valentinianus and Valens endeuoured, in the remembrance of the two aforeſaid Emperours, to call it Valentia, as Marcellinus ſaith. But as this deuiſe toke no hold among the common ſort, ſo it retained ſtill the name of Britaine, vntill the reigne of Ecbert, who about the 800. yeare of Grace, and firſt of his reigne, gaue forth an eſpeciall edict, dated at Wincheſter, that it ſhould be called Angles land, or Angelландt, for which in our time we doo pronounce it England. And this is all (right honorable) that I haue to ſay, touching the ſeuerall names of this Iland, vtterlie miſliking in the meane ſeaſon their deuiſes, which make Hengiſt the onlie parent of the later denomination, whereas Ecbert, bicauſe his anceſtours deſcended from the Angles one of the fiue nations that came with the Saxons into Britaine (for they were not all of one, but of diuers countries, as Angles, Saxons, Germans, Switzers, Norwegiens, Jutes otherwiſe called Jutons, Vites, Gothes or Getes, and Vandals, and all comprehended vnder the name of Saxons, bicauſe of Hengiſt the Saxon and his companie that firſt arriued here before anie of the other) and thereto hauing now the monarchie and preheminence in maner of this whole Iland, called the ſame after the name of the countrie from whence he deriued his originall, neither Hengiſt, neither anie Quæne named Angla, neither whatſoeuer deriuation ab Angulo, as from a corner of the world bearing ſwaie, or hauing ought to doo at all in that behalfe.

Of this opinion is Belforeſt, lib. 3. cap. 44.

What ſundrie nations haue dwelled in Albion. Cap. 4.

AS few or no nations can iuſtlie boaſt themſelues to haue continued ſithence their countrie was firſt replenished, without any mixture, more or leſſe, of forreine inhabitants; no more can this our Iland, whoſe manifold commodities haue oft allured ſundrie princes and famous captaines of the world to conquer and ſubdue the ſame vnto their owne ſubiection. Manie ſorts of people therfore haue come in hither and ſettled themſelues here in this Ile, and firſt of all other, a parcell of the linage and poſteritie of Japhet, brought in by Samothes in the 1910. after the creation of Adam. Howbeit in proceſſe of time, and after they had indifferentlie replenished and furniſhed this Iland with people (which was done in the ſpace of 335. yeares) Albion the giant afore mentioned, repaired hither with a companie of his owne race proceeding from Cham, and not onelie annexed the ſame to his owne dominion, but brought all ſuch in like ſort as he found here of the line of Japhet, into miſerable ſeruitude and moſt extreame thraldome. After him alſo, and within leſſe than fiue hundred and two yeares, came Brute the ſonne of Syluius with a great traine of the poſteritie of the diſperſed Troians in 324. ſhips: who rendering the like courteſie vnto the Chemminits as they had done before vnto the ſeed of Japhet, brought them alſo wholie vnder his rule and gouernance, and diſpoſſeſſing the peeres & inferior owners of their lands and poſſeſſions, he diuided the countrie among ſuch princes and captaines as he in his arriuall here had led out of Grecia with him.

Chemminits.

From henceforth I doo not find any ſound report of other nation whatſoeuer, that ſhould aduenture hither to dwell, and alter the ſtate of the land, vntill the Romane emperours ſubdued it to their dominion, ſauing of a few Galles, (and thoſe peraduenture of Belgie) who firſt comming ouer to rob and pilfer vpon the coaſts, did afterward plant themſelues for altogither neere vnto the ſhore, and there builded ſundrie cities and townes which they named after thoſe of the maine, from whence they came vnto vs. And this is not onelie to be gathered out of Cæſar where he writeth of Britaine of ſet purpoſe, but alſo elſe-where, as in his ſecond booke a litle after the beginning: for ſpeaking of Deuiaticus king of the Swetſions liuing in his time, he affirmeth him not onelie to be the mightieſt prince of all the Galles, but alſo to hold vnder his ſubiection the Ile of Britaine, of which his ſonne Galba was afterward diſpoſſeſſed. But after the comming of the Romans, it is hard to ſaie with how manie ſorts of people we were daillie peſtered, almoſt in euerie ſtead. For as they planted their forwarne legions in the moſt fertile places of the realme, and where they might beſt lie for the ſafegard of their conqueſts: ſo their armies did commonlie conſiſt of manie ſorts of people, and were (as I may call them) a confuſed mixture of all other countries and nations then liuing in the world. Howbeit, I thinke it beſt, bicauſe they did all beare the title of Romans, to reteine onelie that name for them all, albeit they were wofull ghelts to this our Iland: ſith that with them came all maner of vice and vicious liuing, all riot and exceſſe of behauiour into our countrie, which their legions brought hither from each corner of their dominions: for there was no prouince vnder them from whence they had not ſeruitours.

Romans.

How and when the Scots, a people mixed of the Scithian and Spaniſh blod, ſhould arriue here out of Ireland, & when the Picts ſhould come vnto vs out of Sarmatia, or from further toward the north & the Scithian Hyperboreans, as yet it is vncerteine. For though the Scotiſh hiſtories do carrie great countenance of their antiquitie in this Iland: yet (to ſaie freelie what I thinke) I iudge them rather to haue ſtolne in hither within the ſpace of 100. yeares before Chriſt, than to haue continued here ſo long as they themſelues pretend, if my coniecture be any thing. Yet I denie not, but that as the Picts were long planted in this Iland before the Scots aduentured to ſettle themſelues alſo in Britaine; ſo the Scots did often aduenture hither to rob and ſpeale out of Ireland, and were finallie called in by the Peats or Picts (as the Romans named them, bicauſe they painted their bodies) to helpe them againſt the Britains, after the which they ſo planted themſelues in theſe parts, that vnto our time that portion of the land cannot be cleanſed of them. I find alſo that as theſe Scots were reputed for the moſt Scithian-like and barbarous nation, and longeſt without letters; ſo they vſed commonlie to ſpeale ouer into Britaine in leather ſkewes, and began to helpe the Picts about or not long before the beginning of Cæſars time. For both Scots. Picts.

Diodorus lib.6. and Strabo lib.4. doo ſeeme to ſpeake of a parcell of the Iriſh nation that ſhould inhabit Britaine in their time, which were giuen to the eating of mans fleſh, and therefore called Anthropophagi. Mamertinus in like ſort doth note the Redſhanks and the Iriſh (which are properlie the Scots) to be the onelie enimies of our nation, before the comming of Cæſar, as appeareth in his panegyricall oration, ſo that hereby it is found that they are no new gheſtes in Britaine. Wherefore all the controuerſie doth reſt in the time of their firſt attempt to inhabit in this Iland. Certeinlie I marueil much whie they trauell not to come in with Cantaber and Partholonus: but I ſee perfectlie that this ſhift ſhould be too groſſe for the maintenance of their deſired antiquitie. Now, as concerning their name, the Saxons tranſlated the word Scotus for Iriſh: whereby it appeareth that thoſe Iriſh, of whom Strabo and Diodorus doo ſpeake, are none other than thoſe Scots, of whom Icrome ſpeaketh Aduerſus Iouinianum, lib.2. who vſed to feed on the buttocks of boies and womens paps, as delicate diſhes. Aethicus writing of the Ile of Man, affirmeth it to be inhabited with Scots ſo well as Ireland euen in his time. Which is another proofe that the Scots and Iriſh are all one people. They were alſo called Scoti by the Romans, bicauſe their Iland & originall inhabitation thereof were vnknowne, and they themſelues an obſcure nation in the ſight of all the world. Now as concerning the Picts, whatſoeuer Ranulphus Hygden imagineth to the contrarie of their latter enterance, it is eaſie to find by Herodian and Mamertinus (of which the one calleth them Meates, the other Redſhankes and Pictones) that they were ſetled in this Ile long before the time of Seuerus, yea of Cæſar, and comming of the Scots. Which is proofe ſufficient, if no further authoritie remained extant for the ſame. So that the controuerſie lieth not in their comming alſo, but in the true time of their repaire and aduenture into this Iland out of the Orchades (out of which they gat ouer into the North parts of our countrie, as the writers doo report) and from whence they came at the firſt into the aforeſaid Ilands. For my part I ſuppoſe with other, that they came hither out of Sarmatia or Scythia: for that nation hauing had alwaies an eie vnto the commodities of our countrie, hath ſent out manie companies to inuade and ſpoile the ſame. It may be that ſome will gather, thoſe to be the Picts, of whom Cæſar ſaith that they ſtained their faces with wad and madder, to the end they might appeare terrible and fearefull to their enimies; and ſo inferre that the Picts were naturall Britans. But it is one thing to ſtaine the face onelie as the Britans did, of whom Propertius ſaith,

Of the Picts.

Nunc etiam infectos demum mutare Britannos,

And to paint the images and portraitures of beaſts, fiſh and foules ouer the whole bodie, as the Picts did, of whom Martial ſaith, Barbara depictis veni Baſcauda Britannis.

Certes the times of Samothes and Albion, haue ſome likelie limitation: and ſo we may gather of the comming in of Brute, of Cæſar, the Saxons, the Danes, the Normans, and finallie of the Flemmings, (who had the Roſſe in Wales aſſigned vnto them 1066. after the drowning of their countrie.) But when firſt the Picts, & then the Scots ſhould come ouer into our Iland, as they were obſcure people, ſo the time of their arriuall is as far to me vnknowne. Wherefore the reſolution of this point muſt ſtill remaine In tenebris. This neuertheleſſe is certeine, that Maximus firſt Legate of Britaine, and afterward emperour, draue the Scots out of Britaine, and compelled them to get habitation in Ireland, the out Iles, and the North part of the maine, and finallie diuided their region betweene the Britaines and the Picts. He denounced warre alſo againſt the Iriſhmen, for receiuing them into their land: but they crauing the peace, yeelded to ſubſcribe, that from thence-forth they would not receiue any Scot into their dominions; and ſo much the more, for that they were pronounced enimies to the Romans, and diſturbers of the common peace and quietneſſe of their prouinces here in England.

The Saxons became firſt acquainted with this Ile, by meanes of the piracie which they dailie practiſed vpon our coaſtes (after they had once begun to aduenture themſelues alſo vpon the ſeas, thereby to ſeeke out more wealth than was now to be gotten in the Weſt parts of the maine, which they and their neighbours had alreadie ſpoiled in moſt lamentable and barbarous maner) howbeit they neuer durſt preſume to inhabit in this Iland, vntill they were ſent for by Vortiger to ſerue him in his warres againſt the Picts and Scots, after that the Romans had giuen vs ouer, and left vs wholie to our owne defenſe and regiment. Being therefore come vnder Hengiſt in three bottoms or keeles, and in ſhort time eſpieng the idle and negligent behauiour of the Britaines, and fertilitie of our ſoile, they were not a little inflamed to make a full conqueſt of ſuch as at the firſt they came to aid and ſuccour. Herevpon alſo they fell by little and little to the winding in of greater numbers of their countrimen and neighbours, with their wiues and children into this region, ſo that within a while theſe new comlings began to moleſt the homelings, and ceaſed not from time to time to continue their purpoſe, vntill they had gotten poſſeſſion of the whole, or at the leaſtwiſe the greateſt part of our countrie; the Britons in the meane ſeaſon being driuen either into Wales and Cornewall, or altogither out of the Iland to ſeeke new habitations.

The hurt by forren aid.

In like maner the Danes (the next nation that ſucceeded) came at the firſt onelie to pilfer and robbe vpon the frontiers of our Iland, till that in the end, being let in by the Welſhmen or Britons through an earneſt deſire to be reuenged vpon the Saxons, they no leſſe plagued the one than the other, their friends than their aduerſaries, ſeeking by all meanes poſſible to eſtabliſh themſelues alſo in the ſure poſſeſſion of Britaine. But ſuch was their ſucceſſe, that they proſpered not long in their deuiſe: for ſo great was their lordlineſſe, crueltie, and inſatiable deſire of riches, beſide their deteſtable abuſing of chaſt matrons, and young virgins (whoſe huſbands and parents were dailie inforced to become their drudges and ſlaues, whileſt they ſat at home and fed like drone bees of the ſweet of their trauell and labours) that God I ſay would not ſuffer them to continue any while ouer vs, but when he ſaw his time he remoued their yoke, and gaue vs libertie as it were to breath vs, thereby to ſee whether this his ſharpe ſcourge could haue moued vs to repentance and amendment of our lewd and ſinfull liues, or not. But when no ſigne thereof appeared in our hearts, he called in an other nation to vex vs, I meane the Normans, a people mixed with Danes, and of whom it is worthilie doubted, whether they were more hard and cruell to our countrimen than the Danes, or more heauie and intollerable to our Iland than the Saxons or the Romans. This nation came out of Newſtria, the people thereof were called Normans by the French, bicauſe the Danes which ſubdued that region, came out of the North parts of the world: neuertheleſſe, I ſuppoſe that the ancient word Newſtria, is corrupted from Weſt-rike, bicauſe that if you marke the ſituation, it lieth oppoſite from Auſtria or Oſt-rike, which is called the Eaſt region, as Newſtria is the Weſt: for Rike in the old Scithian tong doth ſignifie a region or kingdome, as in Franc-rike, or Franc-reich, Weſtſaxon-reich, Oſtſaxon-reich, Su-rike, Angel-rike, &c, is elſe to be ſeene. But howſoeuer this falleth out, theſe Normans

Danes.

The Normans.

or Danish French, were dedlie aduersaries to the English Saxons, first by meane of a quarell that grew betweene them in the daies of Edward the Confessour, at such time as the Earle of Bullen, and William Duke of Normandie, arriued in this land to visit him, & their freends; such Normans (I meane) as came ouer with him and Emma his mother before him, in the time of Canutus and Ethelred. For the first footing that euer the French did set in this Iland, sithence the time of Ethelbert & Sigebert, was with Emma, which Ladie brought ouer a traine of French Gentlemen and Ladies with hir into England.

The cause of the conquest by the Normans.

After hir also no small numbers of attendants came in with Edward the Confessour, whome he preferred to the greatest offices in the realme, in so much that one Robert a Norman, became Archbishop of Canturburie, whose preferment so much enhanced the minds of the French, on the one side, as their lordlie and outragious demeanour kindled the stomachs of the English nobilitie against them on the other: insomuch that not long before the death of Emma the kings mother, and vpon occasion of the brall hapning at Douer (whereof I haue made sufficient mention in my Chronologie, not regarding the report of the French authors in this behalfe, who write altogither in the fauour of their Archbishop Robert, but following the authoritie of an English priest then liuing in the court) the English Peeres began to shew their disliking in manifest maner. Neuertheles, the Normans so bewitched the king with their lieng and bolting, Robert the Archbishop being the cheefe instrument of their practise, that he beleeued them, and therevpon vered sundrie of the nobilitie, amongst whom Earle Godwin of Kent was the cheefe, a noble Gentleman and father in law to king Edward by the mariage of his daughter. The matter also came to such issue against him, that he was exiled, and fiue of his sonnes with him, whervpon he goeth ouer the sea, and sone after returning with his said sonnes, they inuaded the land in sundrie places, the father himselfe comming to London, where when the kings power was readie to ioine with him in battell, it vtterlie refused so to do: affirming plainelie, that it should be meere follie for one Englishman to fight against another, in the reuenge of Frenchmens quarels: which answer entred so deeplie into the kings mind, that he was contented to haue the matter heard, and appointing commissioners for that purpose; they concluded at the vpshot, that all the French should depart out of England by a day, few excepted, whom the king should appoint and nominate.

Archbishop of Can. exiled, and the rest of the French.

By this means therfore Robert the Archbishop, & of secret counsell with the king, was first exiled as principall abuser & seducer of the king, who gooth to Rome, & there complaineth to the Pope of his iniurie receiued by the English. Howbeit as he returned home againe with no small hope of the readeption of his See, he died in Normandie, whereby he saued a killing. Certes he was the first that euer tendered complaint out of England vnto Rome, & with him went William Bishop of London (afterward reuoked) and Vlfo of Lincolne, who hardlie escaped the furie of the English nobilitie. Some also went into Scotland, and there held themselues, expecting a better time. And this is the true historie of the originall cause of the conquest of England by the French: for after they were well beaten at Douer, bicause of their insolent demeanour there shewed, their harts neuer ceased to boile with a desire of reuenge that brake out into a flame, so sone as their Robert possessed the primacie, which being once obteined, and to set his mischeefe intended abroch withall, a contention was quicklie procured about certeine Kentish lands, and controuersie kindled, whether he or the Earle should haue most right vnto them. The king held with the priest as with the church, the nobilitie with the Earle. In processe also of this businesse, the Archbishop accused the Earle of high treason, burdening him with the slaughter of Alfred the kings brother, which was altogither false: as appeareth by a treatise yet extant of that matter, written by a chaplaine to king Edward the Confessour, in the hands of Iohn Stow my verie freend, wherein he saith thus, Alfredus incautè agens in aduentu suo in Angliam à Danis circumuentus occiditur. He addeth moreouer, that giuing out as he came through the countrie accompanied with his few proud Normans, how his meaning was to recouer his right vnto the kingdome, and supposing that all men would haue yelded vnto him, he fell into their hands, whome Harald then king did send to apprehend him, vpon the same onelie of this report brought vnto his eares. So that (to be short) after the king had made his pacification with the Earle, the French (I say) were exiled, the Quéene restored to his fauour (whom he at the beginning of this broile had imprisoned at Wilton, allowing hir but one onlie maid to wait vpon hir) and the land reduced to hir former quietnesse, which continued vntill the death of the king. After which the Normans not forgetting their old grudge, remembred still their quarell, that in the end turned to their conquest of this Iland. After which obteined, they were so cruellie bent to our vtter subuersion and ouerthrow, that in the beginning it was lesse reproch to be accounted a slaue than an Englishman, or a drudge in anie filthie businesse than a Britaine: insomuch that euerie French page was superiour to the greatest Peere; and the losse of an Englishmans life but a passtime to such of them as contended in their brauerie, who should giue the greatest strokes or wounds vnto their bodies, when their toiling and drudgerie could not please them, or satisfie their greedie humors. Yet such was our lot in those daies by the diuine appointed order, that we must needs obey such as the Lord did set ouer vs, and so much the rather, for that all power to resist was vtterlie taken from vs, and our armes made so weake and feeble that they were not now able to remoue the importable load of the enimie from our surburdened shoulders.

Erle Godwine slandered by the French writers.

The miserie of the English vnder the French.

The cause of our miserie.

And this onelie I saie againe, bicause we refused grace offered in time, and would not heare when God by his Preachers did call vs so fauourablie vnto him. Oh how miserable was the estate of our countrie vnder the French and Normans, wherein the Brittish and English that remained, could not be called to any function in the commonwealth, no not so much as to be constables and headburowes in small villages, except they could bring 2. or 3. Normans for suerties to the Lords of the soile for their good behauiour in their offices! Oh what numbers of all degrees of English and Brittish were made slaues and bondmen, and bought and sold as oxen in open market! In so much that at the first comming, the French bond were set free; and those that afterward became bond, were of our owne countrie and nation, so that few or rather none of vs remained free without some note of bondage and seruitude to the French. Hereby then we perceiue, how from time to time this Iland hath not onelie béene a prey, but as it were a common receptacle for strangers, the naturall homelings or Britons being still cut shorter and shorter, as I said before, till in the end they came not onelie to be driuen into a corner of this region, but in time also verie like vtterlie to haue béene extinguished. For had not king Edward, surnamed the saint, in his time, after greeuous wars made vpon them 1063. (wherein Harald latelie made Earle of Orenford, sonne to Godwin Earle of Kent, and after king of England, was his generall) permitted the remnant of their women to ioine in mariage with the Englishmen (when the most part of their husbands and male children were slaine with the sword) it could not haue béene otherwise chosen, but their whole race must nœds haue sustained the vttermost confusion, and thereby the memorie of the Britons vtterlie haue perished among vs.

Thus we see how England hath six times bœne subiect to the reproch of conquest. And whereas the Scots seeme to challenge manie famous victories also ouer vs, beside grœuous impositions, tributs, & dishonorable compositions: it shall suffice for answer, that they deale in this as in the most part of their historie, which is to seeke great honor by lieng, & great renowme by prating and craking. Indeed they haue done great mischéefe in this Iland, & with extreme cruelties; but as for any conquest the first is yet to heare of. Diuers other conquests also haue bœne pretended by sundrie princes sithence the conquest, onelie to the end that all priuinate lawes and tenures of possession might cease, and they make a new disposition of all things at their owne pleasure. As one by king Edw. the 3. but it toke none effect. Another by Henrie the 4. who neuertheless was at the last though hardlie drawne from the challenge by William Thorington, then cheefe Iustice of England. The third by Henrie the 7. who had some better shew of right, but yet without effect. And the last of all by Q. Marie, as some of the papists gaue out, and also would haue had hir to haue obteined, but God also staied their malices, and hir challenge. But beside the six afore mentioned, Huntingdon the old historiographer speaketh of a seuenth, likelie (as he saith) to come one daie out of the North, which is a wind that bloweth no man to good, sith nothing is to be had in those parts, but hunger & much cold. See more hereof in the historie of S. Albons, and aforsaid author which lieth on the left side of the librarie belonging now to Paules: for I regard no prophesies as one that doubteth from what spirit they do proceed, or who should be the author of them.

Whether it be likelie that any giants were, and whether they inhabited in this Ile or not. Cap. 5.

BEsides these aforesaid nations, which haue crept (as you haue heard) into our Iland, we read of sundrie giants that should inhabit here. Which report as it is not altogither incredible, sith the posterities of diuers princes were called by the name: so vnto some mens eares it seemeth so strange a rehersall, that for the same onelie cause they suspect the credit of our whole historie, & reiect it as a fable, vnworthie to be read. They also condemne the like in all other histories, especiallie of the North, where men are naturallie of greatest stature, imagining all to be but fables that is written of Starcater, Hartben, Angrine, Aruerode, &c: of whom Saxo, Iohannes Magnus and Olaus do make mention, & whose bones do yet remaine to be seene as rare miracles in nature. Of these also some in their life time were able to lift vp (as they write) a vessell of liquor of 1000. weight, or an horsse, or an oxe, & cast it on their shoulders (wherein their verie women haue bœne likewise knowne to come nére vnto them) and of the race of those men, some were séene of no lesse strength in the 1500. of Grace, wherein Olaus liued, and wrote the same of his owne experience and knowledge. Of the giant of Spaine that died of late yeares by a fall vpon the Alpes, as he either went or came fro Rome, about the purchase of a dispensation to marrie with his kinswoman (a woman also of much more than common stature) there be men yet liuing, and may liue long for age, that can saie verie much euen by their owne knowledge. Wherfore it appeareth by present experience, that all is not absolutelie vntrue which is remembred of men of such giants. For this cause therfore I haue now taken vpon me to make this briefe discourse insuing, as indeuouring therby to proue, that the opinion of giants is not altogither grounded vpon vaine and fabulous narrations, inuented onelie to delight the eares of the hearers with the report of marvellous things: but that there haue bœne such men in déed, as for their hugenesse of person haue resembled rather * high towers than mortall men, although their posterities are now consumed, and their monstruous races vtterlie worne out of knowledge. *Esay. 30. vers. 25.

I do not meane herein to dispute, whether this name Gigas or Nephilim was giuen vnto them, rather for their tyrannie and oppression of the people, than for their greatnesse of bodie, or large steps, as Goropius would haue it (for he denieth that euer men were greater than at this present) or bicause their parents were not knowne, for such in old time were called Terræ filij; or whether the word Gigas doth onlie signifie Indigenas, or homelings, borne in the land or not; neither whether all men were of like quantitie in stature, and farre more greater in old time, than now they be: and yet absolutelie I denie neither of these, sith verie probable reasons may be brought for ech of them, but especiallie the last rehearsed, whose confirmation dependeth vpon the authorities of sundrie ancient writers, who make diuers of noble race, equall to the giants in strength and manhood, and yet do not giue the same name vnto them, bicause their quarels were iust, and commonlie taken in hand for defense of the oppressed. Examples hereof we may take of Hercules and Antheus, whose wrestling declareth that they were equall in stature & stomach. Such also was the courage of Antheus, that being often ouercome, and as it were vtterlie vanquished by the said Hercules, yet if he did eftsoones returne againe into his kingdome, he forthwith recouered his force, returned and held Hercules tacke, till he gat at the last betweene him and home, so cutting off the farther hope of the restitution of his armie, and killing finallie his aduersarie in the field, of which victorie Politian writeth thus: Antheus. Lucane lib. 4. in fine.

Incaluere animis dura certare palæstra,
Neptuni quondam filium atque Iouis:
Non certamen erant operoso ex ære lebetes,
Sed qui vel vitam vel ferat interitum:
Occidit Antæum Ioue natum viuere fas est,
Est, magistra Pales Græcia, non Lybia.

The like do our historiens report of Corineus and Gomagot, peraduenture king of this Ile, who fought a combat hand to hand, till one of them was slaine, and yet for all this no man reputeth Hercules or Corineus for giants, albeit that Hanuile in his Architrenion make the later to be 12. cubits in height, which is full 18. foot, if poeticall licence do not take place in his report and assertion. But sith (I say againe) it is not my purpose to stand vpon these points, I passe ouer to speake any more of them. And whereas also I might haue proceeded in such order, that I should first set downe by manie circumstances, whether any giants were, then whether they were of such huge and incredible stature as the authours do remember, and finallie whether any of them haue bœne in this our Iland or not, I protest plainlie, that my mind is not here bent to deale in any such maner, but rather generallie to confirme and by sufficient authoritie, that there haue bœne such mightie men of stature, and some of them also in Britaine, which I will set downe onelie by sundrie examples, whereby it shall fall out, that neither our Iland, nor any part of the maine, haue at one time or other bén altogither without them. First of all therfore, & to begin with the scriptures, the most sure & certeine ground of all knowledge: you shall haue out of them such such notable examples set downe, as I haue obserued in reading the same, which vnto the godlie may suffice for sufficient proofe of my position. Neuertheleſſe, after the scriptures I will resort to the writings of our learned Diuines, and finallie of the infidell and pagane authors, whereby nothing shall seeme to want that may confute Goropius, and all his cauillations.

Deut. 3. vers. 11. Og of Basan.

Cap 17. ver. 4, 5, 6 Goliah.

Cap. 6. vers. 5. Moses the prophet of the Lord, writing of the estate of things before the floud, hath these words in his booke of generations. In these daies saith he, there were giants vpon the earth. Berosus also the Chalde writeth, Anti. li. 1. that neere vnto Libanus there was a citie called Oenon (which I take to be Hanoch, builded sometime by Cham) wherein giants did inhabit, who trusting to the strength and hugenesse of their bodies, did verie great oppression and mischeefe in the world. The Hebrues called them generallie Enach, of Hanach the Chebronite, father to Achimam, Scheschai and Talma, although their first originall was deriued from Henoch the sonne of Caine, of whome that pestilent race descended, as I read. The Moabits named them Emims, and the Ammonites Zamsummims, and it should seeme by the second of Deut. cap. 19, 20. that Ammon and Moab were greatlie replenished with such men, when Moses wrote that treatise. For of these monsters some families remained of greater stature than other vnto Nu. cap. 13. vers. 33, & 34. his daies, in comparison of whome the children of Israell confessed themselues to be but grashoppers. Which is one noble testimonie that the word Gigas or Enach is so well taken for a man of huge stature, as for an homebborne child, wicked tyrant, or oppressour of the people.

Deut. 3. vers. 11. Og of Basan. Furthermore, there is mention made also in the scriptures of Og, sometime king of Basan, who was the last of the race of the giants, that was left in the land of promise to be ouercome by the Israelits, & whose iron bed was afterward shewed for a wonder at Rabbath (a citie of the Ammonites) conteining 9. cubits in length, and 4. in breadth, which cubits I take not to be geometricall, (that is, each one so great as six of the smaller, as those were wherof the Arke was made, as our Diuines affirme, especiallie Augustine: whereas Origen, hom. 2. in Gen. out of whom he seemeth to borrow it, appeareth to haue no such meaning directlie) but rather of the arme of a meane man, which oftentimes doth varie & differ from the standard. Oh how Goropius dalieth about the historie of this Og, of the breaking of his pate against the beds head, & of hurting his ribs against the sides, and all to proue, that Og was not bigger than other men, and so he leaueth the matter as sufficientlie answered with a French countenance of truth. But see Augusti. de ciuit. lib. 15. cap. 25. & ad Faustum Manich. lib. 12. Ambros. &c. and Iohannes Buteo that excellent geometrician, who hath written of purpose of the capacitie of the Arke.

Cap 17. ver. 4, 5, 6. Goliah. In the first of Samuel you shall read of Goliah a Philistine, the weight of whose brigandine or shirt of maile was of 5000. sicles, or 1250. ounces of brasse, which amounteth to 104. pound of Troie weight after 4. common sicles to the ounce. The head of his speare came vnto ten pound English or 600. sicles of that metall. His height also was measured at six cubits and an hand breadth. All which do import that he was a notable giant, and a man of great stature & strength to weare such an armour, and beweld so heaute a lance. But Goropius thinking himselfe still to haue Og in hand, and indeuouring to extenuate the fulnesse of the letter to his vttermost power, doth neuertheleſſe earnestlie affirme, that he was not aboue three foot more than the common sort of men, or two foot higher than Saule: and so he leaueth it as determined.

Cap. 21. ver. 16, 17, &c. In the second of Samuel, I find report of foure giants borne in Geth; of which Ishbenob the first, that would haue killed Dauid, had a speare, whose head weighed the iust halfe of that of Goliah: the second called Siphai, Sippai or Saph, 1. Par. 20. was nothing inferiour to the first: the third hight also Goliah, the staffe of whose speare was like vnto the beame of a weauers lome, neuertheleſſe he was slaine in the second battell in Gob by Elhanan, as the first was by Abisai Ioabs brother, and the second by Elhanan. The fourth brother (for they were all brethren) was slaine at Gath by Ionathan nephew to Dauid, and he was not onlie huge of personage, but also of disfigured forme, for he had 24. fingers and toes. Whereby it is euident, that the generation of giants was not extinguished in Palestine, vntill the time of Dauid, which was 2890. after the floud, nor vtterlie consumed in Og, as some of our expositors would haue it.

Now to come vnto our christian writers. For though the authorities alreadie alleged out of the word, are sufficient to confirme my purpose at the full; yet will I not let to set downe such other notes as experience hath reuealed, onelie to the end that the reader shall not thinke the name of giants, with their quantities, and other circumstances, mentioned in the scriptures, rather to haue some mysticall interpretation depending vpon them, than that the sense of the text in this behalfe is to be taken simplie as it speaketh. And first of all to omit that which Tertullian Lib. 2. de resurrect. saith; S. Augustine noteth, how he with other saw the tooth of a man, wherof he tooke good aduisement, and pronounced in the end that it would haue made 100. of his owne, or anie other mans that liued in his time. The like hereof also doth Iohn Boccace set downe, in the 68. chapter of his 4. booke, saieng that in the caue of a mountaine, not far from Drepanum (a towne of Sicilia called Eryx as he getteth) the bodie of an exceeding high giant was discouered, three of whose teeth did weigh 100. ounces, which being conuerted into English poise, doth yeeld eight pound and foure ounces, after twelue ounces to the pound, that is 33. ounces euerie tooth. De ciuitate Dei lib. 15. cap. 9. Iohannes Boccacius.

He addeth farther, that the forepart of his scull was able to conteine manie bushels of wheat, and by the proportion of the bone of his thigh, the Symmetricians iudged his bodie to be aboue 200. cubits. Whose teeth, scull, and bones, were (and as I thinke yet are, for ought I know to the contrarie) to be seene in the church of Drepanum in perpetuall memorie of his greatnesse, whose bodie was found vpon this occasion. As some digged in the earth to laie the foundation of an house, the miners happened vpon a great vault, not farre from Drepanum: whereinto when they were entred, they saw the huge bodie of a man sitting in the caue, of whose greatnesse they were so afraid, that they ranne awaie, and made an outerie in the citie, how there sat a man in such a place, so great as an hill: the people hearing the newes, ran out with clubs and weapons, as if they should haue gone vnto a foughten field, and 300. of them entring into the caue, they forthwith saw that he was dead, and yet sat as if he had been aliue, hauing a staffe in his hand, compared by mine author vnto the mast of a tall ship, which being touched fell by and by to dust, sauing the nether end betweene his hand and the ground, whose hollownesse was filled with 1500. pound weight of lead, to beare vp his arme that it should not fall in peeces: neuertheleſſe, his bodie also being touched fell likewise into dust, sauing three of his aforesaid teeth, the forepart of his scull, and one of his thigh bones, which are reserued to be seene of such as will hardlie beleeue these reports. A carcase discouered of 200. cubits.

In the histories of Brabant I read of a giant found, whose bones were 17. or 18. cubits in length, but Goropius, as his maner is, denieth them to be the bones of a man, affirming rather that they were the bones of an elephant, because they somwhat resembled those of two such beasts which were found at the making of the famous ditch betweene Brusels and Mechlin. As though there there were anie preciſe reſemblance betweene the bones of a man and of an elephant, or that there had euer beene anie elephant of 27. foot in length. But ſee his demeanour. In the end he granteth that another bodie was found vpon the ſhore of Rhodanus, of thirtie foot in length. Which ſomewhat ſtaieth his iudgement, but not altogither remoueth his error.

Mar. Weſtmon. The bodie of Pallas was found in Italie, in the yeare of Grace 1038. and being meaſured it conteined twentie foot in length, this Pallas was companion with Æneas.

Iohannes Leland. Maſicus, lib. 14. Trinet. Mat. Weſt. There was a carcaſe alſo laid bare 1170. in England vpon the ſhore (where the beating of the ſea had waſhed awaie the earth from the ſtone wherein it laie) and when it was taken vp, it conteined 50. foot in meaſure, as our hiſtories do report. The like was ſeene before in Wales, in the yeare 1087. of another of 14. foot.

Hector Boet. In Perth moreouer a village in Scotland another was taken vp, which to this daie they ſhew in a church, vnder the name of little Iohn (per Antiphraſin) being alſo 14. foot in length, as diuerſe do affirme which haue beholden the ſame, and whereof Hector Boetius doth ſaie, that he did put his whole arme into one of the hanch bones: which is worthie to be remembred.

In the yeare of Grace 1475. the bodie of Tulliola the daughter of Cicero was taken vp, & found higher by not a few foot than the common ſort of women liuing in thoſe daies.

Geruaſius Tilberienſis. Geruaſius Tilberienſis, head Marſhall to the king of Arles writeth in his Chronicle dedicated to Otho 4. how that at Iſoretum, in the ſuburbes of Paris, he ſaw the bodie of a man that was twentie foot long, beſide the head and the necke, which was miſſing & not found, the owner hauing peraduenture beene beheaded for ſome notable treſpaſſe committed in times paſt, or (as he ſaith) killed by S. William.

The Greeke writers make mention of Andronicus their emperour, who liued 1183. of Grace, and was ten foot in height, that is, three foot higher than the Dutch man that ſhewed himſelfe in manie places of England, 1582. this man maried Anna daughter to Lewis of France (before affured to Alexius, whome he ſtrangled, diſmembred and drowned in the ſea) the ladie not being aboue eleuen yeares of age, whereas he was an old dotard, and beſide hir he kept Marpaca a fine harlot, who ruled him as ſhe liſted.

Zonaras ſpeaketh of a woman that liued in the daies of Iuſtine, who being borne in Cilicia, and of verie comelie perſonage, was neuertheleſſe almoſt two foot taller than the talleſt woman of hir time.

Sir Thomas Eliot. A carcaſe was taken vp at Iuie church neere Saliſburie but of late yeares to ſpeake of, almoſt fourteene foot long. in Dictionario Eliotæ.

Leland in Combrit. In Gilleſland in Come Whitton paroche not far from the chapell of the Moze, ſix miles by eaſt from Carleill, a coffin of ſtone was found, and therein the bones of a man, of more than incredible greatnes. In like ſort Leland ſpeaketh of another found in the Ile called Alderney, whereof you ſhall read more in the chapiter of our Ilands.

Richard Graſton. Richard Graſton in his Manuell telleth of one whoſe ſhinbone conteined ſix foot, and thereto his ſcull ſo great that it was able to receiue fiue pecks of wheat. Wherefore by coniecturall ſymmetrie of theſe parts, his bodie muſt needs be of 24. foot, or rather more, if it were diligentlie meaſured. For the proportion of a comelie and well featured bodie, anſwereth 9. times to the length of the face, taken at large from the pitch of the crowne to the chin, as the whole length is from the ſame place vnto the ſole of the foot, meaſured by an imagined line, and ſeuered into ſo manie parts by like ouerthwart draughts, as Drurerus in his lineall deſcription of mans bodie doth deliuer. Neuertheles, this ſymmetrie is not taken by other than the well proportioned face, for recta, orbiculata (or fornicata) prona, reſupinata, and lacunata (or repanda) do ſo far degenerate from the true proportion as from the forme and beautie of the comelie. Hereby alſo they make the face taken in ſtrict maner, to be the tenth part of the whole bodie, that is, frõ the higheſt part of the forehead to the pitch of the chin, ſo that in the vſe of the word face there is a difference, wherby the 9. part is taken (I ſay) from the crowne (called Vertex, becauſe the haire there turneth into a circle) ſo that if the ſpace by a rule were truelie taken, I meane from the crowne or higheſt part of the head to the pitch of the nether chap, and multiplied by nine, the length of the whole bodie would eaſilie appeare, & ſhew it ſelfe at the full. In like maner I find, that from the elbow to the top of the midle finger is the 4. part of the whole length, called a cubit: from the waiſt to the top of the ſame finger, a tenth part: the length of the ſhinbone to the ancle a fourth part (and all one with the cubit:) from the top of the finger to the third ioint, two third parts of the face from the top of the forehead. Which obſeruations I willinglie remember in this place, to the end that if anie ſuch carcaſes happen to be found hereafter, it ſhall not be hard by ſome of theſe bones here mentioned, to come by the ſtature of the whole bodie, in certeine & exact maner. As for the reſt of the bones, ioints, parts, &c: you may reſort to Drurerus, Cardan, and other writers, ſith the farther deliuerie of them concerneth not my purpoſe. To proceed therefore with other examples, I read that the bodie of king Arthur being found in the Syluester Giraldus. In vita Seruorij de Anſheo. yeare 1189. was two foot higher than anie man that came to behold the ſame. Finallie the carcaſe of William conqueror was ſeene not manie yeares ſince (to wit, 1542.) in the citie of Cane, twelue inches longer, Conſtans fama Gallorum. by the iudgment of ſuch as ſaw it, than anie man which dwelled in the countrie. All which teſtimonies I note togither, becauſe they proceed from chriſtian writers, from whome nothing ſhould be farther or more diſtant, than of ſet purpoſe to lie, and feed the world with fables.

In our times alſo, and whileſt Francis the firſt reigned ouer France, there was a man ſeene in Aquiteine, whome the king being in thoſe parties made of his gard, whoſe height was ſuch, that a man of common heigth might eaſilie go vnder his twiſt without ſtoping, a ſtature incredible. Moreouer Caſanion, a writer of our time, telleth of the bones of Briat a giant Briat. found of late in Delphinois, of 15. cubits, the diameter of whoſe ſcull was two cubits, and the breadth of his ſhoulders foure, as he himſelfe beheld in the late ſecond wars of France, & whereunto the report of Ioan Marius made in his bookes De Galliarum illuſtrationibus, where he writeth of the carcaſe of the ſame giant found not farre from the Rhodanus, which was 22. foot long, from the ſcull to the ſole of the feet, doth yeeld ſufficient teſtimonie. Alſo Calameus in his commentaries De Biturigibus, confirmeth no leſſe, adding that he was found 1556. & ſo doth Baptiſta Fulgoſus, lib. 1. cap. 6. ſaieng farther, that his graue was ſeene not farre from Valentia, and diſcouered by the violence and current of the Rhodanus. The ſaid Caſanion in like ſort ſpeaketh of the bones of a man which he beheld, one of whoſe teeth was a foot long, and eight pound in weight. Alſo of the ſepulchre of another neere vnto Charmes caſtell, which was nine paces in length, things incredible to vs, if eieſight did not confirme it in our owne times, and theſe carcaſes were not reſerued by the verie prouidence of God, to the end we might behold his works, and by theſe relikes vnderſtand, that ſuch men were in old time in deed, of whoſe ſtatures we now begin to doubt. Now to ſay ſomwhat alſo of mine owne knowledge, there is the thighbone of a man to be ſeene in the church of S. Laurence neere Guildhall in London, which in time paſt was 26. inches in length, but now it beginneth to decaie, ſo that it is ſhorter by foure inches than it was in the time of king Edward. is to be seene in Aldermarie burie, of some called Aldermanburie, of 32. inches and rather more, whereof the symmetrie hath beene taken by some skilfull in that practise, and an image made according to that proportion, which is first in the east end of the cloister of the same church, not farre from the said bone, and sheweth the person of a man full ten or eleuen foot high, which as some say was found in the cloister of Poules, that was neere to the librarie, at such time as the Duke of Somerset did pull it downe to the verie foundation, and carried the stones thereof to the Strand, where he did build his house. These two bones haue I seene, beside other, whereof at the beholding I toke no great heed, bicause I minded not as then to haue had any such vse of their proportions, and therefore I will speake no more of them: this is sufficient for my purpose that is deliuered out of the chiefest authors.

Now it resteth furthermore that I set downe, what I haue read therof in Pagane writers, who had alwaies great regard of their credit, and so ought all men that dedicate any thing vnto posteritie, least in going about otherwise to reape renowme and praise, they do procure vnto themselues in the end nothing else but meere contempt and infamie. For my part I will touch rare things, and such as to my selfe do seeme almost incredible: howbeit as I find them, so I note them, requiring your Honour in reading hereof, to let euerie Author beare his owne burden, and euerie one his bundle.

In vita Sertorij de Antheo. Plutarch telleth how Sertorius being in Lybia, neere to the streicts of Maroco, to wit, at Tingi (or Tanger in Mauritania, as it is now called) caused the sepulchre of Antheus, afore remembred to be opened: for hearing by common report that the said giant laie buried there, whose corps was fiftie cubits long at the least, he was so far off from crediting the same, that he would not beleeue it, vntill he saw the coffin open wherein the bones of the aforesaid prince did rest. To be short therefore, he caused his souldiers to cast downe the hill made sometime ouer the tombe, and finding the bodie in the bottome coffined in stone, after the measure therof taken, he saw it manifestlie to be 60. cubits in length, which were ten more than the people made accompt of, which Strabo also confirmeth.

Pausanias reporteth out of one Miso, that when the bodie of Aiax was found, the whirlebone of his knee was adiudged so broad as a pretie dish: also that the bodie of Asterius somtime king of Creta was ten cubits long, and that of Hyllus or Gerion no lesse maruelous than the rest, all which Goropius still condemneth to be the bones of monsters of the sea (notwithstanding the manifest formes of their bones, epitaphes, and inscriptions found ingrauen in brasse and lead with them in their sepulchres) so far is he from being perswaded and led from his opinion.

Philostrate. Philostrate in Heroicis saith, how he saw the bodie of a giant thirtie cubits in length, also the carcase of another of two and twentie, and the third of twelue.

Liuie in the seauenth of his first decade, speaketh of an huge person which made a challenge as he stood at the end of the Anien bridge, against any Romane that would come out and fight with him, whose stature was not much inferiour to that of Golias, of Artaches (of whome Herodot speaketh in the historie of Xerxes) who was fiue common cubits of stature, which make but fiue of the kings standard, bicause this is longer by three fingers than the other. Of Pusio, Secundilla, & Cabaras, of which the first two liuing vnder Augustus were aboue ten foot, and the later vnder Claudius of full nine, and all remembred by Plinie; of Eleazar a Iew, of whome Iosephus saith, that he was sent to Tiberius, and a person of heigth fiue cubits; of another of whom Nicephorus maketh mention lib. 12. cap. 13. Hist. eccles. of fiue cubits and an handfull, I say nothing, bicause Casanion of Mutterell hath alredie sufficientlie discoursed vpon these examples in his De gigantibus, which as I gesse he hath written of set purpose against Goropius, who in his Gigantomachia, supposeth himselfe to haue killed all the giants in the world, and like a new Iupiter Alterum carcasse Herculem, as the said Casanion doth merilie charge and vpbraid him.

Plinie telleth of an earthquake at Creta, which discouered the body of a giant, that was 46. cubits in length after the Romane standard, and by diuerse supposed to be the bodie of Orion or Ætion. Neuertheless I read, that Lucius Flaccus and Metellus did sweare Per sua capita, that it was either the carcase of some monster of the sea, or a forged deuise to bleare the peoples eies withall, wherein it is wonderfull to see, how they please Goropius as one that first deriued his fantasticall imagination from their asseueration & oth. The said Plinie also addeth that the bodie of Orestes was seuen cubits in length, one Gabbara of Arabia nine foot nine inches, and two reserued In conditorio Sallustianorum halfe a foot longer than Gabbara was, for which I neuer read that anie man was driuen to sweare. Lib. 7.

Trallianus writeth how the Athenienses digging on a time in the ground, to laie the foundation of a new wall to be made in a certeine Iland in the daies of an emperour, did find the bones of Macrosyris in a coffin of hard stone, of 100. cubits in length after the accompt of the Romane cubit, which was then either a foot and a halfe, or not much in difference from halfe a yard of our measure now in England. These verses also, as they are now translated out of Greeke were found withall, Trallianus.

Sepultus ego Macrosyris in longa insula
Vitæ peractis annis mille quinquies: which amounteth to 81. yeares foure moneths, after the Aegyptian reckoning.

In the time of Hadrian the emperour, the bodie of the giant Ida was taken vp at Messana, conteining 20. foot in length, and hauing a double row of teeth, yet standing whole in his chaps. Eumachus also in Periegesi telleth that when the Carthaginenses went about to dich in their prouince, they found two bodies in seuerall coffins of stone, the one was 23. the other 24. cubits in length, such another was found in Bosphoro Cymmerio after an earthquake, but the inhabitants did cast those bones into the Meotidan marris. In Dalmatia, manie graues were shaken open with an earthquake, in diuers of which certeine carcases were found, whose ribs conteined 16. els, after the Romane measure, whereby the whole bodies were iudged to be 64. sith the longest rib is commonlie about the fourth part of a man, as some couing symmetricians affirme.

Arrhianus saith, that in the time of Alexander the bodies of the Assanes were generallie of huge stature, and commonlie of fiue cubits, and such was the heigth of Porus of Inde, whom the said Alexander vanquished and ouerthrew in battell.

Suidas speaketh of Ganges, killed also by the said prince, who farre exceeded Porus; for he was ten cubits long. What should I speake of Artaceas a capitaine in the host of Xerxes, afore remembred, whose heigth was within 4. fingers breadth of fiue cubits, & the tallest man in the armie except the king himselfe. Herod. lib. 7. Of Athanatus whom Plinie remembreth I saie nothing. But of all these, this one example shall passe, which I do read of in Trallianus, and he setteth downe in forme and manner following.

In the daies of Tiberius th'emperor saith he, a corps was left bare or laid open after an earthquake, of which ech tooth (taken one with another) conteined 12. inches ouer at the least. Now forsomuch as in such as be full mouthed, ech chap hath commonlie 16. teeth at the least, which amount vnto 32. in the whole, needs must the wideneste of this mans chaps be welneere of 16. foot, and the opening of his lips fiue at the least. A large A mouth of fifteene foot wide.

mouth in mine opinion, and not to eat peason with Ladies of my time, besides that if occasion serued, it was able to receiue the whole bodies of mo than one of the greatest men, I meane of such as we be in our daies. When this carcase was thus found, euerie man marueiled at it, & good cause why. A messenger was sent to Tiberius the emperour also to know his pleasure, whether he would haue the same brought ouer vnto Rome or not, but he forbad them, willing his Legate not to remoue the dead out of his resting place, but rather somewhat to satisfie his phantasie to send him a tooth out of his head, which being done, he gaue it to a cunning workeman, commanding him to shape a carcase of light matter, after the proportion of the tooth, that at the least by such means he might satisfie his curious mind, and the fantasies of such as are delited with nouelties. To be short, when the image was once made and set vp on end, it appeered rather an huge colossie than the true carcase of a man, and when it had stood in Rome vntill the people were wearie & throughlie satisfied with the sight thereof, he caused it to be broken all to peeces, and the tooth sent againe to the carcase frō whence it came, willing them moreouer to couer it diligentlie, and in anie wise not to dismember the corps, nor from thence forth to be so hardie as to open the sepulchre anie more. Pausan. lib. 8. telleth in like maner of Hiplodanus & his fellowes, who liued when Rhea was with child of Osyris by Cham, and were called to hir aid at such time as she feared to be molested by Hammon hir first husband, whilest she remained vpon the Thoumasian hill, In ipso loco, saith he, spectantur ossa maiora multo quàm vt humana existimari possint, &c. Of Protophanes who had but one great and broad bone in steed of all his ribs on ech side I saie nothing, sith it concerneth not his stature.

I could rehearse manie mo examples of the bodies of such men, out of Solinus, Sabellicus, D. Cooper, and others. As of Oetas and Ephialtes, who were said to be nine orgies or paces in heigth, and foure in bredth, which are taken for so many cubits, bicause there is small difference betweene a mans ordinarie pace and his cubit, and finallie of our Richard the first, who is noted to beare an are in the wars, the iron of whose head onelie weighed twentie pound after our greatest weight, and whereof an old writer that I haue seene, saith thus:

This king Richard I vnderstand,
Yer he went out of England,
Let make an axe for the nones,
Therewith to cleaue the Saracens bones,
The head in sooth was wrought full weele,
Thereon were twentie pound of steele,
And when he came in Cyprus land,
That ilkon axe he tooke in hand, &c.

I could speake also of Gerards staffe or lance, yet to be seene in Gerards hall at London in Basing lane, which is so great and long that no man can beweld it, neither go to the top thereof without a ladder, which of set purpose and for greater countenance of the wonder is fixed by the same. I haue seene a man my selfe of seuen foot in heigth, but lame of his legs. The chronicles also of Cogshall speake of one in Wales, who was halfe a foot higher, but through infirmitie and wounds not able to beweld himselfe. I might (if I thought good) speake also of another of no lesse heigth than either of these and liuing of late yeares, but these here remembred shall suffice to prooue my purpose withall. I might tell you in like sort of the marke stone which Turnus threw at Æneas, and was such as that twelue chosen and picked men (saith Virgil, were not able so stur and remoue out of the place: but I passe it ouer, and diuerse of the like, concluding that these huge blocks were ordeined and created by God: first for a testimonie vnto vs of his power and might; and secondlie for a confirmation, that bugenes of bodie is not to be accompted of as a part of our felicitie, sith they which possessed the same, were not onelie tyrants, doltish, & euill men, but also oftentimes ouercome euen by the weake & feeble. Finallie they were such indeed as in whom the Lord delited not, according to the saieng of the prophet Baruch; Ibi fuerunt gigantes nominati, illi qui ab initio fuerunt statura magna, scientes bellum, hos non elegit Dominus, neque illis viam disciplinæ dedit, propterea perierunt, & quoniam non habuerunt sapientiam, interierunt propter suam insipientiam, &c. that is, There were the giants famous from the beginning, that were of great stature and expert in warre, those did not the Lord chose, neither gaue he the waie of knowledge vnto them, but they were destroied, because they had no wisedome, and perished through their owne foolishnesse. Cap. 3. 26.

What the bodies of men also do dailie decaie in stature, beside Plinie lib. 7. Esdras likewise confesseth lib. 4. cap. 5. whose authoritie is so good herein as that of Homer or Plinie, who do affirme so much, whereas Goropius still continuing his wonted pertinacitie also in this behalfe, maketh his proposition first by the old Romane foot, and then by his owne, & thereupon concludeth that men in these daies be fullie so great as euer they were, whereby as in the former dealing he thinketh it nothing to conclude against the scriptures, chosen writers and testimonies of the oldest pagans. But see how he would salue all at last in the end of his Gigantomachia, where he saith, I denie not but that od huge personages haue bene seene, as a woman of ten, and a man of nine foot long, which I my selfe also haue beholden, but as now so in old time the common sort did so much wonder at the like as we do at these, bicause they were seldome seene, and not commonlie to be heard of. 4. Esd. cap. 5.

Of the languages spoken in this Iland.
Cap. 6.

WHat language came first with Samothes and afterward with Albion, and the giants of his companie, it is hard for me to determine, sith nothing of sound credit remaineth in writing, which may resolue vs in the truth hereof. Yet of so much are we certeine, that the speach of the ancient Britons, and of the Celts, had great affinitie one with another, so that they were either all one, or at leastwise such as either nation with small helpe of interpretors might vnderstand other, and readilie discerne what the speaker meant. Some are of the opinion that the Celts spake Greeke, and how the British tong resembled the same, which was spoken in Grecia before Homer did reforme it: but I see that these men do speake without authoritie and therefore I reiect them, for if the Celts which were properlie called Galles did speake Greeke, why did Cesar in his letters sent to Rome vse that language, because that if they should be intercepted they might not vnderstand them, or why did he not vnderstand the Galles, he being so skilfull in the language without an interpretor? Yet I denie not but that the Celtish and British speaches might haue great affinitie one with another, and the British aboue all other with the Greeke, for both do appeere by certeine words, as first in tri for three, march for an horsse, & trimarchia, whereof Pausanias speaketh, for both. Atheneus also writeth of Bathanasius a capitaine of the Galles, whose name is meere British, compounded of Bath & Ynad, & signifieth a noble or comelie iudge. And whereas he saith that the reliques of the Galles tooke vp their first dwelling about Isther, and afterward diuided themselues in such wise, that they which went and dwelled in Hungarie were called Sordsai, and the other that inha- British. Small difference betweene the British and Celtike languages.

inhabited within the dominion of Tyrroll) Brennt, whose seate was on the mount Brenhere parcell of the Alpes, what else signifieth the word Iscaredich in British, from whence the word Scordisci commeth, but to be diuided? Hereby then, and sundrie other the like testimonies, I gather that the British and the Celtish speaches had great affinitie one with another, as I said, which Cesar (speaking of the similitude or likenesse of religion in both nations) doth also auerre; & Tacitus in vita Agricolæ, in like sort plainlie affirmeth, or else it must needs be that the Galles which inuaded Italie and Greece were meere Britons, of whose likenes of speech with the Greeke tong I need not make anie triall, sith no man (I hope) will readilie denie it. Appianus talking of the Brennt calleth them Cymbres, and by this I gather also that the Celts and the Britons were indifferentlie called Cymbri in their owne language, or else that the Britons were the right Cymbri, who vnto this daie do not refuse to be called by that name. Bodinus writing of the means by which the originall of euerie kingdome and nation is to be had and discerned, setteth downe three waies whereby the knowledge thereof is to be found, one is (saith he) the infallible testimonie of the sound writers, the other the description and site of the region, the third the relikes of the ancient speech remaining in the same. Which later if it be of any force, then I must conclude, that the speech of the Britons and Celts was sometime either all one or verie like one to another, or else it must follow that the Britons ouerflowed the continent vnder the name of Cymbres, being peraduenture associat in this votage, or mixed by invasion with the Danes, and Norwegiens, who are called Cymbri and Cymmerij, as most writers do remember. This also is euident (as Plutarch likewise confesseth In vita Mary) that no man knew from whence the Cymbres came in his daies, and therfore I beleeue that they came out of Britaine, for all the maine was well knowne vnto them, I meane euen to the vttermost part of the north, as may appeare furthermore by the slaues which were dailie brought from thence vnto them, whom of their countries they called Daui for Daci, Getæ for Gothes, &c: for of their conquests I need not make rehearsall, sith they are commonlie knowne and remembred by the writers, both of the Greekes and Latines.

British corrupted by the Latine and Saxon speeches.

The British tong called Camberaec doth yet remaine in that part of the Iland, which is now called Wales, whither the Britons were driuen after the Saxons had made a full conquest of the other, which we now call England, although the primitiue integritie thereof be not a little diminished by mixture of the Latine and Saxon speaches withall. Howbeit, manie poesies and writings (in making whereof that nation hath euermore delited) are yet extant in my time, whereby some difference betweene the ancient and present language may easilie be discerned, notwithstanding that among all these there is nothing to be found, which can set downe anie sound and full testimonie of their owne originall, in remembrance whereof, their Bards and cunning men haue beene most slacke and negligent. Giraldus in praising the Britons affirmeth that there is not one word in all their language, that is not either Greeke or Latine. Which being rightly vnderstanded and conferred with the likenesse that was in old time betweene the Celts & the Britith tongs, will not a little helpe those that thinke the old Celtish to haue some sauour of the Greeke. But how soeuer that matter standeth, after the Britith speach came once ouer into this Iland, sure it is, that it could neuer be extinguished for all the attempts that the Romans, Saxons, Normans, and Englishmen could make against that nation, in anie maner of wise.

The Britons diligent in pedigrees.

Petigrees and genealogies also the Welsh Britons haue plentie in their owne tong, insomuch that manie of them can readilie derriue the same, either from Brute or some of his band, euen vnto Æneas and other of the Trolans, and so forth vnto Noah without anie maner of stop. But as I know not what credit is to be giuen vnto them in this behalfe, although I must néeds confesse that their ancient Bards were verie diligent in there collection, and had also publike allowance or salaris for the same; so I dare not absolutelie impugne their assertions, sith that in times past all nations (learning it no doubt of the Hebrues) did verie solemnelie preserue the catalogs of their descents, thereby either to shew themselues of ancient and noble race, or else to be descended from some one of the gods. But

Sed senuata quid fadiunt? quid prodest Pontice longo Sanguine celsa seni? Bitho quid auorum dicere turmas? &c.

Latine.

Next vnto the Britith speach, the Latine tong was brought in by the Romans, and in maner generallie planted through the whole region, as the French was after by the Normans. Of this tong I will not say much, bicause there are few which be not skilfull in the same. Howbeit, as the speach it selfe is easie and delectable, so hath it peruerted the names of the ancient riuers, regions, & cities of Britaine in such wise, that in these our daies their old Britith denominations are quite growne out of memorie, and yet those of the new Latine left as most vncertaine. This remaineth also vnto my time, borowed from the Romans, that all our deeds, euidences, charters, & writings of record, are set downe in the Latine tong, though now verie barbarous, and therevnto the copies and court-rolles, and processes of courts and leets registred in the same.

The Saxon toong.

The third language apparantlie knowne is the Scithian or high Dutch, induced at the first by the Saxons (which the Britons call Saysonaec, as they do the speakers Sayson) an hard and rough kind of speach, God wot, when our nation was brought first into acquaintance withall, but now changed with vs into a farre more fine and easie kind of vttérance, and so polished and helped with new and milder words, that it is to be auouched how there is no one speach vnder the sunne spoken in our time, that hath or can haue more varieties of words, copie of phrases, or figures and floures of eloquence, than hath our English tong, although some haue affirmed vs rather to barke as dogs, than talke like men, bicause the most of our words (as they do indéed) incline vnto one syllable. This also is to be noted as a testimonie remaining still of our language, deriued from the Saxons, that the generall name for the most part of euerie skilfull artificer in his trade endeth in Here with vs, albeit the H be left out, and er onlie inserted, as Scriuenhere, writehere, shiphere, &c: for scriuener, writer, and shipper, &c: beside manie other relikes of that speech, neuer to be abolished.

The French toong.

After the Saxon tong, came the Norman or French language ouer into our countrie, and therein were our lawes written for a long time. Our children also were by an especiall decree taught first to speake the same, and therevnto inforced to learne their constructions in the French, whensoeuer they were set to the Grammar schole. In like sort few bishops, abbats, or other clergie men, were admitted vnto anie ecclesiasticall function here among vs, but such as came out of religious houses from beyond the seas, to the end they should not vse the English tong in their sermons to the people. In the court also it grew into such contempt, that most men thought it no small dishonor to speake any English there. Which brauerie toke his hold at the last likewise in the countrie with euerie plowman, that euen the verie carters began to wax wearie of there mother tong, & laboured to speake French, which as then was counted no small token of gentilitie. And no maruell, for euerie French rascall, when he came once hither, was taken for a gentleman, onelie bicause he was proud, and could vse his owne language, and all this (I say) to erile the English and British speaches quite out of the countrie. But in vaine, for in the time of king Edward the first, to wit, toward the latter end of his reigne, the French it selfe ceased to be spoken generallie, but most of all and by law in the misst of Edward the third, and then began the English to recouer and grow in more estimation than before; notwithstanding that among our artificers, the most part of their implements, toles and words of art reteine still their French denominations euen to these our daies, as the language it selfe is vsed likewise in sundrie courts, bookes of record, and matters of law; whereof here is no place to make any particular rehearsall. Afterward also, by diligent trauell of Geffray Chaucer, and Iohn Gowre, in the time of Richard the second, and after them of Iohn Scogan, and Iohn Lydgate monke of Berrie, our said tong was brought to an excellent passe, notwithstanding that it neuer came vnto the type of perfection, vntill the time of Queene Elizabeth, wherein Iohn Iewell B. of Sarum, Iohn Fox, and sundrie learned & excellent writers haue fullie accomplished the nature of the same, to their great praise and immortall commendation; although not a few other do greatlie seeke to staine the same, by fond affectation of forren and strange words, presuming that to be the best English, which is most corrupted with externall termes of eloquence, and sound of manie syllables. But as this excellencie of the English tong is found in one, and the south part of this Iland; so in Wales the greatest number (as I said) retaine still their owne ancient language, that of the north part of the said countrie being lesse corrupted than the other, and therefore reputed for the better in their owne estimation and iudgement. This also is proper to vs Englishmen, that sith ours is a meane language, and neither too rough nor too smooth in vtterance, we may with much facilitie learne any other language, beside Hebrue, Greeke & Latine, and speake it naturallie, as if we were home-borne in those countries; & yet on the other side it falleth out, I wot not by what other meanes, that few forren nations can rightlie pronounce ours, without some and that great note of imperfection, especiallie the French men, who also seldome write any thing that sauoreth of English trulie. It is a pastime to read how Natalis Comes in like maner, speaking of our affaires, doth clip the names of our English lords. But this of all the rest doth breed most admiration with me, that if any stranger do hit vpon some likelie pronuntiation of our tong, yet in age he swarueth so much from the same, that he is worse therein than euer he was, and thereto peraduenture halteth not a litle also in his owne, as I haue seene by experience in Reginald Wolfe, and other, whereof I haue iustlie maruelled.

The helpers of our English toong.

The Cornish toong.

The Cornish and Deuonshire men, whose countrie the Britons call Cerniw, haue a speach in like sort of their owne, and such as hath in deed more affinitie with the Armoricane tong than I can well discusse. Yet in mine opinion, they are both but a corrupted kind of British, albeit so far degenerating in these daies from the old, that if either of them do meete with a Welshman, they are not able at the first to vnderstand one another, except here and there in some od words, without the helpe of interpretors. And no maruell in mine opinion that the British of Cornewall is thus corrupted, sith the Welsh tong that is spoken in the north & south part of Wales, doth differ so much in it selfe, as the English vsed in Scotland doth from that which is spoken among vs here in this side of the Iland, as I haue said alreadie.

Scottish english.

The Scottish english hath been much broader and lesse pleasant in vtterance than ours, because that nation hath not till of late indeuored to bring the same to any perfect order, and yet it was such in maner, as Englishmen themselues did speake for the most part beyond the Trent, whither any great amendement of our language had not as then extended it selfe. Howbeit in our time the Scottish language endeuoreth to come neere, if not altogither to match our tong in finenesse of phrase, and copie of words, and this may in part appeare by an historie of the Apocripha translated into Scottish verse by Hudson, dedicated to the king of that countrie, and conteining fiue books, except my memorie do faile me.

This we see how that vnder the dominion of the king of England, and in the south parts of the realme, we haue these seuerall tongs, that is to saie, English, British, and Cornish, and euen so manie are in Scotland, if you accompt the English speach for one: notwithstanding that for breadth and quantitie of the region, I meane onelie of the side of the maine Iland, it be somewhat lesse to see to than the other. For in the north part of the region, where the wild Scots, otherwise called the Redshanks, or rough footed Scots (because they go bare footed and clad in mantels ouer their safron shirts after the Irish maner) do inhabit, they speake good Irish which they call Gachtlet, as they say of one Gathelus, whereby they shew their originall to haue in times past been fetched out of Ireland: as I noted also in the chapter precedent, and whereunto Vincentius cap. de insulis Oceani doth yeeld his assent, saieng that Ireland was in time past called Scotia; Scotia eadem (saith he) est Hibernia, proxima Britanniæ insula, spatio terrarum angustior, sed situ fœcundior; Scotia autem à Scotorum gentibus traditur appellata, &c. Out of the 14. booke of Isidorus intituled Originum, where he also addeth that it is called Hybernia, because it bendeth toward Iberia. But I find elsewhere that it is so called by certeine Spaniards which came to seeke and plant their inhabitation in the same, whereof in my Chronologie I haue spoken more at large.

In the Iles of the Orchades, or Orkeney, as we now call them, & such coasts of Britaine as do abbut vpon the same, the Gottish or Danish speach is altogither in vse, and also in Shetland, by reason (as I take it) that the princes of Norwaie held those Ilands so long vnder their subiection, albeit they were otherwise reputed as rather to belong to Ireland, because that the verie soile of them is enimie to poison, as some write, although for my part I had neuer any sound experience of the truth hereof. And thus much haue I thought good to speake of our old speaches, and those fiue languages now vsuallie spoken within the limits of our Iland.

Into how manie kingdoms this Iland hath beene diuided. Cap. 7.

IT is not to be doubted, but that at the first, the whole Iland was ruled by one onelie prince, and so continued from time to time, vntill ciuill discord, grounded vpo ambitious desire to reigne, caused the same to be gouerned by diuerse. And this I meane so well of the time before the comming of Brute, as after the extinction of his whole race & posteritie. Howbeit, as it is vncerteine into how manie regions it was seuered, after the first partition; so it is most sure that this latter disturbed estate of regiment, continued in the same, not onelie vntill the time of Cæsar, but also in maner vnto the daies of Lucius, with whome the whole race of the Britons had an end, and the Romans full possession of this Iland, who gouerned it by Legats after the maner of a prouince. It should seeme also that within a while after the time of Dunwallon (who rather brought those foure princes that vsurped in his time to obedience, than extinguished their titles, & such partition as they had made of the Iland among themselues ſelues) each great citie had hir freedome and ſeuerall kind of regiment, proper vnto hir ſelfe, beſide a large circuit of the countrie appertinent vnto the ſame, wherein were ſundrie other cities alſo of leſſe name, which ought homage and all ſubiection vnto the greater ſort. And to ſaie truth, hereof it came to paſſe, that each of theſe regions, whereinto this Iland was then diuided, toke his name of ſome one of theſe cities; although Ciuitas after Cæſar doth ſometime ſignifie an whole continent or kingdome, whereby there were in old time Tot ciuitates quot regna, and contrariwiſe as may appeare by that of the Trinobantes, which was ſo called of Trinobantum the chiefe citie of that portion, whoſe territories conteined all Eſſex, Middleſex, and part of Hertfordſhire, euen as the iuriſdiction of the biſhop of London is now extended, for the ouerſight of ſuch things as belong vnto the church. Ech of the gouernors alſo of theſe regions, called themſelues kings, and therevnto either of them dailie made warre vpon other, for the inlarging of their limits. But for ſomuch as I am not able to ſaie how manie did challenge this authoritie at once, and how long they reigned ouer their ſeuerall portions, I will paſſe ouer theſe ancient times, and come nerer vnto our owne, I meane the 600. yeere of Chriſt, whereof we haue more certeine notice, & at which ſeaſon there is euident proofe, that there were twelue or thirteene kings reigning in this Iland.

Wales diuided into three kingdomes.

We find therefore for the firſt, how that Wales had hir three ſeuerall kingdomes, which being accompted togither conteined (as Giraldus ſaith) 49. cantreds or cantons (whereof three were in his time poſſeſſed by the French and Engliſh) although that whole portion of the Iland extended in thoſe daies no farder than about 200. miles in length, and one hundred in breadth, and was cut from Lhoegres by the riuers Sauerne and Dee, of which two ſtreames this doth fall into the Iriſh ſea at Weſtchcſter, the other into the maine Ocean, betwixt Somerſetſhire and Southwales, as their ſeuerall courſes ſhall witneſſe more at large.

Gwinhed.

In the begining it was diuided into two kingdoms onelie, that is to ſaie, Venedotia or Gwynhedh (otherwiſe called Dehenbarth) and Demetia, for which we now vſe moſt cõmonlie the names of South & Northwales. But in a ſhort proceſſe of time a third ſprung vp in the verie middeſt betweene them both, which from thence-forth was called Powiſy, as ſhalbe ſhewed hereafter. For Roderije the great, who flouriſhed 850. of Chriſt, and was king of all Wales (which then conteined onlie ſir regions) leauing three ſons behind him, by his laſt will & teſtament diuided the countrie into three portions, according to the number of his children, of which he aſſigned one vnto either of them, whereby Morwing or Morwinner had Gwynhedh or Northwales, Cadelh Demetia or Southwales, and Anaralt Powiſy, as Giraldus and other do remember. Howbeit it came to paſſe that after this diuiſion, Cadelh ſuruiued all his brethren, and thereby became lord of both their portions, and his ſucceſſors after him vntill the time of Teuther or Theodor (all is one) after which they were contented to keepe themſelues within the compaſſe of Demetia, which (as I ſaid) conteined 29. of thoſe 49. cantreds before mentioned, as Powiſy did ſir, and Gwinhedh foureteene, except my memorie do faile me.

Venedotia.

The firſt of theſe three, being called as (I ſaid) Northwales or Venedotia (or as Paulus Iouius ſaith Malſabrene, for he diuideth Wales alſo into three regions, of which he calleth the firſt Dumbera, the ſecond Berſrona, and the third Malſabrene) lieth directlie ouer againſt the Ile of Angleſet, the chiefe citie whereof ſtood in the Ile of Angleſei and was called Aberfraw. It conteineth 4. regions, of which the ſaid Iland is the firſt, and whereof in the chapter inſuing I will intreate more at large.

Angleſei.

Arfon.

The ſecond is called Arfon, and ſituate betweene two riuers, the Segwy and the Conwy. The third is Merioneth, and as it is ſeuered from Arfon by the Conwy, ſo is it ſeparated from Tegenia (otherwiſe called Stradcluyd or Tegenia. Stradcluyd and Igenia the fourth region) by the riuer Cluda. Finallie, the limits of this latter are extended alſo euen vnto the Dee it ſelfe, and of theſe foure regions conſiſteth the kingdome of Venedotia, whereof in times paſt the region of the Canges was not the ſmalleſt portion.

Powiſy.

The kingdome of Powiſy, laſt of all erected, as I ſaid, hath on the north ſide Gwinhedh, on the eaſt (from Cheſter to Hereford, or rather to Deane forreſt) England, on the ſouth and weſt the riuer Wy and verie high hilles, whereby it is notablie ſeuered from Southwales, the chiefe citie thereof being at the firſt Salopſburg, in old time Pengwerne, and Puwithig, but now Shrowſburie, a citie or towne raiſed out of the ruines of Vricouium, which (ſtanding 4. miles from thence, and by the Saxons called Wrekenceſter and Wrokeceſter, before they ouerthrew it) is now inhabited with mere Engliſh, and where in old time the kings of Powiſy did dwell and hold their palaces, till Engliſhmen draue them from thence to Matranall in the ſame prouince, where they from thenceforth abead. Vpon the limits of this kingdome, and not far from Holt caſtell, vpon ech ſide of the riuer, as the chanell now runneth, ſtood ſometime the famous monaſterie of Bangor, whileſt the abated glorie of the Britons yet remained vnextinguiſhed, and herein were 2100. monkes, of which, the learned ſort did preach the Goſpell, and the vnlearned labored with their hands, thereby to mainteine themſelues, and to ſuſtaine their preachers. This region was in like ſort diuided afterward in twaine, of which, the one was called Hailor or Hailroſſe, the other reteined ſtill hir old denomination, and of theſe the firſt laie by ſouth, & the latter by north of the Sauerne.

Bangor.

Hailroſſe.

As touching Hailroſſe, I read moreouer in the geſts of Fowkes de Warren, how that one William ſonne to a certeine ladie ſiſter to Paine Peuerell, the firſt lord of Whittington, after the conqueſt did win a part of the ſame, and the hundred of Elleſmore from the Welſhmen, in which enterpriſe he was ſo deſperatlie wounded, that no man highte him life; yet at the laſt by eating of the ſhield of a wild bore, he got an appetite and recouered his health. This William had iſſue two daughters, to wit, Helene maried to the heire of the Alans, and Mellent which refuſed mariage with anie man, except he were firſt tried to be a knight of proweſſe. Herevpon hir father made proclamation, that againſt ſuch a daie & at ſuch a place, whatſoeuer Gentleman could ſhew himſelfe moſt valiant in the field, ſhould marrie Mellent his daughter, & haue with hir his caſtell of Whittington with ſufficient liuelihood to mainteine their eſtates for euer. This report being ſpred, Fowkes de Warren came thither all in red, with a ſhield of ſiluer and pecocke for his creſt, whereof he was called the red knight, and there ouercomming the kings ſonne of Scotland, and a Baron of Burgundie, he maried the maid, and by hir had iſſue as in the treatiſe appeareth. There is yet great mention of the red knight in the countrie there about; and much like vnto this Mellent was the daughter ſometime of one of the lord Roſſes, called Kudall, who bare ſuch good will to Fitz-Henrie clarke of hir fathers kitchen, that ſhe made him carie hir awaie on horſſebacke behind him, onlie for his manhood ſake, which preſentlie was tried. For being purſued & ouertaken, ſhe made him light, & held his cloke whileſt he killed and drawe hir fathers men to flight: and then awaie they go, till hir father conceiuing a good opinion of Fitz-Henrie for this act, receiued him to his fauour, whereby that familie came vp. And thus much (by the waie) of Hailroſſe, whereof this may ſuffice, ſith mine intent is not as now to make anie preciſe deſcription of the particulars of Wales; but onelie to ſhew how thoſe regions laie, which ſometime were knowne to be gouerned in that countrie, The third kingdome is Demetia, or Southwales, ſometime knowne for the region of the Sylures, whereunto I alſo am perſuaded, that the Ordolukes laie in the eaſt part thereof, and extended their region euen vnto the Sauerne: but howſoeuer that matter falleth out, Demetia hath the Sauerne on hir ſouth, the Iriſh ſea on hir weſt parts, on the eaſt the Sauerne onelie, and by north the land of Powiſy, whereof I ſpake of late. Demetia.

Of this region alſo Caermarden, which the old writers call Maridunum, was the cheefe citie and palace belonging to the kings of Southwales, vntill at the laſt through forren and ciuill inuaſions of enimies, the princes thereof were conſtrained to remoue their courts to Dinefar (which is in Cantermawr, and ſituate neuertheleſſe vpon the ſame riuer Tewy, whereon Caermarden ſtandeth) in which place it is far better defended with high hils, thicke woods, craggie rocks, and deepe mariſes. In this region alſo lieth Pembroke alias Penmoroc ſhire, whoſe fawcons haue béene in old time very much regarded, and therein likewiſe is Milford hauen, whereof the Welſh wiſards do yet dreame ſtrange toies, which they beléeue ſhall one daie come to paſſe. For they are a nation much giuen to fortelling of things to come, but more to beléeue ſuch blind prophecies as haue béene made of old time, and no man is accompted for learned in Wales that is not ſuppoſed to haue the ſpirit of prophecie. Cair Maridunum.

That Scotland had in thoſe daies two kingdoms, (beſides that of the Ochades) whereof the one conſiſted of the Picts, and was called Pightland or Pictland, the other of the Iriſh race, and named Scotland: I hope no wiſe man will readilie denie. The whole region or portion of the Ile beyond the Scotiſh ſea alſo was ſo diuided, that the Picts laie on the eaſt ſide, and the Scots on the weſt, ech of them being ſeuered from other, either by huge hils or great lakes and riuers, that ran out of the ſouth into the north betweene them. It ſéemeth alſo that at the firſt theſe two kingdoms were diuided from the reſt of thoſe of the Britons by the riuers Cluda and Forth, till both of them deſirous to inlarge their dominions, draue the Britons ouer the Solue and the Twede, which then became march betweene both the nations. Wherefore the caſe being ſo plaine, I will ſaie no more of theſe two, but proceed in order with the reherſall of the reſt of the particular kingdoms of this our ſouth part of the Ile, limiting out the ſame by ſhires as they now lie, ſo néere as I can, for otherwiſe it ſhall be vnpoſſible for me to leaue certaine notice of the likelieſt quantities of theſe their ſeuerall portions. Pictland. Scotland. Picts. Scots.

The firſt of theſe kingdoms therefore was begunne in Kent by Henghiſt in the 456. of Chriſt, and thereof called the kingdome of Kent or Cantwarland, and as the limits thereof extended it ſelfe no farther than the ſaid countie (the cheefe citie whereof was Dorobernia or Cantwarbyrg now Canturburie) ſo it indured well néere by the ſpace of 400. yeares, before it was made an earledome or Heretochie, and vnited by Inas vnto that of the Weſt Saxons, Athelſtane his ſonne, being the firſt Earle or Heretoch of the ſame. Maiſter Lambert in his hiſtorie of Kent doth gather, by verie probable coniectures, that this part of the Iland was firſt inhabited by Samothes, and afterward by Albion. But howſoeuer that caſe ſtandeth, ſure it is that it hath béen the onelie doore, whereby the Romans and Saxons made their entrie vnto the conqueſt of the region, but firſt of all Cæſar, who entred into this Iland vpon the eightéenth Cal. of September, which was foure daies before the full of the moone, as he himſelfe confeſſeth, and then fell out about the 17. or 18. of that moneth, twelue daies before the equinoctiall (apparant) ſo that he did not tarrie at that time aboue eight or ten daies in Britaine. And as this platforme cannot be denied for his entrance, ſo the ſaid region and eaſt part of Kent, was the onelie place by which the knowledge of Chriſt was firſt brought ouer vnto vs, whereby we became partakers of ſaluation, and from the darkeneſſe of miſtie errour, true conuerts vnto the light and bright beames of the ſhining truth, to our eternall benefit and euerlaſting comforts. Kent Henghiſt.

The ſecond kingdome conteined onelie Suſſex, and a part of (or as ſome ſaie all) Surrie, which Ella the Saxon firſt held: who alſo erected his cheefe palace at Chicheſter, when he had deſtroied Andredſwald in the 492. of Chriſt. And after it had continued by the ſpace of 232. yeares, it ceaſed, being the verie leaſt kingdome of all the reſt, which were founded in this Ile after the comming of the Saxons (for to ſaie truth, it conteined little aboue 7000. families) & within a while after the erection of the kingdome of the Gewiſſes or Weſtſaxons, notwithſtanding that before the kings of Suſſex pretended and made claime to all that which laie weſt of Kent, and ſouth of the Thames, vnto the point of Cornwall, as I haue often read. Southſax. Ella. Deira. Ella. Eaſtangles Offa, à quo Offingæ.

The third regiment was of the Eaſt Saxons, or Trinobantes. This kingdome began vnder Erkenwijn, whoſe cheefe ſeat was in London (or rather Colcheſter) and conteined whole Eſſex, Middleſex, and part of Herfordſhire. It indured alſo much about the prick of 303. yeares, and was diuided from that of the Eaſt Angles onlie by the riuer Stoure, as Houeden and others do report, & ſo it continueth ſeparated from Suffolke euen vnto our times, although the ſaid riuer be now growne verie ſmall, and not of ſuch greatneſſe as it hath béene in times paſt, by reaſon that our countriemen make ſmall accompt of riuers, thinking carriage made by horſſe and cart to be the leſſe chargeable waie. But herin how far they are deceiued, I will elſe-where make manifeſt declaration. Eaſtſax. Erkenwin.

The fourth kingdome was of the Weſt Saxons, and ſo called, bicauſe it laie in the weſt part of the realme, as that of Eſſex did in the eaſt, and of Suſſex in the ſouth. It began in the yeare of Grace 519. vnder Cerdiic, and indured vntill the comming of the Normans, including at the laſt all Wiltſhire, Barkeſhire, Dorſet, Southampton, Somerſetſhire, Glocеſterſhire, ſome part of Deuonſhire (which the Britons occupied not) Cornewall, and the reſt of Surrie, as the beſt authors do ſet downe. At the firſt it conteined onelie Wiltſhire, Dorcetſhire, and Barkeſhire, but yer long the princes thereof conquered whatſoeuer the kings of Suſſex and the Britons held vnto the point of Cornewall, and then became firſt Dorcheſter (vntill the time of Kinigils) then Wincheſter the cheefe citie of that kingdome. For when Birinus the monke came into England, the ſaid Kinigils gaue him Dorcheſter, and all the land within ſeauen miles about, toward the maintenance of his cathedrall ſea, by meanes whereof he himſelfe remoued his palace to Wincheſter. Weſtſax. Cerdiic. Mertia. Creodda.

The fift kingdome began vnder Ida, in the 548. of Chriſt, and was called Northumberland, bicauſe it laie by north of the riuer Humber. And from the comming of Henghiſt to this Ida, it was onlie gouerned by earls or Heretoches as an Heretochy, till the ſaid Ida conuerted it into a kingdome. It conteined all that region which (as it ſhould ſéeme) was in time paſt either wholie apperteining to the Brigants, or whereof the ſaid Brigants did poſſeſſe the greater part. The cheefe citie of the ſame in like maner was Yorke, as Beda, Capgraue, Leyland, and others do ſet downe, who ad thereto that it extended from the Humber vnto the Scotiſh ſea, vntill the ſlaughter of Egfride of the Northumbers, after which time the Picts gat hold of all, betweene the Forth and the Twede, which afterward deſcending to the Scots by meanes of the vtter deſtruction of the Picts, hath not béene ſithens vnited to the crowne Bzennicia, alias Northumberland. Ida.

of England, nor in possession of the meere English, as before time it had béene. Such was the cruéltie of these Picts also in their recouerie of the same, that at a certeine houre they made a Sicilien euensong, and slew euerie English man, woman and child, that they could laie holy vpon within the aforesaid region, but some escaped narrowlie, and saued themselues by flight.

Deira. Ella. Afterward in the yeare of Grace 560. it was parted in twaine, vnder Adda, that reuolted vp all his portion, which lay betweene Humber and the Tine vnto his brother Ella (according to their fathers appointment) who called it Deira, or Southumberland, but reteining the rest still vnto his owne vse, he diminished not his title, but wrote himselfe as before king of all Northumberland. Howbeit after 21. yeares it was reunited againe, and so continued vntill Alfred annexed the whole to his kingdome, in the 331. after Ida, or 878. of the birth of Iesus Christ our Sauiour.

Eastangles Offa, à quo Offingæ. The seauenth kingdome, called of the East-angles, began at Norwich in the 561. after Christ, vnder Offa, of whom the people of that region were long time called Offings. This included all Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridgeshire, and Elie, and continuing 248. yeares, it flourished onelie 35. yeares in perfect estate of liberte, the rest being consumed vnder the tribut and vassallage of the Mercians, who had the souereigntie thereof, and held it with great honour, till the Danes gat hold of it, who spoiled it verie sore, so that it became more miserable than any of the other, and so remained till the kings of the West-saxons vnited it to their crowne. Some saie that Grantcester, but now Cambridge (a towne erected out of hir ruines) was the chéefe citie of this kingdome, and not Norwich. Wherein I may well shew the discord of writers, but I cannot resolue the scruple. Some take this region also to be all one with that of the Icenes, but as yet for my part I cannot yeeld to their assertions, I meane it of Leland himselfe, whose helpe I vse chéefelie in these collections, albeit in this behalfe I am not resolued that he doth iudge aright.

The 8. & last was that of Mertia, which indured 251. yeares, and for greatnesse exceeded all the rest. It tooke the name either of Meere the Saxon word, bicause it was march to the rest (and trulie, the limits of most of the other kingdomes abutted vpon the same) or else for that the lawes of Martia the Quéene were first vsed in that part of the Iland. But as this later is but a méere coniecture of some, so the said kingdome began vnder Creodda, in the 585. of Christ, & indured well neere 300. yeares before it was vnited to that of the West-saxons by Alfred, then reigning in this Ile. Before him the Danes had gotten hold thereof, and placed one Ceolulph an idiot in the same; but as he was soone reiected for his follie, so it was not long after yer the said Alfred (I saie) annexed it to his kingdome by his manhood. The limits of the Mertian dominions included Lincolne, Northampton, Chester, Darbie, Nottingham, Stafford, Huntington, Rutland, Oxford, Buckingham, Worcester, Bedford shires, and the greatest part of Shropshire (which the Welsh occupied not) Lancaster, Gloucester, Hereford (alias Hirchford) Warwike and Hertford shires: the rest of whose territories were holden by such princes of other kingdomes through force as bordered vpon the same. Moreouer, this kingdome was at one time diuided into south and north Mertia, whereof this laie beyond and the other on this side of the Trent, which later also Oswald of Northumberland did giue to Weada the sonne of Penda for kindred sake, though he not long inioied it. This also is worthie to be noted, that in these eight kingdomes of the Saxons, there were twelue princes reputed in the popish Catalog for saints or martyrs, of which Alcimund, Edwine, Oswald, Oswijn and Aldwold reigned in Northumberland; Sigebert, Ethelbert, Edmond, and another Sigebert among the Estangels; Kenelme and Wistan in Mertia; and Saint Edward the confessor, ouer all; but how worthilie, I referre me to the iudgement of the learned. Thus much haue I thought good to leaue in memorie of the aforesaid kingdomes: and now will I speake somewhat of the diuision of this Iland also into prouinces, as the Romanes seuered it whiles they remained in these parts. Which being doone, I hope that I haue discharged whatsoeuer is promised in the title of this chapter.

Limits of Mertia.

The Romans therefore hauing obteined the possession of this Iland, diuided the same at the last into fiue prouinces, as Vibius Sequester saith. The first whereof was named Britannia prima, and conteined the east part of England (as some do gather) from the Trent vnto the Twede. The second was called Valentia or Valentiana, and included the west side, as they note it, from Lirpwle vnto Tokermouth. The third hight Britannia secunda, and was that portion of the Ile which laie southwards, betwéene the Trent and the Thames. The fourth was surnamed Flauia Cæsariensis, and conteined all the countrie which remained betweene Douer and the Sauerne, I meane bysouth of the Thames, and whereunto (in like sort) Cornewall and Wales were orderlie assigned. The fift and last part was then named Maxima Cæsariensis, now Scotland, the most barren of all the rest, and yet not vnsought out of the greedie Romanes, bicause of the great plentie of fish and foule, fine alabaster and hard marble that are ingendred and to be had in the same, for furniture of household and curious building, wherein they much delited. More hereof in Sextus Rufus, who liued in the daies of Valentine, and wrate Notitiam prouinciarum now extant to be read.

¶ Thus haue I brought the Catalog of the Princes of Britaine vnto an end, & that in more plaine and certeine order than hath beene done hertofore by anie. For though in their regions ſince the conqueſt few men haue erred that haue vſed any diligence, yet in the times before the ſame, fewer haue gone any thing neere the truth, through great ouerſight & negligence. Their ſeuerall yeres alſo do appeere in my Chronologie inſuing.

Of the ancient religion vſed in Albion.
Cap. 9.

Samothes.

IT is not to be doubted, but at the firſt, and ſo long as the poſteritie of Japhet onelie reigned in this Iland, that the true knowledge and forme of religion brought in by Samothes, and publiſhed with his lawes in the ſecond of his arriuall, was exercised among the Britains. And although peraduenture in proces of time, either through curioſitie, or negligence (the onelie corruptors of true pietie and godlineſſe) it might a little decaie, yet when it was at the worſt, it farre exceded the beſt of that which afterward came in with Albion and his Chemminites, as may be gathered by view of the ſuperſtitious rites, which Cham and his ſucceſſours did plant in other countries, yet to be found in authors.

What other learning Magus the ſonne of Samothes taught after his fathers death, when he alſo came to the kingdome, beſide this which concerned the true honoring of God, I cannot eaſilie ſay, but that it ſhould be naturall philoſophie, and aſtrologie (whereby his diſciples gathered a kind of foreknowledge of things to come) the verie vſe of the word Magus (or Magusæus) among the Perſians doth yeeld no vncerteine teſtimonie.

Sarron.

In like maner, it ſhould ſeeme that Sarron ſonne vnto the ſaid Magus, diligentlie followed the ſteps of his father, and thereto beſide his owne practiſe of teaching, opened ſchooles of learning in ſundrie places, both among the Celts and Britans, whereby ſuch as were his auditors, grew to be called Sarronides, notwithſtanding, that as well the Sarronides as the Magi, and Druiydes, were generallie called Samothei, or Semnothei, of Samothes ſtill among the Grecians, as Ariſtotle in his De magia doth confeſſe; and furthermore calling them Galles, he addeth thereunto, that they firſt brought the knowledge of letters and good learning vnto the Grækes. Samothei. Semnothei.

Druiyus the ſon of Sarron (as a ſcholer of his fathers owne teaching) ſeemed to be exquiſit in all things, that perteined vnto the diuine and humane knowledge: and therefore I may ſafelie pronounce, that he excelled not onlie in the ſkill of philoſophie and the quadriuials, but alſo in the true Theologie, whereby the right ſeruice of God was kept and preſerued in puritie. He wrote moreouer ſundrie precepts and rules of religious doctrine, which among the Celts were reſerued verie religiouſlie, and had in great eſtimation of ſuch as ſought vnto them. Druiyus.

How and in what order this prince left the ſtate of religion, I meane touching publike orders in adminiſtration of particular rites and ceremonies, as yet I do not read: howbeit this is moſt certeine, that after he died, the puritie of his doctrine began ſomewhat to decaie. For ſuch is mans nature, that it will not ſuffer any good thing long to remaine as it is left, but (either by addition or ſubtraction of this or that, to or from the ſame) ſo to chop and change withall from time to time, that in the end there is nothing of more difficultie, for ſuch as do come after them, than to find out the puritie of the originall, and reſtore the ſame againe vnto the former perfection. Corruptors of religion.

In the beginning this Druiyus did preach vnto his hearers, that the ſoule of man is immortall, that God is omnipotent, mercifull as a father in ſhewing fauor vnto the godlie, and iuſt as an vpright iudge in puniſhing the wicked; that the ſecrets of mans hart are not vnknowne, and onelie knowne to him; and that as Cæſar.

the world and all that is therein had their beginning by him, at his owne will, ſo ſhall all things likewiſe haue an end, when he ſhall ſee his time. He taught them alſo with more facilitie, how to obſerue the courſes of the heauens and motions of the planets by arithmeticall induſtrie, to find out the true quantities of the celeſtiall bodies by geometricall demonſtration, and thereto the compaſſe of the earth, and hidden natures of things contained in the ſame by philoſophicall contemplation. But alas, this integritie continued not long among his ſucceſſors, for vnto the immortalitie of the ſoule, they added, that after death it went into another bodie, (of which tranſlation Ouid ſaith; Sede, nouis domibus viuunt habitántque recepta.)

Morte carent animæ, ſempérque priore relicta

The ſecond or ſuccedent, being alwaies either more noble, or more vile than the former, as the partie deſerued by his merits, whileſt he liued here vpon earth. And therefore it is ſaid by Plato and other, that Orpheus after his death had his ſoule thruſt into the bodie of a ſwanne, that of Agamemnon conueied into an egle, of Aiax into a lion, of Atlas into a certeine wreſtler, of Therſites into an ape, of Deiphobus into Pythagoras, and Empedocles dieng a child, after ſundrie changes into a man, whereof he himſelfe ſaith;

Ipſe ego námq; fui puer olim, deinde puella,
Arbuſtum & volucris, mutus quóq; in æquore piſcis.

For ſaid they (of whom Pythagoras alſo had, and taught this errour) if the ſoule apperteined at the firſt to a king, and he in this eſtate did not leade his life worthie his calling, it ſhould after his deceaſe be ſhut vp in the bodie of a ſlaue, begger, cocke, owle, dog, ape, horſe, aſſe, worme, or monſter, there to remaine as in a place of purgation and puniſhment, for a certeine period of time. Beſide this, it ſhould peraduenture ſuſteine often tranſlation from one bodie vnto another, according to the quantitie and qualitie of his doings here on earth, till it ſhould finallie be purified, and reſtored againe to an other humane bodie, wherein if it behaued it ſelfe more orderlie than at the firſt: after the next death, it ſhould be preferred, either to the bodie of a king againe, or other great eſtate. And thus they made a perpetuall circulation or reuolution of our ſoules, much like vnto the continuall motion of the heauens, which neuer ſtand ſtill, nor long yeld one repreſentation and figure. For this cauſe alſo, as Diodorus ſaith, they vſed to caſt certeine letters into the fire, wherein the dead were burned, to be deliuered vnto their deceaſed frends, whereby they might vnderſtand of the eſtate of ſuch as trauelled here on earth in their purgations (as the Moſcouits do write vnto S. Nicholas to be a ſpeach-man for him that is buried, in whoſe hand they bind a letter, and ſend him with a new paire of ſhoes on his feet into the graue) and to the end that after their next death they ſhould deale with them accordinglie, and as their merits required. They brought in alſo the worſhipping of manie gods, and their ſeuerall ſacrifices: they honoured likewiſe the oke, whereon the miſſle groweth, and dailie deuiſed infinit other toies (for errour is neuer aſſured of hir owne doings) whereof neither Samothes, nor Sarron, Magus, nor Druiyus did leaue them anie preſcription.

Strabo. li. 4. Socion lib. ſucceſſ. Cicero diuinat. 1.

Metempſuchôſis.

Oke honored whereon miſſle did grow, and ſo doo our ſorcerers euen to this daie thinking ſome ſpirits to deale about ſ ſame, for hidden treaſure,

These things are partlie touched by Cicero, Strabo, Plinie, Sotion, Laertius, Theophraſt, Ariſtotle, and partlie alſo by Cæſar, Mela, Val. Max. lib. 2. and other authors of later time, who for the moſt part do confeſſe, that the cheefe ſchole of the Druiydes was holden here in Britaine, where that religion (ſaith Plinie) was ſo hotlie profeſſed and followed, vt dediſſe Perſis videri poſſit, lib. 30. cap. 1. and whither the Druiydes alſo themſelues, that dwelt among the Galles, would often reſort to come by the more ſkill, and ſure vnderſtanding of the myſteries of that doctrine. And as the Galles receiued their religion from the Britons, ſo we likewiſe had from them ſome vſe of Logike & Rhetorike, ſuch as it was which our lawiers practiſed in their pleas and common cauſes. For although the Greeks were not vnknowne vnto vs, nor we to them, euen from the verie comming of Brute, yet by reaſon of diſtance betweene our countries, we had no great familiaritie and common acceſſe one vnto another, till the time of Gurguntius, after whoſe entrance manie of that nation trauelled hither in more ſecuritie, as diuers of our countriemen did vnto them without all danger, to be offered vp in ſacrifice to their gods. That we had the maner of our pleas alſo out of France, Iuuenal is a witneſſe, who ſaith;

Logike and Rhetorike out of Gallia.

Gallia cauſidicos docuit facunda Britannos.

Howbeit as they taught vs Logike and Rhetorike, ſo we had alſo ſome Sophiſtrie from them; but in the worſt ſenſe: for from France is all kind of forgerie, corruption of maners, and craftie behauiour not ſo ſone as often tranſported into England. And albeit the Druiydes were thus honored and of ſo great authoritie in Britaine, yet were there great numbers of them alſo in the Iles of Wight, Angleſey, and the Orchades, in which they held open ſchooles of their profeſſion, aloofe as it were from the reſort of people, wherein they ſtudied and learned their ſongs by heart. Howbeit the cheefe college of all I ſay, remained ſtill in Albion, whither the Druiydes of other nations alſo (beſide the Galles) would of cuſtome repaire, when ſoeuer any controuerſie among them in matters of religion did happen to be moued. At ſuch times alſo the reſt were called out of the former Ilands, whereby it appeareth that in ſuch caſes they had their ſynods and publike meetings, and therevnto it grew finallie into cuſtome, and after that a prouerbe, euen in variances falling out among the princes, great men, and common ſorts of people liuing in theſe weaſt parts of Europe, to yeeld to be tried by Britaine and hir three Ilands, bicauſe they honoured hir preeſts (the Druiydes) as the Athenians did their Areopagites.

Bardus

Gen. 4.

The B degene

Furthermore, in Britaine, and among the Galles, and to ſay the truth, generallie in all places where the Druiyſh religion was frequented, ſuch was the eſtimation of the preeſts of this profeſſion, that there was little or nothing done without their ſkilfull aduiſe, no not in ciuill cauſes, perteining to the regiment of the common-wealth and countrie. They had the charge alſo of all ſacrifices, publike and priuate, they interpreted oracles, preached of religion, and were neuer without great numbers of yong men that heard them with diligence, as they taught from time to time.

Eſtimation of the Druiydes or Druiyds preeſts.

Touching their perſons alſo, they were exempt from all temporall ſeruices, impoſitions, tributes, and exerciſes of the wars: which immunitie cauſed the greater companies of ſcholers to flocke vnto them from all places, to learne their trades. Of theſe likewiſe, ſome remained with them ſeuen, eight, ten, or twelue years, ſtill learning the ſecrets of thoſe vnwritten myſteries by heart, which were to be had amongſt them, and commonlie pronounced in verſe. And this policie, as I take it, they vſed onelie to preſerue their religion from contempt, whereinto it might eaſilie haue fallen, if any books thereof had happened into the hands of the common ſort. It helped alſo not a little in the exercise of their memories, wherevnto bookes are vtter enimies, inſomuch as he that was ſkilfull in the Druiyſh religion, would not let readilie to rehearſe manie hundreds of verſes togither, and not to faile in one tittle, in the whole proceſſe of this his laborious repetition. But as they dealt in this order for matters of their religion, ſo in ciuill affairs, hiſtoricall treatiſes, and ſetting downe of lawes, they vſed like order and letters almoſt with the Grecians. Whereby it is eaſie to be ſeene, that they reteined this kind of writing from Druiyus (the originall founder of their religion) and that this Iland hath not béene void of letters and learned men, euen ſith it was firſt inhabited. I would adde ſome thing in particular alſo of their apparell, but ſith the dealing withall is nothing profitable to the reader, I paſſe it ouer, ſignifieng neuertheleſſe, that it was diſtinguiſhed by ſundrie deuiſes from that of the common ſort, and of ſuch eſtimation among the people, that whoſoeuer ware the Druiyſh wood, might walke where he would without any harme or annoiance. This honour was giuen alſo vnto the prælts in Rome, inſomuch that when Voluſius was exiled by the Triumuirate, and ſaw himſelfe in ſuch danger, as that he could not eſcape the hardeſt, he gat the weed of a prælt vpon his backe, and begged his almes therein, euen in the high waies as he trauelled, and ſo eſcaped the danger and the furie of his aduerſaries: but to proceed with other things.

Bardus.

After the death of Druiyus, Bardus his ſonne, and fift king of the Celts, ſucceeded not onelie ouer the ſaid kingdome, but alſo in his fathers vertues, whereby it is verie likelie, that the winding and wrapping vp of the ſaid religion, after the afore remembred ſort into verſe, was firſt deuiſed by him, for he was an excellent poet, and no leſſe indued with a ſingular ſkill in the practiſe and ſpeculation of muſicke, of which two many ſuppoſe him to be the verie author and beginner, although vntruſtlie, ſith both poetrie and ſong were in vſe before the flood, as was alſo the harpe and pipe, which Iubal inuented, and could neuer be performed without great ſkill in muſicke. But to proceed, as the cheefe eſtimation of the Druiydes remained in the end among the Britons onelie, for their knowledge in religion, ſo did the fame of the Bardes (which were ſo called of this Bardus for their excellent ſkill in muſicke, poetrie, and the heroicall kind of ſong, which at the firſt conteined onelie the high myſteries and ſecret points of their religion. There was little difference alſo betweene them and the Druiydes, till they ſo farre degenerated from their firſt inſtitution, that they became to be minſtrels at feaſts, drunken meetings, and abhominable ſacrifices of the idols: where they ſang moſt commonlie no diuinitie as before, but the puiſſant acts of valiant princes, and fabulous narrations of the adulteries of the gods. Certes in my time this fond vſage, and thereto the verie name of the Bardes, are not yet extinguiſhed among the Britons of Wales, where they call their poets and Muſicians Barthes, as they doo alſo in Ireland: which Sulpitius alſo writing to Lucane remembreth, where he ſaith that the word Bardus is meere Celtike, and ſignifieth a ſinger. Howbeit the Romans iudging all nations beſide themſelues to be but rude and barbarous, and thereto miſliking vtterlie the rough muſicke of the Bardes, entred ſo farre into the contemptuous mockage of their melodie, that they aſcribed the word Bardus vnto their fooles and idiots, whereas contrariwiſe the Scythians and ſuch as dwell within the northweaſt part of Europe, did vſe the ſame word in verie honourable maner, calling their beſt poets and heroicall ſingers, Singebardos; their couragious ſingers and capiteins that delited in muſicke, Albardos, Dagobardos, Rodtbardos, & one lame muſician Lambard aboue all other, of whoſe ſkilfull ditties Germanie is not vnfurniſhed, as I heare vnto this daie. In Quizqueia or new Spaine, an Iland of the Indies, they call ſuch men Boitios, their rimes Arcitos, and in ſtead of harps they ſing vnto timbrels made of ſhels ſuch ſonnets and ditties as either perteine vnto religion, prophane loue, commendation of anceſtrie, and inflammation of the mind vnto Mars, whereby there appeareth to be ſmall difference betweene their Boitios and our Bardes. Finallie of our ſort, Lucane in his firſt booke writeth thus, among other like ſaiengs well toward the latter end;

Lucan. li. 1.

Thus we ſée as in a glaſſe the ſtate of religion, for a time, after the firſt inhabitation of this Iland: but how long it continued in ſuch ſoundneſſe, as the originall authors left it, in good ſooth I cannot ſay, yet this is moſt certeine, that after a time, when Albion arriued here, the religion earſt imbraced fell into great decaie. For whereas Iaphet & Samothes with their children taught nothing elſe than ſuch doctrine as they had learned of Noah: Cham the great grandfather of this our Albion, and his diſciples vtterlie renouncing to follow their ſteps, gaue their minds wholie to ſeduce and lead their hearers headlong vnto all error. Whereby his poſteritie not onelie corrupted this our Iland, with moſt filthie trades and practiſes; but alſo all mankind, generallie where they became, with vicious life, and moſt vngodlie conuerſation. For from Cham and his ſucceſſours proceeded at the firſt all ſorcerie, witchcraft, and the execution of vnlawfull luſt, without reſpect of ſex, age, conſanguinitie, or kind: as branches from an odious and abhominable root, or ſtreames deriued from a moſt filthie and horrible ſtinking puddle. Howbeit, & notwithſtanding all theſe his manifold lewdneſſes, ſuch was the follie of his Ægyptians (where he firſt reigned and taught) that whileſt he liued they alone had him in great eſtimation (whereas other nations contemned and abhorred him for his wickedneſſe, calling him Chemeſenua, that is, the impudent, infamous and wicked Cham) and not onelie builded a citie vnto him which they called Chem Min, but alſo after his death reputed him for a god, calling the higheſt of the ſeuen planets after his name, as they did the next beneath it after Oſyris his ſonne, whom they likewiſe honored vnder the name of Iupiter.

What doctrine Cham and his diſciples taught.

Chemeſenua.

Chem Min.

Cham made a god.

Certes it was a cuſtome begonne in Ægypt of old time, and generallie in vſe almoſt in euerie place in proceſſe of time (when any of their famous worthie princes died) to aſcribe ſome forme or other of the ſtars vnto his perſon, to the end his name might neuer weare out of memorie. And this they called their tranſlation in heauen, ſo that he which had any ſtarre or forme of ſtarres dedicated vnto him, was properlie ſaid to haue a ſeat among the gods. A toie much like to the catalog of Romiſh ſaints, (although the one was written in the celeſtiall or immateriall orbes, the other in ſheeps ſkins, and verie brickle paper) but yet ſo eſteemed, that euerie prince would oft hazard and attempt the vttermoſt aduentures, thereby to win ſuch fame in his life, that after his death he might by merit haue ſuch place in heauen, among the ſhining ſtarres. Howbeit, euerie of thoſe that were called gods, could not obteine that benefit, for then ſhould there not haue béene ſtars enow in heauen to haue ſerued all their turnes, wherfore another place was in time imagined, where they reigned that were of a ſecond calling, as the Semones who were gods by grace and fauour of the people. Semones dici voluerunt (ſaith Fulgentius In vocibus antiquis) quos cœlo nec dignos aſcriberent, ob meriti paupertatem; ſicut Priapus Hyppo. Vortumnus, &c. nes terrenos eos deputare vellent per gratiæ venerationem, as alſo a third place that is to ſay an earth, where thoſe gods dwelled which were noble men, officers, officers, good gouernours and lawgiuers to the people, and yet not thought worthie to be of the ſecond or firſt companie, which was a follie diuiſion.

Thus we ſee in generall maner, how idolatrie, honoring of the ſtarres, and brood of inferiour gods were hatched at the firſt, which follies in proceſſe of time came alſo into Britaine, as did the names of Saturne & Iupiter, &c: as ſhall appeare hereafter. And here ſith I haue alreadie ſomewhat digreſſed from my matter, I will go yet a little farder, and ſhew forth the originall vſe of the word Saturne, Iupiter, Hercules, &c: whereby your Honor ſhall ſee a little more into the errours of the Gentils, and not onelie that, but one point alſo of the rot of all the confuſion that is to be found among the ancient hiſtories. Certes it was vſed for a few yéeres after the partition of the earth (which was made by Noah, in the 133. yeare after the floud) that the beginners of ſuch kingdoms as were then erected ſhould be called Saturni, whereby it came to paſſe that Nimbrote was the Saturne of Babylon: Cham of Ægypt: and ſo forth other of ſundrie other countries. Their eldeſt ſonnes alſo that ſucceded them, were called Ioues; and their nephewes or ſonnes ſonnes, which reigned in the third place Hercules, by which meanes it followed that euerie kingdome had a Saturne, Iupiter and Hercules of hir owne, and not from anie other.

Which were properlie called, Saturni, Ioues, Iunones, and Hercules.

In like ſort they had ſuch another order among their daughters, whom they married as yet commonlie vnto their brethren (God himſelfe permitting the ſame vnto them for a time) as before the floud, to the end the earth might be thoroughlie replenished, and the ſoner furniſhed with inhabitants in euerie part thereof. The ſiſter therefore and wife of euerie Saturne was called Rhea, but of Iupiter, Iuno, Iſis, or Io. Beyond theſe alſo there was no latter Harold that would indeuour to deriue the petigree of anie prince, or potentate, but ſuppoſed his dutie to be ſufficientlie performed, when he had brought it orderlie vnto ſome Saturne or other, wherat he might ceaſe, and ſhut vp all his trauell. They had likewiſe this opinion grounded amongſt them, that heauen & earth were onlie parents vnto Saturne and Rhea, not knowing out of doubt, what they themſelues did meane, ſith theſe denominations, Heauen, Ogyges, the Sunne, Pater Deorum, and ſuch like, were onelie aſcribed vnto Noah: as * Terra, (the Earth) Veſta, Aretia, the Moone, Mater deorum, and other the like were vnto Tydea his wife. So that hereby we ſée, holy Saturne is reputed in euerie nation for their oldeſt god, or firſt prince, Iupiter for the next, and Hercules for the third. And therfore ſith theſe names were diſperſed in the beginning ouer all, it is no maruell that there is ſuch confuſion in ancient hiſtories, and the doings of one of them ſo mixed with thoſe of another, that it is now impoſſible to diſtinguiſh them in ſunder. This haue I ſpoken, to the end that all men may ſee what gods the Pagans honored, & thereby what religion the poſteritie of Cham did bring ouer into Britaine. For vntill their comming, it is not likelie that anie groſſe idolatrie or ſuperſtition did enter in among vs, as deifieng of mortall men, honoring of the ſtarres, and erection of huge images, beſide ſorcerie, witchcraft, and ſuch like, whereof the Chemminites are worthilie called the autors. Neither were theſe errors anie thing amended, by the comming in of Brute, who no doubt added ſuch deuiſes vnto the ſame, as he and his companie had learned before in Græcia, from whence alſo he brought Helenus the ſonne of Priamus, (a man of exceeding age) & made him his prieſt and biſhop thorough out the new conqueſt, that he had atchieued in Britaine.

Iſis, Io, and Iuno all one.

Cœlum or Cœlus. Ogyges. Sol. Pater deorum. * Tydea. Veſta. Terra. Luna. Aretia. Deorum mater.

From whence Brute did learne his religion.

After Brute, idolatrie and ſuperſtition ſtill increaſed more and more among vs, inſomuch that beſide the Druiyſh and Bardike ceremonies, and thoſe alſo that came in with Albion and Brute himſelfe: our countriemen either brought hither from abroad, or dailie inuented at home new religion and rites, whereby it came to paſſe that in the ſtead of the onelie and immortall God (of whome Samothes and his poſteritie did preach in times paſt) now they honored the ſaid Samothes himſelfe vnder the name of Dis and Saturne: alſo Iupiter, Mars, Minerua, Mercurie, Apollo, Diana; and finallie Hercules, vnto whome they dedicated the gates and porches of their temples, entrances into their regions, cities, townes and houſes, with their limits and bounds (as the papiſts did the gates of their cities and ports vnto Botulph & Giles) becauſe fortitude and wiſedome are the cheefe vpholders and bearers vp of common-wealths and kingdoms, both which they aſcribed to Hercules (forgetting God) and diuers other idols whoſe names I now remember not. In lieu more- Mela. Diodorus. Strab. 4. Plin. Cæſar. 5. ouer of ſheepe and oxen, they offred mankind alſo vnto ſome of them, killing their offendors, priſoners, and oft ſuch ſtrangers as came from farre vnto them, by ſhutting vp great numbers of them togither in huge images made of wicker, réed, haie, or other light matter: and then ſetting all on fire togither, they not onelie conſumed the miſerable creatures to aſhes (ſometimes adding other beaſts vnto them) but alſo reputed it to be the moſt acceptable ſacrifice that could be made vnto their idols. From whence they had this horrible cuſtome, trulie I cannot tell, but that it was common to moſt nations, not onlie to conſume their ſtrangers, captiues, &c; but alſo their owne children with fire, in ſuch maner of ſacrifice: beſide the text of the Bible, the prophane hiſtories do generallie leaue it euident, as a thing either of cuſtome or of particular neceſſitie, of which later Virgil ſaith; Dis or Samothes made a god.

Sanguine placaſtis ventos & virgine cæſa, &c.

As Silius doth of the firſt, where he telleth of the vſuall maner of the Carthaginenſes, ſaieng after this maner;

Prima reducebat miſerandos annua caſus, &c.

But to proceed with our owne gods and idols, more pertinent to my purpoſe than the reherſall of forreine demeanours: I find that huge temples in like ſort were builded vnto them, ſo that in the time of Lucius, when the light of ſaluation began ſtronglie to ſhine in Britaine, thorough the preaching of the goſpell, the chriſtians diſcouered 25. Flamines or idol-churches, beſide Ioſephus. Philip. Freculphus To. 2. lib. 2. cap. 4. Nennius. Nicephorus lib. 2. cap. 40. Iſidorus lib. de vita & obit. dict. patrum. W. Malm. de antiq. Glaſconici monaſt. Ptol. Lucenſis. thoſe Archflamines, whoſe preeſts were then as our Archbiſhops are now, in that they had ſuperior charge of all the reſt, the other being reputed as inferiours, and ſubiect to their iuriſdiction in caſes of religion, and ſuperſtitious ceremonies.

Of the quantities of their idols I ſpeake not, ſith it is inough to ſaie, that they were monſtrous, and that each nation contended which ſhould honour the greater blocks, and yet all pretending to haue the iuſt heigth of the god or goddeſſe whom they did repreſent. Apollo Capitolinus that ſtood at Rome, was thirtie cubits high at the leaſt; Tarentinus Iupiter of 40.; the idoll of the ſonne in the Rhodes, of 70. (whoſe toe few men could fadam;) Tuſcanus Apollo that ſtood in the libraris of the temple of Auguſtus, of 50. foot; another made vnder Nero of 110. foot; but one in France paſſed all, which Zenoduris made vnto Mercurie at Aruernum in ten years ſpace, of 400. foot. Wherby it appeareth, that as they were void of moderation in number of gods, ſo without meaſure were they alſo in their proportions, and happie was he which might haue the greateſt idoll, and lay moſt coſt thereon. Monſtrous proportions of idols.

Hitherto yee haue heard of the time, wherein idolatrie reigned and blinded the harts of ſuch as dwelled in this Iland. Now let vs ſee the ſucceſſe of the goſpell, after the death and paſſion of Ieſus Chriſt our ſauiour. And euen here would I begin with an allegation of Theodoret, wherevpon ſome repoſe great aſſurance (conceiuing yet more hope therein by the words of Sophronius) that Paule the Apoſtle ſhould preach the word of ſaluation here, after his deliuerie out of captiuitie, Theodoret. Sophronius.

uitie, which fell as I doo read in the 57. of Christ. But sith I cannot verifie the same by the woords of Theodoret, to be spoken more of Paule than Peter, or the rest, I will passe ouer this coniecture (so far as it is grounded vpon Theodoret) and deale with other authorities, whereof we haue more certeintie. First of all therfore let vs see what Fortunatus hath written of Pauls comming into Britaine, and afterward what is to be found of other by-writers in other points of more assurance. Certes for the presence of Paule I read thus much:

Quid sacer ille simul Paulus tuba gentibus ampla,
Per mare per terras Christi præconia fundens, Europam & Asiam, Lybiam, sale dogmata complens,
Arctos, meridies, hic plenus vesper & ortus,
Transit & Oceanum, vel qua facit insula portum, Quásq; Britannus habet terras atque vltima Thule, &c.

That one Iosephus preached here in England, in the time of the Apostles, his sepulchre yet in Aualon, now called Glessenburg or Glastenburie, an epitaph affirmed thereunto is prose sufficient. Howbeit, sith these things are not of competent force to persuade all men, I will adde in few, what I haue read elsewhere of his arriuall here. First of all therefore you shall note that he came ouer into Britaine, about the 64. after Christ, when the persecution began vnder Nero, at which time Philip and diuers of the godlie being in France (whether he came with other christians, after they had sowed the word of God in Scythia, by the space of 9. yeares) seuered themselues in sunder, to make the better shift for their owne safegard, and yet not otherwise than by their flight, the gospell might haue due furtherance. Hereby then it came to passe, that the said Philip vpon good deliberation did send Iosephus ouer, and with him Simon Zelotes to preach vnto the Britons, and minister the sacraments there according to the rites of the churches of Asia and Greece, from whence they came not long before vnto the countrie of the Galles. Which was saith Malmesburie 103. before Faganus and Dinaw did set forth the gospell amongst them. Of the coming of Zelotes you may read more in the second booke of Niceph. Cal. where he writeth thereof in this maner: Operepretium etiam fuerit Simonem Cana Galileæ ortum, qui propter flagrantem in magistrum suum ardorem, summámq; euangelicæ rei per omnia curam Zelotes cognominatus est hic referre, accepit enim is cœlitùs adueniente spiritu sancto, Aegyptium Cyrenem & Africam, deinde Mauritaniam & Lybiam omnem euangelium deprædicans percurrit, eandémque doctrinam etiam ad occidentalem Oceanum insuláque Britannicas perfert. And this is the effect in a litle rome, of that which I haue read at large in sundrie writers, beside these two here alledged, although it may well be gathered that diuers Britains were conuerted to the faith, before this sixtie foure of Christ. Howbeit, whereas some write that they liued, and dwelled in Britaine, it cannot as yet take any absolute hold in my iudgement, but rather that they were baptised and remained, either in Rome, or else-where. And of this sort I suppose Claudia Rufina the wife of Pudens to be one, who was a British ladie indeed, and not onelie excellentlie seene in the Greeke and Latine tongs, but also with hir husband highlie commended by S. Paule, as one hauing had conuersation and conference with them at Rome, from whence he did write his second epistle vnto Timothie, as I read. Of this ladie moreouer Martial speaketh, in reioising that his poesies were read also in Britaine, and onelie by hir meanes, who vsed to cull out the finest & honestest of his epigrams and send them to hir frends for tokens, saieng after this maner, as himselfe doth set it downe:

Dicitur & nostros cantare Britannia versus.

Furthermore making mention of hir and hir issue, he addeth these woords:

Claudia cœruleis ciim sit Rufina Britannis
Edita, cur Latiæ pectora plebis habet?
Quale decus formæ? Romanam crederet æs Italides possint, Atthides esse suam.
Dij bene, quod sancto peperit fœcunda marito,
Quot sperat, generos, quótque puella nurus.
Sic placeat superis, vt coniuge gaudeat vno,
Et semper natis gaudeat illa tribus.

The names of hir three children were Pudentiana, Praxedes, both virgins, and Nouatus, who after the death of Pudens their father (which befell him in Cappadocia) dwelled with their mother in Vmbria, where they ceased not from time to time to minister vnto the saints. But to leaue this impertinent discourse, and proceed with my purpose.

I find in the Chronicles of Burton (vnder the yeare of Grace 141. and time of Hadrian the emperour) that nine scholers or clerkes of Grantha or Granta (now Cambridge) were baptised in Britaine, and became preachers of the gospell there, but whether Taurinus bishop or elder ouer the congregation at Yorke (who as Vincentius saith, was executed about this time for his faith) were one of them or not, as yet I do not certeinlie find, but rather the contrarie, which is that he was no Britaine at all, but Episcopus Ebroicensis, for which such as perceiue not the easie corruption of the word, may some write Eboracensis, as certeinlie mine author out of whom I allege this authoritie hath done before me. For Vincentius saith flat otherwise, and therefore the Chronologie is it speake of anie Taurinus bishop of Yorke is to be reformed in that behalfe. Diuers other also imbraced the religion of Christ verie zealouslie before these men. Howbeit, all this notwithstanding, the glad tidings of the gospell had neuer free and open passage here, vntill the time of Lucius, in which the verie enimies of the word became the apparent meanes (contrarie to their owne minds) to haue it set forth amongst vs. For when Antoninus the emperour had giuen out a decree, that the Druiysh religion should euerie where be abolished, Lucius the king (whose surname is now perished) tooke aduise of his councell what was best to be done, & wrote in this behalfe. And this did Lucius, bicause he knew it * impossible for man to liue long without any religion at all: finallie finding his Nobilitie & subiects vtter enimies to the Romane deuotiõ (for that they made so many gods as they listed, & some to haue the regiment euen of their dirt & dung) and therunto being pricked forwards by such christians as were conuersant about him, to chose the seruice of the true God that liueth for euer, rather than the slauish seruitude of any pagan idoll: he fullie resolued with himselfe in the end, to receiue and imbrace the gospell of Christ. He sent also two of his best learned and greatest philosophers to Rome, vnto Eleutherus then bishop there in the 177. of Christ, not to promise any subiection to his sea, which then was not required, but to say with such as were picked in mind, Acts. 2. verse. 37. Quid faciemus viri fratres? I meane that they were sent to be perfectlie instructed, and with farther commission, to make earnest request vnto him and the congregation there, that a competent number of preachers might be sent ouer from thence, by whose diligent aduise and trauell, the foundation of the gospell might surelie be laid ouer all the portion of the Ile, which conteined his kingdome, according to his mind.

When Eleutherus vnderstood these things, he reioiced not a little for the great goodnesse, which the Lord had shewed vpon this our Ile and countrie. Afterwards calling the brethren togither, they agreed to ordeine, euen those two for bishops, whom Lucius as you haue heard, had directed ouer vnto them. Finallie after they had thoroughlie catechized them, making generall praier vnto God and earnest supplication for the good successe of these men, they sent them home againe with no small charge, that they should be diligent in their function, and carefull ouer the flocke committed to their custo-

The firſt of theſe was called Eluanus Aualonius, a man borne in the Ile of Aualon, and brought vp there vnder thoſe godlie paſtours and their diſciples, whom Philip ſent ouer at the firſt for the conuerſion of the Britons. The other hight Medguinus, and was thereto ſurnamed Belga, bicauſe he was of the towne of Welles, which then was called Belga. This man was trained vp alſo in one ſchole with Eluanus, both of them being ornaments to their horie ages, and men of ſuch grauitie and godlineſſe, that Eleutherus ſuppoſed none more worthie to ſupport this charge, than they: after whoſe comming home alſo, it was not long yer Lucius and all his houſhold with diuers of the Nobilitie were baptiſed, beſide infinit numbers of the common people, which dailie reſorted vnto them, and voluntarilie renounced all their idolatrie and paganiſme.

A zealous prince maketh feruent ſubiects.

In the meane time, Eleutherus vnderſtanding the ſucceſſe of theſe learned doctours, and ſuppoſing with himſelfe, that they two onlie could not ſuffice to ſupport ſo great a charge as ſhould concerne the conuerſion of the whole Iland; he directed ouer vnto them in the yeare inſuing Faganus, Dinaw (or Dinauus) Aaron, and diuerſe other godlie preachers, as fellow-labourers to trauell with them in the vineyard of the Lord. Theſe men therefore after their comming hither, conſulted with the other, and forthwith wholie conſented to make a diuiſion of this Iland amongſt themſelues, appointing what parcell each preacher ſhould take, that with the more profit and eaſe of the people, and ſomewhat leſſe trauell alſo for themſelues, the doctrine of the Goſpell might be preached and receiued. In this diſtribution, they ordeined that there ſhould be one congregation at London, where they placed Theonus as cheefe elder and biſhop, for that preſent time, worthilie called Theonus. 1. for there was another of that name who fled into Wales with Thadiocus of Yorke, at the firſt comming of the Saxons; and alſo Guthelmus, who went (as I read) into Armorica, there to craue aid againſt the Scots and Vandals that plagued this Ile, from the Twede vnto the Humber. After this Theonus alſo Eluanus ſucceeded, who conuerted manie of the Druiydes, and builded the firſt librarie neere vnto the biſhops palace. The ſaid Lucius alſo placed another at Yorke, whither they appointed Theodoſius: and the third at Caerlheon vpon the riuer Uſke, builded ſometimes by Belinus, and called Glamorgantia, but now Cheſter (in which three cities there had before time beene three Archflamines erected vnto Apollo, Mars, and Minerua, but now raced to the ground, and three other churches builded in their ſtæds by Lucius) to the end that the countries round about might haue indifferent acceſſe vnto thoſe places, and therewithall vnderſtand for certeintie, whither to reſort for reſolution, if after their conuerſion they ſhould happen to doubt of any thing. In like ſort alſo the reſt of the idoll-temples ſtanding in other places were either ouerthrowne, or conuerted into churches for chriſtian congregations to aſſemble in, as our writers do remember. In the report whereof giue me leaue gentle reader, of London my natiue citie to ſpeake a little: for although it may and doth ſeeme impertinent to my purpoſe, yet it ſhall not be much, and therefore I will ſone make an end. There is a controuerſie moued among our hiſtoriographers, whether the church that Lucius builded at London ſtood at Weſtminſter, or in Cornehill. For there is ſome cauſe, why the metropolitane church ſhould be thought to ſtand where S. Peters now doth, by the ſpace of 400. od yéeres before it was remoued to Canturburie by Auſtine the monke, if a man ſhould leane to one ſide without anie conference of the aſſeuerations of the other. But herin (as I take it) there lurketh ſome ſcruple, for beſide that S. Peters church ſtood in the eaſt end of the citie, and that of Apollo in the weſt, the word Cornehill (a denomination giuen of late to ſpeake of to one ſtreet) may eaſilie be miſtaken for Thorney. For as the word Thorney proceedeth from the Saxons, who called the weſt end of the citie by that name, where Weſtminſter now ſtandeth, bicauſe of the wildneſſe and buſhineſſe of the ſoile; ſo I do not read of anie ſtréete in London called Cornehill before the conqueſt of the Normans. Wherfore I hold with them, which make Weſtminſter to be the place where Lucius builded his church vpon the ruines of that Flamine 264. yeares, as Malmesburie ſaith, before the comming of the Saxons, and 411. before the arriuall of Auguſtine. Read alſo his appendix in lib. 4. Pontif. where he noteth the time of the Saxons, in the 449. of Grace, and of Auguſtine in the 596. of Chriſt, which is a manifeſt accompt, though ſome copies haue 499. for the one, but not without manifeſt corruption and error.

3. Cheefe Biſhops in Britaine.

Theonus. Theodoſius London. Yorke. Caerlheon.

Thus became Britaine the firſt prouince that generallie receiued the faith, and where the goſpell was freelie preached without inhibition of hir prince. Howbeit, although that Lucius and his princes and great numbers of his people imbraced the word with greedineſſe, yet was not the ſucceſſe thereof either ſo vniuerſall, that all men beléeued at the firſt; the ſecuritie ſo great, as that no perſecution was to be feared from the Romane empire after his deceaſe; or the proceeding of the king ſo ſeuere, as that he inforced any man by publike authoritie to forſake and relinquiſh his paganiſme: but onelie this freedome was enioied, that who ſo would become a chriſtian in his time might without feare of his lawes profeſſe the Goſpell, in whoſe teſtimonie, if néed had béene, I doubt not to affirme, but that he would haue ſhed alſo his bloud, as did his neece Emerita, who being conſtant aboue the common ſort of women, refuſed not after his deceaſe by fire, to yeld hir ſelfe to death, as a ſweet ſmelling ſacrifice in the noſtrels of the Lord, beyond the ſea in France.

Britaine the firſt prouince that receiued the Goſpell generallie.

Emerita neece vnto Lucius.

The faith of Chriſt being thus planted in this Iland in the 177. after Chriſt, and Faganus and Dinaw with the reſt ſent ouer from Rome, in the 178. as you haue heard: it came to paſſe in the third yeare of the Goſpell receiued, that Lucius did ſend againe to Eleutherus the biſhop, requiring that he might haue ſome breefe epitome of the order of diſcipline then vſed in the church. For he well conſidered, that as it auaileth little to plant a coſtlie vineyard, except it afterward be cheriſhed, kept in good order, and ſuch things as annoie, dailie remoued from the ſame: ſo after baptiſme and entrance into religion, it profiteth little to beare the name of chriſtians, except we do walke in the ſpirit, and haue ſuch things as offend apparentlie, corrected by ſeuere diſcipline. For otherwiſe it will come to paſſe, that the weedes of vice, and vicious liuing, will ſo quicklie abound in vs, that they will in the end choke vp the good ſéed ſowne in our minds, and either inforce vs to returne vnto our former wickedneſſe with déeper ſecuritie than before, or elſe to become meere Atheiſts, which is a great deale worſe.

Lucius ſendeth againe to Rome.

Ro. 8. ver. 1

For this cauſe therefore did Lucius ſend to Rome, the ſecond time, for a copie of ſuch politike orders as were then vſed there, in their regiment of the church. But Eleutherus conſidering with himſelfe, how that all nations are not of like condition, and therefore thoſe conſtitutions that are beneficiall to one, may now and then be preiudiciall to another: and ſéeing alſo that beſide the word no rites and orders can long continue, or be ſo perfect in all points, but that as time ſerueth, they will require alteration: he thought it beſt not to laie any more vpon the necks of the new conuerts of Britaine as yet, than Chriſt and his apoſtles had already ſet downe vnto all men. In returning therefore his meſſengers, he ſent letters by them vnto Lucius and his Nobilitie, dated in the conſulſhips of Commodus and Vespronius, wherein he told them that Christ had left sufficient order in the scriptures for the gouernment of his church alreadie in his word, and not for that onlie, but also for the regiment of his whole * kingdome, if he would submit himselfe, to yéeld and follow that rule. The epistle it selfe is partlie extant, and partlie perished, yet such as it is, and as I haue faithfullie translated it out of sundrie verie ancient copies, I doo deliuer it here, to the end I will not defraud the reader of anie thing that may turne to the glorie of God, and his commoditie, in the historie of our nation.

* Though most princes cannot here on that title.

Epistle of Eleutherus vnto Lucius.

You require of vs the Romane ordinances, and thereto the statutes of the emperours to be sent ouer vnto you, and which you desire to practise and put in vre within your realme and kingdome. The Romane lawes and those of emperours we may excuse refuse, but those of God can neuer be found fault with all. You haue receiued of late through Gods mercie in the realme of Britaine the law and faith of Christ, you haue with you both volumes of the scriptures: out of them therefore by Gods grace, and the councell of your realme take you a law, and by that law through Gods sufferance rule your kingdome, for you are Gods vicar in your owne realme, as the rotall prophet saith; Psal.24. The earth is the Lords and all that is therein, the compasse of the world, and they that dwell therein. Againe, Psal.45. Thou hast loued truth and hated iniquitie, wherefore God, euen thy God hath annointed thee with oile of gladnesse aboue thy fellowes. And againe, according to the saieng of the same prophet; Psal.71. Oh God giue thy iudgement vnto the king, & thy iustice vnto the kings sonne. The kings sons are the christian people & flocke of the realme, which are vnder your gouernance, and liue & continue in peace within your kingdome. * The gospell saith; As the hen gathereth hir chickens vnder hir wings, so doth the king his people. Such as dwell in the kingdome of Britaine are yours, whom if they be diuided, you ought to gather into concord and vnitie, to call them to the faith and law of Christ, and to his sacred church: to chearish and mainteine, to rule also and gouerne them, defending each of them from such as would doo them wrong, and keeping them from the malice of such as be their enimies. * Woo vnto the nation whose king is a child, and whose princes rise vp earlie to banket and féed, which is spoken not of a prince that is within age, but of a prince that is become a child, through follie, sinne & vnskedfastnesse, of whom the prophet saith; Psal.55. The bloudthirstie and deceitfull men shall not liue forth halfe their daies. * By féeding I vnderstand gluttonie; by gluttonie, lust; & by lust all wickednesse & sinne, according to the saieng of Salomon the king; Wisedome entreth not into a wicked mind, nor dwelleth with a man that is subiect vnto sinne. A king hath his name of ruling, and not of the possession of his realme. You shalbe a king whilest you rule well, but if you doo otherwise, the name of a king shall not remaine with you, but you shall vtterlie forgo it, which God forbid. The almightie God grant you so to rule the kingdome of Britaine, that you may reigne with him for euer, whose vicar (or vicegerent) you are within your aforesaid kingdome. Who with the Sonne and the Holie-ghost, &c.

Here wanteth.

Hitherto out of the epistle that Eleutherus sent vnto Lucius, wherein manie prætie obseruations are to be collected, if time and place would serue to stand vpon them. After these daies also the number of such as were ordeined to saluation, increased dailie more and more, whereby (as in other places of the world) the word of God had good successe in Britaine, in time of peace; and in heat of persecution, there were no small number of martyrs that suffered for the same, of which Albane, Amphibalus, Iulius and Aaron, are reputed to be the chiefe, bicause of their noble parentage, which is a great matter in the sight of worldlie men.

Albane. Amphibalus. Iulius. Aaron.

There are which affirme our Lucius to renounce his kingdome, and afterward to become first a bishop, then a preacher of the gospell, and afterward a pope: but to the end such as hold this opinion may once vnderstand the botome of their errors, I will set downe the matter at large, whereby they shall sée (if they list to looke) how far they haue béene deceiued.

I find that Chlorus had issue by his second wife, two sonnes, Dalmatius (who had a sonne called also Dalmatius and slaine by the souldiors) Constantius father to Gallus, and Iulian the apostata; besides foure other whose names as yet I find not. But being at the first matched with Helena, and before she was put from him by the roiall power of Diocletian, he had by hir three sonnes (beside one daughter named Emerita) of which the name of the first is perished, the second was called Lucius, & the third Constantine, that afterward was emperour of Rome, by election of the armies in Britaine. Now it happened that Lucius, whome the French call Lucion, by means of a quarell growne betweene him and his elder brother, did kill his said brother, either by a traie or by some other meanes, whereupon his father exiled him out of Britaine, and appointed him from thenceforth to remaine in Aquitane in France. This Lucion brought thus into worldlie sorow, had now good leasure to meditate vpon heauen, who before in his prosperitie had peraduenture neuer regard of hell. Finallie he fell so far into the consideration of his estate, that at the last he renounced his paganisme, and first became a christian, then an elder, and last of all a bishop in the church of Christ. He erected also a place of praier wherein to serue the liuing God, which after sundrie alterations came in processe of time to be an Abbaie, and is still called euen to our time after Lucion or Lucius: the first founder thereof, and the originall beginner of anie such house in those parts.

Chlorus had three sons, & a daughter by Helena.

Lucion becommeth a christian.

Lucion a bishop.

In this also he and diuers other of his frends continued their times, in great contemplation and praier, and from hence were translated as occasion serued, vnto sundrie ecclesiasticall promotions in the time of Constant. his brother. So that euen by this short narration it is now easie to sée, that Lucius the king, and Lucius or Lucion the sonne of Chlorus, were distinct persons. Hereunto Hermannus Schedelius addeth also how he went into Rhetia with Emerita his sister, and néere vnto the citie Augusta conuerted the Curienses vnto the faith of Christ, and there likewise (being put to death in Castro Martis) lieth buried in the same towne, where his feast is holden vpon the third daie of December, as may readilie be confirmed, whereas the bones of our Lucius were to be séene at Glocester. That Schedelius erreth not herein also, the ancient monuments of the said Abbaie, whereof he was the originall beginner, as I said, doo yeeld sufficient testimonie, beside an hymne made in his commendation, intituled Gaude Lucionum, &c. But for more of this you may resort vnto Boudet in his first booke, and fift chapter of the Annales of Aquitane, who neuertheles maketh the king of Britaine grandfather to this Lucion. The said Schedelius furthermore setteth downe, that his sister was martyred in Trinecastell, néere vnto the place where the said Lucion dwelled, whereby it apéereth in like sort, that she was not sister to Lucius king of Britaine, of which prince Alexander Necham in his most excellent treatise De sapientia diuina, setteth downe this Distichon:

Neither could Lucion or Lucius be fellow and of kinred vnto Paule the apostle, as Auentine inferreth, except he meane it of some other Lucius, as of one whome he nameth Cyrinensis. But then will not the history agree with the conuersion of the Rhetians and Vindelicians, whereof Schedelius and other do make mention. But as each riuer the farder it runneth from the head, the more it is increaſed by ſmall riuelets, and corrupted with filthie puddels, and ſtinking gutters, that deſcend into the ſame: ſo the puritie of the goſpell, preached here in Britaine, in proceſſe of time became firſt of all to be corrupted with a new order of religion, and moſt execrable hereſie, both of them being brought in at once by Pelagius, of Wales, who hauing trauelled through France, Italie, Aegypt, Syria, & the eaſterlie regions of the world, was there at the laſt made an elder or biſhop, by ſome of the monkes, vnto whoſe profeſſion he had not long before wholie addicted himſelfe. Finallie returning home againe with an augmentation of fame and countenance of greater holineſſe than he bare out of the land with him, he did not onelie erect an houſe of his owne order at Bangor in Wales, vpon the riuer Dee, but alſo ſowed the peſtiferous ſeed of his hereticall prauities ouer all this Iland, whereby he ſeduced great numbers of Britons, teaching them to preferre their owne merits, before the free mercie of God, in Jeſus Chriſt his ſonne. By this meanes therefore he brought aſſurance of ſaluation into queſtion, and taught all ſuch as had a diligent reſpect vnto their workes to be doubtfull of the ſame, whereas to ſuch as regard this latter, there can be no quietneſſe of mind, but alwaies an vnſtedfaſt opinion of themſelues, whereby they cannot diſcerne, neither by proſperitie nor aduerſitie of this life, whether they be worthie loue or hatred. Neuertheleſs it behoueth the godlie to repoſe their hope in that grace which is freelie granted through Jeſu Chriſt, and to flee vnto the mercies of God which are offered vnto vs in with and by his ſon, to the end that we may at the laſt find the teſtimonie of his ſpirit working with ours, that we are his choſen children, whereby commeth peace of conſcience to ſuch as do beleeue.

Hereſie and monaſticall life brought into Britaine at one time by Pelagius.

Bangor.

Thus we ſee how new deuiſes or orders of religion and hereſie came in together. I could ſhew alſo what Comets, and ſtrange ſignes appeared in Britaine, much about the ſame time, the like of which with diuers other haue been perceiued alſo from time to time, ſithence the death of Pelagius, at the entrance of anie new kind of religion into this Ile of Britaine. But I paſſe them ouer, onelie for that I would not ſeeme in my tractation of antiquities, to trouble my reader with the reherſall of anie new inconueniences.

To proceed therefore with my purpoſe, after theſe there followed in like ſort ſundrie other kinds of monaſticall life, as Anachorites, Heremits, Cyrilline and Benedictine monkes, albeit that the heremeticall profeſſion was onelie allowed of in Britaine, vntill the comming of Auguſtine the monke, who brought in the Benedictine ſect, framed after the order of the houſe which Benedict ſurnamed Nurſinus did firſt erect in Monte Caſſino, about the 524. of Chriſt, & was finallie ſo well liked of all men, that we had few or (as I ſuppoſe) no blacke monkes in England that were not of his order. In proceſſe of time how Benedict Biſcop alſo our countrieman reſtored the ſaid Benedictine profeſſion greatlie decaied in England, our hiſtories are verie plentifull, which Biſcop went oft into Italie, and at one time for a ſpeciall confirmation of his two monaſteries which he had builded at other mens coſts vnto Paule and Peter vpon the bankes of the Were, as Beda doth remember. So faſt alſo did theſe and other like humane deuiſes proſper after his time, that at their ſuppreſſion in England and Wales onelie, there were found 440. religious houſes at the leaſt, of which 373. might diſpend 200. li. by the yeere at the leaſt, as appeareth by the record of their ſuppreſſion, which alſo noteth the totall ſumme of their reuenues to amount vnto 32000. pounds, their moueables 100000. li. and the number of religious men conteined in the ſame, to be 10000. which would make a prettie armie, whereunto if you adde thoſe 45. of late ſtanding in Scotland, you ſhall ſone ſee what numbers of theſe dens of ſpirituall robbers were mainteined here in Britaine. What number of ſaincts alſo haue been hatched in them I could eaſilie remember, and beſide thoſe 160. which Capgraue ſetteth down, & other likewiſe remembred in the golden Legend, and Legendarie of Exceſter, I might bring a rable out of Scotland able to furniſh vp a calendar, though the yere were twiſe as long.

As touching Pelagius the firſt heretike that euer was bred in this realme (notablie knowne) and parent of Monachiſme, it is certeine, that before his corruption and fall, he was taken for a man of ſingular learning, deepe iudgement, and ſuch a one, as vpon whome for his great gifts in teaching and ſtrictneſſe of life, no ſmall peece of the hope and expectation of the people did depend. But what is wiſedome of the fleſh, without the feare and true knowledge of God? and what is learning except it be handmaid to veritie and ſound iudgement? Wherefore euen of this man, we may ſee it verified, that one Roger Bakon pronounced long after of the corruption of his time, when all things were meaſured by wit and worldlie policie, rather than by the ſcriptures or guidance of the ſpirit; Better it is ſaith he, to heare a rude and ſimple idiot preach the truth, without aparance of skill and learned eloquence, than a profound clearke to ſet forth error, with great ſhew of learning, and boaſt of filed vtterance. Gerſon in like ſort hath ſaid fullie almuch. Theſe follies of Pelagius were blaſed abroad about the 400. of Chriſt, and from thencefoorth how his number of monkes increaſed on the one ſide, and his doctrine on the other, there is almoſt no reader that is vnſkilfull and ignorant.

This alſo is certeine, that within the ſpace of 200. yeares and odde, there were manie more than 2100. monkes gathered togither in his houſe, whoſe trades notwithſtanding the errors of their founder, (who taught ſuch an eſtimation of merits and bodilie exerciſe (as Paule calleth it) that therby he ſought not onlie to impugne, but alſo preuent grace, which was in deed the originall occaſion of the erection of his houſe) were yet farre better and more godlie than all thoſe religious orders, that were inuented of later time, wherein the profeſſours liued to themſelues, their wombs and the licentious fruition of thoſe parts, that are beneath the bellie. For theſe laboured continuallie for their owne liuings, at vacant times from praier (as did Serapions monkes, which were 10000. ouer whome he himſelfe was Abbat) and likewiſe for the better maintenance of ſuch learned men as were their appointed preachers. Their liues alſo were correſpondent to their doctrine, ſo that herein onelie they ſeemed intollerable, in that they had confidence in their deeds, and no warrant out of the word for their ſuccor & defenſe, but were ſuch a plant as the heauenlie father had not planted, and therefore no maruell, though afterward they were raiſed by the roots.

But as Pelagius and his adherents had a time to infect the church of Chriſt in Britaine, ſo the liuing God hath had a ſeaſon alſo to purge and cleanſe the ſame, though not by a full reformation of doctrine, ſith Germanus, Lupus, Palladius, Patricius, and ſuch like leaning for the moſt part vnto the monaſticall trades, did not ſo much condemne the generall errors of Pelagius one waie, as maintaine the ſame, or as euill opinions another. For as Patricke ſeemed to like well of the honoring of the dead, ſo Germanus being in Britaine repaired an old chapell to S. Albane, wherein Lupus alſo praied, as Palladius vpheld the ſtrictneſſe of life, in monaſticall profeſſion to the vttermoſt of his power. Wherefore God wrought this purgation of his houſe at the firſt, rather by taking awaie the wicked and pompous ſcholemaiſters of errour out of this life:

hoping that by ſuch meanes, his people would haue giuen eare to the godlie that remained. But in proceſſe of time, when this his mercifull dealing was forgotten and our countriemen returned to their former diſorders, he brought in the Saxons, who left no idoll vnhonored, no not their filthie Priapus, vnto whom the women builded temples, and made a beaſtlie image (Cumpene intenſo, and as if he had bene circumciſed) whome they called Ithypallus, Verpus, and as Goropius Atvatic. pag. 26. addeth, Ters: calling vpon him in manner at euerie word, yea at the verie fall of a knife out of their hands, and not counted anie ſhame vnto the moſt ancient and ſober matrone of them all. Howbeit when this proceeding of the Lord could alſo take no place, and the ſheepe of his paſture would receiue no wholeſome fodder, it pleaſed his maieſtie, to let them run on headlong from one iniquitie to another, in ſo much that after the doctrine of Pelagius, it receiued that of Rome alſo, brought in by Auguſtine and his monkes, whereby it was to be ſeene, how they fell from the truth into hereſie, and from one hereſie ſtill into another, till at the laſt they were drowned altogither in the pits of error digged vp by Antichriſt, wels in deed that hold no water, which notwithſtanding to their followers ſeemed to be moſt ſound doctrine, and ciſterns of liuing water to ſuch as imbraced the ſame.

Auguſtine the monke.

Auguſtine.

This Auguſtine, after his arriuall, conuerted the Saxons in deed from paganiſme, but as the prouerbe ſaith, bringing them out of Gods bleſſing into the warme ſunne, he alſo imbued them with no leſſe hurtfull ſuperſtition, than they did know before: for beſide the onelie name of Chriſt, and externall contempt of their priſtinate idolatrie, he taught them nothing at all, but rather (I ſaie) made an exchange from groſſe to ſubtill treacherie, from open to ſecret idolatrie, & from the name of pagans, to the bare title of chriſtians, thinking this ſufficient for their ſoules health, and the ſtabliſhment of his monachiſme, of which kind of profeſſion, the holie ſcriptures of God can in no wiſe like or allow. But what cared he? ſith he got the great fiſh for which he did caſt his hooke, and ſo great was the fiſh that he caught in deed, that within the ſpace of 1000. yeares, and leſſe, it deuoured the fourth part & more of the beſt ſoile of the Iland, which was wholie beſtowed vpon his monkes, & other religious broodes that were hatched ſince his time, as may hereafter appeere in the booke following, where I intreate of cities, townes, &c.

Monks of Canturburie plagued.

In the meane ſeaſon what ſucceſſe his monkes had at Canturburie, how oft they were ſpoiled by enimies, their houſes burned by caſualtie, and brethren conſumed with peſtilence, I refer me to Gotcellius, Houeden, Geruaſe, and the reſt of their owne hiſtoriographers. And ſo ſore did the peſtilence rage among them in the time of Celnothus (in whoſe daies the præſts, clerks and monkes ſang their ſeruice togither in the quire, that (of I wote not how manie) there remained onelie fiue aliue, which was a notable token of the furie and wrath of God conceiued and executed againſt that malignant generation. It came alſo to paſſe at the laſt, that men vſed to praie for helpe at the ſaid Auguſtines tumbe (although afterward Thomas Becket a newer ſaint did not a little deface his glorie) among which king Athelſtane was one, whome Elnothus the abbat ſtaied ſo long in the place, when he came thither to praie, that his ſoldiours waiting for his comming, and ſuppoſing the monkes to haue murdered him, began to giue an aſſault and ſet fire vpon the houſe.

Meates. Picts. Caledoniens.

Whileſt theſe things were thus in hand, in the ſouth part of Albion, the Meates, Picts, and Caledoniens, which lie beyond the Scotiſh ſea, receiued alſo the faith, by preaching of ſuch chriſtian elders as aduentured thither dailie, who trauelled not without great ſucceſſe and increaſe of perfect godlines in that part of the Ile. Certes this proſperous attempt paſſed all mens expectation, for that theſe nations were in thoſe daies reputed wild, ſauage, and more vnfaithfull and craftie then well-minded people (as the wild Iriſh are in my time) and ſuch were they (to ſaie the truth) in deed, as neither the ſugred courteſie, nor ſharpe ſwords of the Romans could mollifie or reſtraine from their naturall furie, or bring to anie good order. For this cauſe alſo in the end, the Romane emperours did vtterlie caſt them off as an vnprofitable, brutiſh, & vntameable nation, and by an huge wall hereafter to be deſcribed, ſeparated that rude companie from the more mild and ciuill portion.

Scotland conuerted to the faith of Chriſt.

This conuerſion of the north parts fell out in the firſt yeare before the warres that Seuerus had in thoſe quarters, and 170. after the death of our ſauiour Jeſus Chriſt. From thenceforth alſo the chriſtian religion continued ſtill among them, by the diligent care of their paſtors and biſhops (after the vſe of the churches of the ſouth part of this Iland) till the Romane ſhepheard ſought them out, and found the meanes to pull them vnto him in like ſort with his long ſtaffe as he had done our countriemen, whereby in the end he aboliſhed the rites of the churches of Aſia there alſo, as Auguſtine had done alreadie in England: and in ſtéed of the ſame did furniſh it vp with thoſe of his pontificall ſee, although there was great contention, and no leſſe bloodſhed made amongſt them, before it could be brought to paſſe, as by the hiſtories of both nations yet extant may be ſeene.

Paladius.

In the time of Cœleſtine biſhop of Rome, who ſate in the 423. of Chriſt, one Paladius a Grecian borne (to whome Cyrill wrote his dialog De adoratione in ſpiritu) and ſometime diſciple to Iohn 24. biſhop of Jeruſalem, came ouer from Rome into Britaine, there to ſuppreſſe the Pelagian hereſie, which not a little moleſted the orthodoxes of that Iland. And hauing done much good in the extinguiſhing of the aforeſaid opinion there, he went at the laſt alſo into Scotland, ſuppoſing no leſſe, but after he had trauelled ſomwhat in confutation of the Pelagians in thoſe parts, he ſhould eaſilie perſuade that crooked nation to admit and receiue the rites of the church of Rome, as he would faine haue done before hand in the ſouth. But as Faſtidius Priſcus archbiſhop of London, and his Suffragans reſiſted him here; ſo did the Scotiſh prelates withſtand him there alſo in this behalfe: howbeit, bicauſe of the authoritie of his commiſſion, grauitie of perſonage, and the great gift which he had in the veine of pleaſant perſuaſion (whereby he drew the people after him, as Orpheus did the ſtones with his harpe, and Hercules ſuch as heard him by his tong) they had him not onelie then in great admiration, but their ſucceſſors alſo from time to time, and euen now are contented (and the rather alſo for that he came from Rome) to take him for their cheefe apoſtle, reckoning from his comming as from the faith receiued, which was in the 431. yeare of Chriſt, as the truth of their hiſtorie doth verie well confirme.

The firſt attempt of the biſhop of Rome to bring Scotland vnder his obedience.

Faſtidius biſhop of London.

Paladius reckompted for the apoſtle of the Scots.

Thus we ſee what religion hath from time to time beene receiued in this Iland, & how and when the faith of Chriſt came firſt into our countrie. Howbeit as in proceſſe of time it was ouerſhadowed, and corrupted with the dreames and fantaſticall imaginations of man, ſo it dailie ware worſe & worſe, till that it pleaſed God to reſtore the preaching of his goſpell in our daies, whereby the man of ſinne is now openlie reuealed, and the puritie of the word once againe brought to light, to the finall ouerthrow of the Romiſh ſathan, and his popiſh adherents that honour him daie and night to the vttermoſt of their power, yeelding vp their harts as temples for him to dwell in, which rather ought to be the temples of God and habitations of the Holy-ghoſt. But ſuch is their peruerſe ignorance (notwithſtanding that Paule hath giuen warning of him alreadie 2. Theſſ. 2. calling him (as I ſaid) the man of ſinne, and ſaieng that he ſitteth as God in the temple of God, ſhewing himſelfe in his chalenge of power, as if he were God, vnder pretenſe of zeale vnto true religion) that they will not giue eare vnto the truth, but rather ſhut their eares and their eies from hearing and reading of the ſcriptures, becauſe they will not be drawne out of his ſnares and bondage.

Of the manifold conuerſions and alterations of the eſtate of the common-wealth of Britaine, ſithens the time of Samothes.

THere is a certeine period of kingdomes, of 430. yeares, in which commonlie they ſuffer ſome notable alteration. And as in the aforeſaid ſeaſon there is ſet a time of increaſe and decaie, ſo we find that before the execution of Gods purpoſe doth come to paſſe, in changing the eſtate of things, ſundrie tokens are ſent, whereby warning is giuen, that without repentance he will come and viſit our offenſes. This is partlie verified by Ioachimus Camerarius, who in his firſt booke De oſtentis intreating of the ſame argument, telleth of a ſtrange earthquake felt in Delus, which was neuer touched with any ſuch plague before or after the ouerthrow of the Perſians, giuen vnto them by the Grecians; alſo of the beard that ſuddenlie grew out of the face of the Pedacien prophetelle, ſo often as the citie was to be touched with any alteration and change. Nam (ſaith he) deſcriptas eſſe diuinitus ætates quibus idem humanarum rerum ſtatus duraret, quibus finitis, prædici prius quàm exiſteret nouationem in deterius euenturam rerum, quæque indies minùs ac minùs numini cordi eſſent. Emittuntur igitur cometæ diuinitus, &c. Hæc tandiu ſupra nos conſpecti quamdiu placuit Deo inferuntur, &c. Plato referreth ſuch changes as happen in common-wealths to a certeine diuine force that reſteth hidden in ſundrie od numbers, whereof their periods do conſiſt. True it is that God created all things in number, weight & meaſure, & that after an incomprehenſible maner vnto our fraile & humane capacitie. Neuertheleſſe, he appointed not theſe three to haue the rule of his works, wherefore we muſt not aſcribe theſe changes to the force of number with Plato, much leſſe then vnto deſtinie with the Peripatetiks, but vnto the diuine prouidence and appointment of God, which onelie may be called deſtinie as S. Auguſtine ſaith, for of other deſtinie it is impietie to dreame. Ariſtotle aſcribing all euents vnto manifeſt cauſes precedent, doth ſcoffe at Plato and his numbers in his booke of common-wealths, and bringeth in ſundrie cauſes of the alteration of the ſtate of things, which we may referre vnto principals, as iniurie, oppreſſion, ambition, treaſon, rebellion, contempt of religion and lawes, and therevnto abundance of wealth in few, and great neceſſitie and miſerie in manie. But whatſoeuer Ariſtotle geſſeth at theſe things by humane reaſon as at the firſt cauſes, yet we acknowledge other beyond them, as ſinne, which being ſuffered and come to the full, is cut downe by the iuſtice of the high God, the cheefe cauſe of all, who foreſeeing the wickednelle of ſuch as dwell on earth, doth conſtitute ſuch a reuolution of things in their beginnings, as beſt ſtandeth with the execution of his purpoſe, and correction of our errors. The cauſes therefore that Ariſtotle doth deliuer, are nothing elſe but the meanes which God vſeth to bring his purpoſes to paſſe; and yet they deſerue the name of cauſes, in that they preceed thoſe effects which follow them immediatlie. But in truth other than ſecondarie or third cauſes no man can iuſtlie call them. Bodinus in his hiſtoricall method, cap. 6. making a large diſcourſe of the conuerſions of commonwealths, doth ſeeme at the firſt to denie the force of number, but after a while he marueileth that no Grecian or Latine Academike, hath hitherto made any diſcourſe of the excellencie of ſuch numbers as apperteine to the eſtate of empires and kingdomes by exemplification in any one citie or other. Hereby he ſheweth himſelfe vpon the ſudden to alter his iudgement, ſo that he ſetteth downe certeine numbers as fatall; to wit, three vnto women, and ſeauen and nine vnto men, which (ſaith he) haue Magnam in tota rerum natura poteſtatem, meaning as well in common-wealths and kingdomes from their firſt erections, as in particular ages of bodies, for ſickenelle, health, change of habitation, wealth, and loſſe, &c: and for the confirmation of the ſame, he ſetteth downe ſundrie examples of apparant likelihood, either by multiplication of one by the other, or diuiſion of greater numbers by either of them, or their concurrence one with another, calling the aforeſaid three his criticall or iudiciall numbers, whereby he bringeth or rather reſtoreth an old kind of arithmancie (fathered on Pythagoras, yet neuer inuented by him) againe into the world. But we chriſtians, in reſpecting of cauſes, haue to looke vnto the originall and great cauſe of all, and therefore we haue not to leane vnto theſe points in any wiſe as cauſes: for we know and confeſſe that all things depend vpon his prouidence, who humbleth and exalteth whom it pleaſeth him. Neuertheleſſe, I hope we may without offenſe examine how theſe aſſertions hold, ſo long as we vſe them rather as Indices than Cauſas mutationum. And therefore haue I attempted to practiſe at this preſent the example of Bodinus, firſt in the alterations of our ciuill eſtate paſſed; and ſecondlie, of the like in caſes of religion; from the flood generallie, and then after the firſt comming in of Samothes into our Ile, thereby ſomewhat to ſatiſfie my ſelfe, and recreate the readers; but ſtill proteſting in the meane ſeaſon that I vtterlie denie them to be any cauſes, or of themſelues to worke any effect at all in theſe things, as Bodinus would ſeeme to vphold. As for thoſe of other countries, I referre you to Ariſtotles politikes, and the eight of the common-wealth which Plato hath left vnto vs, therby to be farther reſolued, if you be deſirous to looke on them. In beginning therefore with my purpoſe; Firſt becauſe the flood of Noah was generall, and therefore appertinent vnto all, it ſhall not be amiſſe to begin with that, which was in the yeare 1656. after the creation of Adam, ſo that if you diuide the ſame by nine, you ſhall find the quotient to fall out exactlie with the 184. reuolution of the ſame number. Secondlie, for ſo much as the confuſion of tongs was the originall cauſe of the diſperſion of the people ouer the face of the whole earth, it ſhall not be amiſſe alſo to examine the ſame. Certes it fell out in the 133. after the flood: if we diuide therefore the ſaid 133. by ſeauen, you ſhall find the quotient 19. without any ods remaining. From hence alſo vnto the comming of Samothes into Britaine, or rather his lawes giuen vnto the Celts, and with them vnto the Britons, in the ſecond of his arriuall in this land, we find by exact ſupputation 126. yeares, which being parted by nine or ſeauen ſheweth ſuch a concluſion as maketh much for this purpoſe. Doubtleſſe I am the more willing to touch the time of his lawes than his entrance, ſith alteration of ordinances is the cheefe and principall token of change in rule and regiment; although at this preſent the circumſtances hold not, ſith he diſpoſſeſſed none, neither incroched vpon any. From Samothes vnto the tyrannie of Albion, are 335. yeares complet, ſo that he arriued here in the 335. or 248. ſeptenarie, which alſo concurreth with the 590. after the flood. In like ſort the regiment of Albion continued but ſeauen yeares, and then was the ſouereingtie of this Ile reſtored againe by Hercules vnto the Celts. The next alteration of our eſtate openlie knowne, happened by Brute, betweene whoſe time and death of Albion there paſſed full 601. yeares (for he ſpent much time after his departure out of Grecia, before he came into Albion) ſo that if you accompt him to come hither in the 602. you ſhall haue 86. ſeptenaries exactlie. From Brute to the extinction of his poſteritie in Ferrex and Porrex, and pentarchie of Britaine, taine,are 630. yeares,or 70. nouenaries,than the which where ſhall a man find a more preciſe period after this method or preſcription,for manie and diuers conſiderations. The time of the pentarchie indured likewiſe 49. yeares, or ſeauen ſeptenaries, which being expired Dunwallo brought all the princes vnder his ſubiection,and ruled ouer them as monarch of this Ile. After the pentarchie ended, we find againe that in the 98. yeare, Brennus rebelled againſt Beline his brother, whereupon inſued cruell bloodſhed betweene them. So that here you haue 14. ſeptenaries, as you haue from thoſe warres ended, which indured a full yeare & more before Brennus was reconciled to his brother, to the comming of Cæſar into this Iland(whereat our ſeruitude and miſerable thraldome to the Romans may worthilie take his entrance)48. or 336. yeares, than the which concurrences I know not how a man ſhould imagine a more exact.

After the comming of Cæſar we haue 54. or fiue nouenaries to Chriſt, whoſe death and paſſion redoundeth generallie to all that by firme and ſure faith take hold of the ſame,and applie it vnto their comfort. From the birth of Chriſt to our countrie deliuered from the Romane yoke, are 446. yeares, at which time the Britains choſe them a king,and betoke themſelues to his obedience. But neither they nor their king being then able to hold out the Scots and Picts,which dailie made hauocke of their countrie; the ſaid Vortiger in the third yeare of his reigne (which was the 63. ſeptenarie after Chriſt)did ſend for the Saxons, who arriued here in the 449. and 450. yeares of Grace, in great companies,for our aid and ſuccour, although that in the end their entrances turned to our vtter decaie and ruine, in that they made a conqueſt of the whole Ile,and draue vs out of our liuings. Hereby we ſee therefore how the preparatiue began in the 449. but how it was finiſhed in the tenth nouenarie, the ſequele is too too plaine. In like ſort in the 43. nouenarie or 387. after the comming of the Saxons,the Danes entred,who miſerablie afflicted this Ile by the ſpace of 182. yeares or 26. ſeptenaries, which being expired, they eſtabliſhed themſelues in the kingdome by Canutus. But their time laſting not long,the Normans followed in the end of the 49. yeare,and thus you ſee how theſe numbers do hold exactlie vnto the conqueſt. The like alſo we find of the continuance of the Normans or ſucceſſion of the Conquerour,which indured but 89. yeares, being extinguiſhed in Stephen, and that of the Saxons reſtored in Henrie the ſecond,although it lacke one whole yeare of ten nouenaries,which is a ſmall thing,ſith vpon diuers occaſions the time of the execution of any accident may be preuented or prorogued, as in direction and progreſſion aſtronomicall is often times perceiued. From hence to the infamous excommunication of England in king Iohns daies, whereupon inſued the reſignation of his crownes and dominions to the pope,are eight ſeptenaries or 56. yeares. Thence againe to the depoſition of Richard. 2. and vſurpation of Henrie 4. are 77. yeares or 11. ſeptenaries. From hence to the conſpiracie made againſt Edward. 2. after which he was depoſed & murdered are 117. yeares,or 13. nouenaries. From hence to the beginning of the quarell betweene the houſes of Yorke and Lancaſter (wherein foure ſcore and od perſons of the blod rotall were ſlaine and made awaie firſt and laſt, and which warres begunne in the 1448. and the yeare after the death of the Duke of Glocester, whoſe murther ſeemed to make free paſſage to the ſaid broile)are 72. yeares or eight nouenaries. From hence to the tranſlation of the crowne from the houſe of Lancaſter to that of Yorke, in Edward the 4. are 14. yeares or two ſeptenaries, and laſt of all to the vnion of the ſaid houſes in Henrie the eight, is an exact quadrat of ſeuen multiplied in it ſelfe, or 49. yeares, whereof I hope this may in part ſuffice.

Now as concerning religion, we haue from Chriſt to the faith firſt preached in Britaine(by Ioſephus ab Aramathia, and Simon Zelotes)as ſome write 70. yeares or 10. ſeptenaries. Whence alſo to the baptiſme of Lucius,and his nobilitie in the yeare after their conuerſion, 12. nouenaries or 108. yeares. After theſe the Saxons entred and changed the ſtate of religion for the moſt part into paganiſme, in the yeare 449. 39. nouenarie, and 273. yeare after Lucius had beene baptiſed, which is 39. ſeptenaries, if I be not deceiued. In the 147. or 21. ſeptenarie, Auguſtine came,who brought in poperie,which increaſed and continued till Wicklif with more boldneſſe than anie other began to preach the goſpell, which was Anno. 1361. or 765. yeares after the comming of Auguſtine,and yeeld 85. nouenaries exactlie. From hence againe to the expulſion of the pope 175 yeares,or 25. ſeptenaries,thence to the receiuing of the pope and popiſh doctrine 21. yeares or 3. ſeptenaries, whereunto I would ad the time of reſtoring the goſpell by Queene Elizabeth,were it not that it wanteth one full yeare of 7. Whereby we may well gather, that if there be anie hidden myſterie or thing conteined in theſe numbers,yet the ſame extendeth not vnto the diuine diſpoſition of things, touching the gift of grace and free mercie vnto the penitent, vnto which neither number weight nor meaſure ſhall be able to aſpire.

Of ſuch Ilands as are to be ſeene vpon the coaſts of Britaine. Cap. 10.

THere are neere vnto, or not verie farre from the coaſts of Britaine many faire Ilands,whereof Ireland with hir neighbors (not here handled) ſeeme to be the cheefe. But of the reſt, ſome are much larger or leſſe than other,diuers in like ſort enuironed continuallie with the ſalt ſea (whereof I purpoſe onelie to intreat, although not a few of them be Ilands but at the flood)and other finallie be clipped partlie by the freſh and partlie by the ſalt water, or by the freſh alone, whereof I may ſpeake afterward.

Of theſe ſalt Ilands (for ſo I call them that are enuironed with the Ocean waues) ſome are fruitfull in wood, corne, wild foule, and paſture ground for cattell, albeit that manie of them be accounted barren, becauſe they are onelie repleniſhed with conies, and thoſe of ſundrie colours(cheriſhed of purpoſe by the owners, for their ſkins or carcaſes in their prouiſion of houſehold) without either man or woman otherwiſe inhabiting in them. Furthermore, the greateſt number of theſe Ilands haue townes and pariſh-churches, within their ſeuerall precincts, ſome mo, ſome leſſe: and beſide all this,are ſo inriched with commodities,that they haue pleaſant hauens, freſh ſprings, great ſtore of fiſh, and plentie of cattell, wherby the inhabitants do reape no ſmall aduantage. How manie they are in number I cannot as yet determine, becauſe mine informations are not ſo fullie ſet downe,as the promiſes of some on the one ſide, & mine expectation on the other did extend vnto. Howbeit,firſt of all that there are certeine which lie neere togither, as it were by heapes and cluſters, I hope none will readilie denie. Of theſe alſo thoſe called the Neſiadæ, Inſulæ Scylurum, Sileuſtræ, Syllanæ,now the Sorlings,and Iles of Silley, lieng beyond Cornwall are one,and conteineth in number one hundreth fourtie and ſeauen (each of them bearing graſſe) beſides ſhelfes and ſhallowes. In like ſort the companie of the Hebrides in old time ſubiect vnto Ireland are another, which are ſaid to be 43. ſituat vpon the weſt ſide of this Iland, betweene Ireland & Scotland,and of which there are ſome that repute Angleſei, Neſiadæ. Inſulæ Scylurum. Sileuſtræ. Syllanæ. Sorlingæ. Sylley. Hebrides. Hebudes. Meuaniæ. Orchades.

Mona Cæſaris, and other lieng betweene them to be parcell, in their corrupted iudgement. The third cluſter or bunch conſiſteth of thoſe that are called the Orchades, and theſe lie vpon the northweſt point of Scotland, being 31. alias 28. in number, as for the reſt they lie ſcattered here and there, and yet not to be vntouched as their courſes ſhall come about. There are alſo the 18. Shetland Iles, and other yet farther diſtant from them, of which Iohn Frobuſer I doubt not touched vpon ſome in his voiage to Meta Incognita: but for ſomuch as I muſt ſpeake of the Shetlands hereafter, I do not meane to ſpend anie time about them as yet.

There haue beene diuers that haue written of purpoſe, De inſulis Britanniæ, as Cæſar doth confeſſe. The like alſo may be ſeene by Plutarch, who nameth one Demetrius a Britaine, that ſhould ſet forth an exact treatiſe of each of them in order, and among other tell of certeine deſert Iles beyond Scotland dedicated to ſundrie gods and goddeſſes, but of one eſpeciallie, where Briareus ſhould hold Saturne and manie other ſpirits faſt bound with the chaines of an heauie ſléepe, as he heard, of which ſome die now and then, by meane whereof the aire becommeth maruellouſlie troubled, &c: as you may ſée in Plutarch De ceſſatione oraculorum, &c. But ſith thoſe bookes are now periſhed, and the moſt of the ſaid Ilands remaine vtterlie vnknowen, euen to our owne ſelues (for who is able in our time to ſay where is Glota, Hiuerion, Etta, Iduna, Armia, Æſarea, Barſa, Iſandium, Icdelis, Xantiſma, Indelis, Siata, Ga. Andros or Edros, Siambis, Xanthos, Ricnea, Menapia, &c? whoſe names onelie are left in memorie by ancient writers, but I ſaie their places not ſo much as heard of in our daies) I meane (God willing) to ſet downe ſo manie of them with their commodities, as I do either know by Leland, or am otherwiſe inſtructed of by ſuch as are of credit. Herein alſo I will touch at large thoſe that are moſt famous, and briefflie paſſe ouer ſuch as are obſcure and vnknowen, making mine entrance at the Thames mouth, and directing this imagined courſe (for I neuer ſailed it) by the ſouth part of the Iland into the weſt. From thence in like ſort I will proceed into the north, & come about againe by the eaſt ſide into the fall of the aforeſaid ſtreame, where I will ſtrike ſaile, and ſafelie be ſet a ſhore, that haue often in this voiage wanted water, but oftener béene ſet a ground, eſpeciallie on the Scotiſh ſide.

In beginning therefore, with ſuch as lie in the mouth of the aforeſaid riuer, I muſt néeds paſſe by the How, which is not an Iland, and therefore not within the compaſſe of my deſcription at this time, but almoſt an Iland, which parcels the Latins call Peninſulas, and I do engliſh a Byland, vſing the word for ſuch as a man may go into drie-ſoted at the full ſea, or on horſeback at the low water without anie boat or veſſell: and ſuch a one almoſt is Rochford hundred in Eſſex alſo, yet not at this time to be ſpoken of, becauſe not the ſea onelie but the freſh water alſo doth in maner enuiron it, and is the cheefe occaſion wherefore it is called an Iland. This How lieth betweene Cliffe (in old time called Clouesho, to wit, Cliffe in How or in the hundred of How) & the midwaie that goeth along by Rochéſter, of which hundred there goeth an old prouerbe in rime after this maner:

How.

He that rideth into the hundred of How,
Beſide pilfering ſea-men ſhall find durt ynow.

Greane. Next vnto this we haue the Greane, wherein is a towne of the ſame denomination, an Ile ſuppoſed to be foure miles in length, and two in breadth. Then come we to Shepey, which Ptolomie calleth Connos, conteining ſeauen miles in length, and three in breadth, wherein is a caſtell called Quinborow, and a parke, beſide foure townes, of which one is named Minſter, another Eaſtchurch, the third Warden, and the fourth Leyden: the whole ſoile being throughlie fed with ſheepe, verie well wooded, and (as I heare) belongeth to the Lord Cheyney, as parcell of his inheritance. It lieth thirteene miles by water from Rocheſter, but the caſtell is fifteene, and by ſouth thereof are two ſmall Ilands, whereof the one is called Elmeſie, and the more eaſterlie Herteſie. In this alſo is a towne called Hertie, or Hartie, and all in the Lath of Scraie, notwithſtanding that Hartie lieth in the hundred of Feuerſham, and Shepey reteineth one eſpeciall Bailie of hir owne. Elmeſie. Herteſie.

From hence we paſſe by the Reculuers (or territorie belonging in time paſt to one Raculphus, who erected an houſe of religion, or ſome ſuch thing there) vnto a little Iland in the Stoure mouth. Hereupon alſo the Thanet abutteth, which Ptolomie calleth Toliapis, other Athanatos, becauſe ſerpents are ſuppoſed not to liue in the ſame, howbeit ſith it is not enuironed with the ſea, it is not to be dealt withall as an Iland in this place, albeit I will not let to borow of my determination, and deſcribe it as I go, becauſe it is ſo fruitfull. Beda noteth it in times paſt to haue conteined 600. families, which are all one with Hidelands, Ploughlands, Carrucates, or Temewares. He addeth alſo that it is diuided from our continent, by the riuer called Wantſume, which is about three furlongs broad, and to be paſſed ouer in two places onelie. But whereas Polydore ſaieth, the Thanet is nine miles in length & not much leſſe in breadth, it is now reckoned that it hath not much aboue ſeauen miles from Nordtmuth to Sandwich, and foure in breadth, from the Stoure to Margate, or from the ſouth to the north, the circuit of the whole being 17. or 18. as Leland alſo noteth. This Iland hath no wood growing in it except it be forced, and yet otherwiſe it is verie fruitfull, and beſide that it wanteth few other commodities, the fineſt chalke is ſaid to be found there. Herein alſo did Auguſtine the monke firſt arriue, when he came to conuert the Saxons, and afterward in proceſſe of time, ſundrie religious houſes were erected there, as in a ſoile much bettered (as the ſuperſticious ſuppoſed) by the ſteps of that holy man, & ſuch as came ouer with him. There are at this time 10. pariſh churches at the leaſt in the Ile of Thanet, as S. Nicholas, Birchington, S. Iohns, Wood or Woodchurch, S. Peters, S. Laurence, Mownton or Monkeron, Minſter, S. Gyles, and all Saincts, whereof M. Lambert hath written at large in his deſcription of Kent, and placed the ſame in the Lath of ſainct Auguſtine and hundred of Kingſlow, as may eaſilie be ſéene to him that will peruſe it. Sturrey. Thanet. The ſait verſe of or couple an firſt of an other. Scoleſey Beles th taken. Thorne. Hyding. Port. In Lincolneſhire the word Hide or Hideland, was neuer in vſe in old time as in other places, but for Hide they vſed the word Carucate or cartware, or Teme, and theſe were of no leſſe compaſſe than an Hideland. Ex Hugone le blanc Monacho Petroburgenſi.

Sometime Rutupium or (as Beda calleth it) Reptaceſter, ſtood alſo in this Iland, but now thorough alteration of the chanell of the Dour, it is ſhut quite out, and annexed to the maine. It is called in theſe daies Richborow, and as it ſhould ſeeme builded vpon an indifferent ſoile or high ground. The large brickes alſo yet to be ſeene there, in the ruinous walles, declare either the Romane or the old Britiſh workemanſhip. But as time deceaieth all things, ſo Rutupium named Ruptimuth is now become deſolate, and out of the duſt thereof Sandwich produced, which ſtandeth a full mile from the place where Reptaceſter ſtood. The old writers affirme, how Arthur & Mordred fought one notable battell here, wherin Gwallon or Gawan was ſlaine; at which time the ſaid rebell came againſt his ſouereigne with 70000. Picts, Scots, Iriſh, Norwegiens, &c. and with Ethelbert the firſt chriſtian king of Kent did hold his palace in this towne, and yet none of his coine hath hitherto béene found there, as is dailie that of the Romanes, whereof manie péeces of ſiluer and gold, ſo well as of braſſe, copper, and other mettall haue often béene ſhewed vnto me. It ſhould appéere in like ſort, that of this place, all the whole coaſt of Kent therabout was called Littus Rutupinum, which ſome do not a little confirme by theſe words of Lucane, to be read in his firſt booke ſome after the beginning: Rutupium. Wight. Guidh.

Aut vaga cum Tethis, Rutupinâq; littora feruent, Vnda Calidonios fallit turbata Britannos.

The last verse of one couple and first of an other.

Or when the wandering seas and Kentish coasts doo worke, And Calidons of British bloud,
the troubled waues beguile.

Meaning in like sort by the latter, the coast nere Andredeswald, which in time past was called Littus Calidonium of that wood or forrest, as Leland also confirmeth. But as it is not my mind to deale anie thing curiouslie in these by-matters, so in returning againe to my purpose, and taking my iourney toward the Wight, I must needs passe by Selesey, which sometime (as it should seeme) hath beene a noble Iland, but now in maner a Byland or Peninsula, wherin the chéefe sée of the bishop of Chichester was holden by the space of three hundred twentie nine yeares, and vnder twentie bishops.

Selesey of Seles there taken.

Next vnto this, we come vnto those that lie betweene the Wight and the maine land, of which the most easterlie is called Thorne, and to saie truth, the verie leaff of all that are to be found in that knot. Being past the Thorne, we touched vpon the Yaling, which is bigger than the Thorne, and wherein one towne is situat of the same denomination beside another, whose name I remember not. By west also of the Yaling lieth the Port (the greatest of the three alreadie mentioned) and in this standeth Portsmouth and Kingsteed, whereof also our Leland, saieth thus: Port Ile is cut from the shore by an arme of the maine hauen, which breaketh out about three miles aboue Portsmouth, and goeth vp two miles or more by marish ground to a place called Portbridge, which is two miles from Portsmouth. Then breaketh there out another creeke from the maine sea, about Auant hauen, which gulleth vp almost to Portbridge, and thence is the ground disseuered, so that Portsmouth standeth in a corner of this Ile, which Iland is in length six miles, and three miles in bredth, verie good for grasse and corne, not without some wood, and here and there inclosure. Beside this, there is also another Iland north northwest of Port Ile, which is now so worne and washed awaie with the working of the sea, that at the spring tides it is wholie couered with water, and thereby made vnprofitable. Finallie being past all these, and in compassing this gulfe, we come by an other, which lieth north of Hirst castell, & southeast of Baie hauen, whereof I find nothing worthie to be noted, sauing that it wanteth wood, as Ptolomie affirmeth in his Geographicall tables of all those Ilands which enuiron our Albion.

The Wight is called in Latine Vectis, but in the British speach Guidh, that is to saie, Eese or easie to be séene, or (as D. Caius saith) separate, bicause that by a breach of the sea, it was once diuided from the maine, as Sicilia was also from Italie, Anglesei from Wales, Foulenesse from Esser, & Quinborow from Kent. It lieth distant from the south shore of Britaine (where it is fardest off) by fiue miles & a halfe, but where it commeth nerest, not passing a thousand paces, and this at the cut ouer betweene Hirst castell and a place called Whetwell chine, as the inhabitants doo report. It conteineth in length twentie miles, and in bredth ten, it hath also the north pole eleuated by 50. degrées and 27. minuts, and is onelie 18. degrees in distance, and 50. od minuts from the west point, as experience hath confirmed, contrarie to the description of Ptolomie, and such as folow his assertions in the same. In forme, it representeth almost an egg, and so well is it inhabited with meere English at this present, that there are thirtie six townes, villages and castels to be found therein, beside 27. parish-churches, of which 15. or 16. haue their Parsons, the rest either such poore Vicars or Curats, as the liuings left are able to sustaine. The names of the parishes in the Wight are these.

P. signifieth parsonages, V. vicarages.

It belongeth for temporall iurisdiction to the countie of Hamshire, but in spirituall cases it yeeldeth obedience to the sée of Winchester, wherof it is a Deanerie. As for the soile of the whole Iland, it is verie fruitfull, for notwithstanding the shore of it selfe be verie full of rocks and craggie cliffes, yet there wanteth no plentie of cattell, corne, pasture, medow ground, wild foule, fish, fresh riuers, and pleasant woods, whereby the inhabitants may liue in ease and welfare. It was first ruled by a seuerall king, and afterwards wonne from the Britons by Vespasian the legat, at such time as he made a voiage into the west countrie. In processe of time also it was gotten from the Romans by the kings of Sussex, who held the souereigntie of the same, and kept the king thereof vnder tribute, till it was wonne also from them, in the time of Athelwold, the eight king of the said south region, by Ceadwalla, who killed Aruald that reigned there, and reserued the souereigntie of that Ile to himselfe and his successors for euermore. At this time also there were 1200. families in that Iland, whereof the said Ceadwalla gaue 300 to Wilfride sometime bishop of Yorke, exhorting him to erect a church there, and preach the gospell also to the inhabitants thereof, which he in like maner performed, but according to the prescriptions of the church of Rome, wherevnto he yéelded himselfe vassall and feudarie: so that this Ile by Wilfride was first conuerted to the faith, though the last of all other that hearkened vnto the word. After Ceadwalla, Woolfride the parricide was the first Saxon prince that aduentured to flie into the Wight for his safegard, whither he was driuen by Kenwalch of the Westsaxons, who made great warres vpon him, and in the end compelled him to go into this place for succour, as did also king Iohn, in the rebellious stir of his Barons, practised by the clergie: the said Iland being as then in possession of the Forts, as some doo write that haue handled it of purpose. The first Earle of this Iland that I doo read of, was one Baldwijne de Betoun, who married for his second wife, the daughter of William le Grosse Earle of Awmarle; but he dieng without issue by this ladie, she was maried the second time to Earle Yaundeuile, and thirdlie to William de Fortes, who finished Skipton castell, which his wiues father had begun about the time of king Richard the first. Hereby it came to passe also, that the Forts were Earls of Awmarle, Wight, and Deuonshire a long time, till the ladie Elizabeth Fortes, sole heire to all those possessions came to age, with whom king Edward the third so preuailed through monie & faire words, that he gat the possession of the Wight wholie into his hands, & held it to himselfe & his successors, vntill Henrie the first, about the twentieth of his reigne, crowned Henrie Beauchamp sonne to the lord Richard Earle of Warwike king thereof and of Yardesey and Gardesey with his owne hands, and thervnto gaue him a commendation of the Dutchie of Warwike with the titles of Comes comitum Angliæ, lord Spenser of Aburgauenie, and of the castell of Bilsow (which castell was sometime taken from his ancestors by king Iohn) albeit he did not long enioy theſe great honors, ſith he died 1446. without iſſue, and ſeuen yéeres after his father.

After we be paſt the Wight, we go forward and come vnto Poole hauen, wherein is an Ile, called Brunt Keyſy, in which was ſometime a pariſh-church, and but a chapell at this preſent, as I heare. There are alſo two other Iles, but as yet I know not their names. Brunt Keyſy.

We haue (after we are paſſed by theſe) another Ile, or rather Byland alſo vpon the coaſt named Portland not far from Waymouth or the Golwy, a prettie fertile peece though without wood, of ten miles in circuit, now well inhabited, but much better heretofore, and yet are there about foure ſcore houſholds in it. There is but one ſtreet of houſes therein, the reſt are diſperſed, howbeit they belong all to one pariſh-church, whereas in time paſt there were two within the compaſſe of the ſame. There is alſo a caſtell of the kings, who is lord of the Ile, although the biſhop of Wincheſter be patrone of the church, the parſonage whereof is the faireſt houſe in all the peece. The people there are no leſſe excellent ſlingers of ſtones than were the Baleares, who would neuer giue their children their dinners till they had gotten the ſame with their ſlings, and therefore their parents vſed to hang their meate verie high vpon ſome bough, to the end that he which ſtrake it downe might onlie haue it, whereas ſuch as miſſed were ſure to go without it, Florus lib. 3. cap. 8. Which feat the Portlands vſe for the defenſe of their Iland, and yet otherwiſe are verie couetous. And whereas in time paſt they liued onlie by fiſhing, now they fall to tillage. Their fire bote is brought out of the Wight, and other places, yet doo they burne much cow dong dried in the ſunne, for there is I ſaie no wood in the Ile, except a few elmes that be about the church. There would ſome grow there, no doubt, if they were willing to plant it, although the ſoile lie verie bleake and open. It is not long ſince this was united to the maine, and likelie yer long to be cut off againe. Portland.

Being paſt this we raiſe another, alſo in the mouth of the Golwy, betweene Colſford and Lime, of which for the ſmalneſſe thereof I make no great account. Wherefore giuing ouer to intreat any farther of it, I caſt about to Jardſey, and Gardeſey, which Iles with their appurtenances apperteined in times paſt to the Dukes of Normandie, but now they remaine to our Queene, as parcell of Hamſhire and iuriſdiction of Wincheſter, & belonging to hir crowne, by meanes of a compoſition made betweene K. Iohn of England and the K. of France, when the dominions of the ſaid prince began ſo faſt to decreaſe, as Thomas Sulmo ſaith. Jardſey. Gardeſey.

Of theſe two, Jardſey is the greateſt, an Iland hauing thirtie miles in compaſſe, as moſt men doo coniecture. There are likewiſe in the ſame twelue pariſh-churches, with a colledge, which hath a Deane and Prebends. It is diſtant from Gardſey full 21. miles, or therabouts, and made notable, by meanes of a bloudie fact done there in Queene Maries daies, whereby a woman called Perotine Maſſie wife vnto an honeſt miniſter or preeſt, being great with childe by hir huſband, was burned to aſhes: through the exceeding crueltie of the Deane and Chapiter, then contending manifeſtlie againſt God for the mainteinance of their popiſh and antichriſtian kingdome. In this hir execution, and at ſuch time as the fire caught holde of hir wombe, hir bellie brake, and there iſſued a goodly manchilde from hir, with ſuch force that it fell vpon the cold ground quite beyond the heate and furie of the flame, which quicklie was taken vp and giuen from one tormentor and aduerſarie to an other to looke vpon, whoſe eies being after a while ſatisfied with the beholding thereof, they threw it vnto the carcaſe of the mother which burned in the fire, whereby the poore innocent was conſumed to aſhes, whom that furious element would gladlie haue left vntouched, & whereunto it miniſtred (as you heare) an hurtleſſe paſſage. In this latter alſo, there haue béene in times paſt, fiue religious houſes, and nine caſtels, howbeit in theſe daies there is but one pariſh-church left ſtanding in the ſame. There are alſo certeine other ſmall Ilands, which Henrie the ſecond in his donation calleth Inſulettas, beſide verie manie rocks, whereof one called S. Hilaries (wherein ſometime was a monaſterie) is ſaſt vpon Jardſey, another is named the Cornet, which hath a caſtel not paſſing an arrow ſhot from Gardſey. The Serke alſo is betweene both, which is ſix miles about, and hath another annexed to it by an Iſthmus or Strictland, wherein was a religious houſe, & therwithall great ſtore of conies. S. Hilaries. Iliad. 6. Cornet. Serke. Iliad 5. & 7

There is alſo the Brehoc, the Gytho, and the Herme, which latter is foure miles in compaſſe, and therein was ſometime a Canonrie, that afterward was conuerted into an houſe of Franciſcanes. There are two other likewiſe neere vnto that of S. Hilarie, of whoſe names I haue no notice. There is alſo the rockie Ile of Burhoo, but now the Ile of rats, ſo called of the huge plentie of rats that are found there, though otherwiſe it be replenithed with infinit ſtore of conies, betweene whome and the rats, as I coniecture, the ſame which we call Turkie conies, are oftentimes produced among thoſe few houſes that are to be ſeene in this Iland. Some are of the opinion that there hath béene more ſtore of building in this Ile than is at this preſent to be ſeene, & that it became abandoned through multitudes of rats, but hereof I find no perfect warrantiſe that I may ſafelie truſt vnto, yet in other places I read of the like thing to haue happened, as in Gyara of the Cyclades, where the rats increaſed ſo faſt that they draue away the people. Varro ſpeaketh of a towne in Spaine that was ouerthrowne by conies. The Abderits were driuen out of Thracia by the increaſe of mice & frogs; and ſo manie conies were there on a time in the Iles Maiorca and Minorca (now perteining to Spaine) that the people began to ſtarue for want of bread, and their cattell for lacke of graſſe. And becauſe the Ilanders were not able to ouercome them, Auguſtus was conſtreined to ſend an armie of men to deſtroie that needleſſe brood. Plin. lib. 8. cap. 55. A towne alſo in France ſometime became deſolate onelie by frogs and toades. Another in Africa by locuſtes and alſo by graſhoppers, as Amicla was by ſnakes and adders. Theophraſt telleth of an whole countrie conſumed by the palmer-worme, which is like vnto an huge caterpiller. Plinie writeth of a prouince vpon the borders of Æthiopia made void of people by ants and ſcorpions, and how the citizens of Megara in Grecia were faine to leaue that citie through multitudes of bées, as waſpes had almoſt driuen the Epheſians out of Epheſus. But this of all other (whereof Ælianus intreateth) is moſt wonderfull, that when the Cretenſes were chaſed out of a famous citie of their Iland by infinit numbers of bées, the ſaid bees conuerted their houſes into hiues, and made large combes in them which reached from wall to wall, wherein they reſerued their honie. Which things being dulie conſidered, I doo not denie the poſſibilitie of the erpulſion of the inhabitants out of the Ile of Burhoo by rats, although I ſay that I doo not warrant the effect, becauſe I find it not ſet downe directlie in plaine words. Beſide this there is moreouer the Ile of Alderney a verie prettie plot, about ſeuen miles in compaſſe, wherin a preeſt not long ſince did find a coffin of ſtone, in which lay the bodie of an huge giant, whoſe fore teeth were ſo big as a mans fiſt, as Leland doth report. Certes this to me is no maruell at all, ſith I haue read of greater, and mentioned them alreadie in the beginning of this booke. Such a toth alſo haue they in Spaine whereunto they go in pilgrimage as vnto S. Chriſtophers toth, but it was one of his eie teeth, if Ludouicus Viues ſay true, who went thither to offer vnto the ſame Alderney. Comment. Brit. Horrible murther. Gardſey.

same. S. Augustl. de ciuit. lib. 15. cap. 9. writeth in like sort, of such another found vpon the coast of Vtica, and thereby gathereth that all men in time past were not onlie far greater than they be now, but also the giants farre exceeding the huge stature and height of the highest of them all. Homer complaineth that men in his time were but dwarfes in comparison of such as liued in the warre of Troy. See his fift Iliad, where he speaketh of Diomedes, and how he threw a stone at Æneas, (which 14. men of his time were not able to stirre) and therewith did hit him on the thigh and ouerthrow him. Virgill also doeth no lesse in his owne deuise, but Iuuenal breefelie comprehendeth all this in his 15. Satyra, where he saith:

Iliad. 6.

Iliad 5. & 7.

Virgilius Aen. 12.

Saxa inclinatis per humum quæsita lacertis
Incipiunt torquere, domestica seditione
Tela, nec hunc lapidem, quali se Turnus, & Aiax, Et quo Tydides percussit pondere coxam
Aeneæ: sed quem valeant emittere dextræ
Illis dissimiles, & nostro tempore nata.
Nam genus hoc viuo iam decrescebat Homero,
Terra malos homines nunc educat, atque pusillos,
Ergo Deus quicunque adsurit, videt, & odit.

But to returne againe vnto the Ile of Alderney, from whence I haue digressed. Herein also is a prettie towne with a parish-church, great plentie of corne, cattell, conies, and wilde foule, whereby the inhabitants do reape much gaine and commoditie: onelie wood is their want, which they otherwise supplie. The language also of such as dwell in these Iles, is French; but the wearing of their haire long, & the attire of those that liued in Gardsey and Jardsey, vntill the time of king Henrie the eight, was all after the Irish guise. The Ile of Gardsey also was sore spoiled by the French 1371. and left so desolate, that onlie one cattell remained therein vntouched.

Beyond this, and nearer vnto the coast of England (for these do lie about the verie middest of the British sea) we haue one Iland called the Bzuch or the Bzuchsey, lieng about two miles from Poole, whither men saile from the Fromouth, and wherein is nought else, but an old chapell, without any other housing.

Bruchsey.

Next to this also are certeine rocks, which some take for Iles, as Illeston rocke neere vnto Peritozie, Hozeffan Ile a mile from Peritozie by south, Blacke rocke Ile southeast from Peritozie toward Teygnemouth, and also Chefker, otherwise called Plegimundham: but how (to saie truth) or where this latter lieth, I cannot make report as yet, neuertheless sith Leland noteth them togither, I thinke it not my part to make separation of them.

Mount Iland.

From hence the nert Ile is called Mount Iland, otherwise Mowtland, situate ouer against Lough, about two miles from the shore, and well neere three miles in compasse. This Iland hath no inhabitants, but onelie the warrenner and his dog, who looketh vnto the conies there: notwithstanding that vpon the coast thereof in time of the yeare, great store of pilchards is taken, and carried from thence into manie places of our countrie. It hath also a fresh well comming out of the rocks, which is worthie to be noted in so small a compasse of ground. Moreouer in the mouth of the creeke that leadeth vnto Lough, or Low, as some call it, there is another little Iland of about eight acres of ground called S. Nicholas Ile, and midwaie betweene Falmouth and Dudman (a certeine Promontorie) is such another named the Greefe, wherein is great store of gulles & sea foule. As for Inis Pzynin, it lieth within the Baie, about three miles from Lizards, and containeth not aboue two acres of ground, from which Newlyn is not far distant, and wherein is a poze filher-towne and a faire wel-spring, wherof as yet no writer hath made mention. After these (omitting Pendinant in the point of Falmouth hauen) we came at last to saint Michaels mount, whereof I find this description readie to my hand in Leland.

S. Nicholas Iland.

Greefe. Inis Pzynin.

S. Michaels mount.

The compasse of the rot of the mount of saint Michaels is not much more than halfe a mile, and of this the south part is passurable and breedeth conies, the residue high and rockie soile. In the north side thereof also is a garden, with certeine houses and shops for fishermen. Furthermore, the waie to the mountaine lieth at the north side, and is frequented from halfe eb to halfe floud, the entrance beginning at the fot of the hill, and so ascending by steps and greeces westward, first, and then eastward to the vtter ward of the church. Within the same ward also is a court stronglie walled, wherein on the south side is a chapell of S. Michaell, and in the east side another of our ladie. Manie times a man may come to the hill on fot. On the north northwest side hereof also, is a Piere for botes and ships, and in the Baie betwixt the mount and Pensardz are seene at the lowe water marke, diuers rots and stubs of trees, beside hewen stone, sometimes of dwres & windowes, which are perceiued in the inner part of the Baie, and import that there hath not onelie beene building, but also firme ground, whereas the salt water doth now rule and beare the maisterie. Beyond this is an other little Ile, called S. Clements Ile, of a chapell there dedicated to that saint. It hath a little from it also the Ile called Mowlhole, which is not touched in any Chard. As for Mowlhole it selfe, it is a towne of the maine, called in Cornish Port Enis, that is, Portus insulæ, whereof the said Ile taketh denomination, and in tin workes neere vnto the same there hath beene found of late, speare heds, battell axes, and swords of copper wrapped vp in linnen, and scarselie hurt with rust or other hinderance. Certes the sea hath won verie much in this corner of our Iland, but cheefelie betweene Mowlhole and Pensardz.

S. Clements Ile.

Hauing thus passed ouer verie neere all such Iles, as lie vpon the south coast of Britaine, and now being come vnto the west part of our countrie, a sudden Pirie catcheth hold of vs (as it did before, when we went to Jardsey) and carieth vs yet more westerlie among the flats of Sylley. Such force doth the southeast wind often shewe vpon poore trauellers in those parts, as the south and southwest doth vpon strangers against the British coast, that are not skilfull of our rodes and harborowes. Howbeit such was our successe in this voiage, that we feared no rocks, more than did king Athelstane, when he subdued them (and some after builded a colledge of preests at S. Burien, in performance of his vow made when he enterprised this voiage for his safe returne) nor anie tempest of weather in those parts that could annoie our passage. Perusing therefore the perils whereinto we were pitifullie plunged, we found the Syllane Ilands (places often robbed by the Frenchmen and Spaniards) to lie distant from the point of Cornewall, about three or foure hours sailing, or twentie English miles, as some men do account it. There are of these (as I said) to the number of one hundreth fortie seauen in sight, whereof each one is greater or lesse than other, and most of them sometime inhabited: howbeit, there are twentie of them, which for their greatnesse and commodities exceed all the rest. Thereto (if you respect their position) they are situat in maner of a circle or ring, hauing an huge lake or portion of the sea in the middest of them, which is not without perill to such as with small aduisement enter into the same. Certes it passeth my cunning, either to name or to describe all these one hundreth fourtie seauen, according to their estate; neither haue I had anie information of them, more than I haue gathered by Leland, or gotten out of a map of their description, which I had sometime of Reginald Woolfe: wherfore omitting as it were all the rags, and such as are not worthie to haue anie time spent about their their particular deſcriptions, I will ſonelie touch the greateſt, and thoſe that lie togither (as I ſaid) in maner of a roundle.

S. Maries Ile. The firſt and greateſt of theſe therefore, called S. Maries Ile, is about fiue miles ouer, or nine miles in compaſſe. Therein alſo is a pariſh-church, and a poore towne belonging thereto, of threeſcore houſholds, beſide a caſtell, plentie of corne, conies, wild ſwans, puffens, gulles, cranes, & other kinds of foule, in great abundance. This fertile Iland being thus viewed, we ſailed ſouthwards by the Norman rocke, and S. Maries ſound vnto Agnus Ile, which is ſix miles ouer, and hath in like ſort one towne or pariſh within the ſame of fiue or ſix houſholds, beſide no ſmall ſtore of hogs & conies of ſundrie colours, verie profitable to their owners. It is not long ſince this Ile was left deſolate, for when the inhabitants thereof returned from a feaſt holden in S. Maries Ile, they were all drowned, and not one perſon left aliue. There are alſo two other ſmall Ilands, betweene this and the Annot, whereof I find nothing worthie relation: for as both of them ioind togither are not comparable to the ſaid Annot for greatneſſe and circuit, ſo they want both hogs and conies, whereof Annot hath great plentie. There is moreouer the Minwiſand, from whence we paſſe by the Smithy ſound (leauing three little Ilands on the left hand, vnto the Suartigan Iland, then to Rouſuian, Rouſuiar, and the Cregwin, which ſeauen are (for the moſt part) replenished with conies onelie, and wild garlike, but void of wood & other commodities, ſauing of a ſhort kind of graſſe, or here & there ſome firzes wheron their conies do feed.

Leauing therefore theſe deſert peeces, we incline a little toward the northweſt, where we ſtumble or run vpon Moncardiar, Inis Welſeck, & Suethiall. We came in like ſort vnto Rat Iland, wherein are ſo manie monſtrous rats, that if anie horſſes, or other beaſts, happen to come thither, or be left there by negligence but one night, they are ſure to be deuoured & eaten vp, without all hope of recouerie. There is moreouer the Anwall and the Brier, Ilands in like ſort void of all good furniture, conies onelie excepted, and the Brier (wherein is a village, caſtell, and pariſh-church) bringeth forth no leſſe ſtore of hogs, and wild foule, than Rat Iland doth of rats, whereof I greatlie maruell.

Moncarthat. Inis Welſeck. Suethiall. Rat Iland. Anwall. Brier.

By north of the Brier, lieth the Ruſco, which hath a Labell or Byland ſtretching out toward the ſouthweſt, called Inis widdon. This Ruſco is verie neere ſo great as that of S. Maries. It hath moreouer an hold, and a pariſh within it, beſide great ſtore of conies and wild foule, whereof they make much gaine in due time of the yeare. Next vnto this we come to the Round Iland, which is about a mile ouer, then to S. Lides Iland, (wherein is a pariſh-church dedicated to that Saint, beſide conies, wood, and wild foule, of which two later there is ſome indifferent ſtore) the Notho, the Auing, (one of them being ſituat by ſouth of another, and the Auing halfe a mile ouer, which is a iuſt halfe leſſe than the Notho) and the Tyan, which later is a great Iland, furniſhed with a pariſh-church, and no ſmall plentie of conies as I heare. After the Tyan we come to S. Martines Ile, wherein is a faire towne, the Ile it ſelfe being next vnto the Ruſco for greatneſſe, and verie well furniſhed with conies & freſh ſprings. Alſo betwixt this and S. Maries, are ten other, ſmaller, which reach out of the northeaſt into the ſouthweſt, as Knolworth, Sniuilliuer, Menwetham, Vollis. 1. Surwihe, Vollis. 2. Arthurs Iland, Guiniliuer, Nenech and Gothrois, whoſe eſtates are diuers: howbeit as no one of theſe is to be accounted great in compariſon of the other, ſo they all yeeld a ſhort graſſe meet for ſheepe and conies, as do alſo the reſt. In the greater Iles likewiſe (whoſe names are commonlie ſuch as thoſe of the townes or churches ſtanding in the ſame) there are (as I here) ſundrie lakes, and thoſe neuer without great plentie of wild foule, ſo that the Iles of Sylley, are ſuppoſed to be no leſſe beneficiall to their lords, than anie other whatſoeuer, within the compaſſe of our Ile, or neere vnto our coaſts. In ſome of them alſo are wild ſwine. And as theſe Iles are ſuppoſed to be a notable ſafegard to the coaſt of Cornewall, ſo in diuerſe of them great ſtore of tin is likewiſe to be found. There is in like maner ſuch plentie of fiſh taken among thoſe ſame, that beſide the feeding of their ſwine withall, a man ſhall haue more there for a penie, than in London for ten grotes. Howbeit their cheeſe commoditie is made by Reigh, which they drie, cut in peeces, and carie ouer into little Brittaine, where they exchange it there, for ſalt, canuas, reable monie, or other merchandize which they do ſtand in need of. Alike trade haue ſome of them alſo, with Buckhorne or dried whiting, as I heare. But ſith the author of this report did not ſtatlie auouch it, I paſſe ouer that fiſh as not in ſeaſon at this time. Thus haue we viewed the richeſt and moſt wealthie Iles of Sylley, from whence we muſt direct our courſe eaſtwards, vnto the mouth of the Sauerne, and then go backe againe vnto the weſt point of Wales, continuing ſtill our voiage along vpon the weſt coaſt of Britaine, till we come to the Soluey whereat the kingdomes part, & from which forth on we muſt touch ſuch Ilands as lie vpon the weſt and north ſhore, till we be come againe vnto the Scottiſh ſea, and to our owne dominions.

Wild ſwine in Sylley.

From the point of Cornewall therefore, or promontorie of Helenus (ſo called, as ſome thinke, becauſe Helenus the ſon of Priamus who arriued here with Brute lieth buried there, except the ſea haue waſhed awaie his ſepulchre) vntill we come vnto the mouth of Sauerne, we haue none Ilands at all that I do know or heare of, but one litle Byland, Cape or Peninſula, which is not to be counted of in this place. And yet ſith I haue ſpoken of it, you ſhall vnderſtand, that it is called Pendinas, and beſide that the compaſſe thereof is not aboue a mile, this is to be remembred farder thereof, how there ſtandeth a Pharos or light therein, for ſhips which ſaile by thoſe coaſts in the night. There is alſo at the verie point of the ſaid Pendinas, a chappell of ſaint Nicholas, beſide the church of ſaint Ia, an Iriſh woman ſaint. It belonged of late to the Lord Broke, but now (as I geſſe) the Lord Mountioy enioieth it. There is alſo a blockhouſe, and a peere in the eaſt ſide thereof, but the peere is ſore choked with ſand, as is the whole ſhore furthermore from S. Ies vnto S. Carantokes, inſomuch that the greateſt part of this Byland is now couered with ſands, which the ſea caſteth vp, and this calamitie hath indured little aboue fiftie yeares, as the inhabitants do affirme.

Helenus. Priamus. Pendinas.

There are alſo two rocks neere vnto Tredwy, and another not farre from Tintagell, all which many of the common ſort do repute and take for Iles: wherefore as one deſirous to note all, I thinke it not beſt that theſe ſhould be omitted: but to proceed. When we be come further, I meane vnto the Sauerne mouth, we meet the two Holmes, of which one is called Stepholme, and the other Flatholme, of their formes being in deed parcels of ground and low ſoiles fit for little elſe than to beare graſſe for cattell, whereof they take thoſe names. For Holme is an old Saxon word, applied to all ſuch places. Of theſe alſo Stepholme lieth ſouth of the Flatholme, about foure or fiue miles; the firſt alſo a mile and an halfe, the other two miles or thereabout in length; but neither of them a mile and an halfe in breadth, where they do ſeeme to be the broadeſt.

It ſhould ſeeme by ſome that they are not worthie to be placed among Ilands: yet otherſome are of opinion, that they are not altogither ſo baſe, as to be reputed amongſt flats or rocks: but whatſoeuer they be, this is ſure, that they oft annoie ſuch paſſengers and merchants as paſſe and repaſſe vpon that riuer. Neither dow I read of any other Iles which lie by east of these, saue onlie the Barri, and Dunwen: the first of which is so called of one Barroc, a religious man (as Gyraldus saith) and is about a flight shot from the shore. Herin also is a rocke standing at the verie entrance of the cliffe, which hath a little rift or chine vpon the side, whereunto if a man dow laie his eare, he shall heare a noise, as if smithes did worke at the forge, sometimes blowing with their bellowes, and sometimes striking and clinking with hammers, whereof manie men haue great wonder; and no maruell. It is about a mile in compasse, situat ouer against Aberbarry, and hath a chappell in it.

Barri is a flight shot from the shore.

Dunwen.

Dunwen is so called of a church (dedicated to a Welsh woman saint, called Dunwen) that standeth there. It lieth more than two miles from Henrosser, right against Neuen, and hath within it two faire mils, & great store of conies. Certes if the sand increase so fast hereafter as it hath done of late about it, it will be united to the maine within a short season. Beyond these and toward the coast of southwales lie two other Ilands, larger in quantitie than the Holmes, of which the one is called Caldee or Inis Pyr. It hath a parish-church with a spire steeple, and a prettie towne belonging to the countie of Pembroke, and iurisdiction of one Dauid in Wales. Leland supposeth the ruines that are found therein to haue bene of an old priorie sometimes called Lille, which was a cell belonging to the monasterie of S. Dogmael, but of this I can saie nothing. The other hight Londy, wherein is also a village or towne, and of this Iland the parson of the said towne is not onelie the captaine, but hath thereto weise, dikresse, and all other commodities belonging to the same. It is little aboue sixteene miles from the coast of Wales, though it be thirtie from Caldee, and yet it serueth (as I am informed) lord and king in Deuonshire. Moreouer in this Iland is great plentie of sheepe, but more conies, and therewithall of verie fine and short grasse for their better food & pasturage; likewise much Sampere vpon the shore, which is carried from thence in barrels. And albeit that there be not scarslie fourtie housholds in the whole, yet the inhabitants there with huge stones (alredie prouided) may keepe off thousands of their enimies, bicause it is not possible for anie aduersaries to assaile them, but onelie at one place; and with a most dangerous entrance. In this voiage also we met with two other Ilands, one of them called Shepes Ile, the other Rat Ile; the first is but a little plot lieng at the point of the Baie, before we come at the Blockehouse which standeth north of the same, at the verie entrie into Milford hauen vpon the eastside. By north also of Shepes Ile, and betweene it & Stacke rocke, which lieth in the verie middest of the hauen, at another point is Rat Ile yet smaller than the former, but what commodities are to be found in them as yet I cannot tell. Schalmey the greater and the lesse lie northwest of Milford hauen a good waie. They belong both to the crowne, but are not inhabited, bicause they be so often spoiled with pirates. Schoncold Ile ioineth vnto great Schalmey, and is bigger than it, onlie a passage for ships parteth them, whereby they are supposed to be one: Leland noteth them to lie in Milford hauen. Beside these also we found the Bateholme, Stockeholme, Midland, and Gresholme Iles, and then doubling the Wellock point, we came into a Baie, where we saw saint Brides Iland, and another in the Sound betweene Ramsey and the point, of all which Iles and such rocks as are offensiue to mariners that passe by them, it may be my hap to speake more at large hereafter.

Schalmey.

Schoncold.

Limen or Ramsey.

Limen (as Ptolomie calleth it) is situat ouer against S. Dauids in Wales (whereunto we must needs come, after we be past another little one, which some men dow call Gresholme) & lieth directlie west of Schalmey. In a late map I find this Limen to be called in English Ramsey: Leland also confirmeth the same, and I cannot learne more thereof, than that it is much greater than anie of the other last mentioned (sithens I described the Holmes) and for tempozall iurisdiction a member of Penbrokshire, as it is vnto S. Dauids for matters concerning the church. Leland in his commentaries of England lib. 8. saieth that it contained three Ilets, whereof the bishop of S. Dauids is owner of the greatest, but the chanter of S. Dauids claimeth the second, as the archdeacon of Cairmarden doth the third. And in these is verie excellent pasture for sheepe and horses, but not for other horned beasts which lacke their vpper teeth by nature (whose substance is conuerted into the nourishment of their hornes) and therefore cannot bite so low. Next vnto this Ile we came to Mawr, an Iland in the mouth of Mawr, scant a bow shot ouer, and enuironed at the low water with fresh, but at the high with salt, and here also is excellent catching of herings.

Mawr.

After this, proceeding on still with our course, we fetched a compasse, going out of the north toward the west, and then turning againe (as the coast of the countrie leadeth) vntill we sailed full south, leauing the shore still on our right hand, vntill we came vnto a couple of Iles, which dow lie vpon the mouth of the Soch, one of them being distant (as we gessed) a mile from the other, and neither of them of anie greatnesse almost worthie to be remembred. The first that we came vnto is called Tudfall, and therein is a church; but without anie parishioners, except they be sheepe and conies. The quantitie thereof also is not much aboue six acres of ground, measured by the pole. The next is Penthlin, Myrach, or Mereroste, situat in maner betwixt Tudfall or Tuidall and the shore, and herein is verie good pasture for horses, wherof (as I take it) that name is giuen vnto it. Next vnto them, we come vnto Gwelyn, a little Ile which lieth southeast of the fall of Daron or Daren, a thing of small quantitie, and yet almost parted in the mids by water, and next of all vnto Wardsey an Iland lieng ouer against Perwincle the southwest point or promontozie of Northwales (where Merlin Sylvestris lieth buried) and whither the rest of the monks of Bangor did flie to saue themselues, when 2100. of their fellowes were slaine by the Saxon princes in the quarell of Augustine the monke, & the citie of Caerleon or Chester raced to the ground, and not since reedified againe to anie purpose. Ptolomie calleth this Iland Lymnos, the Britons Enlhi, and therein also is a parish-church, as the report goeth. From hence we cast about, gathering still toward the northest, till we came to Caer Ierienrhod, a notable rocke situat ouer against the mouth of the Leuenni, wherein standeth a strong hold or fortresse, or else some towne or village. Certes we could not well discerne whether of both it was, bicause the wind blew hard at southwest, the morning was misie, and our mariners doubting some flats to be couched not far from thence, hasted awaie vnto Angleset, whither we went a pace with a readie wind euen at our owne desire.

Tudfall.

Penthlin.

Guelyn.

This Iland (which Tacitus mistaketh no doubt for Mona Cæsaris, and so doth Ptolomie as appeareth by his latitudes) is situat about two miles from the shore of Northwales. Paulus Iouius gesseth that it was in time past ioined to the continent, or maine of our Ile, and onelie cut off by working of the Ocean, as Sicilia peraduenture was from Italie by the violence of the Leuant or praise of some king that reigned there. Thereby also (as he saith) the inhabitants were constreind at the first to make a bridge ouer into the same, till the breach waxed so great, that no such passage could anie longer be mainteined. But as these things dow either not touch my purpose at all, or make smallie with the present description of this Ile: so (in comming to Anglesei cut from Wales by working of the sea.

Angleſei. my matter) Angleſei is found to be full ſo great as the Wight, and nothing inferiour, but rather ſurmounting it, as that alſo which Cæſar calleth Mona in fruitfulneſſe of ſoile by manie an hundred fold. In old time it was reputed and taken for the common granarie to Wales, as Sicilia was to Rome and Italie for their prouiſion of corne. In like maner the Welſhmen themſelues called it the mother of their countrie, for giuing their minds wholie to paſturage, as the moſt eaſie and leſſe chargeable trade, they vtterlie neglected tillage, as men that leaned onelie to the fertilitie of this Iland for their corne, from whence they neuer failed to receiue continuall abundance. Gyraldus ſaith that the Ile of Angleſei was no leſſe ſufficient to miniſter graine for the ſuſtentation of all the men of Wales, than the mountaines called Ereri or Snowdoni in Northwales were to yeld plentie of paſture for all the cattell whatſoeuer within the aforeſaid compaſſe, if they were brought togither and left vpon the ſame. It contained moreouer ſo manie townes welnére, as there be daies in a yeare, which ſome conuerting into Cantreds haue accompted but for three, as Gyraldus ſaith. Howbeit, as there haue bene I ſay 363. townes in Angleſei, ſo now a great part of that reckoning is vtterlie ſhronke, and ſo far gone to decaie, that the verie ruines of them are vnneath to be ſéene & diſcerned: and yet it ſéemeth to be méetlie well inhabited. Leland noting the ſmalneſſe of our hundreds in compariſon to that they were in time paſt, addeth (ſo far as I remember) that there are ſix of them in Angleſei, as Menay, Maltraith, Liuon, Talbellion, Torkalin, and Tindaithin: hereunto Lhoid ſaith alſo how it belonged in old time vnto the kingdoms of Guinhed or Northwales, and that therein at a towne called Aberfraw, being on the ſouthweſtſide of the Ile, the kings of Gwinhed held euermore their palaces, whereby it came to paſſe, that the kings of Northwales were for a long time called kings of Aberfraw, as the Welſhmen named the kings of England kings of London, till better inſtruction did bring them farther knowledge.

There are in Angleſei many townes and villages, whoſe names as yet I cannot orderlie atteine vnto: wherefore I will content my ſelfe with the rehearſall of ſo many as we viewed in ſailing about the coaſts, and otherwiſe heard report of by ſuch as I haue talked withall. Beginning therefore at the mouth of the Gefni (which riſeth at northeaſt aboue Gefni or Geuenni, 20. miles at the leaſt into the land) we paſſed firſt by Hundwyn, then by Newborow, Port Hayton, Beaumarrais, Penmon, Elian, Almwoch, Burric (whereby runneth a rill into a creéke) Cornew, Holihed (ſtanding in the promontorie) Gwifen, Aberfraw, and Cair Cadwalader, of all which, the two latter ſtand as it were in a nuke betweene the Geuenni water, and the Fraw, whereupon Aberfraw is ſituate. Within the Iland we heard onlie of Gefni afore mentioned, of Griſtial ſtanding vpon the ſame water, of Tefri, of Lanerchimedh, Ladhtenfarwy and Bodedrin, but of all theſe the cheefe is now Beaumarais, which was builded ſometime by king Edward the firſt, and therewithall a ſtrong caſtell about the yeare 1295. to keepe that land in quiet. There are alſo as Leland ſaith 31. pariſh churches beſide 69. chappels, that is, a hundreth in all. But héerof I can ſaie little, for lacke of iuſt inſtruction. In time paſt, the people of this Ile vſed not to ſeuerall their grounds, but now they dig ſtonie hillocks, and with the ſtones thereof they make rude walles, much like to thoſe of Deuonſhire, ſith they want hedgebote, fire bote, and houſe bote, or (to ſaie at one word) timber, buſhes and trees. As for wine, it is ſo plentifull and good cheape there moſt commonlie as in London, through the great recourſe of merchants from France, Spaine, and Italie vnto the aforeſaid Iland. The fleſhlikewiſe of ſuch cattell as is bred there, whereof we haue frore yearelie brought vnto Cole faire in Eſſex is moſt delicate, by reaſon of their excellent paſture, and ſo much was it eſteemed by the Romans in time paſt, that Columella did not onelie commend and preferre them before thoſe of Liguria, but the emperours themſelues being neere hand alſo cauſed their prouiſion to be made for nete out of Angleſei, to feed vpon at their owne tables as the moſt excellent beefe. It taketh now the name of Angles and Ei, which is to meane the Ile of Engliſhmen, becauſe they wan it in the Conquerors time, vnder the leading of Hugh earle of Cheſter, and Hugh of Shrewesburie. Howbeit they recouered it againe in the time of William Rufus, when they ſpoiled the citie of Gloceſter, ranſacked Shrewesburie, and returned home with great botie and pillage, in which voiage alſo they were holpen greatlie by the Iriſhmen, who after three yeares ioined with them againe, and ſlue the earle of Shrewesburie (which then liued) with great crueltie. The Welſhmen call it Tiremone and Mon, and herein likewiſe is a promontorie or Byland, called Holie head (which hath in time paſt bene named Cair kyby, of Kyby a monke that dwelled there) from whence the readieſt paſſage is commonlie had out of Northwales to get ouer into Ireland, of which Ile I will not ſpeake at this time, leaſt I ſhuld bereaue another of that trauell. Yet Plinie ſaith, lib. 4. cap. 16. that it lieth not farre off from and ouer againſt the Silures, which then dwelled vpon the weſt coaſt of our Iland, and euen ſo farre as Dunbritton, and beyond: but to our Cair kybi. The Britons named it Enyliſnach, or holie Ile, of the number of carcaſes of holie men, which they affirme to haue bene buried there. But herein I maruell not a little, wherein women had offended, that they might not come thither, or at the leaſt wiſe returne from thence without ſome notable reproch or ſhame vnto their bodies. By ſouth alſo of Hilarie point, ſomewhat inclining toward the eaſt, lieth Inis Lygod, a ſmall thing (God wot) and therefore not worthie great remembrance: neuertheles not to be omitted, though nothing elſe inforced the memorall thereof, but onelie the number and certeine tale of ſuch Iles as lie about our Iland. I might alſo ſpeake of the Ile Mail Ronyad, which lieth north weſt of Angleſei by fiue miles; but becauſe the true name hereof, as of manie riuers and ſtreames are to me vnknowne, I am the more willing to paſſe them ouer in ſilence, leaſt I ſhould be noted to be farther corrupter of ſuch words as I haue no ſkill to deliuer and exhibit in their kind. And now to conclude with the deſcription of the whole Iland, this I will adde moreouer vnto hir commodities, that as there are the beſt milſtones of white, red, blew, and greene greets, (eſpeciallie in Tindaithin) ſo there is great gaines to be gotten by fiſhing round about this Ile, if the people there could vſe the trade: but they want both cunning and diligence to take that matter in hand. And as for temporall regiment, it apperteineth to the countie of Cairnaruon, ſo in ſpirituall cauſes it belongeth to the biſhoprike of Bangor. This is finallie to be noted of Angleſei, that ſundrie earthen pots are often found there of dead mens bones conuerted into aſhes, ſet with the mouthes downeward contrarie to the vſe of other nations, which turned the brims vpwards, whereof let this ſuffice.

Ancient buriall.

Hauing thus deſcribed Angleſei, it reſteth to report furthermore, how that in our circuit about the ſame, we met with other little Ilets, of which one lieth northweſt thereof almoſt ouer againſt Butricke mouth, or the fall of the water, that paſſeth by Butricke. The Britons called it Ynis Ader, that is to ſay, the Ile of birds in old time, but now it hight Ynis Moil, or Ynis Rhomaid, that is the Ile of porpaſſes. It hath to name likewiſe Yſterifd, and Adros. Being paſt this, we came to the ſecond lieng by north eaſt, ouer againſt the Hilarie point

Adar. Moil. Rhomaid. Yſterifd. Adros.

Holiehead, or Cair kiby.

Enilſnach, holie Ile.

Lygod. point, called Ynis Ligod, that is to saie, the Ile of Wise, and of these two this latter is the smallest, neither of them both being of any great nesse to speake of. Ynis Seriall. Seriall or Prestholme, lieth ouer against Penmon, or the Prestholme point called the head of Mon, where I found a towne (as I told you) of the same denomination. Ptolomie nameth not this Iland, whereof I maruell. It is parcell of Flintshire, and of the iurisdiction of S. Asaph, and in fertilitie of soile, and breed of cattell, nothing inferiour vnto Anglesei hir mother: although that for quantitie of ground it come infinitelie short thereof, and be nothing comparable vnto it. The last Iland vpon the cost of Wales, hauing now left Anglesei, is called Credine, Credine. and although it lie not properlie within the compasse of my description, yet I will not let to touch it by the waie, sith the causey thither from Denbighland, is commonlie ouerflowne. It is partlie made an Iland by the Conwey, and partlie by the sea. But to proceed, when we had viewed this place, we passed forth to S. Antonies Ile, which is about two or three miles compasse or more, a fatdle soile, but yet verie batable for sheepe and cattell, it is well replenished also with fresh wels, great plentie of wild foule, conies and quarries of hard ruddie stone, which is oft brought thence to Westchester, where they make the foundations of their buildings withall. There are also two parish churches in the same, dedicated to S. Antonie and S. Iohn, but the people are verie poore, because they be so oft spoiled by pirats, although the lord of the same be verie wealthie thorough the exchange made with them of his victuals, for their wares, whereof they make good peniworths, as theeues commonlie do of such preies as they get by like escheat, notwithstanding their landing there is verie dangerous, and onlie at one place. Howbeit they are constreined to vse it, and there to make their marts. From hence we went on, vntill we came Hilberie. to the cape of Ile Bree, or Hilberie, and point of Wyrale, from whence is a common passage into Ireland, of 18. or 20. houres sailing, if the wether be not tedious. This Iland at the full sea is a quarter of a mile from the land, and the streame betweene foure fadams deepe, as ship-boies haue oft sounded, but at a lowe water a man may go ouer thither on the sand. The Ile of it selfe is verie fatdle a mile in compasse, and well stored with conies, thither also went a sort of superstitious fooles in times past, in pilgrimage, to our ladie of Hilberie, by whose offerings a cell of monkes there, which belonged to Chester, was cherished and maintained.

The next Iland vpon the coast of England is Man or Mona Cæsaris, which some name Mana or Manim, but after Ptolomie, Monaoida, as some thinke, though other ascribe that name to Anglesei, which the Welshmen do commonlie call Môn, as they do this Manaw. It is supposed to be the first, as Hirtha is the last of the Hebrides. Hector Boetius noteth a difference betweene them of 300. miles. But Plinie saith that Mona is 200000. miles from Camaldunum, lib. 2. cap. 75. It lieth also vnder 53. degrees of latitude, and 30. minuts, and hath in longitude 16. degrees and 40. minuts, abutting on the north side vpon S. Ninians in Scotland, Furnesfels on the east, Prestholme and Anglesei on the south, and Ulther in Ireland on the west. It is greater than Anglesei by a third, and there are two riuers in the same, whose heads do ioine so neere, that they do seeme in maner to part the Ile in twaine. Some of the ancient writers, as Ethicus, &c: call it Eubonia, and other Eubonia. following Orosius, Meuana or Mæuania, howbeit after Meuania. Beda and the Scotish historiographers, the Meuaniæ are all those Iles aforesaid called the Hebrides, Eubonides, or Hebudes (whereof William Malmesburie, lib. 1. de regibus (beside this our Mona) will haue Anglesei also to be one. Wherefore it seemeth hereby that a number of our late writers ascribing the said name vnto Mona onelie, haue not beene a little deceiued. Iornandes lib. de Getis speaketh of a second Meuania; Habet & aliam Meuaniam (saith he) necnon & Orchadas. But which should be primia, as yet I do not read, except it should be Anglesei; and then saith Malmesburie well. In like sort Properlius speaketh of a Meuania, which he called Nebulosa, but he meaneth it euidentlie of a little towne in Umbria where he was borne, lib. 4. eleg. De vrbe Rom. Wherefore there needeth no vse of his authoritie. This in the meane time is euident out of Orosius, lib. 1. capite 2. that Scots dwelled sometime in this Ile, as also in Ireland, which Ethicus also affirmeth of his owne time, and finallie confirmeth that the Scots and Irish were sometime one people. It hath in length 24. miles, and 8. in breedth, and is in maner of like distance from Galloway in Scotland, Ireland and Cumberland in England, as Buchanan reporteth.

In this Iland also were some time 1500. fatmilies, of which 960. were in the west halfe, and the rest in the other. But now through ioining houls to house, and land to land (a common plague and canker, which will eat vp all, if prohibition be not made in time to withstand this mischeefe) that number is halfe diminished, and yet many of the rich inhabiters want rowme, and wote not how and where to bestowe themselues, to their quiet contentations. Certes this impediment groweth not by reason that men were greater in bodie, than they haue beene in time past, but onelie for that their insatiable desire of inlarging their priuate possessions increaseth still vpon them, and will do more, except they be restrained: but to returne to our purpose. It was once spoiled by the Scots in the time of king Athelstane, chiefly by Anlafus in his flight from the bloudie battell, wherein Constantine king of Scotland was ouercome: secondlie by the Scots 1388. after it came to the possession of the English, for in the beginning the kings of Scotland had this Iland vnder their dominion, almost from their first arriuall in this Iland, and as Beda saith till Edwine king of the Northumbers wan it from them, and vnited it to his kingdome. After the time of Edwine, the Scots got the possession thereof againe, and held it till the Danes & Norwales wan it from them, who also kept it (but with much trouble) almost 370. yeares vnder the gouernance of their viceroies, whome the kings of Norwale inuested vnto that honor, till Alexander the third king of that name in Scotland recouered it from them, with all the rest of those Iles that lie vpon the west coast, called also Sodorenses in the daies of Magnus king of Norwale. And sithens that time the Scottish princes haue not ceased to giue lawes to such as dwelled there, but also from time to time appointed such bishops as should exercise ecclesiasticall iurisdiction in the same, till it was won from them by our princes, and so vnited vnto the realme of England. Finallie, how after sundrie sales Chronica bargains and contracts of matrimonie (for I read that Tinemuthi. William Scrope the kings Vicechamberleine, did buy this Ile and crowne thereof of the lord William Montacute earle of Sarum) it came vnto the ancestours of the earles of Darbie, who haue beene commonlie said to be kings of Man, the discourse following shall more at large declare. Giraldus noteth a contention betweene the kings of England & Ireland for the right of this Iland, but in the end, when by a compromise the triall of the matter was referred to the liues or deaths of such venemous wormes as should be brought into the same, and it was found that they died not at all, as the like do in Ireland, sentence passed with the king of England, & so he reteined the Iland. But howsoeuer this matter standeth, and whether anie such thing was done at all or not, sure it is that the people of the said Ile were much giuen to witchcraft and sorcerie (which they learned of the Scots a nation greatlie bent to that horrible practise) in somuch that their women would oftentimes sell wind to the mariners, incloſed vnder certeine knots of thred, with this iniunction, that they which bought the ſame, ſhould for a great gale vndo manie, and for the leſſe a fewer or ſmaller number. The ſtature of the men and alſo fertilitie of this Iland are much commended, and for the latter ſuppoſed verie nære to be equall with that of Angleſei, in all commodities.

Tall men in Man.

There are alſo theſe townes therein, as they come now to my remembrance, Ruſhen, Dunglaſſe, Holme towne, S. Brids, Bala cury (the biſhops houſe) S. Mich. S. Andrew, kirk Chriſt, kirk Louel, S. Mathees, kirk S. Anne, Pala ſala, kirk S. Marie, kirk Concane, kirk Malu, and Home. But of all theſe Ruſhen with the caſtell is the ſtrongeſt. It is alſo in recompenſe of the common want of wood, indued with ſundrie prætie waters, as firſt of al the Burne riſing in the northſide of Warehill botoms, and branching out by ſouthweſt of kirk S. An, it ſeemeth to cut off a great part of the eaſtſide thereof, from the reſidue of that Iland. From thoſe hils alſo (but of the ſouth halfe) commeth the Holme and Holmey, by a towne of the ſame name, in the verie mouth whereof lieth the Pile afore mentioned. They haue alſo the Bala paſſing by Bala cury, on the weſtſide, and the Rame on the north, whoſe fall is named Rameſei hauen, as I do read in Chronicles.

Riuers.

There are moreouer ſundrie great hils therein, as that whereupon S. Mathees ſtandeth, in the northeaſt part of the Ile, a parcell whereof commeth flat ſouth, betweene kirk Louell, and kirk Marie, yéelding out of their botoms the water Bala, whereof I ſpake before. Beſide theſe and well toward the ſouth part of the Ile, I find the Warehils, which are extended almoſt from the weſt coaſt ouerthwart vnto the Burne ſtreame. It hath alſo ſundrie hauens, as Ramſei hauen, by north Laxam hauen, by eaſt Port Iris, by ſouthweſt Port Home, and Port Michell, by weſt. In like ſort there are diuers Ilets annered to the ſame, as the Calfe of man on the ſouth, the Pile on the weſt, and finallie S. Michels Ile in the gulfe called Ranoths waie in the eaſt. Moreouer the ſheepe of this countrie are exceeding huge, well woolled, and their tailes of ſuch greatneſſe as is almoſt incredible. In like ſort their hogs are in maner monſtrous. They haue furthermore great ſtore of barnacles breeding vpon their coaſts, but yet not ſo great ſtore as in Ireland, and thoſe (as there alſo) of old ſhips, ores, maſts, peeces of rotten timber as they ſaie, and ſuch putrified pitched ſtuffe, as by wracke hath happened to corrupt vpon that ſhore. Howbeit neither the inhabitants of this Ile, nor yet of Ireland can readilie ſaie whether they be fiſh or fleſh, for although the religious there vſed to eat them as fiſh, yet elſewhere, ſome haue beene troubled, for eating of them in times prohibited for heretikes and lollards.

Barnacles neither fiſh nor fleſh.

For my part, I haue beene verie deſirous to vnderſtand the vttermoſt of the breeding of barnacls, & queſtioned with diuers perſons about the ſame. I haue red alſo whatſoeuer is written by foren authors touching the generation of that foule, & ſought out ſome places where I haue beene aſſured to ſée great numbers of them: but in vaine. Wherefore I vtterlie deſpaired to obteine my purpoſe, till this preſent yeare of Grace 1584. and moneth of Maie, wherein going to the court at Greenewich from London by bote, I ſaw ſundrie ſhips lieng in the Thames newlie come home, either from Barbarie or the Canarie Iles (for I do not well remember now from which of theſe places) on whoſe ſides I perceiued an infinit ſort of ſhels to hang ſo thicke as could be one by another. Drawing nære alſo, I toke off ten or twelue of the greateſt of them, & afterward hauing opened them, I ſaw the propoſition of a foule in one of them more perfectlie than in all the reſt, ſauing that the head was not yet formed, becauſe the freſh water had killed them all (as I take it) and thereby hindered their perfection. Certeinelie the feathers of the taile hong out of the ſhell at leaſt two inches, the wings (almoſt perfect touching forme) were garded with two ſhels or ſheeldes proportioned like the ſelfe wings, and likewiſe the breſtbone had hir couerture alſo of like ſhellie ſubſtance, and altogither reſembling the figure which Lobell and Pena do giue forth in their deſcription of this foule: ſo that I am now fullie perſuaded that it is either the barnacle that is ingendred after one maner in theſe ſhels, or ſome other ſea-foule to vs as yet vnknowen. For by the feathers appearing and forme ſo apparant, it cannot be denied, but that ſome bird or other muſt proceed of this ſubſtance, which by falling from the ſides of the ſhips in long voiages, may come to ſome perfection. But now it is time for me to returne againe vnto my former purpoſe.

There hath ſometime beene, and yet is a biſhop of this Ile, who at the firſt was called Epiſcopus Sodorenſis, when the iuriſdiction of all the Hebrides belonged vnto him. Whereas now he that is biſhop there, is but a biſhops ſhadow, for albeit that he beare the name of biſhop of Man, yet haue the earles of Darbie, as it is ſuppoſed, the cheefe profit of his ſée (ſauing that they allow him a little ſomewhat for a ſiquriſh) notwithſtanding that they be his patrons, and haue his nomination vnto that liuing. The firſt biſhop of this Ile was called Wimundus or Raymundus, and ſurnamed Monachus Sauinenſis, who by reaſon of his extreame and tyrannicall crueltie toward the Ilanders, had firſt his ſight taken from him, & then was ſent into exile. After him ſucceeded another monke in king Stephens daies called Iohn, and after him one Marcus, & ſo other after other in ſucceſſion, the ſée it ſelfe being now alſo ſubiect to the archbiſhop of Yorke for ſpirituall iuriſdiction. In time of Henrie the ſecond, this Iland alſo had a king, whoſe name was Cuthred, vnto whome Vinianus the cardinall came as legate 1177. and therin Houeden erreth not. In the yeare alſo 1228. one Reginald was viceroy or petie king of Man, afterward murthered by his ſubiects. Then Olauus, after him Hoſbach the ſonne of Oſmond Hacon, 1290. who being ſlaine, Olauus and Gotredus parted this kingdome of Sodora, in ſuch wiſe, that this had all the reſt of the Iles, the other onelie the Ile of Man at the firſt; but after the ſlaughter of Gotredus, Olauus held all, after whom Olauus his ſonne ſucceeded. Then Harald ſonne to Olauus, who being entered in Maie, and drowned vpon the coaſtes of Ireland, his brother Reginald reigned twentie and ſeuen daies, and then was killed the firſt of June, whereby Olauus alias Harald ſonne to Gotred ruled in the Ile one yeare. Next vnto him ſucceeded Magnus the ſecond ſonne of Olauus, and laſt of all Iuarus, who held it ſo long as the Norwaies were lords thereof. But being once come into the hands of the Scots, one Godred Mac Mares was made lieutenant, then Alane, thirdlie Maurice Okarefer, and fourthlie one of the kings chapleines, &c. I would gladlie haue ſet downe the whole catalog of all the viceroyes and lieutenants: but ſith I can neither come by their names nor ſucceſſions, I ſurceſſe to ſpeake any more of them, and alſo of the Ile it ſelfe, whereof this may ſuffice.

After we haue in this wiſe deſcribed the Ile of Man, with hir commodities, we returned eaſtwards backe againe vnto the point of Ramſhed, where we found to the number of ſix Ilets of one ſort and other, whereof the firſt greateſt and moſt ſouthweſterlie, is named the Wauay. It runneth out in length, as we geſſed, about fiue miles and more from the ſoutheaſt into the northweſt, betweene which and the maine land lie two little ones, whoſe names are Oldborrow and Fowlney. The fourth is called the Fouldra, and being ſituate ſoutheaſt of the firſt, it hath a prettie pile or blockhouſe therin, which the inhabitants name the pile of Fouldra.

Rauenglaſſe.

From hence we went by Rauenglaſſe point, where lieth an Iland of the ſame denomination, as Reginald Wolfe hath noted in his great card, not yet finiſhed, nor likelie to be publiſhed. He noteth alſo two other Ilets, betweene the ſame and the maine land; but Leland ſpeaketh nothing of them (to my remembrance) neither any other card, as yet ſet forth of England: and thus much of the Ilands that lie vpon our ſhore in this part of my voiage.

Having ſo exactlie as to me is poſſible, ſet downe the names and poſitions of ſuch Iles, as are to be found vpon the coaſt of the Queenes Maieſties dominions, now it reſteth that we proceed orderlie with thoſe that are ſcene to lie vpon the coaſt of Scotland, that is to ſaie, in the Iriſh, the Deucalidonian & the Germans ſeas, which I will performe in ſuch order as I may, ſith I cannot do ſo much therin as I would. Some therefore do comprehend and diuide all the Iles that lie about the north coaſt of this Ile now called Scotland into three parts, ſauing that they are either occidentals, the weſt Iles, alias the Orchades & Zelandine, or the Shetlands. They place the firſt betweene Ireland and the Orchades, ſo that they are extended from Man and the point of Cantire almoſt vnto the Orchades in the Deucalidonian ſea, and after ſome are called the Hebrides. In this part the old writers in deed placed the Hebrides or Hemodes, which diuers call the Hebudes and the Acmodes; albeit the writers varie in their numbers, ſome ſpeaking of 30 Hebudes and ſeuen Hemodes; ſome of fiue Ebudes, as Solinus, and ſuch as follow his authoritie. Howbeit the late Scottiſh writers do product a ſumme of more than 300 of theſe Ilands in all, which ſometime belonged to the Scots, ſometime to the Norwegians, and ſometime to the Danes. The firſt of theſe is our Manaw, of which I haue before intreated: next vnto this is Aliſa a deſert Ile, yet repleniſhed with conies, ſolond foule, and a fit harbor for fiſhermen that in time of the yeare lie vpon the coaſt thereof for herings. Next vnto this is the Arran, a verie hillie and craggie ſoile, yet verie plentifull of fiſh all about the coaſt, and wherein is a verie good hauen: ouer againſt the mouth whereof lieth the Moll, which is alſo no ſmall defenſe to ſuch ſeafaring men as ſeeke harbor in that part. Then came we by the Fladwa or Pladwa, no leſſe fruitfull and ſtored with conies than the Bota, Bura, or Botha, of eight miles long & foure miles broad, a low ground but yet verie batable, and wherein is good ſtore of ſhort and indifferent paſture: it hath alſo a towne there called Roſſe, and a caſtell named the Camps. There is alſo another called the Marnech, an Iland of a mile in length, and halfe a mile in breadth, low ground alſo but yet verie fertile. In the mouth likewiſe of the Glot, lieth the more Cumber and the leſſe, not farre in ſunder one from another, and both fruitfull inough the one for corne, and the other for Platyceraton. The Auon another Iland lieth about a mile from Cantire, and is verie commodious to ſhips, wherof it is called Auon, that is to ſaie, Portuoſa, or full of harbor: and therefore the Danes had in time paſt great vſe of it. Then haue we the Raclind, the Kyntar, the Cray, the Gegaw ſix miles in length and a mile and a halfe in breadth; the Dera full of deere, and not otherwiſe vnfruitfull: and therefore ſome thinke that it was called the Ile of deere in old time. Scarba foure miles in length, and one in breadth, verie little inhabited, and thereinto the ſea betweene that and the Ile of deere is ſo ſwift and violent, that except it be at certeine times, it is not eaſilie navigable. Being paſt theſe, we come to certeine Ilands of no great fame, which lie ſcattered here and there, as Bellach, Gyraſtell, Longaie, both the Fiolas, the three Yarues, Culbrenin, Duncomell, Lupar, Belnaua, Wikerua, Calfile, Luing, Sele Ile, Sound, of which the laſt three are fruitfull, and belong to the earle of Argile. Then haue we the Slate, ſo called of the tiles that are made therin. The Nagſey, Iſdalf, and the Sken (which later is alſo called Thian, of a wicked herbe growing there greatlie hurtfull, and in colour not much vnlike the lillie, ſauing that it is of a more wan and feeble colour) Vderga, kings Ile, Duffa or blacke Ile, Kirke Ile and Triaradi. There is alſo the Ile Ard, Humble Ile, Greene Ile, and Heth Ile, Arbor Ile, Gote Ile, Conies Ile alias idle Ile, Abrid Ile or bird Ile, and Liſmor, wherein the biſhop of Argill ſometime held his palace, being eight miles in length and two miles in breadth, and not without ſome mines alſo of good mettall. There is alſo the Ile Ouilia, Siuna, Trech, Shepey, Fladaw, Stone Ile, Greſſe, great Ile, Ardis, Muſadell, & Berner, ſometime called the holie ſanctuarie, Vghe Ile, Molochaſgyr, and Drinacha, now ouergrowne with buſhes, elders, and vtterlie ſpoiled by the ruines of ſuch great houſes as haue heretofore beene found therin. There is in like ſort the Wije, the Ranſe, and the Caruer.

Scarba.

In this tract alſo, there are yet three to intreat of, as Ila, Mula and Iona, of which the firſt is one of the moſt, that hath not beene leaſt accounted of. It is not much aboue 24 miles in length, and in breadth 16 reaching from the ſouth into the north, and yet it is an exceeding rich plot of ground verie plentious of corne, cattell, deere, and alſo lead, and other mettals, which were eaſie to be obteined, if either the people were induſtrious, or the ſoile yeeldable of wood to fine and trie out the ſame. In this Iland alſo there is a lake of ſweet water called the Laie, and alſo a baie wherein are ſundrie Ilands; and thereunto another lake of freſh water, wherein the Falangam Ile is ſituate, wherein the ſouereigne of all the Iles ſometime dwelled. Neere vnto this is the round Ile, ſo called of the conſultations there had: for there was a court ſometime holden, wherein 14 of the principall inhabitants did miniſter iuſtice vnto the reſt, and had the whole diſpoſition of things committed vnto them, which might rule vnto the benefit of thoſe Ilands. There is alſo the Stoneheape, an other Iland ſo called of the heape of ſtones that is therein. On the ſouth ſide alſo of Ila, we find moreouer the Colurne, Mulmor, Oſiin, Brigidan, Corkerke, Humble Ile, Imerſga, Bethy, Texa, Shepeie, Naoſig, Rinard, Cane, Tharſcher, Aknor, Gret Ile, Man Ile, S. Johns Ile, and Stackbed. On the weſt ſide thereof alſo lieth Ouerſey, whereby runneth a perilous ſea, and not nauigable, but at certeine houres, Merchant Ile, Vſabraſt, Tanask, Neff, Wauer Ile, Oruans, Hog Ile, and Colauanſo.

Ila. Round Ile.

Mula is a right noble Ile, 24 miles in length and ſo manie in breth, rough of ſoile, yet fruitfull enough: & beſide woods, deere, & good harborough for ſhips, repleniſhed with diuers and ſundrie townes and caſtels. Ouer againſt Columkill alſo, it hath two riuers, which yeld verie great ſtore of ſalmons, and other riuellets now altogither vnfruitfull, beſide two lakes, in each of which is an Iland: and likewiſe in euerie of theſe Ilands a caſtell. The ſea beating vpon this Ile, maketh foure notable baies wherein great plentie and verie good herrings are taken. It hath alſo in the northweſt ſide Columbria, or the Ile of doues; on the ſoutheaſt, Era: both verie commodious for fiſhing, cattell, and corne. Moreouer, this is worth the noting in this Ile aboue all the reſt, that it hath a pleſant ſpring, ariſing two miles in diſtance from the ſhore, wherein are certeine little egs found, much like vnto indifferent pearles, both for colour and bright-neſſe, and thereto full of thicke humour, which egs being carried by violence of the freſh water vnto the ſalt, are there within the ſpace of twelue houres conuerted into great ſhels, which I take to be mother pearle; except I be deceiued.

Iona. Iona was ſometime called Columkill, in fame and eſtimation nothing inferiour to anie of the other, although in length it exceed little aboue two miles, and in breadth one. Certes it is verie fruitfull of all ſuch commodities, as that climat wherein it ſtandeth doth yeld, and beareth the name of Columbus the abbat, of whome I haue ſpoken more at large in my Chronologie. There were ſomtimes alſo two monaſteries therein, one of monks builded by Fergus, another of nuns: and a pariſh church, beſide many chapels builded by the Scotiſh kings, and ſuch princes as gouerned in the Iles. And when the Engliſh had once gotten poſſeſſion of the Ile of Manaw, a biſhops ſee was erected in the old monaſterie of Columbus, whereby the iuriſdiction of thoſe Iles was ſtill maintained and continued. Certes there remaine yet in this Iland the old burials apertaining to the moſt noble families that had dwelled in the weſt Iles; but three aboue other are accompted the moſt notable, which haue little houſes builded vpon them. That in the middeſt hath a ſtone, whereon is written, Tumuli regum Scotiæ, The burials of the kings of Scotland: for (as they ſaie) fourtie eight of them were there interred. Another is intituled with theſe words, The burials of the kings of Ireland, becauſe foure of them lie in that place. The third hath theſe words written thereon, The graues of the kings of Norwaie, for there eight of them were buried alſo, and all through a fond ſuſpicion conceiued of the merits of Columbus. Howbeit in proceſſe of time, when Malcolme Cammor had erected his abbeie at Donfermeling, he gaue occaſion to manie of his ſucceſſors to be interred there.

Regum tumuli.

About this Iland there lie ſix other Iles diſperſed, ſmall in quantitie, but not altogither barren, ſometimes giuen by the kings of Scotland and lords of the Iles vnto the abbeie of ſaint Columbus, of which the Soa, albeit that it yeld competent paſturage for ſhéepe, yet is it more commodious, by ſuch egs as the great plentie of wildfoule there breeding do laie within the ſame. Then is there the Ile of Shrewes or of women; as the more ſober heads do call it. Alſo Rudan, next vnto that, the Kering. There is alſo the Shen halfe a mile from Mula, whoſe bankes do ſwarme with conies: it hath alſo a pariſh church, but moſt of the inhabitants do liue and dwell in Mula. There is alſo the Coarſe or the Arſe, and all theſe belong vnto ſaint Columbus abbeie. Two miles from Arſe is the Olue, an Iland fiue miles in length, and ſufficientlie ſtored with corne and graſſe, & not without a good hauen for ſhips to lie and harbor in. There is alſo the Colſans, an Iland fruitfull inough, and full of cornell trées. There is not far off alſo the Gomater, Staſa, the two Berneburgs, and the Moſſe Ile, in the old Brittiſh ſpeech called Monad, that is to ſaie Moſſe. The ſoile of it is verie blacke, becauſe of the corruption & putrefaction of ſuch woods as haue rotted thereon: whereupon alſo no ſmall plentie of moſſe is bred and ingendered. The people in like maner make their fire of the ſaid earth, which is fullie ſo good as our Engliſh turffe. There is alſo the Long, & ſix miles further toward the weſt, Tirreie, which is eight miles in length and three in breadth, & of all other one of the moſt plentifull for all kinds of commodities: for it beareth corne, cattell, fiſh, and ſeafowle aboundantlie. It hath alſo a well of freſh water, a caſtell, and a verie good hauen for great veſſels to lie at ſafegard in. Two miles from this alſo is the Gun, and the Coll two miles alſo from the Gun. Then paſſed we by the Calfe, a verie woddie Iland, the foure greene Iles, the two glaſſe or ſkie Ilands, the Ardan, the Ile of wolfes, & then the great Iland which reacheth from the eaſt into the weſt, is ſixteene miles in length, and ſix in breadth, full of mounteins and ſwelling woods: and for aſmuch as it is not much inhabited, the ſeafoules laie great plentie of egs there, whereof ſuch as will, may gather what number them liſteth. Vpon the high cliffes and rocks alſo the Soland géeſe are taken verie plentifullie. Beyond this, about foure miles alſo is the Ile of horſes: and a little from that the hog Iland, which is not altogither vnfruitfull. There is a falcon which of cuſtome breédeth there, and thereunto it is not without a conuenient hauen. Not farre off alſo is the Canna, and the Egga, little Iles, but the later full of Soland géeſe. Likewiſe the Sobzatill, more apt to hunt in than méet for anie other commoditie that is to be reaped thereby.

The Ile of Shrewes.

Moſſe Ile.

After this we come to the Skie, the greateſt Ile about all Scotland: for it is two and fortie miles long; and ſomewhere eight, & in ſome places twelue miles broad: it is moreouer verie hillie, which hilles are therevnto loaden with great ſtore of wood, as the woods are with paſture, the fields with corne and cattell; and (beſides all other commodities) with no ſmall heards of mares, whereby they raiſe great aduantage and commoditie. It hath fiue riuers verie much abounding with ſalmons, and other freſh ſtreams not altogither void of that prouiſion. It is inuironed alſo with manie baies, wherein great plentie of herrings is taken in time of the yéere. It hath alſo a noble pole of freſh water; fiue caſtels and ſundrie townes; as Aie, S. Johns, Dunwegen, S. Nicholas, &c. The old Scots called it Skianacha, that is, Winged, but now named Skie. There lie certeine ſmall Ilands about this alſo, as Rauſa a tatable ſoile for corne & gras; Conie Iland full of woods and conies; Paba a theuiſh Iland, in whoſe woods théeues do lurke to rob ſuch as paſſe by them. Scalpe Ile, which is full of deere; Crowling, wherein is verie good harbour for ſhips; Karſa, full of beéchen woods and ſtags, being in length ſeuen miles, and two in breadth. The Ron, a woddie Ile and full of heath: yet hath it a good hauen, which hath a little Iland called Gerloch on the mouth thereof, and therein lurke manie théeues. There is not farre off from this Ron, to wit about ſix miles alſo, the Flad, the Tiulmen, Oranſa, Buie the leſſe, and Buie the more, and fiue other little trifling Iles, of whoſe names I haue no notice.

Skie.

After theſe we come vnto the Ile, a prettie fertile Iland, to the Due, to the Aſkome, to the Lindill. And foure ſcore miles from the Skie towards the weſt, to the Ling, the Gigarmen, the Berner, the Nagle, the Pable, the Flad, the Scarpe, the Sander, the Vateras, which later hath a noble hauen for great ſhips, beſide ſundrie other commodities: and theſe nine laſt rehearſed are vnder the dominion of the biſhop of the Iles. After this we come to the War, an Iland ſeauen miles in length, not vnfruitfull for graſſe and corne, but the chiefe commoditie thereof lieth by taking of herrings, which are there to be had abundantlie. In one baie of this Iland there lieth an Iſlet, and therein ſtandeth a ſtrong caſtell. In the north part hereof alſo is an hill which beareth good graſſe from the foot to the top, and out of that riſeth a ſpring, which running to the ſea, doth carrie withall a kind of creature not yet perfectlie formed, which ſome do liken vnto cockels; and vpon the ſhore where the water falleth into the ſea, they take vp a kind of ſhelfiſh, when the water is gone, which they ſuppoſe to be ingendred or increaſed after this manner. Betweene the Barre and the Uiſſe lie alſo

theſe Iland's, Orbans, Oue, Yakerſet, Warlang, Flad, the two Baies, Yaie, Yelſaie, Gigaie, Lingaie, Fraie, Fudaie, and Friſkaie. The Uiſſe is thirtie miles long and ſix miles broad; and therein are ſundrie freſh waters, but one eſpeciallie of three miles in length: neuertheleſſe, the ſea hath now of late found a waie into it, ſo that it cannot be kept off with a banke of three ſcore foot, but now and then it will flowe into the ſame, and leaue ſea-fiſh behind it in the lake. There is alſo a fiſh bred therein almoſt like vnto a ſalmon, ſauing that it hath a white bellie, a blacke backe, and is altogither without ſcales: it is likewiſe a great harbour for theeues and pirats.

Eight miles beyond this lieth the Yelſcher, appertinent to the nuns of Iona: then haue we the Yaſker, verie plentifullie benefited by ſeales, which are there taken in time of the yeare. Three ſcore miles from this alſo is the Yirth, whoſe inhabitants are rude in all good ſcience and religion; yet is the Iland verie fruitfull in all things, and bringeth forth theepe farre greater than are elſe-where to be found, for they are as big as our fallow deare, horned like bugles, and haue their tailes hanging to the ground. He that is owner of this Ile, ſendeth ouer his bailiffe into the ſame at midſummer, to gather in his duties, and with him a prieſt to ſaie maſſe, and to baptiſe all the children borne ſince that time of the yeare precedent: or if none will go ouer with him (becauſe the voiage is dangerous) then doth each father take paine to baptiſe his owne at home. Their rents are paid commonlie in dried ſcales and ſea foule. All the whole Ile is not aboue a mile euerie waie; and except three mounteines that lie vpon one part of the ſhore, ſuch as dwell in the other Iles can ſee no part thereof.

Baptiſme without prieſts.

Being paſt the Uiſſe, we came after to Walaie, the Soa, the Strome, to Pabaie, to Barner, Enſaie, Killiger, the two Sagas, the Yermodraie, Scarſe, Crie, Ling, Gilling, Yeie, Yoie, Farlaie, great So, little So, Iſe, Sein the more, Sein the leſſe, Tarant, Slegan, Tuom, Scarpe, Yareie, and the ſeauen holie Ilands, which are deſert and bred nothing but a kind of wild ſheepe, which are often hunted, but ſeldome or neuer eaten. For in ſtead of fleſh they haue nothing but tallow; and if anie fleſh be, it is ſo vnſauorie, that few men care to eate of it, except great hunger compell them. I ſuppoſe, that theſe be the wild ſheepe which will not be tamed; and becauſe of the horrible grenning thereof, is taken for the baſtard tiger. Their haire is betweene the woll of a ſheepe, and the haire of a goat, reſembling both, ſhacked, and yet abſolutelie like vnto neither of both: it maie be alſo the ſame beaſt which Capitolinus calleth Ouis fera, ſhewed in the time of Gordian the emperour; albeit that ſome take the ſame for the Camelopardalis: but hereof I make no warrantiſe.

Wild ſheepe.

Tigers.

There is alſo not farre off the Garuell, the Lambe, the Flad, the Bellas, the two Bernars, the Kirt, the two Buies, the Uiraie, the Pabaie, the two Sigrams, and the Ile of Pigmeies (which is ſo called vpon ſome probable coniecture) for manie little ſculs and bones are dailie there found deepe in the ground, perfectlie reſembling the bodies of children; & not anie of greater quantities, wherby their coniecture (in their opinion) is the more likelie to be true. There is alſo the Fabill Ile, Adams Ile, the Ile of Lambes, Hulmes, Uiccoll, Yaueraie, Car, Era, Columbes Ile, Tor Ile, Iſkurd, Scalpe, Flad, and the Swet; on whoſe eaſt ſide is a certeine vault or caue, arched ouer, a flight ſhot in length, wherevnto meane ſhips do vſe to runne for harbour with full ſaile when a tempeſt ouertaketh them, or the raging of the ſea, in thoſe parts do put them in danger of wrecke. Alſo we paſſed by the old caſtell Ile, which is a prettie and verie commodious plat for fiſh, foule, egges, corne and paſture. There is alſo the Ile Cuſt or Eu, which is full of wood, and a notable harbour for theeues, as is alſo the Grimort; likewiſe the preſts Ile, which is verie full of ſea foule and good paſture. The Afull, the two Yerberts, to wit, the greater and the leſſe; and the Iles of Horſles, and Yertaika: and theſe 8 lie ouer againſt the baie which is called the Lake Brian. After this, we go toward the north, and come to the Yaraie, and the Lewis or the Leug, both which make (in truth) but one Iland of three ſcore miles in length, and ſixteene in breadth, being diſtinguiſhed by no water, but by huge woods, bounds, and limits of the two owners that do poſſeſſe thoſe parts. The ſouth part is called Yaraie, and the whole ſituate in the Deucalidon ſea, ouer againſt the Roſſe, & called Thule by Tacitus, wherein are manie lakes, and verie prettie villages, as lake Erwin, lake Unſalſago: but of townes, S. Clements, Stoie, Nois, S. Columbane, Radmach, &c. In like ſort, there are two churches, whereof one is dedicated to ſaint Peter, an other to S. Clement, beſide a monaſterie called Roadill. The ſoile alſo of this Ile is indifferent fruitfull; but they reape more profit vnder the ground than aboue, by digging. There is neither woolfe, for, nor ſerpent ſeene in this Iland; yet are there great woods therein, which alſo ſeparate one part from the other. Likewiſe there be plentie of ſtags, but farre leſſe in quantitie than ours: and in the north part of the Iland alſo is a riuer which greatlie aboundeth with ſalmons. That part alſo called Lewiſa, which is the north half of the Ile is well inhabited toward the ſea coaſts, and hath riuers no leſſe plentifull for ſalmon than the other halfe. There is alſo great ſtore of herrings taken, whereof the fiſher men do raiſe great gaine and commoditie; and no leſſe plentie of theepe, which they do not ſheare, but plucke euerie yeare; yet is the ground of this part verie heathie, and full of moſſe, and the face thereof verie ſwart and blacke, for the ſpace of a foot in depth, through the corruption of ſuch woods as in time paſt haue rotted on the ſame. And therefore in time of the yeare they conuert it into turffe to burne, as need ſhall ſerue; and in the yeare after, hauing well donged it in the meane time with aſhes of the ſea, they ſowe barleie in the ſelfe places where the turffes grew, and reape verie good corne, wherewith they liue and feed. Such plentie of whales alſo are taken in this coaſt, that the verie tithe hath been knowne, in ſome one yeare, to amount vnto ſeauen and twentie whales of one greatneſſe and other. This is notable alſo in this part of the Ile, that there is a great caue two yards deepe of water when the ſea is gone, and not aboue foure when it is at the higheſt; ouer which great numbers do ſit of both ſeres and ages, with hoks and lines, and catch at all times an infinite deale of fiſh, wherewith they liue, and which maketh them alſo the more idle.

Lewis called Thule by Tacitus, with no better authoritie than the Inglefeic Mona.

Tithe whales.

Ile of Pigmeies.

Being paſt this about ſixtie miles, we come vnto the Rona, or Ron, which ſome take for the laſt of the Hebrides, diſtant (as I ſaid) about fortie miles from the Orchades, and one hundreth and thirtie from the promontorie of Dungiſbe. The inhabitants of this Ile are verie rude and irreligious, the lord alſo of the ſoile doth limit their number of houſholds, & hauing aſſigned vnto them what numbers of the greater and ſmaller ſorts of cattell they ſhall ſpend and inioie for their owne proviſion, they ſend the ouerplus yearlie vnto him to Lewis. Their cheefe paiments conſiſt of a great quantitie of meale, which is verie plentifull among them, ſowed vp in theepes ſkins. Alſo of mutton and ſea foule dried, that reſteth ouer and aboue, which they themſelues do ſpend. And if it happen that there be more people in the Iland than the lords booke or rate doth come vnto, then they ſend alſo the ouerplus of them in like maner vnto him: by which meanes they liue alwaies in plentie. They receiue no vices from ſtrange countries, neither know or heare of anie things done elſe-where than in their owne Iland. Manie whales are taken alſo vpon their coaſts, which are likewiſe r ſhed with ſeale, and porpaſſe, and thoſe which are either ſo tame, or ſo fierce, that they abaſh not at the ſight of ſuch as looke vpon them, neither make they anie haſt to flie out of their preſence.

Beyond this Ile, about 16 miles weſtward, there is another called Suilſcraie, of a mile length, void of graſſe, and without ſo much as heath growing vpon hir ſoile: yet are there manie cliffes and rocks therein, which are couered with blacke moſſe, whereon innumerable ſorts of foules do breed and laie their egs. Thither in like ſort manie do ſaile from Lewiſſa, to take them yong in time of the yeare, before they be able to flie, which they alſo kill and drie in eight daies ſpace, and then returne home againe with them, and great plentie of fethers gathered in this voiage. One thing is verie ſtrange and to be noted in this Iland, of the Colke foule, which is little leſſe than a goſe; and this kind commeth thither but once in the yeare, to wit, in the ſpring, to laie hir egs and bring vp hir yong, till they be able to ſhift for themſelues, & then they get them awaie togither to the ſea, and come no more vntill that time of the yére which next inſueth. At the ſame ſeaſon alſo they caſt their fethers there, as it were anſwering tribute to nature for the vſe of hir moſſie ſoile: wherein it is wonderfull to ſée, that thoſe fethers haue no ſtalkes, neither anie thing that is hard in them, but are ſéene to couer their bodies as it were woll or downe, till breeding time (I ſaie) wherein they be left ſtarke naked.

Suilſcraie.

Colke foule.

Orchades.

The Orchades (whoſe firſt inhabitants were the Scithians, which came from thoſe Iles where the Gothes did inhabit, as ſome ſparks yet remaining among them of that language do declare) lie partlie in the Germaine, and partlie in the Caliden ſeas, ouer againſt the point of Dunghilbie (being in number eight and twentie, or as other ſaie thirtie & one, yet ſome ſaie thirtie three, as Oroſius, but Plinie ſaith fortie) and now belonging to the crowne of Scotland, as are the reſt whereof heretofore I haue made report, ſince we croſſed ouer the mouth of the Solueie ſtreame, to come into this countrie. Certes the people of theſe Iſlands reteine much of their old ſparing diets, and thereunto they are of goodlie ſtature, tall, verie comelie, healthfull, of long life, great ſtrength, whitiſh colour, as men that feed moſt vpon fiſh; ſith the cold is ſo extreame in thoſe parts, that the ground bringeth forth but ſmall ſtore of wheate, and in maner verie little or no fuell at all, wherewith to warme them in the winter, and yet it ſéemeth that (in times paſt) ſome of theſe Iſlands alſo haue béene well repleniſhed with wood, but now they are without either tree or ſhrub, in ſtéed whereof they haue plentie of heath, which is ſuffered to grow among them, rather thorough their negligence, than that the ſoile of it ſelfe will not yéeld to bring forth trées & bulhes. For what ſtore of ſuch hath bæne in times paſt, the roots yet found and digged out of the ground do yéeld ſufficient triall. Otes they haue verie plentifullie, but greater ſtore of barleie, wherof they make a nappie kind of drinke, and ſuch indéed, as will verie readilie cauſe a ſtranger to ouerſhot himſelfe. Howbeit this may be vnto vs in lieu of a miracle, that although their drinke be neuer ſo ſtrong, & they themſelues ſo vnmeaſurable drinkers (as none are more) yet it ſhall not eaſilie be ſéene (ſaith Hector) that there is anie drunkard among them, either frantike, or mad man, dolt, or naturall fole, meet to weare a cockeſcombe.

If he ſpeake all in truth.

This vnmeaſurable drinking of theirs is confeſſed alſo by Buchanan, who noteth, that whenſoeuer anie wine is brought vnto them from other ſoiles, they take their parts thereof aboundantlie. He addeth moreouer, how they haue an old bole (which they call S. Magnus bole, who firſt preached Chriſt vnto them) of farre greater quantitie than common boles are, and ſo great, that it may ſéeme to be reſerued ſince the Lapithane banket, onelie to quaffe and drinke in. And when anie biſhop commeth vnto them, they offer him this bole full of drinke, which if he be able to drinke vp quite at one draught; then they aſſure themſelues of good lucke, and plentie after it. Neuertheleſſe this exceſſe is not often found in the common ſort, whom penurie maketh to be more frugall; but in their prieſts, and ſuch as are of the richer calling. They ſuccour pirats alſo, and verie often exchange their vittels with their commodities, rather for feare and want of power to reſiſt (their Ilands lieng ſo ſcattered) than for anie neceſſitie of ſuch gains as they do get by thoſe men: for in truth, they thinke themſelues to haue little néed of other furniture than their owne ſoiles do yéeld and offer vnto them. This is alſo to be read of the inhabitants of theſe Ilands, that ignorance of exceſſe is vnto the moſt part of them in ſtéed of phyſicke; and labour and trauell a medicine for ſuch few diſeaſes as they are moleſted and incombred withall.

In like ſort they want venemous beaſts, cheeſelie ſuch as do delight in hotter ſoile, and all kinds of ouglie creatures. Their ewes alſo are ſo full of increaſe, that ſome do vſuallie bring forth two, three, or foure lambes at once, whereby they account our anelings (which are ſuch as bring forth but one at once) rather barren than to be kept for anie gains. As for wild and tame foules, they haue ſuch plentie of them, that the people there account them rather a burthen to their ſoile, than a benefit to their tables: they haue alſo neat and gotes, whereby they abound in white meat, as butter and cheeſe: wherein, next vnto fiſh, the cheefe part of their ſuſtenance doth conſiſt. There is alſo a biſhop of the Orchades, who hath his ſée in Pomona the cheefe of all the Ilands, wherein alſo are two ſtrong caſtels, and ſuch hath béene the ſuperſtition of the people here, that there is almoſt no one of them, that hath not one church at the leaſt dedicated to the mother of Chriſt. Finallie, there is little vſe of phyſicke in theſe quarters, leſſe ſtore of éeles, and leaſt of frogs. As for the horſſes that are bred amongſt them, they are commonlie not much greater than aſſes, and yet to labour and trauell, a man ſhall find verie few elſe-where, able to come neere, much leſſe to match with them, in holding out their iournies. The ſeas about theſe Ilands are verie tempeſtuous, not onelie through ſtrong winds, and the influences of the heauens and ſtars; but by the contrarie méetings and worſkings of the weſt ocean, which rageth ſo vehementlie in the ſtreicts, that no veſſell is able to paſſe in ſafetie amongſt them. Some of theſe Ilands alſo are ſo ſmall and low, that all the commoditie which is to be reaped by anie of them, is ſcarſelie ſufficient to ſuſteine one or two men: and ſome of them ſo barren and full of rocks, that they are nothing elſe but moſſe or bare ſhingle. Wherefore onelie thirteene of them are inhabited and made account of, the reſt being left vnto their ſheepe and cattell. Of all theſe Ilands alſo Pomona is the greateſt, and therfore called the continent, which conteineth thirtie miles in length, and is well replenished with people: for it hath twelue pariſh churches, and one towne, which the Danes (ſometime lords of that Iland) called Cracouia: but now it hight Kirkwa. Kirkwa.

wa. There are alſo two pꝛetie holds, one belonging to the king, the other to the biſhop: and alſo a beautifull church, and much building betweene the two holds, and about this church, which being taken as it were for two townes, the one is called the kings and the other the biſhops towne. All the whole Iland is full of cliffes and pꝛomontoꝛies, whereby no ſmall number of baies and ſome hauens are pꝛoduced.

There is alſo tin and lead to be found in ſir of theſe Iles, ſo good and plentifullie as anie where elſe in Britaine. It lieth foure & twentie miles from Cathneſſe, being ſeparated from the ſame by the Pictiſh ſea: wherein alſo lie certeine Ilands, as Stroma, foure miles from Cathneſſe, which albeit that it be but foure miles from Cathneſſe, is not reputed for anie of the Oꝛchades. Going therefoꝛe from hence northward, we come to the firſt Ile of the Oꝛchades, called ſouth Rauals, which is ſirteene miles from Dunghilbie, alias Dunachilbie, & that in two houres ſpace, ſuch is the ſwiftneſſe of the ſea in that tract. This Ile is fiue miles long, and hath a faire poꝛt called ſaint Margarets hauen. Then paſſe we by two deſert Iles, which lie towards the eaſt, wherein nothing is found but cattell: ſome call them the holmes, bicauſe they lie low, and are good for nothing but graſſe. On the noꝛthſide lieth the Bur, and two other holmes betweene the ſame Pomona. From Bur, toward the weſt lie three Iles, Snu, Flat, and Far: and beyond them Hoie and Wall, which ſome accompt for two, and other but for one; bicauſe that in March and September, the flats that lie betweene them, doo ſeeme to ioine them togither, after the tide is gone. This neuertheleſſe is certeine, that in this ſingle oꝛ double Ile, which is ten miles in length, the higheſt hilles are to be ſeene that are in all the Oꝛchades. And as they lie eight miles from Rauals, ſo are they two miles from Pomona, from ſaint Donats in Scotland full twentie miles. And on the noꝛth ſide of it lieth the Bꝛainſe, in a narrow ſtreict, as Buchanan doth remember. And theſe are the Iles which lie betweene Pomona and Cathneſſe. As for the weſt ſide of the continent, I find that it lieth open to the ſea, without either ſhelues, Ilands, oꝛ rocks, appéering neere vnto it: but on the eaſt ſide thereof Cobeſa doth in maner ouerſhadow it. Siapinſa alſo an Ile of ſir miles long, lieth within two miles of Cracouſa. Toward the eaſt, on the weſt ſide of Pomona lieth the Rouſe, of ſir miles in length: and by eaſt of that, the Egliſa, wherin (as they ſaie) their patrone S. Magnus lieth interred. From henſe ſouthward lie the Ucra Gerſa, and not far off the Ueſter (which is foureſcoꝛe miles from Hethland) Papa, & Stronza, which is alſo eightie miles from Hethland as the Ueſter. In the middeſt alſo of this tract lieth Far, oꝛ Fara, which is to ſaie, faire Ile, in old Engliſh, faire eie: and within ſight ſo well of Hethland, as the Oꝛchades, by reaſon of three inſuperable rocks which are apparant in the ſame: a verie poꝛe Iland, and yet yeareelie robbed (of ſuch commodities as it hath) by ſuch Flemiſh and Engliſh fiſhermen as paſſe by the coaſts thereof in time of the yeare, to catch fiſh for the pꝛouiſion of their countries.

Nert vnto this is the greateſt of all the Hethlands, an Iland called the Maine, ſirtie miles in length, and ſirteene in bꝛeadth, full of rocks, and whoſe coaſts are onelie inhabited, the innermoſt parts being left vnto the foules of the aire, bicauſe of the barrenneſſe and vnfruitfulneſſe of the ſoile: yet of late ſome haue indeuoured to impeople it, but with no ſucceſſe coꝛreſpondent to their deſire. Wheꝛefoꝛe they returned to their foꝛmer trades, making their cheefe commoditie and yeareelie gaine by fiſh, as afoꝛetime. Ten miles from this toward the noꝛth, lieth the Zeale, twentie miles in length, eight in bꝛeadth, and ſo wild that it will ſuffer no creature to liue thereof, that is not bꝛed therein. Betweene this Iland alſo and the Maine, are other ſmaller Ilands to be found, as the Ling, Oꝛne, Big, and Sanferre. And from henſe nine miles noꝛthward Ulſa, twentie miles long, & ſir in bꝛeadth, plaine, pleaſant, but inuiꝛoned with a ſwift and terrible ſea. Betweene this alſo and the Zeale, are the Uie, the Uze, and the Ling: alſo toward the weſt, the two Skenes, Chalſeie, Noꝛwade, Bꝛaſe, and Nolſe, on the weſt ſide lie the weſt Skenes, Rottia, Papa the leſſe, Wunned, Papa the moꝛe, Walla, Tondꝛa, Burra, Yaura the moꝛe, Yaura the leſſe, & in maner ſo manie holmes diſperſed heere and there, whereof I haue no notice. Some call theſe the Shetland, and ſome the Shotland Iles. Buchanan nameth them in the third member of his diuiſion Zelandiſe, and toward the end of his firſt booke ſeemeth to auouch, that they liue in maner as doo the inhabitants of the Oꝛchades: although not in ſo ciuill wiſe, noꝛ in ſuch large meaſure and aboundance of diet in their houſes. He addeth moꝛeouer, that their apparrell is after the Germaine cut, comelie, but not ſo chargeable and coſtlie, and how they raiſe their gaine by ſkins of beaſts, as marterns, ſheepe, oxen, and gotes ſkins, and therevnto a kind of cloth which they weaue, and ſell to the merchants of Noꝛwaie, togither with their butter, fiſh, either ſalted oꝛ dꝛied, and their traine oile, and exerciſe their trade of fiſhing alſo in their vncerteine ſhewes, which they fetch out of Noꝛwaie.

Their ſpeech is Gothiſh, and ſuch of them as by their dealing with foꝛren merchants doo gather anie wealth, that they will verie often beſtow vpon the furniture of their houſes. Their weights & meaſures are after the Germaine maner, their countrie is verie healthie, and ſo wholeſome, that of late a man was found which had maried a wife at one hundꝛed yeares of age, and was able to go out a fiſhing with his bote at one hundꝛed and foꝛtie, and of late yéeres died of méere age, without anie other diſeaſe. Oꝛonkennelle is not heard of among them, and yet they méet and make good chéere verie often. Neither doo I read of anie great vſe of fleſh oꝛ foule there, although that ſome of their Ilands haue plentie of each. Noꝛ anie mention of coꝛne growing in theſe parts, and therefoꝛe in ſtéed of bꝛead they dꝛie a kind of fiſh, which they beat in moꝛters to powder, & bake it in their ouens, vntill it be hard and dꝛie. Their fuell alſo is of ſuch bones as the fiſh yéeldeth, that is taken on their coaſts: and yet they liue as themſelues ſuppoſe in much felicitie, thinking it a great péece of their happineſſe to be ſo farre diſtant from the wicked auarice, and cruell dealings of the moꝛe rich and ciuill part of the woꝛld.

Herein alſo they are like vnto the Hirchiens, in that at one time of the yeare, there commeth a pꝛieſt vnto them out of the Oꝛchades (vnto which iuriſdiction they doo belong) who baptiſeth all ſuch childꝛen, as haue béene boꝛne among them, ſince he laſt arꝛiued, and hauing afterward remained there foꝛ a two dales, he taketh his tithes of them (which they pꝛouide and paie with great ſcrupuloſitie in fiſh, foꝛ of other commodities paie they none) and then returneth home againe, not without boaſt of his troubleſome voiage, except he watch his time. In theſe Iles alſo is great plentie of fine Amber to be had (as Hector ſaith) which is pꝛoduced by the woꝛking of the ſea vpon thoſe coaſts: but moꝛe of this elſewhere. Amber.

This neuertheleſs is certeine, that theſe Ilands, with the Oꝛchades, were neuer perfectlie vnited to the crowne of Scotland, till the mariage was made betweene king James and the ladie Marie daughter to Chriſtierne king of Denmarke 1468; which Chriſtierne at the birth of their ſonne James (afterward king of Scotland and called James the fourth) reſigned all his right and title whatſoeuer either he or his anceſtors either preſently or heretofore had, might haue had, or hereafter may or ſhould haue, vnto the aforeſaid peeres, as appéereth by the charter.

From theſe Shetland Iles, and vntill we come ſouthwards to the Scarre, which lieth in Buquhamneſſe, I find no mention of anie Ile ſituat vpon that coaſt, neither greatlie from thence, vntill we come at the Forth, that leadeth vp to Sterling, neither thought we it ſafetie for vs to ſearch ſo farre as Thule, whence the moſt excellent bzimſtone commeth, & thereto what ſtore of Ilands lie vnder the more northerlie climats, whoſe ſecret ſituations though partlie ſeene in my time, haue not yet bin perfectlie reueled or diſcouered by anie, bicauſe of the great abounddance of huge Ilands of ice that moueth to and fro vpon their ſhores, and ſundrie perilous gulfes and indraughts of water, and for as much as their knowlege doth not concerne our purpoſe, therfore calling about, we came at the laſt into the Firth or Forth, which ſome call the Scotiſh ſea, wherein we paſſe by ſeuen or eight ſuch as they be, of which the firſt called the Paie, the ſecond Baas, and Garwie the third, doo ſéeme to be inhabited. From theſe alſo holding on our courſe toward England, we paſſe by another Ile, wherein Faur caſtell ſtandeth, and this (ſo far as my ſkill ſerueth) is the laſt Iland of the Scotiſh ſide, in compaſſing whereof I am not able to diſcerne, whether their flats and ſhallowes, number of Ilands without name, confuſion of ſituation, lacke of true deſcription, or mine owne ignorance hath troubled me moſt. No meruell therefore that I haue béene ſo oft on ground among them. But moſt ioifull am I that am come home againe: & although not by the Thames mouth into my native citie (which taketh his name of Troie) yet into the Engliſh dominion, where god interteinement is much more franke and copious, and better harborough wherein to reſt my wearie bones, and refreſh at eaſe our wetherbeaten carcaſſes.

The firſt Iland therefore which commeth to our ſight, after we paſſed Berwike, is that which was ſomtime called Lindeſfarne, but now Holie Iland, and conteineth eight miles; a place much honored among our monaſticall writers, bicauſe diuerſe monks and heremits did ſpend their times therein. There was alſo the biſhops ſæ of Lindeſfarne for a long ſeaſon, which afterward was tranſlated to Cheſter in the ſtréet, & finallie to Dureſme, Dunelme, or Durham. It was firſt erected by Oſwald, wherein he placed Aidanus the learned Scotiſh monke, who came hither out of the Ile called Hij, whereof Beda ſpeaking in the third chapter of his third booke, noteth, that although the ſaid Hij belong to the kings of Northumberland, by reaſon of ſituation & nérenеſſe to the coaſt; yet the Picts appointed the biſhops of the ſame, and gaue the Ile with the ſæ it ſelfe to ſuch Scotiſh monks as they liked, bicauſe that by their preaching they firſt receiued the faith. But to returne to Lindeſfarne. After Aidan departed this life, Finanus finiſhed and builded the whole church with ſawed timber of oke, after the maner of his countrie, which when Theodorus the archbiſhop of Canturburie had dedicated, Edbert the biſhop did couer ouer with lead.

Lindeſfarne or Holie Iland.

Next vnto this is the Ile of Farne, and herein is a place of defenſe ſo far as I remember, and ſo great ſtore of egs laid there by diuerſe kinds of wildfoule in time of the yeare, that a man ſhall hardlie run for a wager on the plaine ground without the breach of manie, before his race be finiſhed. About Farne alſo lie certeine Iles greater than Farne it ſelfe, but void of inhabitants; and in theſe alſo is great ſtore of puffins, graie as duckes, and without coloured feathers, ſauing that they haue a white ring round about their necks. There is moreouer another bird, which the people call ſaint Cuthberts foules, a verie tame and gentle creature, and eaſie to be taken. After this we came to the Cocket Iland; ſo called, bicauſe it lieth ouer againſt the fall of Cocket water. Herein is a veine of meane ſeacole, which the people dig out of the ſhore at the low water; and in this Iland dwelled one Henrie ſometime a famous heremite, who (as his life declareth) came of the Danith race. And from thence vntill we came vnto the coaſt of Norfolke I ſaw no more Ilands.

Puffins.

Saint Cuthberts foules.

Being therfore paſt S. Edmunds point, we found a litle Ile ouer againſt the fall of the water that commeth from Holkham, & likewiſe another ouer againſt the Claie, before we came at Waburne hope: the third alſo in Yarmouth riuer ouer againſt Bradwell, a towne in low or little England, whereof alſo I muſt néeds ſaie ſomewhat, bicauſe it is in maner an Iland, and as I geſſe either hath béene or may be one: for the brodeſt place of the ſtrict land that leadeth to the ſame, is little aboue a quarter of a mile, which againſt the raging waues of the ſea can make but ſmall reſiſtance. Little England or low England therefore is about eight miles in length and foure in bredth, verie well replenиſhed with townes, as Friſtan, Burgh caſtell, Olton, Flixton, Leſtoft, Gunton, Blundſton, Coxton, Lownd, Athebie, Horton, Belton, Bradwell, and Gorleſton, and beſide this it is verie fruitfull and indued with all commodities.

Little England.

Going forward from hence, by the Eſſonneſſe (almoſt an Iland) I ſaw a ſmall parcell cut from the maine in Orford hauen, the Langerſtone in Orwell mouth, & two péeces or Illets at Cattiwade bridge; and then caſting about vnto the Colne, we beheld Merſeie which is a prettie Iland, well furniſhed with wood. It was ſometime a great receptacle for the Danes when they inuaded England; howbeit at this preſent it hath beſide two decaied blockehouſes, two pariſh churches, of which one is called eaſt Merſeie, the other weſt Merſeie, and both vnder the archdeacon of Colcheſter, as parcell of his iuriſdiction.

Merſeie.

Foulneſſe is an Ile void of wood, and yet well replenиſhed with verie good graſſe for neat and ſhéepe, whereof the inhabitants haue great plentie: there is alſo a pariſh church, and albeit that it ſtand ſomewhat diſtant from the ſhore, yet at a dead low water a man may (as they ſaie) ride thereto if he be ſkilfull of the cauſie; it is vnder the iuriſdiction of London. And at this preſent maſter William Tabor bacheler of diuinitie and archdeacon of Eſſex hath it vnder his iuriſdiction & regiment, by the ſurrender of maiſter John Walker doctor alſo of diuinitie, who liued at ſuch time as I firſt attempted to commit this booke to the impreſſion.

Foulneſſe.

In Maldon water are in like ſort thrée Ilands inuironed all with ſalt ſtreames, as ſaint Oſithes, Northeie, and another (after a merth) that beareth no name ſo far as I remember. On the right hand alſo as we went toward the ſea againe, we ſaw Ramſeie Ile, or rather a Peninſula or Biland, & likewiſe the Reie, in which is a chappell of ſaint Peter. And then coaſting vpon the mouth of the Bourne, we ſaw the Wallot Ile and his mates, whereof two lie by eaſt Wallot, and the fourth is Foulneſſe, except I be deceiued, for here my memorie faileth me on the one ſide, and information on the other, I meane concerning the placing of Foulneſſe. But to proceéd. After this, and being entered into the Thames mouth, I find no Iland of anie name, except you accompt Rochford hundred for one, whereof I haue no mind to intreat, more than of Crowland, Merſland, Clie, and the reſt, that are framed by the ouze, Andredeſeie in Trent, ſo called of a church there dedicated to ſaint Andrew, and Auon (two noble riuers hereafter to be deſcribed) ſith I touch onelie thoſe that are inuironed with the ſea or ſalt water round about, as we may ſee in the Canwaie Iles, which ſome call marſhes onelie, and liken them to an ipocras bag, ſome to a vice, ſcrue, or wide ſleeue, becauſe they are verie ſmall at the eaſt end, and large at weſt. The ſalt rilles alſo that croſſe the ſame do ſo ſeparat the one of them from the other, that they reſemble the ſlope courſe of the cutting part of a ſcrue or gimlet, in verie perfect maner, if a man do imagine himſelfe to looke downe from the top of the maſt vpon them. Betweene theſe, moreouer and the Leigh towne lieth another litle Ile or Holme, whoſe name is to me vnknowne. Certes I would haue gone to land and viewed theſe parcels as they laie, or at the leaſt haue ſailed round about them by the whole hauen, which may eaſilie be done at an high water: but for as much as a perrie of wind (ſcarſe comparable to the makerell gale, whereof Iohn Anele of Calis one of the beſt ſeamen that England euer bred for his ſkill in the narow ſeas was wont to talke) caught hold of our ſailes, & caried vs forth the right waie toward London, I could not tarie to ſee what things were hereabouts. Thus much therefore of our Ilands, & ſo much may well ſuffice where more cannot be had.

The deſcription of the Thames, and ſuch riuers as fall into the ſame. Cap. 11.

HAuing (as you haue ſeene) attempted to ſet downe a full diſcourſe of all the Ilands, that are ſituat vpon the coaſt of Britaine, and finding the ſucceſſe not correſpondent to mine intent, it hath cauſed me ſomewhat to refreine my purpoſe in this deſcription alſo of our riuers. For whereas I intended at the firſt to haue written at large, of the number, ſituation, names, quantities, townes, villages, caſtels, mounteines, freſh waters, plaſhes or lakes, ſalt waters, and other commodities of the aforeſaid Iles, mine expectation of information from all parts of England, was ſo deceiued in the end, that I was faine at laſt onelie to leane to that which I knew my ſelfe either by reading, or ſuch other helpe as I had alreadie purchaſed and gotten of the ſame. And euen ſo it happeneth in this my tractation of waters, of whoſe heads, courſes, length, breadth, depth of chanell (for burden) ebs, flowings, and falles, I had thought to haue made a perfect deſcription vnder the report alſo of an imagined courſe taken by them all. But now for want of inſtruction, which hath beene largelie promiſed, & ſlacklie performed, and other ſudden and iniurious denaill of helpe voluntarilie offered, without occaſion giuen on my part, I muſt needs content my ſelfe with ſuch obſeruations as I haue either obteined by mine owne experience, or gathered from time to time out of other mens writings: whereby the full diſcourſe of the whole is vtterlie cut off, and in ſtead of the ſame a mangled rehearſall of the reſidue ſet downe and left in memorie.

Wherefore I beſeech your honour to pardon this imperfection and rudeneſſe of my labour, which notwithſtanding is not altogither in vaine, ſith my errors maie proue a ſpurre vnto the better ſkilled, either to correct or inlarge where occaſion ſerueth; or at the leaſt wiſe to take in hand a more abſolute peece of worke, as better direction ſhall incourage them thereto. The entrance and beginning of euerie thing is the hardeſt; and he that beginneth well, hath atchiued halfe his purpoſe. The ice (my lord) is broken, and from henceforth it will be more eaſie for ſuch as ſhall come after to wade through with the reſt, ſith Facile eſt inuentis addere; and to continue and finiſh, is not ſo great a matter in building, as to attempt and laie the foundation or platforme of anie noble peece of workmanſhip, though it be but rudelie handled. But to my purpoſe. As I began at the Thames in my deſcription of Ilands, ſo will I now do the like with that of famous riuers; making mine entrie at the ſaid riuer it ſelfe, of whoſe founteine ſome men make as much adoo, as in time paſt of the true head of Nilus, which, till of late (if it be yet deſcried) was neuer found: or the Tanais, whoſe originall was neuer knowne, nor ſhall be: for whileſt one placeth it here, another there; there are none at all that deale with it exactlie. Wherefore leaning to ſuch mens writings as haue of ſet purpoſe ſought out the ſpring of the Thames; I affirme, that this famous ſtreame hath his head or beginning out of the ſide of an hill, ſtanding in the plaines of Cotſwold, about one mile from Tetburie, neere vnto the Foſſe (an high waie ſo called of old) where it was ſometime named Iſis, or the Ouſe, although diuerſe do ignorantlie call it the Thames euen there, rather of a fooliſh cuſtome than anie ſkill, becauſe they either neglect or vtterlie are ignorant how it was named at the firſt. From hence it runneth directlie toward the eaſt (as all good riuers ſhould) and meeteth with the Cirne or Churne, (a brooke called in Latine Corinium) whereof Cirnceſter towne (by which it commeth) doth take the denomination. Corinium.

From hence it haſteth vnto Crekelade, alias Crekanford, Lechlade, Radcotebridge, Newbridge, and Coueſham, receiuing by the waie an infinit ſort of ſmall ſtreames, brookes, beckes, waters, and rundels: and here on this ſide of the towne diuideth it ſelfe into two courſes, of which the one goeth ſtraight to Botleie and Hinkſeie, the other by Godſtow, a village not farre off. This latter ſpreadeth it ſelfe alſo for a while into ſundrie ſmaller branches, which run not farre per they be reunited, and then beclipping ſundrie pleaſant medowes, it palſeth at length by Orford, of ſome ſuppoſed rather to be called Duſeford of this riuer, where it meeteth with the Charwell, and a litle from whence the originall branches do ioine and go togither by Abbandune (alias Denſham or Abington as we call it) although no part of it at the firſt came ſo neere the towne as it doth now, till a branch thereof was led thither from the maine ſtreame, thorough the induſtrie of the monks, as (beſide the teſtimonie of old records thereof yet extant to be ſeene) by the decaie of Cair Dour now Dorcheſter it ſelfe, ſometime the thorough fare from Wales and the weſt countrie to London, which inſued vpon this fact, is eaſie to be ſeene. From hence it goeth to Dorcheſter, and ſo to Thame, where ioining with a riuer of the ſame denomination, it loſeth the name of Iſis or Ouſe (whereof Duſeneie at Orford is produced) and from thenceforth is called Thameſis. From Thame it goeth to Wallingford, and ſo to Reding, which in time paſt, of the number of bridges there, was called Pontium; albeit that the Engliſh name doth rather proceed from Rhe, or Ree, the Saxon word for a water-courſe or riuer, which maie be ſeene in Dureé, or Sutheré, for ouer the Ree, or ſouth of the Rhe, as to the ſkilfull doth readilie appeere; yet ſome hold (and not altogither againſt probabilitie and likelihood) that the word Sutheré is ſo called of Sudrijc, to wit, the ſouth kingdome, vnto Charwell. Some write, that the maine ſtreame was brought thither which ranne before betweene Andredeſeie and Culenham. Pontium. Saint Marie ouer Rhe.

Thameſis.

thereunto in part the Thames is a bound. But that holdeth not in denomination, either of the said church or name of the foresaid countie. Other affirme likewise, that Reding is so called of the Greeke word (ῥέω) which is to ouerflowe. Certes, as neither of these coniectures are to be contemned, so the last cõmeth most neere to mine aid, who affirme, that not onelie the course of euerie water it selfe, but also his ouerflowing was in time past called Rhe, by such Sarons as inhabited in this Iland: and euen to this date in Esser I haue oft obserued, that when the lower grounds by rage of water haue béene ouerflowen, the people beholding the same, haue said; All is on a Rhe, as if they should haue said; All is now a riuer, albeit the word Riuer be deriued from the French, and borrowed by them from the Latins: but not without corruption, as it was brought vnto them. I will not here giue notice how farre they are deceiued, which call the aforesaid church by the name of S. Marie Auderies, or S. Marie ouer Isis, or Ise. But I will proceed with the course of this noble streame, which, howsoeuer these matters stand it hath passed by Reding, and there receiued the Kenet, which commeth from the hilles that lie west of Marleborough, then the Chetis, commonlie called the Side that commeth from Chetisford: it hieth to Sudlington otherwise called Maidenhead, and so to Windlesore (or Windsore) Eaton, and then to Chertsey, where Erkenwald bishop of London sometime builded a religious house or cell, as I do read.

Kenet.

Chetis.

From Chertsey it hasteth directlie vnto Staines, and receiuing an other streame by the waie, called the Cole (whereupon Colbrooke standeth) it goeth by Kingstone, Shene, Sion, and Brentford or Bregentford, where it méeteth the Brane or the Brene, another breake descending from Edgworth, whose name signifieth a frog, in the Brittish speach. Upon this also sir John Chin had sometime a statelie house, with a maruellous prouision to inclose and reteine such fish as should come about the same. From Brentford it passeth by Portlach, Putneie, Fulham, Batterseie, Chelseie, Lambeth, and so to London. Finallie going from thence vnto the sea, it taketh the Lée with it by the waie vpon the coast of Esser, and the Darnt vpon Kent side, which riseth néere to Tanrige, and commeth by Shorcham, vnto Dertford, whereunto the Craie falleth. And last of all the Medwaie a notable riuer (in mine opinion) which watereth all the south and southwest part of Kent, and whose description is not to be omitted hereafter in this place.

Cole.

Brene.

Darwent.
Craie.

Hauing in this maner breefelie touched this noble riuer, and such brookes as fall into the same; I will now adde a particular description of each of these last by themselues, whereby their courses also shall be seuerallie described to the satisfaction of the studious. But yer I take the same in hand, I will insert a word or two of the commodities of the said riuer, which I will performe with so much breuitie as is possible; hereby also finding out his whole tract and course from the head to the fall thereof into the sea. It appeareth euidentlie that the length thereof is at the least, one hundreth and eightie miles, if it be measured by the tourneies of the land. And as it is in course, the longest of the three famous riuers of this Ile, so it is nothing inferiour vnto them in aboundance of all kind of fish, whereof it is hard to saie, which of the three haue either most plentie, or greatest varietie, if the circumstances be duelie weighed. What some other write of the riuers of their countries it skilleth not, neither will I (as diuerse do) inuent strange things of this noble streame, therewith to nobilitate and make it more honorable: but this will I in plaine termes affirme, that it neither swalloweth vp bastards of the Celtick brood, or casteth vp the right begotten that are throwne in without hurt into their mothers lap, as Politian fableth of the Rhene, Epistolarum lib. 8. epi. 6. nor yéeldeth clots of gold as the Tagus doth: but an infinit plentie of excellent, sweet and pleasant fish, wherewith such as inhabit nere vnto hir bankes are fed and fullie nourished.

What should I speake of the fat and sweet salmons, dailie taken in this streame, and that in such plentie (after the time of the smelt be past) as no riuer in Europa is able to exceed it. But what store also of barbels, trouts, cheuins, pearches, smelts, breames, roches, daces, gudgings, flounders, shrimps, &c: are commonlie to be had therein, I refer me to them that know by experience better than I, by reason of their dailie trade of fishing in the same. And albeit it seemeth from time to time, to be as it were defrauded in sundrie wise of these hir large commodities, by the insatiable auarice of the fishermen, yet this famous riuer complaineth commonlie of no want, but the more it loseth at one time, the more it yéeldeth at another. Onelie in carps it seemeth to be scant, sith it is not long since that kind of fish was brought ouer into England, and but of late to speake of into this streame, by the violent rage of sundrie landflouds, that brake open the heads and dams of diuers gentlemens ponds, by which meanes it became somewhat partaker also of this said commoditie, whereof earst it had no portion that I could euer heare. Oh that this riuer might be spared but euen one yeare from nets, &c! But alas then should manie a poore man be vndone. In the meane time it is lamentable to see, how it is and hath béene choked of late with sands and shelues, through the penning and wrecking of the course of the water for commodities sake. But as this is an inconuenience easilie remedied, if good order were taken for the redresse thereof: so now, the fine or pate set vpon the ballaffe sometime frælis giuen to the merchants by patent, euen vnto the lands end (Iusques au poinct) will be another cause of harme vnto this noble streame, and all through an aduantage taken at the want of an (i) in the word ponct; which grew through an error committed by an English notarie vnskilfull in the French toong, wherein that patent was granted.

Salmons.

Carps a fish late brought into England and later into the Thames.

Furthermore, the said riuer floweth and filleth all his chanels twise in the daie and night, that is in euerie twelue houres once; and this ebbing & flowing, holdeth on for the space of seauentie miles, within the maine land: the streame or tide being alwaies highest at London, when the moone doth exactlie touch the northeast and south or west points of the heauens, of which one is visible, the other vnder the earth, and not subiect to our sight. These tides also differ in their times, each one comming latter than other, by so manie minuts as passe yer the reuolution and naturall course of the heauens do reduce, and bring about the said planet vnto those hir former places: whereby the common difference betweene one tide and another, is found to consist of twentie foure minuts, which wanteth but twelue of an whole houre in foure and twentie, as experience doth confirme. In like sort we sée by dailie triall, that each tide is not of equall heigth and greatnesse. For at the full and change of the moone we haue the greatest floods, and such is their ordinarie course, that as they diminish from their changes and fuls, vnto the first and last quarters; so afterwards they increase againe, vntill they come to the full and change. Sometimes also they rise so high (if the wind be at the north or northeast, which bringeth in the water with more vehemencie, because the tide which filleth the chanell, commeth from Scotland ward) that the Thames ouerouerfloweth hir banks nére vnto London: which happeneth eſpecialliein the fuls and changes of Januarie and Februarie, wherein the lower grounds are of cuſtome ſoneſt drowned. This order of flowing in like ſort is perpetuall, ſo that when the mone is vpon the ſouthweſt and north of points, then is the water by London at the higheſt: neither do the tides alter, except ſome rough winds out of the weſt or ſouthweſt do keepe backe and checke the ſtreame in his entrance, as the eaſt and northeaſt do haſten the comming in thereof, or elſe ſome other extraordinarie occaſion, put by the ordinarie courſe of the northerne ſeas, which fill the ſaid riuer by their naturall returne and flowing. And that both theſe do happen eft among, I refer me to ſuch as haue not ſildome obſerued it, as alſo the ſenſible chopping in of three or foure tides in one naturall daie, wherof the vnſkilfull do deſcant manie things.

The iust distãce betweẽ one tide and another.

The ſtreame oft checked in hir entrance into the land.

But how ſo euer theſe ſmall matters do fall out, and how often ſoeuer this courſe of the ſtreame doth happen to be diſturbed; yet at two ſeuerall times of the age of the mone, the waters returne to their naturall courſe and limits of time exactlie. Polydore ſaith, that this riuer is ſeldome increaſed or rather neuer ouerfloweth hir banks by landflouds: but he is herein verie much deceiued, as it ſhalbe more apparantlie ſéene hereafter. For the more that this riuer is put by of hir right courſe, the more the water muſt of neceſſitie ſwell with the white waters which run downe from the land: becauſe the paſſage cannot be ſo ſwift and readie in the winding as in the ſtreight courſe. Theſe landflouds alſo do greatlie ſtraine the fineſſe of the ſtreame, in ſo much that after a great landfloud, you ſhall take haddocks with your hands beneath the bridge, as they flote aloft vpon the water, whoſe eies are ſo blinded with the thicknelle of that element, that they cannot ſée where to become, and make ſhift to ſaue themſelues before death take hold of them. Otherwiſe the water of it ſelfe is very cléere, and in compariſon next vnto that of the ſea, which is moſt ſubtile and pure of all other; as that of great riuers is moſt excellent, in compariſon of ſmaller brookes: although Ariſtotle will haue the ſalt water to be moſt groſſe, becauſe a ſhip will beare a greater burden on the ſea than on the freſh water; and an eg ſinke in this that ſwimmeth on the other. But he may eaſilie be anſwered by the quantitie of rome and aboundance of waters in the ſea; whereby it becommeth of more force to ſuſteine ſuch veſſels as are committed to the ſame, and whervnto the greateſt riuers (God wot) are nothing comparable. I would here make mention of ſundrie bridges placed ouer this noble ſtreame, of which that of London is moſt chieflie to be commended, for it is in maner a cõtinuall ſtreet, well repleniſhed with large and ſtatelie houſes on both ſides, and ſituat vpon twentie arches, whereof ech one is made of excellent free ſquared ſtone, euerie of them being three ſcore foot in heigth, and full twentie in diſtance one from another, as I haue often viewed.

London bridge.

In like maner I could intreat of the infinit number of ſwans dailie to be ſéene vpon this riuer; the two thouſand wherries and ſmall boats, wherby three thouſand poore watermen are maintéined, through the cariage and recariage of ſuch perſons as paſſe or repaſſe, from time to time vpon the ſame: beſide thoſe huge tideboats, tiltbotes, and barges, which either carrie paſſengers, or bring neceſſarie proviſion from all quarters of Oxfordſhire, Barkeſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Bedfordſhire, Herfordſhire, Middleſex, Eſſex, Surrie, and Kent, vnto the citie of London. But for ſomuch as theſe things are to be repeated againe in the particular deſcription of London, annexed to his card; I ſurceaſe at this time to ſpeake anie more of them here, as not lingering but haſting to performe my promiſe made euen now, not yet forgotten, and in performance whereof I thinke it beſt to reſume the deſcription of this noble riuer againe into my hands, and in adding whatſoeuer is before omitted, to deliuer a full and perfect demonſtration of his courſe. How and where the ſaid ſtreame ariſeth, is alreadie ſet with ſufficiencie ſet downe, noting the place to be within a mile of Cetburie, whereof ſome do vtterlie miſlike, becauſe that rill in ſummer drouths is oft ſo drie, that there is little or no water at all ſéene running aboue ground in the ſame. For this cauſe therefore manie affirme the verie head of Iſis to come from the pole aboue Kemble. Other confound it with the head of the Cirne or Chirne, called in Latine Corinium that riſeth aboue Coberleie. For my part I follow Leland, as he doth the monke of Malmesburie, which wrote the hiſtorie intituled Eulogium hiſtoriarum, who ſearched the ſame of ſet purpoſe, and pronounced with Leland, although at this preſent that courſe be verie ſmall, and choked vp (as I heare) with grauell and ſand. Proceeding therefore from the head, it firſt of all receiueth the Kemble water called the Coue, which riſeth aboue Kemble towne, goeth by Kemble it ſelfe vnto Poole and Somerford, and then (accompanieth the Thames) vnto Canes, Aſhton, Canes, and Howſton, holding on in one chanell vntill they méet with the Chirne, the next of all to be deſcribed.

Iſis. Coues.

The Chirne is a faire water ariſing out of the ground aboue Coberleie, from whence it runneth to Colwleie, Colwlesburne, Randcome, and ſo into the Iſis on the left ſide aboue Crekelade. Theſe three waters being thus vnited and brought into one chanell, within a little ſpace of the head of Iſis, it runneth on by Crekelade, beneath which towne it receiueth the Rhe, deſcending from Elcombe, Eſcot, Redburne, Widhill, & at the fall into Iſis, or not far off ioineth with another that runneth weſt of Purton by Braden forreſt, &c. Next of all our Iſis méeteth with the Amneie on the left hand, which comming from aboue Holie rode Amneie, runneth by Downe Amneie, and finallie into the Iſis a little aboue Iſeie. In like ſort I read of another that méeteth withall on the right hand aboue Iſeie alſo, which ſo far as I can call to remembrance, commeth from about Dziſield and falleth ſo into our Iſis, that they run as one vntill they come at the Colne, although not ſo nakedlie and without helpe, but that in this voiage, the maine ſtreame doth croſſe one water that deſcendeth from Swindon, and going alſo by Stratton toward Seuingham, is it ſelfe increaſed with two rils by the waie, whereof one commeth from Liddenton by Wambreie, as I haue béene informed.

Cozinium. Rhe. Amneie.

The Colne is a faire riuer riſing by north nere to Witchington, & from thence goeth to Shiptons, Compton Abdale, Mittenton, Parneworth, Colne Deanes, and Colne Rogers, Winſton, Biberie, Colne Alons, Quenington, Faireford, and weſt of Lachelade into the riuer Iſis, which hereabout on the ſouthſide alſo taketh in another, whereof I find this remembrance. The Iſis being once paſt Seuingham, croſſeth a brooke from ſouthweſt that mounteth about Alchbirie, and receiuing a rill from byweſt (that commeth from Hinton) beneath Shrineham, it afterward ſo diuideth it ſelfe, that the armes therof include Inglesham, and by reaſon that it falleth into the Iſis at two ſeuerall places, there is a pleſant Iland produced, whereof let this ſuffice.

Colneius, Colineus, or Colunus.

Being paſt Lechelade a mile, it runneth to ſaint Johns bridge, & thereabout méeteth with the Leche on the left hand. This brooke, whereof Lechlade taketh keth the name (a towne whereunto one peece of an old vniuerſitie is aſcribed, which it did neuer poſſeſſe, more than Crekelade did the other) riſeth eaſt of Hampnet, frō whence it goeth to north Lech, Eſſenton, Anleſworth, eaſt Lech, ſouth Thorpe, Farendon, & ſo into the Iſis. From hence this famous water goeth by Kenſkot toward Radcote bridge (taking in the rill that riſeth in an od peece of Barkeſhire, and runneth by Langford) and being paſt the ſaid bridge (now notable through a conſpiracie made there ſometimes by ſundrie barons againſt the eſtate) it is not long yer it croſſe two other waters, both of them deſcending from another od parcell of the ſaid countie, whereof I haue this note giuen me for my further information. There are two fals of water into Iſis beneath Radcote bridge, wherof the one commeth from Shilton in Barkeſhire by Areſcote, blacke Burton and Clarrefield. The other alſo riſeth in the ſame peece, and runneth by Briſenorton vnto Bampton, and there receiuing an armelet from the firſt that breake off at blacke Burton, it is not long yer they fall into Iſis, and leaue a pretie Iland. After theſe confluences, the maine courſe of the ſtreame hasteth by Shifford to Newbridge, where it ioineth with the Winruſh. The Winruſh riſeth aboue Shieburne in Glocеſterſhire, from whence it goeth to Winruſh, & cōming by Barrington, Burford, Widbrooke, Swinbecke caſtell, Witnecie, Duckington, Cockthorpe, Stanlake, it meeteth with the Iſis weſt by ſouth of Northmore. From hence it goeth beneath Stanton, Hartingcourt and Enſham, betweene which and Callinton, it receiueth (as Leland calleth it) the Bſuerne water.

Winruſh.

Bſuerne.

It riſeth aboue Limington, and going to Norton in the Marſh, and through a patch of Worceſterſhire vnto Euenlode, betweene it and the foure ſhire ſtones, it taketh in a rill called Come, comming by the long and the little Comptons. After this alſo it goeth by Bradwell, Odington, and ſo to Bleddenton, aboue which towne it taketh in the Kolrich water that iſſueth at two heads, in the hils that lie by weſt of little Kolrich, and ioine aboue Benkeham, and Church hill. From thence alſo it goeth vnto Bſuerne, Shipton vnderwood, Aſcot, Short hamton, Chorleburie, Corneburie parke, Stonfield, Longcombe, and ſoutheaſt of Woodſtocke parke, taketh in the Enis, that riſeth aboue Emſtone, and goeth to Tiddington, Glimton, Wotton (where it is increaſed with a rill that runneth thither from Steple Barton; by the Beechin tree) Woodſtocke, Blaidon, ſo that after this confluence, the ſaid Enis runneth to Callinton, and ſo into the Iſis, which goeth from hence to Orford, and there receiueth the Charwell, now preſentlie to be deſcribed.

Charwell.

The head of Charwell is in Northamptonſhire, where it riſeth out of a little pole, by Charleton village, ſeuen miles aboue Banberie northeaſt, and there it iſſueth ſo ſalt at the verie ſurge, that it groweth into a pretie ſtreame, in maner out of hand. Sone after alſo it taketh in a rillet called the Bure, which falleth into it, about Otmere ſide: but forasmuch as it riſeth by Bincеſter, the whole courſe thereof is not aboue foure miles, and therefore cannot be great. A friend of mine proſecuting the reſt of this deſcription reporteth thereof as followeth. Before the Charwell commeth into Orfordſhire, it receiueth the Culen, which falleth into the ſame, a little aboue Edgcote, and ſo deſcending toward Wardington, it meeteth with another comming from by north weſt, betweene Wardington and Cropreadie. At Banberie alſo it meeteth with the Come (which falleth from fennie Conton by Farneboro, and afterwards going by kings Sutton, not far from Aine, it receiueth the diſcharge of diuerſe rillets, in one bottome before it come at Cliffon. The ſaid water therefore ingendred of ſo manie brookelets, conſiſteth chiefelie of two, whereof the moſt ſoutherlie called Oke, commeth from Oke Norton, by Witchington or Wiggington, and the Berfords; and carieng a few blind rils withall, doth meet with the other that falleth from by northweſt into the ſame, within a mile of Charwell.

That other (as I coniecture) is increaſed of three waters, wherof each one hath his ſeuerall name. The firſt of them therefore hight Tudo, which comming betweene Epwell and the Lee by Toddington, ioineth about Broughton with the ſecond that runneth from Horneton, named Ornus, as I geſſe. The laſt falleth into the Tude or Tudelake, beneath Broughton; and for that it riſeth not far from Sotteſwell in Warwikeſhire, ſome are of the opinion, that it is to be called Sothbroke. The nert water that meeteth without Charwell beneath Cliffon commeth from about Croughton, and after this is the Solwar or Swere, that riſeth north of Pichaell Tew, and runneth by nether Wotton. The laſt of all is the Reie aliàs Bure, whoſe head is not far aboue Burceſter, aliàs Bincеſter, and Burneſter: and from whence it goeth by Bureceſter to Merton, Charleton, Fencote, Addington, Noke, Iſlip, and ſo into Charwell, that holdeth on his courſe after this augmentation of the waters, betweene Wood and Water Eton, to Marſton, and the eaſt bridge of Orford by Magdalene college, and ſo beneath the ſouth bridge into our aforeſaid Iſis.

In deſcribing this riuer, this one thing (right honorable) is come vnto my mind, touching the center and nauill as it were of England. Certes there is an hillie plot of ground in Helledon pariſh, not far from Danberie, where a man maie ſtand and behold the heads of three notable riuers, whoſe waters, and thoſe of ſuch as fall into them, do abundantlie ſerue the greateſt part of England on this ſide of the Humber. The firſt of theſe waters is the Charwell, alreadie deſcribed. The ſecond is the Leme that goeth weſtward into the fourth Auon. And the third is the head of the Pene or fift Auon it ſelfe, of whoſe courſes there is no card but doth make ſufficient mention; and therefore your honour maie behold in the ſame how they do coaſt the countrie, and alſo meaſure by compaſſes how this plot lieth in reſpect of all the reſt, contrarie to common iudgement, which maketh Northampton to be the middeſt and center of our countrie.

Middeſt of England whereabouts.

But to go forward with my deſcription of the Duſe, which being paſt Orford goeth to Iſlie, Kennington, Sanford, Rodeie, Newnham, and ſo to Abington, ſomtime called Senlham, without increaſe, where it receiueth the Oche, otherwiſe called the Coche, a little beneath S. Helens, which runneth thither of two brooklets, as I take it, whereof one commeth from Compton, out of the vale and weſt of the hill of the White horſſe, the other from Kings Letcombe, and Wantage in Barkſhire, and in one chanell, entreth into the ſame, vpon the right ſide of his courſe. From Abington likewiſe (taking the Arun withall ſouthweſt of Sutton Courtneie) it goeth by Appleford, long Wittenham, Cliffon, Wittenham the leſſe, & beneath Dorcheſter, taketh in the Thame water, from whence the Iſis loſeth the prehemineence of the whole denomination of this riuer, and is contented to impart the ſame with the Thame, ſo that by the conjunction of theſe two waters Thameſis is produced, and that name continued euen vnto the ſea.

from the ſtone bꝛidge, that is betwæne Querendon and Ailſburie (after the courſe of the water) as Leland hath ſet downe. Running therefoꝛe by long Perſton, and Puttenham, Hucket, and Bearton, it receiueth ſoone after a rill that commeth by Querendon from Hardwike, and yet long an other on the other ſide that riſeth aboue Windouer in the Chilterne, and paſſing by Halton, Weſton, Turrill, Bꝛoughton, and Ailſburie, it falleth into the Tame weſt of the ſaid towne (except my memoꝛie dow faile me. From this confluence the Tame goeth by Ethoꝛpe, the Winchingtons, Coddington, Cherſleie, Notleie abbeie: and comming almoſt to Tame, it receiueth one water from ſoutheaſt aboue the ſaid towne, and another alſo from the ſame quarter beneath the towne; ſo that Tame ſtandeth inuironed vpon thꝛée ſides with thꝛée ſeuerall waters, as maie be eaſilie ſéene. The firſt of theſe commeth from the Chiltern eaſt of Below oꝛ Bledlow, from whence it goeth to Hinton, Hoꝛſenden, Kingſeie, Towſeie, and ſo into the Tame. The other deſcendeth alſo from the Chilterne, and going by Chinner, Crowell, Siddenham, and Tame parke, it falleth in the end into Tame water, and then they pꝛoceéd togither as one by Shabbington, Ricot parke, Dꝛacot, Waterſtoke, Milton, Cuddeſdon, and Chiſelton. Here alſo it taketh in another water from by-eaſt, whoſe head commeth from Chilterne hils, not farre from Stocking church, in the waie from Oxford to London. From whence it runneth to Weſton (and méeting beneath Curham with Watlington rill) it goeth on to Chalgraue, Stadham, and ſo into the Tame. From hence our ſtreame of Thame runneth to Newenton, Dꝛaton, Doꝛcheſter (ſometime a biſhops ſée, and a noble citie) and ſo into the Thames, which falleth in like ſoꝛt to Benſington, Crowmarſh, oꝛ Wallingfoꝛd, where it receiueth the Blaue, deſcending from Blaueburg, now Blewberie, as I learne.

Wlsings.

Thus haue I bꝛought the Thames vnto Wallingfoꝛd, ſituate in the vale of White hoꝛſe that runneth a long therby. From hence it goeth by Newenham, noꝛth Stoke, ſouth Stoke, Goꝛing, Baſſilden, Pangburne, where it mæteth with a water that commeth from about Hamſted Moꝛris, runneth by Fꝛiꝛelham, Buckelburie, Stanfoꝛd, Bꝛadfeld, Tidmarſh and Pangburne. After which confluence it goeth on betwæne Mapledoꝛham and Purleie, to Cauerſham, and Cauerſham manour, and a little beneath receiueth the Kenet that commeth thereinto from Reading.

Cenethus.

The Kenet riſeth aboue Duerton 5 oꝛ 6 miles weſt of Marleboꝛow, oꝛ Marlingſboꝛow, as ſome call it; & then going by Fifeld, Clatfoꝛ, Paulon, & Pꝛeſhute, vnto Marleburie: it holdeth on in like oꝛder to Ramſburie, and noꝛthweſt of little Cote, taketh in a water by noꝛth deſcending from the hilles aboue Alburne chaſe weſt of Alburne town. Thence it runneth to little Cote, Charnhamſtꝛéet, & beneth Charnhamſtꝛéet it croſſeth the Bedwin, which (taking the Chalkburne rill withall) commeth from great Bedwyne, & at Hungerfoꝛd alſo two other in one botom ſomewhat beneath the towne. From hence it goeth to Auington, Kinburie, Hamſted marſhall, Euburne, Newberie; and beneath this towne, taketh in the Lamburne water that commeth by Iſberie, Egerſton, the Sheffoꝛds, Weſtfoꝛd, Boꝛfoꝛd, Donington caſtell, and Shaw. From Newberie it goeth to Thatcham, Wolhampton, Aldermaſton, a little aboue which village it receiueth the Alburne, another bꝛoke increaſed with ſundꝛie rils: and thus going on to Padwoꝛth, Okton, and Michaell, it commeth at laſt to Reading, where (as I ſaid) it ioineth with the Thames, and ſo they go foꝛward as one by Sonning to Shiplake, and there on the eaſt ſide receiue the Loddon that commeth downe thither from the ſouth, as by his courſe appéeꝛeth.

Bꝛdwine. Chalkeburne. Lamburne. Alburnus.

The Loddon riſeth in Hamſhire betwæne weſt Shirburne and Wꝛoton toward the ſouthweſt, afterward directing his courſe toward the noꝛthweſt, thoꝛough the Vine, it paſſeth at the laſt by Bꝛamlie, and thoꝛough a pæce of Wiltſhire, to Stradfield, Swallowfield, Arberfield, Loddon bꝛidge, leauing a patch of Wiltſhire on the right hand (as I haue béene informed.) This Loddon not far from Turges towne receiueth two waters in one bottome, whereof the weſterlie called Baſing water, commeth from Baſingſtoke, and thoꝛough a parke vnto the afoꝛeſaid place.

Lodunus.

The other deſcendeth of two heads from Mapledoꝛ well, and goeth by Skewes, Newenham, Rotherwiſe, and yet it come at Hartlie, ioineth with the Baſing water, from whence they go togither to Turges, where they méet with the Loddon (as I haue ſaid alreadie.) The next ſtreame toward the ſouth is called Ditſoꝛd bꝛoke. It riſeth not farre from Upton, goeth by Gruell, and beneath Wharnboꝛow caſtell receiueth the Ikell (comming from a parke of the ſame denomination) from whence they go togither by Maddingleie vnto Swalowfield, and ſo into the Loddon. In this voiage alſo the Loddon mæteth with the Elwie oꝛ Elueie that commeth from Alderſhare, not farre by weſt of Euerſleie: and about Eluetham likewiſe with another running from Dogmanſfield named the Douke: and alſo the third not inferioꝛ to the reſt comming from Erin, whoſe head is in Surreie, and going by Aſh becommeth a limit, firſt betwæne Surreie and Hamſhire; then betwæne Hamſhire and Barkeſhire, and paſſing by Aſh, Erinleie, Blacke water, Perleie, and Finchamſted; it ioineth at laſt with the Ditſoꝛd, before it come at Swalowfield. To conclude therefoꝛe with our Loddon, hauing receiued all theſe waters; and after the laſt confluence with them now being come to Loddon bꝛidge, it paſſeth on by a part of Wiltſhire to Twifoꝛd bꝛidge, then to Wargraue, and ſo into the Thames that now is maruellouſlie increaſed and growen vnto triple greatneſſe (to that it was at Oxford.)

Ditis vadum. Ikelus. Elueius. Ducus. Erin.

Being therefoꝛe paſt Shiplake and Wargraue, it runneth by Hoꝛſependon, oꝛ Harding: then to Henleie vpon Thames, where ſometime a great rill voideth it ſelfe in the ſame. Then to Remenham, Greneland (going all this waie from Shiplake iuſt noꝛth, and now turning eaſtwards againe) by Medenham, Hurleie, Bilham, Marlow the greater, Marlow the leſſe, it mæteth with a bꝛoke ſone after that conſiſteth of the water of two rilles, whereof the one called the Uſe, riſeth about weſt Wickham, out of one of the Chilterne hilles, and goeth from thence to eaſt Wickham oꝛ high Wickham, a pꝛetie market towne. The other named Higden, deſcendeth alſo from thoſe mountaines but a mile beneath weſt Wickham, and ioining both in one at the laſt, in the weſt end of eaſt Wickham towne, they go togither to Wlowburne, Hedſoꝛ, & ſo into the Thames. Some call it the Tide; and that woꝛd dow I vſe in my foꝛmer treatiſe: but to pꝛoceéd. After this confluence our Thames goeth on by Cowkham, Topleie, Maidenhead, alias Sudlington, Bꝛaie, Doꝛneie, Clure, new Windſoꝛ (taking in neuertheleſſe, at Eaton by the waie, the Burne which riſeth out of a Moꝛe, & commeth thither by Burnham) old Windſoꝛ, Wꝛaiboꝛow, and a little by eaſt therof doth croſſe the Cole, whereof I find this ſhoꝛt deſcription inſuing.

Uſa. Higden.

The Cole riſeth néere vnto Flamſted, from whence it goeth to Redburn, S. Michaels, S. Albons, Aldenham, Watfoꝛd, and ſo by Moꝛe to Richmanſwoꝛth, where there is a confluence of thꝛée waters, of which Colus, alias Vere and Uertume.

Gadus. which this Cole is the firſt. The ſecond called Gadus riſeth not farre from Alhridge, an houſe or palace belonging to the prince: from whence it runneth to great Gaddesdin, Hemſted, betweene Kings Langleie, and Abbots Langleie, then to Hunters, and Caſhew bridges, and ſo to Richmanſworth, receiuing by the waie a rill comming from Alburie by northwell, to Northchurch, Barkehamſted, and beneath Hemſted ioining with the ſame. The laſt commeth in at northweſt from aboue Chelham, by Chelham it ſelfe, then by Chelham Bois, Latimers, Mawdlens, Cheinies, Sarret and Richmanſworth, and ſo going on all in one chanell vnder the name of Cole, it runneth to Vrbridge, where it taketh in the Miſſenden water, from northweſt, which riſing aboue Miſſenden the greater goeth by Miſſenden the leſſe, Hagmondeſham (now Hammerſham) the Vach, Chalkhunt Giles, Chalkhunt S. Peters, Denham, and then into the Cole aboue Vrbridge (as I haue ſaid.) Sone after this our Cole doth part it ſelfe into two branches, neuer to ioine againe before they come at the Thames, for the greater of them goeth thorough the goodlie medows ſtraight to Colebrooke, the other vnto two milles, a mile and a halfe eaſt of Colebrooke, in the waie to London, leauing an Iland betweene them of no ſmall ſize and quantitie.

Windeles. Being paſt the Cole, we come to the fall of the Windeles, which riſeth by northweſt néere vnto Bagſhot, from whence it goeth to Windleſham, Chobham, and méeting with a brooklet comming weſtward from Bigleie, they run togither toward Cherteſeie, where when they haue met with a ſmall rill riſing north of Sonning hill in Windleſoure great parke, it falleth into the Thames on the northeaſt ſide of Cherteſeie. When we were come beyond this water, it was not long yer we came vnto another on the ſame ſide, that fell into the Thames betweene Shepperton on the one ſide, and Oteland on the other, and is called the Waie. The Weie or the Waie riſing by weſt, commeth from Milford, & ſone after taking the Hedleie brooke withall (which riſeth in Wulmere forreſt, and goeth by Hedleie and Frenſham) haſteth by Bentleie, Farnham, Alton, Waiberleie, Elſted, and ſo to Pepper harrow, where it ioineth with the Thureſbie water, which commeth not farre off from a village of the ſame denomination. From hence alſo it goeth to Godalming, and then toward Shawford, but yer it come there, it croſſeth Craulie becke, which riſing ſomewhere about the edge of Suſſer ſhort of Ridgewie, goeth by Wacherie parke, Knoll, Craulie, Bramleie, Wonarſh, and ſo into the Waie. From hence then our riuer goeth to Shawford, and ſone after (méeting with the Abbinger water that commeth by Shere, Albirie, and the chappell on the hill) it proceedeth to Guldeford, thence to Stoke, Sutton in the parke, Send, Woking, and at Newarke parke ſide taketh in a brooke that riſeth of two heads, whereof one doth ſpring betweene two hils north of Pepper harrow, and ſo runneth thorough Henleie parke, the other aboue Purbright, and afterward ioining in one, they go forth vnto Newarke, and being there vnited, after the confluence it goeth to Purford court, to Biſier, Wanford, Oteland, and ſo into the Thames.

Weie. Thureſbie. Crawleie. Abbinger.

Molis. From Oteland the Thames goeth by Walton, Sunburie, weſt Moulſeie, Hampton, and yer it come at Hampton court on the northſide, and eaſt Moulſeie on the other, it taketh in the Moule water, which giueth name vnto the two townes that ſtand on each ſide of the place, where it falleth into our ſtreame. It riſeth in Wood forreſt, and going by Burſtow, it méeteth afterward with another gullet, conteining a ſmall courſe from two ſeuerall heads, whereof one is alſo in the forreſt aforenamed, the other runneth from Febuſh wood, and comming by Iſeld, méeteth with the firſt aboue Horleie, and ſo run on in one chanell, I ſaie, till they ioine with the Moule water, whereof I ſpake before.

After this confluence in like ſort, it is not long yer the Moule take in another from by north, which commeth from about Nelham on the one ſide, and another on the other ſide, running by Ockleie and Capell, and whereinto alſo a branch or rill commeth from a wood on the northweſt part. Finallie, being thus increaſed with theſe manie rilles, it goeth by eaſt Bechewoorth, weſt Bechewoorth, and ouer againſt the Swalow on the ſide of Mzake hill, taking in another that cõmeth thither from Wotton by Darking and Milton, it runneth to Nickleham, Letherhed, Stoke, Cobham, Aſhire parke, eaſt Moulſeie, and ſo into the Thames, which after this coniunction goeth on to Kingſton, and there alſo méeteth with another becke, riſing at Ewell ſouth of Nonſuch. Certes, this rill goeth from Ewell by the old parke, then to Hauldon, & ſo to Kingſton towne. The Thames in like maner being paſt Kingſton, goeth to Tuddington, Peterſham, Twickenham, Richmond, and Shene, where it receiueth a water on the northweſt ſide, which comming from about Harrow on the hill, and by weſt of the ſame, goeth by Hales, Harlington, Felthan, and Thiſtleworth into the Thames.

The next fall of water is at Sion, néere vnto new Brainford, ſo that it iſſueth into the Thames betweene them both. This water is called Brane, that is in the Britiſh tong (as Leland ſaith) a frog. It riſeth about Edgeworth, and commeth from thence by Kingeſburie, Twiford, Perſuall, Yanwell, and Auſterleie. Thence we followed our riuer to old Brentford, Northlach, Cheſwic, Barnelmes, Fulham, and Putneie, beneath which townes it croſſed a becke from Wandleſworth, that riſeth at Woodmans turne, and going by Eaſthalton, méeteth another comming from Croidon by Bedington, and ſo going on to Mitcham, Parton abbeie, and Wandleſworth, it is not long yer it fall into the Thames. Next vnto this is Mariburne rill on the other ſide, which commeth in by S. James, ſo that by this time we haue either brought the Thames, or the Thames conueied vs to London, where we reſted for a ſeaſon to take view of the ſeuerall tides there, of which each one differeth from other, by foure & twentie minuts, that is fortie eight in a whole daie, as I haue noted before, except the wether alter them. Being paſt London, and in the waie toward the ſea: the firſt water that it méeteth withall, is the Bromc on Kent ſide, weſt of Grœnewich, whoſe head is Bromis in Bromleie pariſh, and going from thence to Lewcham, it taketh in a water from by eaſt, and ſo directeth his courſe forth right vnto the Thames.

Brane. Mariburne. Bromis.

The next water that it méeteth withall, is on Eſſex ſide, almoſt againſt Woolwich, and that is the Lée or Luie, whoſe head riſeth ſhort of Kempton in Hertfordſhire, foure miles ſoutheaſt of Luton, ſometime called Logodunum or Logrodunum, & going thorough a peece of Brokehall parke (leauing Woodhall parke on the north, and Hatfield on the ſouth, with another parke adioining) it goeth toward Hartford towne. But yer it come there, it receiueth a water (peraduenture the Marran) riſing at northweſt in Brode-water hundred, from aboue Welwin, northeaſt of Digeſwell, and going to Hartingfeld burie, where the ſaid confluence is within one mile of the towne. Beneath Hatfield alſo it receiueth the Beane (as I geſſe) comming from Borwood by Benington, Aſton, Watton, and Stapleford, and a little lower, the third arme of increaſe from aboue Ware, which deſcendeth from two heads: whereof the greateſt commeth meth from Barkewaie in Edwinſter hundred, the other Sandon in Oddeſey hundred, and after they be met beneath little Hornemeade, they go togither by Pulcherchurth, or Puckrich, Stonden, Thunderidge Wadeſmill, Benghow, and ſo into the Lée, which from hence runneth on till it come at Ware, which was drowned by the rage of the ſame 1408, and ſo to Amwell, where on the north ſide it receiueth the water that commeth from little Hadham, through a peece of Singlethall parke, then by great Hadham, and ſo from Widford to the aforeſaid towne. From hence alſo they go as one to old Stanſted called Le Veil, branching in ſuch wiſe yer it come there, that it runneth through the towne in ſundrie places. Thence it goeth forth to Abbats Stanſted, beneath which it méeteth with the Stoure, weſt (as I remember) of Roidon. This Sture riſeth at Wenden lotes, from whence it goeth to Langleie, Clauering, Berden, Manhuden, & Birchanger (where it taketh a rill comming from Elſingham, & Stanſted Mountfitchet.) Thence it hieth on to Biſhops Stourford, Sabrichford, and beneath this towne croſſeth with another from the eaſt ſide of Elſingham, that goeth to Hatfield, Brodocke, Shiring, Harlo, & ſo into the Stoure, and from whence they go togither to Eaſtwic, Parmedon, and next into the Lée. Theſe things being thus performed, the Lée runneth on beneath Hoddeſdon, Broxburne, and Wormleie, where a water breaketh out by weſt of the maine ſtreame, a mile lower than Wormeleie it ſelfe, but yet within the paroch, and is called Wormeleie locke. Sturius.

Lée. Logus. Marran. Beane.

It runneth alſo by Cheſton nunrie, and out of this a little beneath the ſaid houſe, breaketh an arme called the Shirelake, becauſe it diuideth Eaſtſex and Hartford ſhire in ſunder, and in the length of one medow called Fritheie. This lake runneth not but at great flouds, and méeteth againe with a ſuccor of ditchwater, at a place called Hockeſdich, halfe a mile from his firſt breaking out, and halfe a mile lower at Marſh point ioineth againe with the ſtreame from whence it came before. Thence commeth the firſt arme to S. Paulie bridge (the firſt bridge weſtward vpon that riuer) vpon Waltham cauſie, & halfe a mile lower than Paulie bridge, at the corner of Ramnie mead, it méeteth with the kings ſtreame & principall courſe of Luy, or Lée, as it is commonlie called. The ſecond arme breaketh out of the kings ſtreame at Halifield halfe a mile lower than Cheſton nunrie, and ſo to the fulling mill, and two bridges by weſt of the kings ſtreame, wherinto it falleth about a ſtones caſt lower at a place called Malkins ſhelfe, except I was wrong informed. Cheſton & Hartfordſhire men do ſais, that the kings ſtreame at Waltham doth part Hartfordſhire and Eſſex, but the Eſſex men by forreſt charter do plead their liberties to hold vnto S. Paulies bridge. On the eaſt ſide alſo of the kings ſtreame breaketh out but one principall arme at Halifield, three quarters of a mile aboue Waltham, & ſo goeth to the corne mill in Waltham, and then to the B. ſtreame againe a little beneath the kings bridge.

From hence the Lée runneth on by ſouth on Waltonſtow till it come to Stretford Langthorne, where it brancheth partlie of it ſelfe, and partlie by mans induſtrie for mils. Howbeit herein the dealing of Alfred (ſometimes king of England) was not of ſmalleſt force, who vnderſtanding the Danes to be gotten vp with their ſhips into the countrie, thereto kill and ſlaie his ſubiects, in the yeere of grace 896, by the conduct of this riuer: he in the meane time before they could returne, did ſo mightilie weaken the maine chanell, by drawing great numbers of trenches from the ſame; that when they purpoſed to come backe, there was nothing ſo much water left as the ſhips did draw: wherefore being ſet on ground, they Alfred.

were ſome fired, & the aduerſaries ouercome. By this policie alſo much medow ground was wone, & made firme land, whereby the countrie about was not a little inriched, as was alſo a part of Aſſyria by the like practiſe of Cyrus with the Ganges, at ſuch time as he came againſt Babylon, which riuer before time was in maner equall with Euphrates. For he was ſo offended, that one of his knights whom he loued déerlie, was drowned and borne awaie with the water in his paſſage ouer the ſame, that he ſware a déepe oth yer long to make it ſo ſhallow that it ſhould not wet a woman to the knées. Which came to paſſe, for he cauſed all his armie to dig 46 new draines frō the ſame, wherby the vow that he had made was at the full performed. Senec. de Tra. li. 3. But to conclude with the Lée that ſomtime ouerflowed all thoſe medowes, through which it paſſeth (as for a great waie not inferior to the Thames) and I find that being paſt Weſtham, it is not long yer it fall into that ſtreame. One thing I read more of this riuer before the conqueſt, that is, how Edward the firſt, & ſonne of Alfred, in the yeare of grace 912, builded Hartford towne: at which time alſo he had Wittham a towne in Eſſex in hand, as his ſiſter called Aelfled repaired Oxford & London, and all this foure yeares before the building of Maldon, of ſome called Hertford or Herudford betweene three waters, that is, the Lée, the Beneſuth, and Pemmarran, or rather Penmarran: but how theſe waters are diſtinguiſhed in theſe daies, as yet I cannot tell. It is poſſible, that the Bene may be the ſame which commeth by Benington, and Benghow: which if it be ſo, then muſt the Pemmarran be the ſame that deſcendeth from Whitwell, for not farre from thence is Branfield, which might in time paſt right well be called Parranfield, for of like inuerſion of names I could ſhew manie examples.

Being paſt the Lée (whoſe chanell is begun to be purged 1576, with further hope to bring the ſame to the north ſide of London) we come vnto the Rodon, vpon Eſſex ſide in like maner, and not verie farre (for foure miles is the moſt) from the fall of the Lée. This water riſeth at little Canfield, from whence it goeth to great Canfield, high Roding, Eithorpe Roding, Ledon Roding, White Roding, Beauchampe Roding, Fifeld, Shelleie, high Ongar, and Cheping Ongar, where the Lauer falleth into it, that ariſeth betwixt Hatching and high Lauer: and taking another rill withall comming from aboue Northweld at Cheping Ongar, they ioine (I ſaie) with the Rodon, after which confluence Leland conjecteth that the ſtreame is called Juell: for my part, I wot not what to ſay of it. But héerof I am ſure, that the whole courſe being paſt Ongar, it goeth to Stanſted riuers, Theidon mount, Hetbridge, Chigwell, Woodford bridge, Ilford bridge, Barking, & ſo into the Thames. Rodon or Rodunus. Lauer. Iuelus.

The Darwent méeteth with our ſaid Thames vpon Kents ſide, two miles and more beneath Erith. It riſeth at Tanridge, or there abouts, as I haue béene informed by Chriſtopher Saxtons card late made of the ſame, and the like (I hope) he will do in all the ſeuerall ſhires of England at the infinit charges of ſir Thomas Sackford knight, & maiſter of the requeſts, whoſe zeale vnto his countrie héerin I cannot but remember, & ſo much the rather, for that he meaneth to imitate Ortelius, & ſomewhat beſide this hath holpen me in the names of the townes, by which theſe riuers for the Kentiſh part do run. Would to God his plats were once finiſhed for the reſt! But to proceed. The Darwent therefore, riſing at Tanridge, goeth on by Titſeie toward Braſted, and receiuing on ech ſide of that towne (& ſeuerall bankes) a riuer or rill, it goeth on to Rockhold, Shorham, Kinſford, Horton, Darnhith, Dartford or Derwentford, & there taking in the Craie on the left hand that coms from Orpington by Darwent. Craie.

Marie Crale, Paules Crale, North Crale, and Crailford, it is not long yer it fall into the Thames. But after I had once passed the fall of the broke, it is a world to see what plentie of Serephium groweth vpon the Kentish shore, in whose description Fuichsius hath not a little halted; whilest he giueth forth the hearbe Argentaria for Serephium, betweene which there is no maner of likelihood. This neuertheless is notable in the said hearbe, that being translated into the garden, it receiueth another forme cleane different from the first, which it yelded when it grew vpon the shore, and therevnto appeareth of more fat & soggie substance. Which maketh me to thinke that our physicians do take it for a distinct kind of wormewood, whereof controuersie ariseth among them. The next water that falleth into the Thames, is west of the Maule Iles, a rill of no great fame, neither long course, for rising about Cozingham, it runneth not manie miles east and by south, yer it fall into the mouth of this riuer, which I do now describe.

I would haue spoken of one creeke that commeth in at Cliffe, and another that runneth downe from Halstlo by S. Maries: but sith I vnderstand not with what backewaters they be serued, I let them passe as not skilfull of their courses. And thus much of the riuers that fall into the Thames, wherein I haue done what I maie, but not what I would for mine owne satisfaction, till I came from the head to Lechlade, vnto which, as in lieu of a farewell, I will ascribe that distichon which Apollonius Rhodius writeth of the Thermodon:

Hinc non est aliud flumen par, nec tot in agros
Fellum dimittit riuos quot fundit vtrinque.

Midwaie. Next vnto the Thames we haue the Midwaie water, whereof I find two descriptions, the first beginneth thus. The Midwaie water is called in Latine Mœdeuia (as some write) because the course therof is midwaie in a manner betweene London and Dorobernia, or (as we now call it) Canturburie. In British it hight Dourbrée: and thereof Rochester was sometime called Durobrenum. But in an old charter which I haue seene (conteining a donation sometime made to the monasterie of saint Andrews there by Ceadwalla) I find that the Saxons called this riuer Wedring; and also a towne standing betweene Malling and east Farlete, Wedrington; and finallie, a forrest also of the same denomination, Wedrington, now Waterdon, wherby the originall name appeareth to be fetched from this streame. It ariseth in Waterdon forrest east of Whetlin or Wedring, and ioineth with another broke that descendeth from Ward forrest in Suller: and after this confluence they go on togither, as one by Aghhirst, where hauing receiued also the second broke, it hasteth to Pensherst, and there carrieth withall the Eden, that commeth from Lingfield parke. After this it goeth to the southeast part of Kent, and taketh with it the Frith or Firth, on the northwest side, and an other little streame that commeth from the hilles, betweene Peuenburie and Horsemon on the southeast. From thence also, and not farre from Malling it receiueth the Theise (a prettie streame that ariseth about Theise Hirst) & afterward the Gran or Crane, which hauing his head not farre from Cranbrooke, and meeting with sundrie other riuelets by the waie, whereof one branch of Theise is the last, for it parteth at the Twist, and including a prettie Iland, doth ioine with the said Midwaie, a little aboue Malding, and then with the Lowse. Finallie at Maidstone it meeteth with another broke, whose name I know not, and then passeth by Allington, Duton, Newhide, Halling, Cuckestane, Rochester, Chatham, Gillingham, Upchurch, Kingsferrie, and falleth into the maine sea betweene Shepeie and the Grane.

Frethus.

Theise. Grane alias Cranus.

And thus much out of the first author, who commendeth it also, for that in time past it did yeeld such plentie of sturgeon, as beside the kings portion, and a due vnto the archbishop of Canturburie out of the same, the deane and chapter of Rochester had no small allowance also of that commoditie: likewise for the shrimps that are taken therein, which are no lesse esteemed of in their kind, than the westerne smelts or flounders taken in the Thames, &c. The second author describeth it after this manner, and more copiouslie than the other.

The cheefe head of this streame riseth in Waterdon forrest, from whence after it hath runne a prettie waie still within the same, east of Whetlin, it meeteth with a broke, whose head is in Ward forrest, southwest of Grenested, which goeth to Hartfield, and so to Whetlin, and yer long ioineth with the Midwaie. After this confluence it is not long yer it take in another by-west from Cowden ward, and the third aboue Pensherst, growing from two heads, whereof one is in Lingfield parke, the other west of Crawherst; and ioining aboue Edenbridge, it doth fall into the midwaie beneath Heuer towne, and Chiddingston. From Pensherst our maine streame hasteth to Ligh, Tunbridge, and Twidleie, and beneath the towne, it crosseth a water from North, whereof one head is at the Mote, another at Wroteham, the third at west Peckham, & likewise another from southest, that runneth east of Capell. Next after this it receiueth the Theie, whose forked head is at Theise Hirst, which descending downe toward the north, taketh in not farre from Scotnie a broke out of the northside of Waterden forrest, whose name I find not, except it be the Dour. After this confluence our riuer goeth to Goldhirst, and comming to the Twist, it bifurcheth in such wise, that one part of it runneth into Midwaie, another into the Garan, or rather Cranebrooke (if my coniecture be anie thing.) The Garan (as Leland calleth it) or the Crane (as I do take it) riseth neere to Cranebrooke, and going by Sillinghirst, it receiueth yer long one water that commeth by Fretingdon, and another that runneth from great Chard by Smerdon, and Hedcorne, crossing two rilles by the waie from by north, Hedcorne it selfe standing betweene them both. Finallie, the Garan or Crane meeting with Midwaie south of Malling, they on the one side, and the Theie on the other, leaue a prettie Iland in the middest, of foure miles in length, and two in breadth, wherein is some hillie soile, but neither towne nor village, so farre as I remember.

Garanus, Cranus.

From Malling forward, the Midwaie goeth to west Farlegh, east Farlegh: and yer it come at Maidstone, it interteineth a rill that riseth short of Ienham, and goeth by Ledes and Otteringden, which is verie beneficiall to clothiers in drie yeeres: for thither they conueie their clothes to be thicked at the fulling milles, sometimes ten miles for the same: there is also at Ledes great plentie of fulling earth, which is a necessarie commoditie.

Being past Maidstone, it runneth by Allington, Snodland, Halling, Cuckstane, and Rochester, where it passeth vnder a faire bridge of stone, with a verie swift course, which bridge was begun 1388 by the lord John Cobham, the ladie Margaret his wife, and the valiant sir Robert Knolles, who gaue the first onset vpon that peece of worke, and therevnto builded a chapell of the Trinitie at the end therof, in testimonie of his pietie. In processe of time also one John Warner of Rochester made the new coping thereof; and archbishop Warham of Canturburie the iron barres: the bishops also of that see were not slacke in their beneuolence and furtherances toward that

that worke, eſpeciallie Walter Merton founder of Merton college in Oxford, who by miſfortune periſhed by falling from the ſame, as he rode to ſurueie the workemen. Being paſt Rocheſter, this noble riuer goeth to Chatham, Gillingham, Apchurin, and ſonne after branching, it imbraceth the Greene at his fall, as his two heads do Aſhdon forreſt, that lieth betweene them both.

Of ſuch ſtreames as fall into the ſea, betweene the Thames and the mouth of the Sauerne.

Chap. 12.

Stoure.

AFter the Midwaie we haue the Stoure that riſeth at Ringeſwood, which is fourteene or fifteene miles from Canturburie. This riuer paſſeth by Aſhford, Wie, Nackington, Canturburie, Fordiſh, Standiſh, and Sturemouth, where it receiueth another riuer growing of three branches. After our Stoure or Sture parteth it ſelf in twaine, & in ſuch wiſe, that one arme therof goeth toward the north, and is called (when it commeth at the ſea) the north mouth of Stoure; the other runneth ſoutheaſtward vp to Richborow, and ſo to Sandwich, from whence it goeth northeaſt againe and falleth into the ſea. The iſſue of this later tract is called the hauen of Sandwich. And peraduenture the ſtreame that commeth downe thither, after the diuiſion of the Stoure, maie be the ſame which Beda calleth Wantſome; but as I cannot vndo this knot at will, ſo this is certeine, that the Stoure on the one ſide, and peraduenture, the Wantſome on the other, parteth and cutteth the Tenet from the maine land of Kent, whereby it is left for an Iland.

Mailburne water alſo (as I heare) neer to Cantwarburie, but I wote not whereabouts: ſee Marianus Scotus.

Wantſome.

There are other little brookes which fall into the Stoure, whereof Leland ſpeaketh, as Filhpole becke that ariſeth in Stonehirſt wood, and meeteth with it foure miles from Canturburie: another beginneth at Chiſlet, and goeth into the Stoure gut, which ſometime incloſed Thanet, as Leland ſaith: the third iſſueth out of the ground at Northburne (where Eadbert of Kent ſometime paſt held his palace) and runneth to Sandwich hauen, as the ſaid authour reporteth: and the fourth called Bridgewater that riſeth by S. Marie Burne church, and going by Biſhops Burne, meeteth with Canturburie water at Stourmouth: alſo Witham that riſeth aboue Witham ſhort of Adſam, and falleth into Bridgewater at Dudmill, or Wenderton: and the third nameleſſe, which riſeth ſhort of Wodenſburgh (a towne wherein Hengiſt & the Saxons honored their grand idoll Woden, or Odhine) and goeth by Staple to Wingam: but ſith they are obſcure I will not touch them here. From hence paſſing by the Godwine, a plot verie perilous for ſea-faring men (ſometime firme land, that is, vntill the tenth of the conquerours ſonne, whoſe name was William Rufus, and wherein a great part of the inheritance of erle Godwine in time paſt was knowne to lie) but eſcaping it with eaſe, we came at length to Douer. In all which voiage we found no ſtreame, by reaſon of the cliffes that inuiron the ſaid coaſt. Howbeit vpon the ſouth ſide of Douer, there is a prettie freſh riuer, whoſe head ariſeth at Erwell, not paſſing foure miles from the ſea, and of ſome is called Dour, which in the Britiſh tong is a common name for waters, as is alſo the old Britiſh word Auon for the greateſt riuers, into whoſe mouthes or falles ſhippes might find ſafe entrance; and therefore ſuch are in my time called hauens, a new word growen by an aſpiration added to the old: the Scots call it Auen. But more of this elſe-where, ſith I am now onelie to ſpeake of Dour, whereof it is likelie that the towne & caſtell of Douer did ſometime take the name. From hence we go toward the Camber (omitting peraduenture here and there ſundrie ſmall creeks void of backwater by the waie) whereabouts the Rother a noble riuer falleth into the ſea. This Rother ſeparateth Suſſex from Kent, and hath his head in Suſſex, not farre from Argas hill neere to Waterden forreſt, and from thence directeth his courſe vnto Rotherfield. After this it goeth to Ethlingham or Hitchingham, and ſo forth by Newendon vnto Natham ferrie, where it diuideth it ſelfe in ſuch wiſe, that one branch thereof goeth to Appledoure (where is a caſtell ſometime builded by the Danes, in the time of Alfred, as they did erect another at Middleton, and the third at Beamflete) and at this towne, where it meeteth the Bilie that riſeth about Bilſington, the other by Iden, ſo that it includeth a fine parcell of ground called Orneie, which in time paſt was reputed as a parcell of Suſſex; but now vpon ſome occaſion or other (to me vnknowne) annexed vnto Kent. From hence alſo growing into ſome greatneſſe, it runneth to Rie, where it meeteth finallie with the Becke, which commeth from Beckleie: ſo that the plot wherein Rie ſtandeth, is in manner a by-land or peninſula, as experience doth confirme. Leland and moſt men are of the likelieſt opinion, that this riuer ſhould be called the Limen, which (as Peter of Cornhull ſaith) doth iſſue out of Andredeſwald, where the head thereof is knowne to be. Certes, I am of the opinion, that it is called the Rother vnto Appledoure, & from thence the Limen, becauſe the Danes are noted to enter into theſe parts by the Limen; and ſailing on the ſame to Appledoure, did there begin to fortifie, as I haue noted alreadie. Howbeit, in our time it is knowne by none other name than the Rother or Appledoure water, whereof let this ſuffice.

Being thus croſſed ouer to the weſt ſide of Rie hauen, & in viewing the iſſues that fall into the ſame, I met firſt of all with a water that groweth of two brookes, which come downe by one chanell into the eaſt ſide of the mouth of the ſaid port. The firſt therfore that falleth into it deſcendeth from Beckleie or thereabouts (as I take it) the next runneth along by Peſemarſh, & ſoone after ioining with all, they hold on as one, till they fall into the ſame at the weſterlie ſide of Rie: the third ſtreame commeth from the north, and as it mounteth vp not farre from Munfield, ſo it runneth betweene Seſcambe and Wacklinton neere vnto Bread, taking another rill withall that riſeth (as I heare) not verie far from Weſtfield. There is likewiſe a fourth that groweth of two heads betweene Jelingham and Pet, and going by Winchelſeie it meeteth with all about Rie hauen, ſo that Winchelſeie ſtandeth inuironed on three parts with water, and the ſtreames of theſe two that I haue laſt rehearſed.

The water that falleth into the Ocean, a mile by ſouthweſt of Haſtings, or therabouts, is called Æſtus or Aſten: perhaps of Haſten or Haſting the Dane, (who in time paſt was a plague to France and England) & riſing not far from Penhirſt, it meeteth with the ſea (as I heare) by eaſt of Hollington. Bulnerhith is but a creeke (as I remember) ſerued with no backewater; and ſo I heare of Codding or Old hauen, wherefore I meane not to touch them.

Into Pevenſeie hauen diuerſe waters do reſort, and of theſe, that which entereth into the ſame on the eaſt ſide riſeth out from two heads, whereof the moſt eaſterlie is called Aſh, the next vnto the Burne, and vniting themſelues not farre from Aſhburne, they continue their courſe vnder the name and title of Aſhburne water, as I read. The ſecond that commeth thereinto iſſueth alſo of two heads, whereof the one is ſo manie miles from Boxeham, the other not far from the Parke eaſt of Yellingſtowne, and both of them concurring ſouthweſt of Hirſtmowſen, they direct their courſe toward Peuenſeie (beneath which they meet with another riſing at Foington) and thence go in one chanell for a mile or more, till they fall togither into Peuenſeie hauen. The Cuckmer iſſueth out at ſeuerall places, and hereof the more eaſterlie branch commeth from Warbleton ward, the other from Biſhops wood, and meeting beneth Halling, they run in one bottome by Pitcham Arlington, Wellington, old Frithſtan, and ſo into the ſea.

Unto the water that commeth out at Newhauen, ſundrie brookes and riuerets doo reſort, but the chiefe head riſeth toward the weſt, ſomewhat betweene Etchinford and Shepleie, as I heare. The firſt water therefore that falleth into the ſame on the eaſt ſide, iſſueth out of the ground about Uertwood, and running from thence by Langhton and Kipe, on the weſt ſide, it falleth into the aforeſaid riuer beneath Forle and Glime, or three miles lower than Lewis, if the other buttall like you not. The nert hereunto hath his head in Argas hill, the third deſcendeth from Alhedon forreſt, and ioining with the laſt mentioned, they croſſe the maine riuer a little beneath Iſefield. The fourth water commeth from Alhedon forreſt by Horſted Caines (or Duſeſtate Caines) and falleth into the ſame, likewiſe eaſt of Linfield. Certes I am deceiued if this riuer be not called Iſis, after it is paſt Iſefield. The fift riſeth about Stonuelgate, and meeteth alſo with the maine ſtreame aboue Linfield, and theſe are knowen to lie vpon the right hand as we rowed vp the riuer. On the other ſide are onelie two, whereof the firſt hath his originall nære vnto Wenefield, and holding on his courſe toward the eaſt, it meeteth with his maſter betweene Newicke and Iſefield (or Iſfield) as ſome read it. The laſt of all commeth from Plimodume or Plumpton, and hauing met in like ſort with the maine riuer about Barcham, it runneth forth with it, & they reſt in one chanell by Barcham, Hamſeie, Malling, Lewis, Piddingburne, and ſo forth into the maine.

Sturewell.

Plinus.

The next riuer that we came vnto weſt of Brighthemſton is the Soze, which notwithſtanding I find to be called Brember water, in the ancient map of Parton colledge in Oxford: but in ſuch ſort (as I take it) as the Rother or Limen is called Apledoure ſtreame, becauſe of the ſaid towne that ſtandeth thervpon. But to proceed, it is a pleaſant water, & thereto if you conſider the ſituation of his armes, and branches from the higher grounds, verie much reſembling a foure ſtringed whip. Whereabout the head of this riuer is, or which of theſe branches may ſafelie be called Soza from the riſing, in good ſooth I cannot ſay. For after we had paſſed nine or ten mils thereon vp into the land, ſuddenlie the croſſe waters ſtopped vs, ſo that we were inforced to turne either eaſt or weſt, for directlie forth-right we had no waie to go. The firſt arme on the right hand as we went, riſeth out of a parke by ſouth of Alborne, and going on for a certeine ſpace toward the northweſt, it turneth ſouthward betweene Shermonburie and Twinham, and ſone after meeteth with the Bimar, not much ſouth from Shermonburie, whence they run togither almoſt two miles, till they fall into the Soze. That on the weſt ſide deſcendeth from about Billingeſhirſt, & going toward the eaſt, it croſſeth with the fourth (which riſeth a litle by weſt of Thacam) eaſt from Pulborow, and ſo they run as one into the Soze, that after this confluence haſteth it ſelfe ſouthward by Brember, Burleis, the Combes, and yer long into the Ocean.

Soza.

Bimarus.

Arunus.

The Arun (of which beſide Arundell towne the caſtell and the vallie wherin it runneth is called Vallis Aruntina, or Arundale in Engliſh) is a goodlie water, and thereto increaſed with no ſmall number of excellent & pleaſant brookes. It ſpringeth vp of two heads, whereof one deſcendeth from the north not far from Gretham, and going by Lis, meeteth with the nert ſtreame (as I geſſe) about Dourſford houſe. The ſecond riſeth by weſt from the hils that lie toward the riſing of the ſunne from Eaſt maine, and runneth by Peterfield. The third commeth from Bertonward, and ioineth with the ſecond betweene Peterfield and Dourſford, after which confluence they go togither in one chanell ſtill toward the eaſt (taking a rill with them that commeth betweene Fernehirſt and S. Lukes chappell, ſouthweſt of Linchmere, and meeting with it eaſt of Loddeſworth (as I doo read, and likewiſe ſundrie other in one chanell beneath Stopham) to Waltham, Burie, Houghton, Stoke, Arundell, Tortington ford, Climping (all on the weſt ſide) and ſo into the ſea.

Having thus deſcribed the weſt ſide of Arun, let vs doo the like with the other in ſuch ſort as we beſt may. The firſt riuer that we come vnto therfore on the eaſt ſide, and alſo the ſecond, riſe of ſundrie places in S. Leonards forreſt, & ioining a little aboue Horſham, they meet with the third, which commeth from Iſfield parke, not verie farre from Slinfeld. The fourth hath two heads, whereof one riſeth in Witleie parke, the other by weſt, nære vnto Heſelmere chappell, and meeting by weſt of Dourſfeld, they vnite themſelues with the chanell, growing by the confluence that I ſpake of beneath Slinfeld, a little aboue Billingſhirſt. The laſt water commeth from the hils aboue Linchemere, and runneth weſt and ſouth, and paſſing betweene Billingthirſt and Stopham, it commeth vnto the chanell laſt mentioned, and ſo into the Arun beneath Stopham, without anie further increaſe, at the leaſt that I doo heare of.

Burne hath his iſſue in a parke nære Aldingburrie (or rather a little aboue the ſame toward the north, as I haue ſince bæne informed) and running by the bottomes toward the ſouth, it falleth betweene north Berflete and Fletham. Erin riſeth of ſundrie heads, by eaſt of Erinleie, and diretting his courſe toward the ſunne riſing, it peninſulateth Seleſeie towne on the ſouthweſt and Pagham at northweſt. Deel ſpringeth about Benderton, and thence running betweene middle Lauant and eaſt Lauant, it goeth by weſt of weſt Hampnet, by eaſt of Chicheſter, or weſt of Rumbaldeſdowne, and afterward by Fiſhburne, where it meeteth with a rill comming northweſt from Funtingdon (a little beneath the towne) & then running thus in one ſtreame toward the ſea, it meeteth with another rillet comming by north of Boſham, and ſo into Auant gulfe by eaſt of Thorneie Iland.

Erin.

Delus.

The Racon riſeth by eaſt of Racton or Racodunum (as Leland calleth it) and comming by Chidham, it falleth into the ſea, northeaſt of Thorneie aforeſaid. The Emill commeth firſt betweene Racton and Stanſted, then downe to Emilſworth or Emmeſworth, & ſo vnto the Ocean, ſeparating Suſſer from Hampſhire almoſt from the very head. Hauing in this maner paſſed along the coaſts of Suſſer, the nert water that I remember, riſeth by eaſt of the forreſt of Elſbirie, from whence it goeth by Southwike, weſt Burhunt, Farham, and ſo into the gulfe almoſt full ſouth. Then come we to Bedenham creeke (ſo called of a village ſtanding thereby) the mouth whereof lieth almoſt directlie againſt Portcheſter caſtell, which is ſituat about three miles by water from Portſmouth towne, as Leland doth report. Then go we within halfe a mile further to Forten creeke, which either giueth or taketh name of Racunus.

Emill.

Badunus forte.

Forten or Fordon.

Oſterpoole. a village hard by. After this we come to Oſterpoole lake, a great creeke, that goeth vp by weſt into the land, and lieth not far from a round turret of ſtone, from whence alſo there goeth a chaine to another tower on the eaſt ſide directlie ouer againſt it, the like whereof is to be ſeene in diuerſe other hauens of the weſt countrie, wherby the entrance of great veſſels into that part may be at pleaſure reſtreined.

From hence we go further to Tichefeld water, that riſeth about Eaſtmaine parke, ten or twelue miles by northeaſt or there abouts from Tichefeld. From Eaſtmaine it goeth (parting the forreſts of Waltham, and Eaſtberie by the way) to Witham or Wiſcombe, a pretie market towne & large thoroughfare, where alſo the water ſeparateth it ſelfe into two armelets, and going vnder two bridges of wood commeth yet long againe vnto one chanell. From hence it goeth three or foure miles further, to a bridge of timber by maiſter Writhoſeleies houſe (leauing Tichfeld towne on the right ſide) and a little beneath runneth vnder Ware bridge, whither the ſea floweth as hir naturall courſe inforceth. Finallie, within a mile of this bridge it goeth into the water of Hampton hauen, whervnto diuerſe ſtreames reſort, as you ſhall heare hereafter.

Tichefield.

Hamelriſh. After this we come to Hamble hauen, or Hamelriſh creeke, whoſe fall is betweene ſaint Andrewes caſtell, and Hoke. It riſeth about Shidford in Waltham forreſt, & when it is paſt Croke bridge, it meeteth with another breake, which iſſueth not farre from Biſhops Waltham, out of ſundrie ſprings in the high waie on Winchester, from whence it paſſeth (as I ſaid) by Biſhops Waltham, then to Budeleie or Botleie, and then ioining with the Hamble, they run togither by Prowlingſworth, Upton, Bruſill, Hamble towne, and ſo into the ſea.

Hamelriſh.

Southhampton. Now come we to the hauen of Southhampton, by Ptolomie called Magnus portus, which I will briefelie deſcribe ſo neere as I can poſſiblie. The breadth or entrie of the mouth hereof (as I take it) is by eſtimation two miles from ſhore to ſhore. At the weſt point therof alſo is a ſtrong caſtell latelie builded, which is rightlie named Caldſhore, but now Cawſhot, I wote not by what occaſion. On the eaſt ſide thereof alſo is a place called Hoke (afore mentioned) or Hamell hoke; wherein are not aboue three or foure fiſher houſes, not worthie to be remembred. This hauen ſhooteth vp on the weſt ſide by the ſpace of ſeuen miles, vntill it come to Hampton towne, ſtanding on the other ſide, where it is by eſtimation a mile from land to land. Whence it goeth vp further about three miles to Redbridge, ſtill ebbing and flowing thither, and one mile further, ſo farre as my memorie doth ſerue mee. Now it reſteth that I deſcribe the Alreſford ſtreame, which ſome do call the Arre or Arle, and I will proceed withall in this order following.

Southhampton.

Alreſford. The Alreſford beginneth of diuerſe faire ſprings, about a mile or more frō Alreſford, or Alford as it is now called, and ſome after reſorting to one bottome, they become a broad lake, which for the moſt part is called Alford pond. Afterward returning againe to a narrow chanell, it goeth through a ſtone bridge at the end of Alford towne (leauing the towne it ſelfe on the left hand) toward Hichingſtocke three miles off, but yet it commeth there, it receiueth two rils in one bottome, whereof one commeth from the Forreſt in maner at hand, and by northweſt of old Alreſford, the other frō Browne Candiuer, that goeth by Northenton, Swarewotton, Aberſtone, &c: vntill we meet with the ſaid water beneath Alford towne. Being paſt Hichinſtocke, it commeth by Alnington to Elſton village, and to Worthie, where it beginneth to branch, and ech arme to part it ſelfe into other that reſort to Hide and the lower ſoiles by eaſt of Winchester, there ſeruing the ſtreets, the cloſe of S. Maries, Wolueſeie, and the new college verie plentifullie with their water. But in this meane while, the great ſtreame commeth from Worthie to the eaſt bridge, and ſo to ſaint Elizabeth college, where it doth alſo part in twaine, enuironing the ſaid houſe in moſt delectable maner. After this it goeth toward S. Croſſes, leauing it a quarter of a mile on the right hand: then to Twiford (a mile lower) where it gathereth againe into one bottome, and goeth ſix miles further to Woodmill, taking the Otter brooke withall on the eaſt ſide, and ſo into the ſalt creeke that leadeth downe to the hauen.

Otter.

On the other ſide of Southhampton, there reſorteth into this hauen alſo both the Teſt & the Stockbridge water in one bottome, whereof I find this large deſcription inſuing. The verie head of the Stockewater, is ſuppoſed to be ſomewhere about Baſing ſtoke, or church Hockleie, and going from thence betweene Duerton and Steuenton, it commeth at laſt by Lauerſtocke & Whitchurch, and ſome after receiuing a brooke by northweſt, called the Bourne (deſcending from S. Marie Bourne, ſoutheaſt from Horſleburne) it proceedeth by Long paroch and the wood, till it meet with the Cranburne, on the eaſt ſide (a pretie riuelet riſing about Michelneie, and going by Fullington, Barton, and to Cramburne) thence to Horwell in one bottome, beneath which it meeteth with the Andeuer water, that is increaſed yet it come there by an other brooke, whoſe name I doo not know. This Andeuer ſtreame riſeth in Culhamſhire forreſt, not far by north from Andeuer towne, and going to vpper Clatford, yet it touch there it receiueth the rill of which I ſpake before, which riſing alſo neer vnto Anport, goeth to Honketon, to Abbateſham, the Andeuer, and both (as I ſaid) vnto the Teſt beneath Horwell, whereof I ſpake euen now.

Stocke. Bourne.

These ſtreames being thus brought into one bottome, it runneth toward the ſouth vnder Stockbridge, and ſome after diuiding it ſelfe in twaine, one branch thereof goeth by Houghton, & a little beneath meeteth with a rill, that commeth from byweſt of S. Ans hill, and goeth by eaſt of vpper Wallop, weſt of nether Wallop, by Bucholt forreſt, Broughton, and called (as I haue beene informed) the Gallop, but now it is named Wallop. The other arme runneth through the parke, by north weſt of kings Somburne, and vniting themſelues againe, they go forth by Mottelhunt, and then receiue the Teſt, a pretie water riſing in Clarendun parke, that goeth by weſt Deane, and eaſt Deane, ſo to Mottelhunt, and finallie to the aforeſaid water, which from thence forth is called the Teſt, euen vnto the ſea. But to proceed. After this confluence, it taketh the gate to Kimbebridge, then to Rumſeie, Longbridge, and beneath the ſame receiueth a concourſe of two rilles whereof the one commeth from Sherefield, the other from the new Forreſt, and ioining in Wadeleie parke, they beat vpon the Teſt, not verie farre from Purſeling. From thence the Teſt goeth vnder a pretie bridge, before it come at Redbridge, from whence it is not long yet it fall into the hauen.

Ptolomaus. Teſt.

The next riuer that runneth into this port, ſpringeth in the new Forreſt, and commeth thereinto about Eling, not paſſing one mile by weſt of the fall of Teſt. From hence caſting about againe into the maine ſea, and leauing Calde ſhore caſtell on the right hand, we directed our courſe toward the southweſt, vnto Beaulieu hauen, whereinto the Mincie deſcendeth. The Mincie riſeth not far from Mincieſteed, a village in the north part of the new Forreſt; and going by Beaulieu, it falleth into the ſea ſouth-

Eling.

Mincie.

west (as I take it) of Erburie, a village standing vpon the shore.

Limen. Being past the Mineie, we crossed the Limen as it is now called, whose head is in the verie hart of the new Forrest (sometime conuerted into a place of nourishment for deere by William Rufus, buteng his pleasure with the ruine of manie towns and villages, as diuerse haue inclosed or inlarged their parks by the spoile of better occupiengs) & running southwest of Lindhirst & the parke, it goeth by east of Brokenhirst, west of Bulder, & finallie into the sea southward by east of Lemington. I take this not to be the proper name of the water, but of the hauen, for Limen in Greeke is an hauen: so that Limendune is nothing else, but a downe or higher plot of ground lieng on the hauen: neuertheles, sith this denomination of the riuer hath now hir free passage, I think it not conuenient to seeke out any other name that should be giuen vnto it. The next fall that we passed by is nameles, except it be called Bure, & as it descendeth from new Forrest, so the next vnto it light Mile, as I haue heard in English: Certes the head thereof is also in the southwest part of the said Forrest, & the fall not far from Milford bridge, beyond the which I find a narrow going or Strickland leading fro the point to Hirst castell which standeth into the sea, as if it hong by a thred, from the maine of the Iland, readie to be washed awaie by the continuall working and dailie beating of the waues.

Bure.

Mills.

Auon. The next riuer that we came vnto of anie name is the Auon, which (as Leland saith) riseth by northeast, and not far from Woolfehall in Wiltshire, supposed to be the same which Ptolomie called Halenus. The first notable bridge that it runneth vnto, is at Uphauen, thence foure miles further it goeth to little Ambresburie, and there is another bridge, from thence to Wodford village, standing at the right hand banke, and Newton village on the left. The bishops of Sarum had a proper manor place at Wodford, which bishop Sharton pulled downe altogither, bicause it was somewhat in ruine. Thence it goeth to Filherton bridge, to Cranebridge, old Salisburie, new Salisburie, and finallie to Harnham, which is a statelie bridge of stone, of six arches at the least. There is at the west end of the said bridge, a little Iland, that lieth betwixt this and another bridge, of foure prettie arches, and vnder this later runneth a good round streame, which (as I take it) is a branch of Auon, that breaketh out a little aboue, & some after it reuniteth it selfe againe: or else that Wilton water hath there his entrie into the Auon, which I cannot yet determine. From Harneham bridge it goeth to Dounton, that is about foure miles, and so much in like sort from thence to Fordingbridge, to Ringwood bridge fiue miles, to Christes church Twinham fiue miles, and streight into the sea; and hitherto Leland of this streame, which for the worthinesse thereof (in mine opinion) is not sufficientlie described. Wherefore I thinke good to deliuer a second receiued of another, which in more particular maner doth exhibit his course vnto vs.

Certes this Auon is a goodlie riuer, rising (as I said before nere) vnto Wolfe hall; although he that will seeke more scrupulouslie for the head in deed, must looke for the same about the borders of the forrest of Sauernake (that is Soure oke) which lieth as if it were imbraced betweene the first armes thereof, as I haue beene informed. These heads also do make a confluence by east of Partinhall hill, and west of Wilton. From whence it goeth to Milton, Powsele, Manningfield abbeie, Manningfield crosse, and beneath Newington taketh in one rill west from Rudborow, and another a little lower that riseth also west of Alcanninges, and runneth into the same by Patneie, Werden, Wilford, Charleton, and Ruffisall. Being therefore past Newington, it goeth to Uphauen (whereof Leland speaketh) to Chesilburie, Compton, Ablington, little Almsburie, Darntford, Wodford, old Salisburie, and so to new Salisburie, where it receiueth one notable riuer from by northwest, & another from northeast, which two I will first describe, leauing the Auon at Salisburie for a while.

The first of these is called the Wilugh, whereof the whole shire doth take hir name, and not of the great plentie of willowes growing therein, as some fantasticall heads do imagine: whereof also there is more plentie in that countrie than is to be found in other places. It riseth among the Deuerels, and running thence by hill Deuerell, & Deuerell long bridge, it goeth toward Bishops straw, taking in one rill by west & another from Upton by Werminster at northwest. From Bishops straw it goeth to Norton, Upton, Badhampton, Steplinford, and Stapleford, where it meeteth with the Winterburie water from by north, descending from Maddenton by Winterburne. From Stapleford it hasteth to Wilshford, Newton, Chilhampton, Wilton: and thither commeth a water vnto it from southwest, which riseth of two heads aboue Duerdonet. After this it goeth by Woodcastell, to Tisburie, and there receiueth a water on each side, whereof one commeth from Funthill, the other from two issues (of which one riseth at Aulkie, the other at Swalodise) and so keeping on still with his course, our Wilugh runneth nert of all by Sutton. Thence it goeth to Fouant, Boberstocke, Southburcombe, Wilton (where it taketh in the Fomington or Nader water) Westharnam, Salisburie, and Eastharnam: and this is the race of Wilugh.

Wilugh.

Nader becke.

The other is a naked arme or streame without anie branches. It riseth aboue Colingburne Kingston in the hils, and thence it goeth to Colingburne, the Tidworths (whereof the more southerlie is in Wiltshire) Shipton, Cholterton, Newton, Coneie, Idmerston, Porton, the Winterburns, Lauerstocke, and so into Auon east of Salisburie. And thus is the confluence made of the aforesaid waters, with this our second Auon, whereinto another water falleth (called Becquithes broke) a mile beneath Harneham bridge, whose head is fiue miles from Sarum, and three miles aboue Becquithes bridge, as Leland doth remember, who noteth the Chalkeburne water to haue his due recourse also at this place into the aforesaid riuer. Certes it is a prettie broke, and riseth six miles from Shaftesburie, and in the waie toward Salisburie in a bottome on the right hand, whence it commeth by Knighton and Fennistratford, to Yonington, that is about twelue miles from the head, and about two miles and an halfe from Yonington beneath Odstocke, goeth into the Auon, a mile lower than Harnham bridge, except he forget himselfe. This Harnham, whereof I now intreat, was sometime a prettie village before the erection of new Salisburie, and had a church of S. Martine belonging vnto it, but now in stead of this church, there is onelie a barne standing in a verie low mead on the northside of S. Michaels hospitall. The cause of the relinquishing of it was the moistnesse of the soile, verie oft ouerflowne. And whereas the kings high waie laie sometime through Wilton, licence was obteined of the king and Richard bishop of Salisburie, to remoue that passage vnto new Salisburie in like maner, and vpon this occasion was the maine bridge made ouer Auon at Harneham. By this exchange of the waie also old Salisburie fell into vtter decaie, & Wilton which was before the head towne of the shire, and furnished with twelue parish churches, grew to be but a poore village, and of small reputation. Howbeit, this was not the onelie cause of Becquith broke.

Three townes decaied by changing one waie.

the ruine of old Saliſburie, ſith I read of two other, whereof the firſt was a ſaluo vnto the latter, as I take it. For where as it was giuen out, that the townesmen wanted water in old Saliſburie, it is flat otherwiſe; ſith that hill is verie plentifullie ſerued with ſpringes and wels of verie ſweet water. The truth of the matter therefore is this.

In the time of ciuill warres, the ſouldiors of the caſtell and chanons of old Sarum fell at ods, inſomuch that after often braules, they fell at laſt to ſad blowes. It happened therefore in a rogation weeke that the clergie going in ſolemne proceſſion, a controuerſie fell betweene them about certeine walkes and limits, which the one ſide claimed and the other denied. Such alſo was the hot intertainment on ech part, that at the laſt the Caſtellanes eſpieng their time, gate betweene the cleargie and the towne, and ſo cloſed them as they returned homeward, that they feared ante more to gang about their bounds for the yeare. Herevpon the people miſſing their bellie cheare (for they were wont to haue banketing at euerie ſtation, a thing commonlie practiſed by the religious in old time, wherewith to linke in the commons vnto them, whom anie man may lead whither he will by the bellie, or as Latimer ſaid, with beefe, bread and beere) they conceiued forthwith a deadlie hatred againſt the Caſtellans. But not being able to cope with them by force of armes, they conſulted with Richard Poze their biſhop, and he with them ſo effectuallie, that it was not long yer they, I meane the chanons, began a new church vpon a peece of their owne ground called Mirifield, pretending to ſerue God there in better ſafetie, and with far more quietneſſe than they could do before. This church was begun 1219, the nine and twentith of Aprill, and finiſhed with the expenſes of 42000 marks, in the yeare 1260, and fiue & twentith of March, whereby it appeereth that it was aboue fortie yéers in hand, although the clearks were tranſlated to the new towne 1220, or the third yeare after the traie. The people alſo ſeeing the diligence of the chanons, and reputing their harmes for their owne inconuenience, were as earneſt on the other ſide to be néere vnto theſe prelats, and therefore euerie man brought his houſe vnto that place, & thus became old Sarum in few yeares vtterlie deſolate, and new Saliſburie raiſed vp in ſtéed thereof, to the great decaie alſo of Harnham and Wilton, whereof I ſpake of late. Neuertheleſſe it ſhould ſéeme to me that this new citie is not altogither void of ſome great hinderances now and then by water: for in the ſecond of Edward the ſecond (who held a parlement there) there was a ſudden thaw after a great froſt, which cauſed the waters ſo faſt to ariſe, that euen at high maſſe time the water came into the minſter, and not onelie ouerflowed the nether part of the ſame, but came vp all to the kings pauaſe where he ſate, whereby he became wethod, and in the end inforced to leaue the church, as the executour did his maſſe, leaſt they ſhould all haue béene drowned: and this rage indured there for the ſpace of two daies, whereupon no ſeruice could be ſaid in the ſaid minſter.

An holie conflict.

New Saliſburie begun.

Now to returne againe from whence I thus digreſſed. Our Auon therefore departing from Saliſburie, goeth by Burtford, Longford, and taking in the waters afore mentioned by the waie, it goeth by Stanleie, Dunketon, Craiſford, Burgate, Fording bridge, Ringwood, Auon, Chriſtes church; and finallie into the ſea. But yer it come all there & a little beneth Chriſtes church, it croſſeth the Stoure or Sture, a verie faire ſtreame, whoſe courſe is ſuch as may not be left vntouched. It riſeth of ſir heads, whereof three lie on the north ſide of the parke at Sturton within the pale, the other riſe without the parke; & of this riuer the towne and baronie of Sturton doth take his name as I geſſe, for except my memorie do to much faile me, the lord Sturton giueth the ſir heads of the ſaid water in his armes. But to proceed. After theſe branches are conioined in one bottome, it goeth to long Laine mill, Stilton, Milton, and beneath Gillingham receiueth a water that deſcendeth from Mere. Thence the Sture goeth to Bugleie, Stoure, Weſtouer bridge, Stoure prouoſt, and yer long it taketh in the Cale water, from Pen that commeth downe by Wickhampton to Moreland, & ſo to Staplefford, ſeuen miles from Wickhampton, paſſing in the ſaid voiage, by Wine Caunton, and the fiue bridges. After this confluence, it runneth to Hinton Parues, and ſone after croſſeth the Lidden and Deuilis waters all in one chanell, whereof the firſt riſeth in Blackemore vale, and goeth to the biſhops Caundell: the ſecond in the hils ſouth of Pulham, and ſo runneth to Lidlinch; the third water iſſueth néere Ibberton, and going by Fifehed to Lidlington, and there méeting with the Lidden, they receiue the Blackewater aboue Bagburne, and ſo go into the Stoure.

Cale. Lidden. Deuilis. Iber. Blackewater.

After this the Stoure runneth on to Stoureton minſter, Fitleford, Hammond, and ſone after taking in one water that commeth from Hargraue by weſt Orchard, and a ſecond from Funt mill, it goeth on to Chele, Ankeford, Handford, Durweſton, Knighton, Brainſton, Blandford, Charleton: and croſſing yer long a rill that riſeth about Tarrent, and goeth to Launſton, Munketon, Caunſton, Tarrant, it proceedeth forth by Shepwie, and by and by receiuing another broke on the right hand, that riſeth about Stricland, and goeth by Quarleſton, Whitchurch, Anderſton, and Winterburne, it haſteth forward to Stoureminſter, Berford lake, Alen bridge, Winburne, aliàs Twinburne minſter, whither commeth a water called Alen (from Knolton, Wilkehampton, Elkambridge, Hinton, Barnſleie) which hath two heads, whereof one riſeth ſhort of Woodcotes, and eaſt of Farneham, named Terig, the other at Munketon aboue S. Giles Winburne, and going thence to S. Giles Athleie, it taketh in the Horton becke, as the Horton doth the Cranburne. Finallie, méeting with the Terig aboue Knolton, they run on vnder the name of Alen to the Stoure, which goeth to the Canfords, Preſton, Kingſton, Perleie, and Polneſt: but yer it come at Polneſt it taketh in two brookes in one bottome, whereof one commeth from Woodland parke by Holt parke, and Holt, another from aboue vpper Winburne, by Edmondeſham, Uertwod, and Pannington, and ioining about S. Leonards, they go to Hornebridge, and ſo into Stoure. After which confluence, the ſaid Stoure runneth by Iuor bridge, and ſo into Auon, leauing Chriſts church aboue the méeting of the ſaid waters (as I haue ſaid before.)

This Stoure aboundeth with pike, perch, roch, dace, gudgeon and eels.

Hauing in this maner paſſed Chriſtes church head we come to the fall of the Burne, which is a little broke running from Stourefield heath, without branches; from whence we proceéded: & the next fall that we come vnto is Poole, from whoſe mouth vpon the ſhore, by ſouthweſt in a baie of three miles off, is a poore fiſher towne called Sandwich, where we ſaw a péere and a little freſh broke. The verie vtter part of ſaint Adelmes point, is fiue miles from Sandwich. In another baie lieth weſt Lilleworth, where (as I heare) is ſome profitable harborough for ſhips. The towne of Poole is from Winburne about foure miles, and it ſtandeth almoſt as an Ile in the hauen. The hauen it ſelfe alſo, if a man ſhould meaſure it by the circuit, wanteth little of twentie miles, as I did geſſe by the view.

and the ſouth points, to ſée what waters were there, we left Bzunkeleie Iland, and the caſtell on the left hand within the ſaid points; and paſſing about by Pole, and leaning that créeke, bicauſe it hath no freſh, we came by Holton and Beſwoꝛth, where we beheld two falles, of which one was called the noꝛth, the other the ſouth waters. The noꝛth ſtreame hight Piddle as I heare. It riſeth about Alton, and goeth from thence to Piddle trench head, Piddle hinton, Walterſtow, and yet it come at Birſtam, receiueth Deuils bzoke that commeth thither from Bzugham and Melcombe by Deuliſh towne. Thence it goeth to Tow piddle, Ache piddle, Turners piddle (taking in yet it come there, a water that runneth from Yelton by Piddleton, Milburne & Biere) then to Hide, and ſo into Pole hauen, and of this water Marianus Scotus ſpeaketh, except I be deceiued. The ſouth water is pꝛoperlie called Frome foꝛ Frame. It riſeth néere vnto Euerſhot, and going downe by Fromequitaine, Chelmington, and Catſtocke, it receiueth there a rill from beſide Rowſham, and Wrarehall. After this it goeth on to Chilfrome, and thence to Maden Newton, where it méeteth with the Diuke, that riſeth either two miles aboue Hoke parke at Benford, oꝛ in the great pond within Hoke parke, and going by the Tollards, falleth into the Frome about Maden Newton, & ſo go as one from thence to Fromevauchirch, Crokewaie, Frampton, and Muckilford, and receiueth néere vnto the ſame a rill from aboue Upſidling by S. Nicholas Sidling, and Grimſton. From hence it goeth on by Stratton and Bzadfoꝛd Peuerell, and beneath this Bzadfoꝛd, it croſſeth the Silleie alias Winterne and Cherne bzoks both in one chanell: whereof the firſt riſeth in vpper Cherne pariſh, the other at Winterne, and méeting aboue middle Cherne, they go by nether Cherne, Foꝛſton, Godmanſton, and aboue Charneminſter into Frome. In the meane time alſo our Frome bzancheth and leaueth an Iland aboue Charneminſter, and ioining againe néere Doꝛcheſter, it goeth by Doꝛcheſter, and Foꝛthington; but yet it come at Beckington, it méeteth with another Becke that runneth thereinto from Winterburne, Stapleton, Martinſtow, Yeringſtow, Caine and Staffoꝛd, and from thence goeth without anie further increaſe as yet to Beckington, Knighton, Tinkleton, Moꝛton, Wooll, Bindon, Stoke, & beneath Stoke receiueth the iſſue of the Luckefoꝛd lake, from whence alſo it paſſeth by Eaſtholme, Warham, and ſo into the Baie. From this fall we went about the arme point by Slepe, where we ſaw a litle créeke, then by Owze, where we beheld an other, & then comming againe toward the entrance by ſaint Helens, and Furleie caſtell, we went abzoad into the maine, and found our ſelues at libertie.

When we were paſt Pole hauen, we left the Handfaſt point, the Peuerell point, S. Adelmes chappell, and came at laſt to Lughpoꝛt hauen, whereby and alſo the Luckefoꝛd lake, all this poꝛtion of ground laſt remembzed, is left in maner of a byland oꝛ peninſula, and called the Ile of Burbecke, wherein is good ſtoꝛe of alum and hard ſtone. In like ſoꝛt going ſtill weſterlie, we came to Sutton points, where is a créeke. Then vnto Waie oꝛ Wilemouth, by kings Welcombe, which is twentie miles from Pole, and whoſe head is not full foure miles aboue the hauen by noꝛthweſt at Uphill in the ſide of a great hill. Hereinto when we were entred, we ſaw thzée falles, whereof the firſt and greateſt commeth from Upweie by Bzadweie, and Radipole, receiuing afterward the ſecond that ran from eaſt Chekerell, and likewiſe the third that maketh the ground betwéene Weimouth and Smalmouth paſſage almoſt an Iland. There is a little barre of ſand at the hauen mouth, and a great arme of the ſea runneth vp by the right hand; and ſcant a mile aboue the hauen mouth on the ſhoꝛe, is a right goodlie and warlike caſtell made, which hath one open barbicane. This arme runneth vp alſo further by a mile as in a baie, to a point of land where a paſſage is into Poꝛtland, by a little courſe of pibble ſand. It goeth vp alſo from the ſaid paſſage vnto Abbatſburie about ſcauen miles off, where a litle freſh rondell reſoꝛteth to the ſea. And ſomewhat aboue this is the head oꝛ point of the Cheſill lieng noꝛthweſt, which ſtretcheth vp from thence about ſeauen miles, as a maine narrow banke, by a right line vnto the ſoutheaſt, and there abutteth vpon Poꝛtland ſcant a quarter of a mile aboue the Newcaſtle there. The nature of this banke is ſuch, that ſo often as the wind bloweth vehementlie at ſoutheaſt, ſo often the ſea beateth in, and loſing the banke ſoketh thzough it: ſo that if this wind ſhould blow from that coꝛner anie long time togither, Poꝛtland ſhould be left an Iland as it hath béene befoꝛe. But as the ſouthweſt wind doth appaire this banke, ſo a noꝛthweſt doth barre it vp againe. It is pꝛetie to note of the Townelet of Waimouth, which lieth ſtreight againſt Milton on the other ſide, and of this place where the water of the hauen is but of ſmall bzeadth, that a rope is commonlie tied from one ſide of the ſhoꝛe to another, whereby the ferrie men doo guide their botes without anie helpe of Oꝛes. But to pꝛoceed with our purpoſe. Into the mouth of this riuer doo ſhips often conte foꝛ ſuccour.

Going by Poꝛtland and the point thereof called the Naſe, we ſailed along by the Shingle, till we came by ſaint Katharins chappell, where we ſaw the fall of a water that came downe from Blackdéene Beaconward, by Poꝛtham and Abbatſburie. Thence we went to another that fell into the ſea, néere Birton, and deſcended from Litton by Chilcombe, then vnto the Bzide oꝛ Bzute poꝛt, a pꝛetie hauen, and the riuer it ſelfe ſerued with ſundzie waters. It riſeth halfe a mile oꝛ moze aboue Bemiſter, and ſo goeth from Bemiſter to Netherburie by Parneham, then to Melplaſh, and ſo to Bzitepoꝛt, where it taketh in two waters from by eaſt in one chanell, of which one riſeth eaſt of Nettlecourt, and goeth by Poꝛtſloke and Milton, the other at Alkerwell, and runneth by Longlether. From hence alſo our Bzide going toward the ſea, taketh the Simen on the weſt that commeth by Simenſburge into the ſame, the whole ſtreame ſone after falling into the ſea, and leauing a pꝛetie hauenet.

The next poꝛt is the Chare, ſerued with two rils in one confluence, beneath Charemouth. The cheefe head of this riuer is (as Leland ſaith) in Marſhwood parke, and commeth downe by Whitechurch: the other runneth by weſt of Wotton, and méeting beneath Charemouth towne (as I ſaid) doth fall into the ſea. Then came we to the Cobbe, and beheld the Lime water, which the townelmen call the Buddle, which commeth about thzée miles by noꝛth of Lime, from the hils, fleting vpon Rockie ſoile, and ſo falleth into the ſea. Certes, there is no hauen héere that I could ſée, but a quarter of a mile by weſt ſouthweſt of the towne, is a great and coſtlie iuttie in the ſea foꝛ ſuccour of ſhips. The towne is diſtant from Colton, about fiue miles. And héere we ended our voiage from the Auon, which conteineth the whole coaſt of Doꝛcheſter, oꝛ Doꝛcetſhire, ſo that next we muſt enter into Summerſet countie, and ſée what waters are there.

The firſt water that we méet withall in Summerſetſhire is the Are, which riſeth in a place called Are knoll, longing to ſir Giles Strangwaie, néere vnto Cheddington in Doꝛſetſhire, from whence it runneth to Moſkerne, Feboꝛow, Clarton, Weſtoꝛd bzidge, bridge, Wainham ford, and receiuing one rill from the east by Hawkechurch, and sone after another comming from northwest by Churchstoke, from Wainbroke, it goeth to Areminster, beneath which it crosseth the Pare, that commeth from about Buckland, by Whitkaunton, Parecombe, Long bridge, Stockeland, Kilmington bridge (where it receiueth a broke from by south, that runneth by Dalwood) and so into the Are. From hence our Are goeth to Drake, Pulburie, Culliford: but yer it come altogither at Culliford, it meeteth with a water that riseth aboue Cotleie, and goeth from thence by Widworthie, Culliton, and there receiuing a rill also, proceedeth on after the confluence aboue Culliford bridge, into the Are, and from thence hold on togither into the maine sea, whereinto they fall vnder the roots of the winter cliffes, the points of them being almost a mile in sunder. The most westerlie of them called Berewood, lieth within halfe a mile of Seton.

Pare alias Arte.

But the other toward the east is named Whitecliffe, of which I saie no more, but that in the time of Athelstane, the greatest nauie that euer aduentured into this Iland, arriued at Seton in Deuonshire, being replenished with aliens that sought the conquest of this Iland, but Athelstane met and incountered with them in the field, where he ouerthrew six thousand of his aforesaid enimies. Not one of them also that remained aliue, escaped from the battell without some deadlie or verie grieuous wound. In this conflict moreouer were slaine fiue kings, which were interred in the churchyard of Are minster, and of the part of the king of England were killed eight earles of the cheefe of his nobilitie, and they also buried in the churchyard aforesaid. Herevnto it addeth how the bishop of Shireburne was in like sort slaine in this battell, that began at Brune dune neere to Coliton, and indured euen to Are minster, which then was called Brunberie or Brunburg. The same daie that this thing happened the sunne lost his light, and so continued without ante brightnesse, vntill the setting of that planet, though otherwise the season was clere and nothing cloudie.

As for the hauen which in times past as I haue heard, hath beene at Sidmouth (so called of Sidde a rillet that runneth thereto) and likewise at Seton, I passe it ouer, sith now there is none at all. Yet hath there beene sometime a notable one, albeit, that at this present betweene the two points of the old hauen, there lieth a mightie bar of pibble stones, in the verie mouth of it, and the riuer Are is driuen to the verie east point of the hauen called White cliffe. Thereat also a verie little gull goeth into the sea, whither small fisherbotes do oft resort for succour. The men of Seton began of late to take and make a maine wall within the hauen to haue changed the course of the Are, and (almost in the middle of the old hauen) to haue trenched through the Chesill, thereby to haue let out the Are, & to haue taken in the maine sea, but I heare of none effect that this attempt did come vnto. From Seton westward lieth Coliton, about two miles by west northwest, whereof riseth the riuer Colie, which going by the aforesaid towne, passeth by Colecombe parke, and afterward falleth betweene Are bridge and Are mouth towne into the Are riuer.

Sidde. Seton. Colie.

By west of Berewoorth point lieth a creeke, serued (so farre as I remember) with a fresh water that commeth from the hilles south of Southleie or Brancombe. Sidmouth hauen is the next, and thither commeth a fresh water by S. Maries from the said hils, that goeth from S. Maries aforesaid to Sidburie, & betweene Saltcombe & Sidmouth into the maine sea. By west of Auterton point also lieth another hauen, and thither commeth a prettie riueret, whose head is in the Hackpendon hilles, and commeth downe first by Apanter, then by a parke side to Pohuns Auter, Munketon, Honniton, Buckewell, and north of Autrie receiueth a rill called Tale, that riseth northwest of Brodemburie in a wood, and from whence it commeth by Pehemburie, Amniton, and making a confluence with the other, they go as one betweene Cadde and Autrie, to Herford, Luton, Collaton, Auterton, Budeleie, and so into the sea.

Sid. Autrie alias Otterele.

On the west side of this hauen is Budeleie almost directly against Otterton. It is easie to be seene also, that within lesse space than one hundred yeers, ships did vse this hauen, but now it is barred vp. Some call it Budeleie hauen of Budeleie towne, others Salterne port, of a little creeke commig out of the maine hauen vnto Salterne village, that hath in time past beene a towne of great estimation.

Tale.

The Ere riseth in Eremore in Summersetshire, Exe. neere vnto Ere crosse, and goeth from thence vnto Ereford, Winsford, and Ertun, where it receiueth a water comming from Cutcombe, by north. After this confluence it goeth on toward the south, till it meet with a prettie broke rising northeast of Whettell (going by Brunton Regis) increased at the least with three rilles which come all from by north. These being once met, this water runneth on by west of the beacon that beareth the name of Haddon, & sone after taketh in the Barleie, that receiueth in like sort the Done at Hawkbridge, and from hence goeth by Dauerton, and Combe, and then doth meet with the Ere, almost in the verie confines betweene Dorset & Summerset shires. Being past this coniunction, our Ere passeth betweene Brushford and Durbath, and then to Ere bridge, where it taketh in (as I heare) a water by west from east Auskie: and after this likewise another on ech side, whereof one commeth from Dirford, and Baunton, the other called Woodburne, somewhat by east of Okeford. From these meetings it goeth to Caue and through the forrest and woods to Hatherland and Washfields, vntill it come to Tiuerton, and here it receiueth the Lomund water that riseth aboue Alhbrittle, & commeth downe by Hockworthie, vpper Loman, and so to Tiuerton that standeth almost euen in the verie confluence. Some call this Lomund the Simming broke or Sunnings bath. After this our Ere goeth to Bickleie, Theuerten (taking in a rill by west) nether Ere, Bramford, beneath which it ioineth with the Columbe that riseth of one head northeast of Clarie Haidon, and of another south of Shildon, and meeting beneath Columbe stocke, goeth by Columbe and Bradfeld, and there crossing a rill that commeth by Alhford, it runneth south to Wood, Pore haies, Columbton, Brandnicke, Beare, Columbe John, Horham, and ioining (as I said) with the Ere at Bramford, passing vnder but one bridge, yer it meet with another water by west, growing of the Forten and Cride waters (except it be so that I do iudge amisse.) The Cride riseth aboue Wollesworthie, and neere vnto Upton: after it is past Dewrith, crosseth a rill from betweene Puggill and Stockeleie by Stocke English, &c. From hence it goeth to Fulford, where it meeteth with the Forten, wherof one branch commeth by Caldbroke, the other from S. Marie Tedburne, and ioining aboue Crediton, the chanell goeth on to the Cride, (which yer long also receiueth another from by north, comming by Stockeleie and Combe) then betweene Haine and Newton Sires, to Pines, and so into the Ere, which faieth not vntill it come to Excester. From Excester (whither the burgesses in time past laboured to bring the same, but in vaine) it runneth to Were, there taking in a rill from by west, and an other lower by Erminster, next of all vnto Toppelham; beneath which towne the Cliue entreth thereinto, into, which riſing about Plumtree, goeth by Cliſt Haidon, Cliſt Laurence, Wode Cliſt, Honiton, Sonton, Biſhops Cliſt, S. Marie Cliſt, Cliſt ſaint George, and then into the Ere, that runneth forward by Notwell court, Limſton and Ponderham caſtell.

Ben. Here (as I heare) it taketh in the Ben, or Benton broke (as Leland calleth it) comming from Holcombe parke, by Dunſdike, Shillingford, Benford, Ben, Benton, and ſo into Ere hauen, at whoſe mouth lie certeine rocks which they call the Checkſtones, except I be deceiued. The nert fall, whereof Leland ſaith nothing at all, commeth by Aſhcombe and Duliſh, and hath his head in the hilles thereby.

Teigne. The Teigne mouth is the nert fall that we came to, & it is a godlie port foure miles from Exemouth. The head of this water is twentie miles from the ſea at Teigne head in Dartmore among the Gidleie hilles. From whence it goeth to Gidleie towne, Teignton drue, where it receiueth the Crokerne comming from by north, and likewiſe another weſt of Fulford parke. Then it goeth to Dufford, Bidford, Birſlowe, Chidleie, Knighton, and beneath the bridge there receiueth the Bonie, whoſe courſe is Crokerne. to north Bonie, Lilleie, and Bowtracie. Thence it

Bonie. runneth to kings Teignton, taking in Eidis, a Eidis. broke beneath Preſton that commeth from Edeford by the waie. And when it is paſt this confluence, at

Leman. kings Teignton, it croſſeth the Leman, which com-

Aller. meth from Saddleton rocke by Beckington, and Newton Buſhels: and ſone after the Aller that riſeth betweene Danburie and Warog well, afterward falling into the ſea by Biſhops Teignton, ſouth of Teignmouth towne.

The verie vtter weſt point of the land, at the mouth of Teigne is called the Neſſe, and is a verie high red cliffe. The eaſt part of the hauen is named the Poles, a low ſandie ground, either caſt vp by the ſpuing of the ſand out of the Teigne, or elſe throwne vp from the ſhore by the rage of wind and water. This ſand occupieth now a great quantitie of the ground betweene the hauen where the ſand riſeth, and Teignmouth towne, which towne (ſurnamed Regis) hath in time paſt bin ſore defaced by the Danes, and of late time by the French.

From Teignemouth we came to Tor baie, whereof the weſt point is called Birie, and the eaſt Perritorie, betweene which is little aboue foure miles. From Tor baie alſo to Dartmouth is ſir miles, where (ſaith Leland) I marked diuerſe things. Firſt of all vpon the eaſt ſide of the hauen a great hillie point called Downeſend, and betwixt Downeſend, and a pointlet named Wereford is a little baie. Were it ſelfe, in like ſort, is not full a mile from Downeſend vpward into the hauen. Kingſwere towne ſtandeth out as another pointlet, and betwixt it & Wereford is the ſecond baie. Somewhat moreouer aboue Kingſwere towne goeth a little creke vp into the land from the maine ſtreame of the hauen called Waterhead, and this is a verie fit place for veſſels to be made in. In like ſort halfe a mile beyond this into the landward goeth another longer creke, and aboue that alſo a greater than either of theſe called Gawnſton, whoſe head is here not halfe a mile from the maine ſea, by the compaſſing thereof, as it runneth in Tor baie.

Dart. The riuer of Dart or Darent (for I read Derenta moth for Dartmouth) commeth out of Dartmore fifteene miles aboue Totneſſe, in a verie large plot, and ſuch another wild mouriſh & forreſtie ground as Ermore is. Of it ſelfe moreouer this water is verie ſwift, and thorough occaſion of tin-workes whereby it paſſeth, it carrieth much ſand to Totneſſe bridge, and ſo choketh the depth of the riuer downeward, that the hauen it ſelfe is almoſt ſpoiled by the ſame. The mariners of Dartmouth accompt this to be about a kenning from Plimmouth. The Darent therefore proceeding from the place of his vpriſing, goeth on to Buckland, from whence it goeth to Buckland hole; and ſone after taking in the Aſhburne water on the one ſide that runneth from Sadleton rocke by north, and the Buckfaſtlich that commeth from north weſt, it runneth to Staunton, Darington, Hemſton, and there alſo croſſing a rill on ech ſide paſſeth forth to Totneſſe, Bowden, and aboue Gabriell Stoke meeteth with the Hartburne that runneth vnder Roſſ bridge, two miles aboue Totnes, or (as another ſaith) by Ratter, Harberton, Painesford, and Aſprempton into Darent, which yer long alſo commeth to Cornewoorthie, Grenewaie, Ditham, Darntmouth towne (whervnto king John gaue ſometimes a maior, as he did vnto Totneſſe) from thence betweene the caſtelles, and finallie into ſea.

Aſhburne. Buckfaſtlich. Hartburne.

From hence we went by Stokefleming to another water, which commeth from blacke Ruton, then to the ſecond that falleth in eaſt of Slapton, and ſo coaſting out of this baie by the Start point, we ſaile almoſt directlie weſt, till we come to Saltcombe hauen. Certes this port hath verie little freſh water comming to it, and therefore no meruell though it be barred; yet the head of it (ſuch as it is) riſeth neere Buckland, and goeth to Dudbroke, which ſtandeth betweene two creekes. Thence it bieth to Charleton, where it taketh in a rill, whoſe head commeth from ſouth and north of Shereford. Finallie, it hath another creke that runneth vp by Ilton: and the laſt of all that falleth in north of Portlemouth, whoſe head is ſo neere the baie laſt afore remembred, that it maketh it a forie peninſula (as I haue heard it ſaid.)

Then come we to the Awne, whoſe head is in the hils farre aboue Bzent towne, from whence it goeth to Dirford wood, Loddewell, Hache, Aunton, Thorleſton, and ſo into the ſea ouer againſt a rocke called S. Michaels burrow. Arme riſeth aboue Harford, thence to Stoford, Iuie bridge, Armington bridge, Fleet, Orchardton, Owne well, and ſo vnto the ſea, which is full of flats and rocks, ſo that no ſhip commeth thither in anie tempeſt, except it be forced thereto, through the vttermoſt extremitie and deſperat hazard of the fearefull mariners. King Philip of Caſtile loſt two ſhips here in the daies of king Henrie the ſeuenth, when he was driuen to land in the weſt countrie by the rage of weather. Palme goeth by Cornewood, Slade, Stratleie, Palmerton, Collaton, Newton ferrie, and ſo into the ſea, about foure miles by ſouth eaſt from the maine ſtreame of Plimmouth. Being paſt theſe portlets, then nert of all we come to Plimmouth hauen, a verie buſie peece to deſcribe, becauſe of the numbers of waters that reſort vnto it, & ſmall helpe that I haue for the knowledge of their courſes; yet will I do what I may in this, as in the reſt, and ſo much I hope by Gods grace to performe, as ſhall ſuffice my purpoſe in this behalfe.

Awne. Arme. See Hen. 7. pag. 792, 793, 794. Palme. Plim.

The Plimne or Plim, is the verie ſame water that giueth name to Plimpton towne. The mouth of this gulfe, wherein the ſhips do ride, is walled on ech ſide and chained ouer in time of neceſſitie, and on the ſouth ſide of the hauen is a blocke houſe vpon a rockie hill: but as touching the riuer it ſelfe, it riſeth in the hils weſt of Cornewood, and commeth downe a ſhort courſe of three miles to Newenham after it be iſſued out of the ground. From Newenham alſo it runneth to Plimpton, and ſone after into the Stoure, which Stoure ariſeth northweſt of Shepſtour, & goeth frō thence to Nemchurch, Hele, Shane, Bickleie, and ſo to Eford, where taking in the Plim, it runneth downe as one vnder the name of Plim, vntill vntill it go past Plimmouth, and fall into the hauen south east of Plimmouth aforesaid. I haue oftentimes trauelled to find out the cause why so manie riuers in England are called by this name Stoure, and at the first supposing that it was growne by the corruption of Dour, the Brittish word for a streame, I rested therupon as resolued for a season: but afterward finding the word to be meere Saxon, and that Stouremare is a prouince subiect to the duke of Saxonie, I yeelded to another opinion: whereby I conceiue that the said name was first deriued from the Saxons. But to returne to our purpose.

Liuer.

Plimmouth it selfe standeth betweene two creeks, not serued with anie backewater, therefore passing ouer these two, we enter into the Thamar that discharged it selfe into, the aforsaid hauen. Going therfore vp that streame which for the most part parteth Deuonshire from Cornewall, the first riuer† that I met withall on the east side is called Taxie, the head whereof is among the mounteins foure miles aboue Peters Taxie, beneath which it meeteth with another water from by west, so that these two waters include Parle Taxie betweene them, though nothing neere the confluence. From hence the Taxe or Taxie runneth to Taxistocke, aboue which it taketh in a rill from by west, and another aboue north Buckland, whose head is in Dartmore, and commeth therevnto by Sandford and Harrow bridge. From hence it goeth into Thamar, by north Buckland, monks Buckland, Beare, and Tamerton follie. Hauing thus dispatched the Taxie, the next that falleth in on the east side vpwards is the Lidde, which rising in the hils aboue Lidford, runneth downe by Curriton and Siddenham, and so to Lidstone, aboue which it receiueth the Trushell brooke, which rising north east of Bredistow, goeth by Trulholton to Ibaine, where it receiueth a rill that commeth by Bradwood from Germanswike, and after the confluence runneth to Lifton, and from thence into the Thamar. The next aboue this is the Coze water, this ariseth somewhere about Elwell or Yelwell, and going by Virginston, runneth on by saint Giles without anie increase vntill it come to Thamar. Next of all it taketh in two brookes not much distant in sunder, whereof the one commeth in by Glanton, the other from Holsworthie, and both east of Tamerton, which standeth on the further banke, & other side of the Thamar, and west northwest of Tedcote, except the quarter deceiue me.

Thamar.

Certes, the Thamar it selfe riseth in Summersetshire, about three miles northeast of Hartland, and in maner so crosseth ouer the whole west countrie betweene sea and sea, that it leaueth Cornewall, a byland or peninsula. Being therefore descended from the head, by a tract of six miles, it commeth to Denborow, Pancrase well, Bridge Reuell, Tamerton, Tetcote, Luffencote, Boiton, and Wirrington, where it meeteth with a water on the west side called Arteie, that riseth short of Jacobstow. Two miles in like sort frō this confluence, we met with the Renseie, whose head is short of Warpesson by south east: from whence it goeth by Treneglos, Tremone, Tresmure, Trewen, Lanston, and so into the Thamar, that runneth from hence by Lowthitton vnto Bradston, and going on toward Dunterton, taketh in a rill from south Pitherwic, and by Lesant; beneath Dunterton also it crosseth the Enian. This riuer riseth at Dauidston, and directeth his race by saint Clethir, Lancast, and Trelaske first; and then vnder sundrie bridges, vntill it meet with the Thamar. From hence also the Thamar goeth by Siddenham to Calstocke bridge, Calstocke towne, Clifton, Targreue (there abouts taking in a creeke aboue Landilip) and running on from thence, halleth toward Saltash, where it receiueth the Liuer water. The head of Liuer is about Brownwillie hill, from whence it goeth on to North hill, Lekenhorne, South hill, and taking in a rill by east (from aboue Kellington) it runneth on to Newton, Pillaton, Wotton, Blossleming, saint Erne, and beneath this village crosseth a rillet that runneth thither from Bicton by Quithiocke, saint Germans, and Sheuiocke. But to proceed. After the confluence, it goeth betweene Erlie and Fro Martine castell, and sone after taking in a rill from by north, that passeth west of saint Steuens, it is not long yer it fall into the Thamar, which after this (receiuing the Milbrooke creeke) goeth on by Edgecombe, and betweene saint Michaels Ile and Ridden point into the maine sea. And thus haue I finished the description of Plimmouth water, and all such falles as are betweene Newsson rocke on the east side, and the Ram head on the other.

Enian.

After this we proceeded on with our iournie toward the west, and passing by Longstone, we came sone after to Sothan baie, where we crossed the Seton water, whose head is about Liscard, & his course by Minheniet, Chafrench, Tregowike, Sutton, and so into the sea. Then came we to Low, and going in betweene it and Mount Ile, we find that it had a branched course, and thereto the confluence aboue Low. The chiefe head riseth in the hils, as it were two miles aboue Gaine, and going by that towne, it ceaseth not to continue his course east of Dulo, till it come a little aboue Low, where it crosseth and ioineth with the Brodoke water that runneth from Brodokes by Trewargo, and so into the sea. Next vnto these are two other rils, of which one is called Polpir, before we come at Foy, or Fawy.

Foy or Fawy riuer riseth in Fawy more, on the side of an hill in Fawy more, from whence it runneth by certeine bridges, till it met with the Glin water west of Glin towne, which rising aboue Temple, & meeting with a rill that commeth in from S. Neotes, doth fall into Fawy a mile and more aboue Respin from by east. After this confluence then, it goeth to Respin bridge, Lestermen castell, Lostwithiell bridge, Pill, saint Kingtons, saint Winnow, and Golant, and here also receiueth the Lerine water out of a parke, that taketh his waie into the maine streame by Biconke, Tethe, and the Fining house. Being thus united, it proceedeth vnto Fawy towne, taking in a rill or creeke from aboue it on the one side, and another beneath it south of Halling on the other: of which two this latter is the longest of course, sith it runneth three good miles before it come at the Foy. Leland writing of this riuer addeth verie largelie vnto it after this maner. The Fawy riseth in Fawy more (about two miles from Camilford by south, and sixteene miles from Fawy towne) in a verie quaue mire on the side of an hill. From hence it goeth to Draineshridge, to Clobham bridge, Lergen bridge, New bridge, Respin bridge, and Lostwithiell bridge, where it meeteth with a little brooke, and neere therevnto parteth it selfe in twaine. Of these two armes therefore one goeth to a bridge of stone, the other to another of timber, and sone after ioining againe, the maine riuer goeth to saint Gwinnowes, from thence also to the point of saint Gwinnowes wood, which is about halfe a mile from thence, except my memorie doth faile me. Here goeth in a salt creeke halfe a mile on the east side of the hauen, and at the head of it is a bridge called Lerine bridge; the creeke it selfe in like maner bearing the same denomination.

From Lerine creeke, to S. Caracs pill or creeke, is about halfe a mile, and lower on the east side of the said hauen: it goeth vp also not aboue a mile and an halfe into the land. From Caracs creeke to Poulmorland a mile, and this likewiſe goeth vp ſcant a quarter of a mile into the land, yet at the head it parteth it ſelfe in twaine. From Poulmorland weto Bodnecke village halfe a mile, where the paſſage and repaſſage is commonlie to Fawy. From Bodnecke to Pelene point (where a creeke goeth vp not fullie a thouſand paces into the land) a mile, thence to Poulruan a quarter of a mile, and at this Poulruan is a tower of force, marching againſt the tower on Fawy ſide, betweene which (as I do heare) a chaine hath ſometime beene ſtretched, and likelie inough; for the hauen there is hardly two bow ſhot ouer. The verie point of land at the eaſt ſide of the mouth of this hauen, is called Pontus croſſe, but now Panuche croſſe. It ſhall not be amiſſe in this place ſomewhat to intreat of the towne of Fawy, which is called in Cornish Comwhath, and being ſituat on the northſide of the hauen, is ſet hanging on a maine rockie hill, being in length about one-quarter of a mile, except my memorie deceiue me.

Comwhath.

The renowme of Fawy roſe by the wars vnder king Edward the firſt, Edward the third, and Henrie the fift, partlie by feats of armes, and partlie by plaine piracie. Finallie, the townesmen feeling themſelues ſomwhat at eaſe and ſtrong in their purſes, they fell to merchandize, and ſo they proſpered in this their new deuiſe, that as they trauelled into all places, ſo merchants from all countries made reſort to them, whereby within a while they grew to be exceeding rich. The ſhips of Fawy ſailing on a time by Rhie and Winchelſeie in the time of king Edward the third, refuſed ſtoutlie to vale anie bonet there, although warning was giuen them ſo to do by the portgreues or rulers of thoſe townes. Herevpon the Rhie and Winchelſeie men made out vpon them with cut and long taile: but ſo hardlie were they interteined by the Fawy pirates (I ſhould ſaie aduenturers) that they were driuen home againe with no ſmall loſſe and hinderance. Such fauour found the Fawy men alſo immediatlie vpon this bickering, that in token of their victorie ouer their winching aduerſaries, and riding ripiers (as they called them in mockerie) they altered their armes and compounded for new, wherein the ſcutchion of Rhie and Winchelſeie is quartered with theirs, and beſide this the Foyens were called the gallants of Fawy or Foy, whereof they not a little reioiſed, and more peraduenture than for ſome greater bootie. And thus much of Fawy towne, wherein we ſee what great ſucceſſe often commeth of witleſſe and raſh aduentures. But to returne againe to our purpoſe from whence we haue digreſſed, and as hauing ſome deſire to finiſh vp this our voiage, we will leaue the Fawmouth & go forward on our iournie.

Gallants of Foy or Fawy.

Being therefore paſt this hauen, we come into Trewardith baie, which lieth into the land betweene Canualle and the Blacke head point, and hereabout Leland placeth Vrſtoum promontorium. In this we ſaw the fall of two ſmall brookes, not one verie far diſtant from another. The firſt of them entring weſt of Trewardith, the other eaſt of ſaint Blaies, and both directlie againſt Curwarder rocke, except I miſtake my compaſſe. Neither of them are of anie great courſe, and the longeſt not full three miles and an halfe. Wherfore ſith they are neither branched nor of anie great quantitie, what ſhould I make long harneſt of a little corne, and ſpend more time than may well be ſpared about them?

When we were paſt the Blacke head, we came to Auſkell brooke, which is increaſed with a water that commeth from aboue Melwan, and within a mile after the confluence, they fall into the ſea at Pentozen, from whence we went by the Blacke rocke, and about the Dudman point, till we came to Chare baies, where falleth in a prettie water, whoſe head is two miles aboue ſaint Tues. Thence we went by here and there a meere ſalt creeke, till we paſſed the Graie rocke, in Gwindzaith baie, and S. Anthonies point, where Leland maketh his accompt to enter into Falamouth hauen.

Auſkell.

Chare.

The Fala riſeth a little by north of Penuenton towne, and going weſtward till it come downwards toward ſaint Dioniſe, it goeth from thence to Melader, ſaint Steuens Grampont, Goldon, Crede, Cornelete, Tregue, Morgan, Tregunnan, it falleth into the hauen with a good indifferent force: and this is the courſe of Fala. But leaſt I ſhould ſeeme to omit thoſe creekes that are betweene this and S. Anthonies point, I will go a little backe againe, and fetch in ſo manie of them, as come now to my remembrance. Entring therefore into the port, we haue a creeke that runneth vp by ſaint Anthonies toward ſaint Gereus, then another that goeth into the land by eaſt of ſaint Maries caſtell, with a forked head, paſſing in the meane time by a great rocke, that lieth in the verie midſt of the hauen, in maner of the third point of a triangle, betweene ſaint Maries caſtell and Pendinant.

Fala.

Thence we caſt about by the ſaid caſtell, and came by another creeke that falleth in by eaſt, then the ſecond aboue ſaint Iuſtus, the third at Ardenora, the fourth at Rilan. And hauing as it were viſited all theſe in order, we come backe againe about by Tregonnian, and then going vpward betweene it and Taluerne, till we came to Featangolan, we found the confluence of two great creekes beneath ſaint Clements, whereof one hath a freſh water comming downe by S. Werther, the other another from Truro, increaſed with ſundrie branches, though not one of them of anie greatneſſe, and therefore vnworthie to be handled. Pole hole ſtandeth vpon the head almoſt of the moſt eaſterlie of them. S. Kenwen and Truro ſtand aboue the confluence of other two. The fourth falleth in by woſſ from certeine hils: as for the firſt and firſt, as they be little creeks and no freſh, ſo haue I leſſe language and talke to ſpend about them.

Of ſaint Cate, and ſaint Feokes creeke, whoſe iſſue is betweene Kelſronget and creeke of Truric, I ſee no cauſe to make any long ſpeech; yet I remember that the towne of S. Feoke ſtandeth betweene them both. That alſo called after this ſaint, riſing aboue Perannarwothill, and comming thence by Kirklo, falleth into Falamouth, northeaſt of Miloz, which ſtandeth vpon the point betweene it and Miloz creeke. Miloz creeke is nert Kelſronget: ſome call it Miloz pole, from whence we went by Trefuſis point, and there found an other great fall from Perin, which being branched in the top, hath Perin towne almoſt in the verie confluence. And thus much by my collection of the fall. But for ſomuch as Leland hath taken ſome paines in the deſcription of this riuer, I will not ſuffer it to periſh, ſith there is other matter conteined therein worthie remembrance, although not deliuered in ſuch order as the thing it ſelfe requireth.

S. Cate. S. Feoke Miloz.

The verie point (ſaith he) of the hauen mouth (being an hill whereon the king hath builded a caſtell) is called Pendinant. It is about a mile in compaſſe, almoſt inuironed with the ſea: and where the ſea couereth not, the ground is ſo low that it were a ſmall matter to make Pendinant an Iland. Furthermore, there lieth a cape or foreland within the hauen a mile and a halfe, and betwixt this and maiſter Killigrewes houſe one great arme of the hauen runneth vp to Penrine towne, which is three miles from the verie entrie of Falamouth hauen, and two good

Leuine. miles from Penſuſis. Moreouer, there is Leuine, Priſelo, betwixt ſaint Budocus and Pendinas, which were a good hauen but for the barre of ſand. But to proceed.

The firſt creeke or arme that caſteth on the north-weſt ſide of Falemouth hauen, goeth vp to Perin, and at the end it breaketh into two armes, whereof the leſſe runneth to Glaſcuith, viridis nidus, the greene neſt, or Wagmere at Penrine: the other to ſaint Gluuias the parith church of Penrine. In like ſort out of each ſide of Penrine creeke, breaketh an arme yer it come to Penrine. This I vnderſtand alſo that ſtakes and foundations of ſtone haue béene ſet in the creeke at Penrine a litle lower than the wharfe, where it breaketh into armes: but howſoeuer this ſtandeth, betwixt the point of Trefuſis and Mylor. the point of Reſkronget is Mylor creeke, which goeth vp a mile into the land, and by the church is a good rode for ſhips. The next creeke beyond the point of Reſkronget wood, is called Reſkronget, which going Reſkronget. two miles vp into the maine, breaketh into two armes. In like order betwixt Reſkronget and the creeke of Truric be two creekes; one called ſaint S. Feokes. Feokes, the other ſaint Caie, next vnto which is S. Caie. Truric creeke that goeth vp about two miles creeking from the principall ſtreame, and breaketh within halfe a mile of Truric, caſting in a branch weſtward euen hard by Newham wood.

Truric creeke. This creeke of Truric is diuided into two parts before the towne of Truric, and each of them hauing a bꝛooke comming downe and a bꝛidge, the towne of Truric ſtandeth betwixt them both. In like ſort Kenwen ſtréet is ſeuered from the ſaid towne with this arme, and Clements ſtreet by eaſt with the other. Out of the bodie alſo of Truric creeke breaketh another eaſtward a mile from Crurie, and goeth vp a mile and a halfe to Creſilian bꝛidge of ſtone. At the verie entrie and mouth of this créeke is a rode of ſhips called Maples rode: and here fought not long ſince eightéene ſhips of Spaniſh merchants, with foure ſhips of warre of Dieppe, but the Spaniards draue the Frenchmen all into this harborow. A mile and an halfe aboue the mouth of Crurie creeke, is another named Lhan Morgan of S. Morgans church Morgan. at hand. This créeke goeth vp a quarter of a mile from the maine ſtreame into the hauen, as the maine ſtreame goeth vp two miles aboue Morgan creeke ebbing and flowing: and a quarter of a mile higher is the towne of Cregowie, where we found a bꝛidge of ſtone vpon the Fala riuer. Fala it ſelfe riſeth a mile or more weſt of Roche hill, and goeth by Graund pont, where I ſaw a bꝛidge of ſtone.

Graund pont. This Graund pont is foure miles from Roche hill, and two little miles from Cregowie, betwixt which the Fala taketh his courſe. From Cregowie to paſſe downe by the bodie of the hauen of Falamouth to the mouth of Lanie horne pill or créeke, on the ſouth ſide of the hauen is a mile, and (as I remember) it goeth vp halfe a mile from the principall ſtreame of the hauen. From Lanihorne pill alſo is a place or point of ſand about a mile wide of fortie acres or thereabout (as a peninſula) called Ardeuerauter. As for the water or créeke that runneth into the ſouth ſoutheaſt part, it is but a little thing of halfe a mile vp into the land, and the créeke that hemmeth in this peninſula, of both doth ſéeme to be the greater. From the mouth of the weſt creeke of this peninſula, vnto ſaint Iuſtes creeke, is foure miles or more.

In like maner from ſaint Iuſtes pill or créeke (for both ſignifie one thing) to ſaint Mawes creeke Gluſtus. S. Mawes. is a mile and a halfe, and the point betwéene them both is called Pendinas. The créeke of ſaint Mawes goeth vp a two miles by eaſt northeaſt into the land, and beſide that it ebbeth and floweth ſo farre, there is a mill driuen with a freſh créeke that reſorteth to the ſame. Halfe a mile from the head of this downeward to the hauen, is a créeke in maner of a pole, whereon is a mill alſo that grindeth with the tide. And a mile beneath that on the ſouth ſide entereth a créeke (about halfe a mile into the countrie) which is barred from the maine ſea by a ſmall ſandie banke, and another mile yet lower, is an other little créekelet. But how ſo euer theſe créekes do run, certeine it is that the bankes of them that belong to Fala are meruellouſlie well wooded. And hitherto Leland, whoſe words I dare not alter, for feare of corruption and alteration of his iudgement. Being paſt Falmouth hauen therefore (as it were a quarter of a mile beyond Arwennach, maiſter Killegrewes place which ſtandeth on the brimme or ſhore within Falmouth) we came to a little hauen which ran vp betwéene two hilles, but it was barred: wherefore we could not learne whether it were ſerued with anie backe freſh water or not.

From thence we went by Polwitherall créeke Polwitherall. (parted into two armes) then to the Polpenrith, Polpenrith. wherevnto a riueret falleth that riſeth not farre from thence, and ſo goeth to the maine ſtreame of the hauen at the laſt, whither the créeke reſorteth about three miles and more from the mouth of the hauen, and into which the water that goeth vnder Gare and Wike. Mogun bridges, do fall in one bottome (as Leland Gare. hath reported.) Vnto this hauen alſo repaireth the Mogun. Penkeſtell, the Callous, the Cheſtow, and the Gil- Penkeſtell. Callous. Cheſtow. ling, although this latter lieth againſt ſaint Mawnons on the hither ſide hard without the hauen mouth Gilling. (if I haue done aright.) For ſo motheaten, mouldie, & rotten are thoſe bookes of Leland which I haue, and beſide that, his annotations are ſuch and ſo confounded, as no man can (in a maner) picke out anie ſenſe from them by a leaſe togither. Wherefore I ſuppoſe that he diſperſed and made his notes intricate of ſet purpoſe: or elſe he was loth that anie man ſhould eaſilie come to that knowledge by reading, which he with his great charge & no leſſe trauell atteined vnto by experience. Thus leauing Fala hauen, as more troubleſome for me to deſcribe, than profitable for ſeafaring men, without good aduiſe to enter into, we left the rocke on our left hand, and came ſtraight ſouthweſt to Helford hauen, whoſe water commeth downe from Wréeke (where is a confluence of two Helle. ſmall rilles whereof that rill conſiſteth) by Mawgan and Trelawarren, and then it receiueth a rill on the north ripe from Conſtantine, after whoſe confluence it goeth a maine vntill it come to the Ocean, where the mouth is ſpoiled by ſand comming from the tinworks. See Leland in the life of S. Breaca. Beneath this alſo is another rill comming from S. Martyns, by whoſe courſe, and another ouer againſt it on the weſt ſide that falleth into the ſea by Winniton, all Menage is left almoſt in maner of an Iland. From hence we go ſouth to the Manacle point, then ſouthweſt to Liſard, and ſo north and by weſt to Predannocke points, beyond which we méet with the fall of the ſaid water, that riſeth in the edge of Menag, and goeth into the ſea by Melien on the north, and Winniton on the ſouth. By north alſo of Winniton is the Curie water that runneth ſhort of Magan, and touCurie. cheth with the Ocean ſouth of Pengwenian point.

From hence we ſailed to the Lo mouth, which ſome Lo. call Lopole, becauſe it is narrower at the fall into the ſea, than it is betwéene the ſea and Hailſton. It riſeth aboue S. Sethians, and comming downe by Wendron, it haſteth to Hailſton or Helſton, from whence onelie it is called Lo: but betwéene Helſton and the head, men call it commonlie Cohor. Of this riuer Leland ſaith thus: The Lopole is two miles in length, and betwixt it and the maine Ocean is but a barre of ſand that once in three or foure yéeres, what by weight of the freſh water, and working of the ſea breaketh out, at which time it maketh a wonderfull noiſe: but ſone after the mouth of it is barred vp againe. At all other times the ſuperfluitie of the water of Lopole (which is full of trout and éele) draineth out through the ſandie barre into the open ſea: certes if this barre could alwaies be kept open, it would make a goodlie hauen vp vnto Hailetton towne, where coinage of tin is alſo vſed, as at Truric and Loſtwithiell, for the quéenes aduantage.

Being paſſed the Lo, I came to another water that deſcendeth without anie increaſe from Crowan by Simneie, whoſe whole courſe is not aboue three miles in all. Then going by the Cuddan point, we entered the mounts Baie, and going ſtreight north (leauing S. Michaels mount a little vpon the left hand) we came to the Lid, which riſing ſhort of Tewindnacke, deſcendeth by Lidgenan, and ſo into the ſea. Certes the courſe of theſe waters cannot be long, ſith in this verie place the breadth of land is not aboue foure miles, and not more than fiue at the verie lands end. There is alſo a rill eaſt of Bozugie, and Guluall, and another weſt of the ſame hard at hand, and likewiſe the third eaſt of Penſants: and not a full quarter of a mile from the ſecond, ſouthweſt of Penſants alſo lieth the fourth that commeth from Sancrete ward by Newlin, from whence going ſouthweſt out of the baie by Poulhole Ile, that lieth ſouth of Poulhole towne, we come to a water that entreth into the Ocean betwixt Remels & Lamorleie point. Trulie the one head thereof commeth from by weſt of Sancrete, the other from by weſt of an hill that ſtandeth betwéene them both, and ioining aboue Remels, it is not long yer they ſalute their grandame. After this, and before we come at Roſecaſtell, there are two other créekes, whereof one is called Boſkennie, that riſeth ſouth of ſaint Buriens, and an other ſomewhat longer than the firſt, that iſſueth by weſt of the aforeſaid towne, wherein is to be noted, that our cards made heretofore do appoint S. Buriens to be at the very lands end of Cornewall, but experience now teacheth vs, that it commeth not néere the lands end by three miles. This latter rill alſo is the laſt that I do reade of on the ſouth ſide, and likewiſe on the weſt and north, till we haue ſailed to S. Jes baie, which is full ten miles from the lands end, or Bzeſan Ile eaſtward, & rather more, if you reckon to the fall of the Haile, which lieth in the very middeſt and higheſt part of the baie of the ſame. The ſoile alſo is verie hillie here, as for ſaint Jes towne, it is almoſt (as I ſaid) a byland, and yet is it well watered with ſundrie rilles that come from thoſe hilles vnto the ſame.

The Haile riſeth in ſuch maner, and from ſo manie heads, as I haue before ſaid: howbeit I will adde ſomewhat more vnto it, for the benefit of my readers. Certes the chéefe head of Haile riſeth by weſt of Gwdalfin hilles, and going downe toward ſaint Erthes, it receiueth the ſecond, and beſt of the other three rilles from Gwdalfin towne: finallie, comming to ſaint Erthes, and ſo vnto the maine baie, it taketh in the Clowart water from Guimer, ſouth of Phelacke, which hath two heads, the ſaid village ſtanding directlie betwirt them both.

The Caine riſeth ſoutheaſt of Caineburne towne a mile and more, from whence it goeth without increaſe by weſt of Gwethian, and ſo into the ſea weſt of Mara Darwale. From hence we coaſted about the point, & left the baie till we came to a water that riſeth of two heads from thoſe hilles that lie by ſouth of the ſame: one of them alſo runneth by ſaint Uni, another by Redreuth, and méeting within a mile, they fall into the Ocean beneath Luggam or Tuggan. A mile and a halfe from this fall we come vnto another ſmall rill, and likewiſe two other créekes, betwixt which the towne of ſaint Agnes ſtandeth; and likewiſe the fourth halfe a mile beyond the moſt eaſterlie of theſe, whoſe head is almoſt three miles within the land in a towne called ſaint Alin. Thence going by the Manrocke, and weſt of ſaint Piran in the ſand, we find a courſe of three miles and more from the head, and hauing a forked branch, the parts do méet at weſt aboue ſaint Kibbard, and ſo go into the ſea. I take this to be ſaint Pirans créeke, for the next is Carantocke pill or créeke, whoſe head is at Gulwarth, from whence it goeth vnto Trerife, and ſone after taking in a rill from by weſt, it runneth into the ſea coaſt of ſaint Carantakes. Beyond this is another créeke that riſeth aboue little ſaint Colan, and goeth by leſſe ſaint Columbe: and eaſt and by north hereof commeth downe one more whoſe head is almoſt ſouth of the Nine ſtones, & going from thence to great ſaint Columbes, it paſſeth by Lamberne, and ſo into the ſea. S. Merous créeke is but a little one, riſing weſt of Padſtow, and falling in almoſt ouer againſt the Gull rocke. Then turning betwéene the point and the blacke rocke, we entred into Padſtow hauen three miles lower than port Iſſec, and a mile from port Gwin, whoſe waters remaine next of all to be deſcribed.

The Alan ariſeth flat eaſt from the hauen mouth of Padſtow, well néere eight or nine miles about Dauidſtone, neere vnto which the Eniam alſo iſſueth, that runneth into the Thamar. Going therefore from hence it paſſeth to Camelford, ſaint Aduen, ſaint Bernard (both Cornith ſaints) and ſone after receiueth a rill at northeaſt, deſcending from Rowters hill. Thence it goeth to Bliſeland, and Helham, the firſt bridge of name that ſtandeth vpon Alin. Yer long alſo it taketh in one rill by ſouth from Bodman, another from ſaint Laurence, the third by weſt of this, and the fourth that commeth by Methiell, no one of them exceeding the courſe of three miles, and all by ſouth. From hence it goeth toward Igleſaleward, and there receiueth a water on the eaſt ſide, which commeth about two miles from ſaint Teath, by Michelſton, ſaint Tuchoe, ſaint Maben (no Cornith patrons) and finallie ſouth of Igleſall, méeteth with the Alen that goeth from thence by S. Bzeaca to Woodbzidge. Hereabout I find, that into our Alein or Alen, there ſhould fall two riuerets, whereof the one is called Carneſeie, the other Laine, and comming in the end to full notice of the matter, I ſée them to iſſue on ſeuerall ſides beneath Woodbzidge almoſt directlie the one againſt the other. That which deſcendeth from northweſt, and riſeth about ſaint Kew, is named Carneſeie, as I heare: the other that commeth in on the ſouthweſt banke bight Laine, and noted by Leland to riſe two miles aboue S. Elſe. But howſoeuer this matter ſtandeth, there are two other créekes on ech ſide alſo, beneath theſe, as Pethzike créeke, and Minner créeke (ſo called of the Cornith ſaints) for that ſoile bred manie, wherewith I finiſh the deſcription of Alen, or (as ſome call it) Dunmere, and other Padſtow water.

From Padſtow hauen alſo they ſaile out full weſt to Waterford in Ireland. There are likewiſe two rockes, which lie in the eaſt ſide of the hauen, ſecretlie hidden at full ſea, as two pads in the ſtraw, whereof I thinke it taketh the name. Yet I remember how I haue read that Padſtow is a corrupted word for Adelſtow, and ſhould ſignifie ſo much as Athelſtani locus, as it may well be. For it is euident that they had in time paſt ſundrie charters of priuilege from Athelſtane, although at this preſent it be well ſtored with Iriſhmen. But to our purpoſe. Leland ſuppoſeth this riuer to be the ſame Camblan, where Arthur fought his laſt and fatall conflict: for to this daie men that dw eare the ground there, dw oft plow vp bones of a large ſize, and great ſtore of armour, or elſe it may be (as I rather coniecture) that the Romans had ſome field (or Caſtra) thereabout, for not long ſince (and in the remembrance of man) a braſſe pot full of Romane coine was found there, as I haue often heard. Being thus paſſed Padſtow hauen, and after we had gone three miles from hence, we came to Portgwin a proze fiſher towne, where I find a broke and a peere. Then I came to Portiſſee alias Cunilus two miles further, and found there a broke, a peere, and ſome ſuccor for fiſher boats. Next of all vnto a broke that ran from ſouth eaſt, directlie north into the Sauerne ſea, and within halfe a mile of the ſame laie a great blacke rocke like an Iland. From this water to Treuenni is about a mile, where the paroch church is dedicated to ſaint Simphorian, and in which paroch alſo Tintagell or Dundagle caſtell ſtandeth, which is a thing inexpugnable for the ſituation, and would be made with little reparations one of the ſtrongeſt things in England. For it ſtandeth on a great high terrible crag inuironed with the ſea. There is a chappell yet ſtanding in the dungeon thereof, dedicated to ſaint Vlet. Tintagell towne and Treuenni are not a mile in ſunder.

The next creeke is called Boſſinni, which is a mile from Tintagell, and to the ſame Tredwie water reſorteth, and ſo they go to the ſea betwixt two hils, whereof that on the one ſide lieth out like an arme or cape, and maketh the faſhion of an hauenet or peere, whither ſhiplets ſometime dw reſort for ſuccour. A frier of late daies toke vpon him to make an hauen at this place, but in vaine. There lie alſo two blacke rocks as Ilets, at the weſt northweſt point, or ſide of this creeke, the one (ſauing that a little gut doth part them) ioining with the other, and in theſe by all likelihod is great ſtore of gulles. I can not tell whether this be the water that runneth by Boſcaſtell or not, but if it be not, then haue I this deſcription of the latter. Boſcaſtell creeke that lieth eaſt of Tintagell, is but a ſmall thing, running at the moſt not aboue two miles into the land, yet it paſſeth by foure townes, whereof the firſt is called Leſneth, the ſecond ſaint Juliet, the third Minſter, and the fourth Boſcaſtell or Buſhcaſtell, as ſome men dw pronounce it.

In Bede baie I find the Bedewater, whoſe chiefe head is not farre from Norton. Thence running to Stratton, it receiueth the Lancels rill before it come at Norham. And here alſo it croſſeth another whoſe head is eaſt of ſaint Marie wyke, from whence it runneth by Wolſton and Whaleſborow, and thence into the ſea betweene Efford and Plough hill. And thus much of the waters that lie betweene the point of Cornewall, and the Hartland head vpon the north ſide of Cornewall. Now let vs dw the like with thoſe that remaine of Deuonſhire, whereof the ſaid Hartland is the verie firſt point in this our poeticall voiage. Hauing therefore brought Hartland point on our backs, we come next of all to Barſtable bar, and ſo into the hauen, whereinto two principall ſtreams dw perpetuallie vnburden their chanels.

Bede.

Lancels.

The firſt and more weſterlie of theſe is called Ocus, whoſe head is not farre weſt of the head of Darnt, and both in Darntmore. Riſing therefore in the aforeſaid place, it runneth northweſt to Snorton, and ſo to Okehampton, beneath which towne it meeteth with an other water comming from ſoutheaſt, & riſeth not much weſt from the head of Tawe. From hence it goeth to Stow Erborne, Monke Okington, & Iddeſleie, where it taketh in the Tauridge a verie prette ſtreamelet, whoſe iſſue is not full a mile by eaſt from the head of Thamar, three miles by north eaſt from Hartland. Comming therefore by weſt and eaſt Putford, Bulworthie, Bockington, Newton, and Shebbor, it receiueth a forked rill that runneth from ech ſide of Bradworthie by Sutcombe, Treborow, Milton, & ſo to Thornebirie, where meeting with an other forked water (whereof one head comming from Dunland, ioineth with the other north of Cockbirie) it goeth with ſpeed into the Tauridge water. After this confluence it runneth on to Sheepewaſh (by weſt whereof falleth in the Buckland water from by north) thence to high Hainton, and ſo to Hatherlaie, north wherof it taketh in a rill from by ſouth, and endeth his race at Iddeſleie, by ioining with the Oke. Hence then the Ocus haſteth to Dowland, and betweene it and Doulton, receiueth one rill from by eaſt, as it doth an other betweene Doulton and Parton from by weſt, and ſo proceeding on with his courſe, it commeth eaſt of Torrington the leſſe, and taking in a water at eaſt, that runneth from three heads (by Wollie parke) betweene which Combe and Roughborow are ſituat, it deſcendeth to Torington the more, and meeting with the Langtree water on the one ſide, and the Ware broke on the other, it proceedeth to Bedifor, croſſing a rill by the waie that commeth vnto it betweene Annarie & Litham. From Bedifor bridge it goeth without anie increaſe to Weſtleie, Norham, Apledoure, and ſo into the hauen.

The Taw of both is the more noble water, notwithſtanding that his hauen be barred with ſand; and thereby dangerous, and hath moſt rils deſcending into his chanell. Howbeit, by theſe two is all the hart of Deuonſhire well watered on the northſide of the mores. The Tawy riſeth directlie at ſouth weſt of Throwleie, and north of the head of Darnt, or (as Leland ſaith) in Ermore ſouth eaſt from Barſtable. From thence alſo it runneth to Sele, South Taueton, Cockatre, Bath, Northtaueton, Alhridge, Colridge, and ſome after receiueth the Bowmill creeke, wherof one head riſeth at Bow, the other at Mill, and meeting beneth Biſhops Morchard, they fall into the Taw north of Nimeth Rowland, as I haue beene informed. From hence then it runneth by Edgeforth, to Chimligh, by ſouth whereof it meeteth with a rill comming downe of two heads from about Rakenford, by Wetheridge and Chawleie. Thence it goeth to Burrington, and Chiltenholtwod, and there taketh in the Houlebraie water conſiſting of two in one chanell, wherof the Holl doth riſe aboue north Moulton, and comming to Moulton receiueth another rill running from Holland, and ſome after the ſecond that growing by two brokes (the head of one being at Knawſton, and of the other weſt of Crokeham, and both uniting themſelues beneath Mariſton) doth fall into the ſame yer long alſo, and ſo go togither till it croſſe the Braie, which (being the ſecond of the two that maketh the Houlbraie) riſeth at Braie, commeth by Buckland, and ſouth of Holtwod doth make his confluence with Taw. Being paſt the wod, it goeth on to Brightleie hall, Taueton, Taueſtocke, & Barſtable, ſometime a prette walled towne with foure gates, but now a little thing; and ſuch in deed, as that the ſuburbes thereof are greater than it ſelfe. I ſuppoſe that the name of this towne in the Britiſh ſpeach was Abertaw, becauſe it ſtood toward the mouth of Taw, and Berdneſſe pronounced ſhort (as I geſſe) for Aberneſſe. As for Staple, it is an addition for a market, & therefore hath nothing to dw in the proper name of the towne. King Athelſtane is taken here for the chiefe priuileger of the towne. This is alſo worthie to be noted hereof, that the houſes there are of stone, as most are in all the good townes thereabout.

But to proceed with our purpose. Beneath this towne there falleth in a water that hath one head neere about Challacombe, & another at east Downe, whereof this descending by Stoke riuer, and the other by Sherwell, they vnite themselues within three miles of Barstaple. Soone after also it taketh in another that descendeth from Bitenden by Ashford, and the last of all east of saint Anthonies chappell, named the Doneham, bicause one head is at west Done, and the other at Yam, both of them meeting west of Ash. And thus is Taue described, which is no great water nor quicke streame, as may appeere in Low water marke at Barstable, and yet is it a prettie riueret. This also is worthie to be noted thereof, that it receiueth no brooke from by west, whereof I would somewhat maruell, if Taurige were not at hand.

Donehaw.

Being past the Taue, Cride baie and Bugpoint alias Bagpoint, we go by Moze baie, Mortstone alias Mortstone, and then toward the northeast, till we come by a creekelet to Ilfare combe, & so to Combe Marton, whereat (I meane ech of them) are sundrie creekes of salt water, but not serued with anie fresh that I as yet do heare of. Marrie there is betweene Martinbow & Trenslow, a creeke that hath a backewater, which descendeth from Parracombe (so farre as I call to mind named Parradine becke) but the greatest of all is betweene Linton and Conisberie called Oze, which riseth in Summersetshire in Exmoze (east of Moze oke, moze than a mile) and going by Owze, falleth into the sea betweene Linton and Conisberie, so that the whole race thereof amounteth in and out to an eight miles, as I haue heard reported. Thus haue I finished the discourse of the waters of Deuonshire, whose breadth in this place from hence ouerthwart to the Checkstones in the mouth of Ex, on the south side of the Ile, is eight and thirtie miles or vnder fortie, and so much likewise is it from Plimmouth to Hartland point, but the broadest part there commeth to six and thirtie miles, whereas the broadest part of Cornewall doth want two miles of fortie.

The breadth of Deuonshire & Cornewall.

Being past the aforesaid limits of the counties we came to Portloch baie, whither commeth a water named Loch that descendeth from Stokepero, Lucham and Portloch without increase. Thence to Dunkeir brooke, which runneth from about Wotton, and Courtneie by Tunbercombe and Dunkeir, then to another that commeth west of Old Cliffe, leauing a parke on the west side, next of all to Watchet water, whereof one head commeth from the Quantocke hils south of Bickualer by Westquantocke head, and almost at Monisord, receiueth the Williton becke, then to east Quantocke brooke (omitting a creeket) & next of all to Doddington water, that goeth by Holford, Alforton, and afterward into the sea. From hence we go by Bottesall point, to Stert point, where two noble riuers do make their confluence, which I will seuerallie describe, as to my purpose apperteineth.

The first of these is called the Iuell, or (as I find it in an ancient writer) Pow, who saith that the riuer Pow doth runne from Ilchester to Bridgewater, and so into the sea. It riseth aboue Oburne, and at Shirburne receiueth a water, whereof Leland saith thus. There are seuen springs in an hill called the seuen sisters, north east from Shireburne, which gather into one bottome, & come into the Mere. Another brooke likewise commeth by Yeidon from Puscandell, three miles from thence by flat east, betwixt the parke and the Mere full so great as the streame of the Mere, and ioining at the lower mill of Shireburne, with the Mere water, it is not long yer it fall into the Euill. Thence our Euill goeth on towards Glaston Bradford, and yer it come there taketh in a forked rill from by south, descending from about west Chelburie and Chetnall in Dorsetshire, beneath which towne the other head falleth into the same, so that they run forth by Bearhaggard and Thorneford (till they meet with the Iuell) and so to Clifton, Euill a proper market towne, Trent, Putford, Alhinton, and east of Limminton it meeteth with the Cade that runneth from Parlington, by north Cadbirie, and sone after crossing a rill also from by east, that commeth from Blackeford by Compton, it hasteth to south Cadbirie, Sparkeford, Quenes Camell, west Camell, and so into Iuell, which runneth on to Kimmington, Ilchester, Ilbridge, long Sutton, and yer it come at Langport, taketh in two famous waters in one chanell, next of all to be remembred before I go anie further. The first of all these riseth southeast betweene the Parrets (where it is called Parret water) and goeth to Crokehorne, and at Merlot taketh in a brooke from the east, which consisteth of two courses vnited at Bowbridge, whereof the one descendeth from Pen by Hasilburie, the other from aboue the three Chenocks, as I do vnderstand.

Cade.

Parret.

From hence also they go as one with the Parret water, toward south Pederton (taking in at east a becke comming from Hamden hill) thence to Pederton, Lambrooke, Thorneie bridge, and Puchelneie where it meeteth with the second called Ill or Ilus, whose head is aboue Chellington, & comming downe from thence by Cadworth, before it come at Dunniet, it taketh in a rill that runneth by Chalcombe and Knoll. Thence leauing Ilminster on the east side, it meeteth with another from by east, descending from about Whitlakington. Then it goeth to Pokington (where it crosseth the Ilton water by west) next to Ilbruers, and there it ioineth with a rillet that riseth by west at Staple, and runneth by Bicknell and Abbats Ilie, and after this confluence goeth on toward Langport. And here after some mens opinion, the Iuell loseth his name, and is called Parret: but this coniecture cannot hold, sith in the old writers it is called Iuell, till it fall into the sea. Nevertheless, how soeuer this matter standeth, being past Langport, it goeth by Awber toward saint Anthonies, where it meeteth with the Tone next of all to be described.

The seuen sisters.

The Tone issueth at Clatworthie, and goeth by west of Wiuelscombe, to Stawleie, Ritford, Runton, Wellington and Bradford, beneath which it taketh in a faire water coming from Sanford Combe, Elworthie, Brunt Rale, Piluerton, Oke and Hilfarens. After this confluence also it runneth to Helebridge, and there below meeteth with one water that runneth by Hawse, Hethford and Norton, then another from Crokeham by bishops Slediard, and the third & fourth at Taunton, that descendeth from Kingston by north, and another by south that riseth about Pidminster. And thus is the Tone increased, which goeth from Taunton to Kilton, Crech, Northcurrie, Ling, and so by Anthonie into the Iuell, that after this confluence meeteth yer long with the Chare, a prettie riuer that commeth by east from Northborow, by Carleton, Badcare, Litecare, Somerton, Yigham, Audzle more, Audzle, and Pitchellborow. From whence going on betweene Quenes more and North more, it receiueth one brooke called Peder from by southwest, that runneth through Pederton parke and North more; and likewise another that passeth by Durleie, yer it do come at Bridgewater. From Bridgewater it goeth by Chilton directlie northwest, and then turning flat west, it goeth northward towards the sea, taking in two waters by the waie, whereof one runneth by Coꝛpole & Camington, and beareth the name of Camington, the other by Sidding ton and Comage, and then receiuing the Bꝛier before it come at Start point, they fall as one into the Ocean, whereof let this ſuffice foꝛ the deſcription of the Iuell, whoſe ſtreame doth water all the weſt part of Summerſetſhire and leaueth it verie fruitfull.

Camington. Bꝛier.

Bꝛier. Leland writeth the firſt Bricuclus and the ſecond Mellodunus of the Milton water.

The Bꝛier, Bꝛuer, oꝛ Bꝛéer, riſeth of two waters, whereof one is in Selwood foꝛreſt, & commeth downe by Bꝛuecombe, Bꝛuham, and Bꝛuton. The other which Leland nameth Mellos, is noꝛtheſt of Staffoꝛdell towne, and going by the ſame, it runneth by Redlinch, to Wike; where it mæteth with the other head, and thence go on as one to Awnſfoꝛd, Alfoꝛd (where it taketh in a water called Dulis from by noꝛth that riſeth néere Dolting, and commeth by Euerchurch parke) then to the Lidfoꝛds, Baſboꝛow wood, the Coꝛ hill, Pont perilous (whereinto they fable that Arthur being wounded to death did thꝛow Calibur his ſwoꝛd) by Glaſtenburie and ſo into the Méere. Beſide this riuer there are two other alſo that fall into the ſaid Méere, whereof the one called Solwaie commeth from Cꝛéechurch parke, and Pulton by Hartlacke bꝛidge, the other named Cos oꝛ the Coſcombe water, from aboue Shepton, Mallet (which caſt of Wike taketh in a water comming from Welles) by Wike, Gedneie, and ſo into the Méere. Finallie, returning all into one chanell, it runneth to Burtlehouſe, and ſone after diuiding it ſelfe, one arme goeth by Baſtian aliàs Bꝛent bꝛidge, to Pigh bꝛidge, leauing Huntſpill a market towne by ſouthweſt, the other by Parke to Rokes bꝛidge, Hebbes paſſage, and ſo into the ſea, leauing a faire Iland, wherin beſide Bꝛentmarth are ſeuen oꝛ eight townes, of whoſe names I haue no knowledge.

Howaie oꝛ Stowaie. Dulis. Cos.

Now as touching the water that commeth from Welles, which falleth (as I ſaid) into the Coſcombe water on the right hand of the Cawſeie; you ſhall vnderſtand that as manie ſpꝛings are in Wels, ſo the chiefe of them is named Andꝛes well, which riſeth in a medow plat not farre from the eaſt end of the cathedꝛall church, and afterward goeth into the Coſcombe, in ſuch place as I haue noted. Leland ſpeaketh of the Milton & Golafer waters, which ſhould fall likewiſe into the Bꝛier: but whether thoſe be they whereof the one riſeth aboue Staffoꝛdell, and in the deſcent runneth by Shipton, Pitcombe, and ſo to Awnſfoꝛd on the one ſide, as the other doth riſe betweene Batcombe and Upton noble on the other halfe; oꝛ vnto whether of them either of theſe names are ſeuerallie to be attributed: as yet I do not read.

Milton. Golafer.

Are. The Cheder bꝛooke, dꝛiueth twelue miles within a quarter of a mile of his head.

The ſecond Are which commeth by Are towne in old time called Uera, iſſueth out of Diwkie hole, from whence it goeth by Diwkie towne, afterward mæting with the Cheder bꝛooke that commeth from the Cheder rocks, wherein is an hole in old time called Carcer Æoli, whereof much hath béene written & ſurmiſed paſt credit. It runneth by Were, Ratcliffe, and after a little compaſſe into the noꝛtheaſt bꝛanch of the afoꝛeſaid riuer laſt deſcribed, betweene Rokes bꝛidge and Hebbes paſſage, as I haue béene informed. From the fall of Are we come to an other called Bane, noꝛtheaſt of Wiwdſpꝛing, whoſe head is about Banwell parke, oꝛ elſe in Smaldon wood. Then to another, and to the third, called Artro, which riſeth about Litton, and going by the Artroes, Abbeie, Perꝛibꝛidge (receiuing a rill yer it come thither from by ſouth) beneath Cungelbirie, oꝛ (as I learne) betweene Kingſton and Laurence Wike, it mæteth with the ſea.

Bane. Artro.

Sotteſpill. Sotteſpill water riſeth betweene Cheueleie and Malleſeie, howbeit it hath no increaſe before it come into the ſea at Sotteſpill, more than the next vnto it, which is named Cleueden water, of a certeine towne nære to the fall thereof. It riſeth ſoutheaſt of Barrow, goeth by Burton Malleſeie, and ſo vnto Cleueden. The Auon, commonlie called the third Auon, is a gœdlie water, and growne to be verie famous by ſundꝛie occaſions, to be particularlie touched in our deſcription of Bꝛiſtow. Yet thus much will I note héere thereof as a rare accident, how that in king Edgars dales, the verie ſame yeare that the old monaſterie of Euetham fell downe by it ſelfe, a poꝛpaſſe was taken therein nære to the ſaid monaſterie, and neuer anie before oꝛ ſince that time heard of to haue béene found in that ſtreame. And euen ſo not manie yeares before I firſt wrote this treatiſe, a ſturgion was taken aliue in Rocheſter ſtreame, which the biſhop gaue vnto your honoꝛ, and you would as gladlie haue ſent it to the quéenes maieſtie, if ſhe might haue béene preſented withall aliue as it was taken. Certes both theſe rare occurrents gaue no leſſe occaſion of ſtrange ſurmiſes to the inhabitants of both places, than the blockes of Bꝛerton, when they appeare, do vnto that familie; of which the repoꝛt goeth that they are neuer ſéene but againſt ſome miſchéefe oꝛ other to befall vnto that houſe. But how farre am I gone from my purpoſe?

Cleueden. Auon. 3. Sturgion taken in Rocheſter water.

The Auon therefoꝛe riſeth in the verie edge of Tetburie, and goeth by long Newton to Bꝛokenton, Whitchurch, and Malmſburie, where it receiueth two waters, that is to ſaie, one from by weſt comming by Foreleie and Bꝛomleham, which runneth ſo nære to the Auon in the weſt ſuburbe of Malmſburie, that the towne thereby is almoſt made an Iland. Another from Okeleie parke by Hankerton, Charleton, and Gareſden. After this confluence it haſteth to Cole parke, then goeth it toward the ſoutheaſt, till it mæt with a water comming from ſouthweſt (betwéene Hullauington and Bꝛadfield) by Alton: and ſone after with another at the noꝛthſide from Binall by Motton Baſſet (thꝛough the parke to Gretenham, and Idouer bꝛidges) and after the confluence to Dauntſeie, Segar, Sutton, Chriſtmalford, Auon, Calwaies houſe, and then to weſt Tetherton. Beneath this towne alſo it taketh in a water increaſed by two bꝛookes, whereof one comming from Cleue by Hilmarton, Whitleie houſe and Bꝛamble (and there receiuing another that commeth by Calne) paſſeth on by Stanlie into the Auon, which from thence foꝛth goeth to Chippenham, Kolwdon, Lekham, and then receiuing Colham water, goeth to Lacocke, Mellham, and yer it come at Whaddon, croſſeth two other in one chanell, whereof one riſeth about Bꝛumham houſe, and goeth to Sene, the other about the Diuizes, and from thence runneth to Potterne wood, Creke wood, Woꝛton, Malton, Bucklington, and ioining with the other aboue Litleton, they run by Semmington, and noꝛth of Whaddon afoꝛeſaid into the maine ſtreame, whereof I now intreat. From hence our Auon runneth to Stauerton, and ſouthweſt of that towne mæteth with the Were that commeth from Upton by Milton, Bꝛooke parke (there croſſing a rill called Biſſe from Weſtbirie vnder the plaine) then to noꝛth Bꝛadleie, Trubꝛidge, and ſo into Auon that goeth from thence to Bꝛadfoꝛd, & within a mile oꝛ thereabouts, before it come at Freſhfoꝛd, it mæteth with the Frome, whoſe deſcription doth inſue.

Colham. were. weſtbirie vnder ỳ plaine, neuer without a theéle oꝛ twaine.

The Frome riſeth in the eaſt part of Mendip hils, and from thence runneth by Aſtwie, the Colepits, Lie vnder Mendip, Whateleie, Elmeſbꝛidge, and ſone after taketh in the Nonneie water, comming from Nonneie caſtell, thence to Walles and Dꝛcharleie bꝛidge, where it receiueth a pretie bꝛooke deſcending from Frome Selwood weſt of Brackleie, increaſed with ſundrie rils, whereof two come out of Selwood foreſt (and one of them from the Fratrie) another out of Long lead parke, from Horningſham, and the fourth from Coſſeie. Hence our Frome goeth to Lullington, Beckington, Farleie caſtell, Boord and Freſh ford, and taking in the Silling brooke, falleth into the Auon beneath Bradford, and eaſt of Freſhford. From thence going beneath Stoke, it receiueth on the left hand a water comming from ſouthweſt, increaſed by ſundrie brookes, whereof one commeth from Camelet by Litleton, and Dankerton, the other from Stone Eſton, Midſummer Norton, by Welſton, Rodſtocke, Wrigleton, Foſcot, and Wellow, and there (taking in a rill from Phillips Norton) it goeth by Clauerton to Hampton, and there it meeteth with another water comming from Barthford, whoſe head is at Litleton from whence it runneth by weſt Kineton to Caſtell combe (where it ioineth with a rill riſing by north from Litleton druе) and thence commeth ſouth to Slaughtenford, Haſelburie, Box, Baſthford, and ſo into the Auon, which turning plaine weſt, haſteth to Baſthwike, and (meeting with another in his paſſage from Caldaſton) to Bath, the Tiuertons, and Coſton.

Frome. Nonneie.

Silling.

Heere alſo it taketh in a rill by the waie from Markeſburie by Milmerton and Newton, and then going on to Salwford, it meeteth with one rill ſome weſt of Northſtocke, named Swinford, and another by Bitton, from Durhain by Wike, and ſo proceedeth ſtill holding on his way to Caimſham, a towne in Summerſet ſhire (ſo called of Caim an Engliſh ſaint, by whoſe praiers, as the countrie once beleeued, all the adders, ſnakes and ſerpents were turned into ſtone, their formes reſerued, and for a certeine ſpace of ground about the ſaid towne, and whereof ſome ſtore as yet is to be found in thoſe quaries. But this miracle is ſo true as the hiſtorie of Hilda, or that S. Patrike ſhould chaſe all venemous creatures out of Italie with his ſtaffe; or that maid Radegund ſhould driue the crowes to the pound, which did annoie hir corne while ſhe went vnto a chappell to heare & ſee a maſſe) where it croſſeth the Chute, which iſſueth at Winford, and goeth by biſhops Chue to Penford, and there receiueth the Clue comming from Cluton, and from thence to Chute, & ſo into the Auon. The Auon likewiſe after all theſe confluences goeth to Braiſelton, and ſo to Braſſow, beneath which it receiueth a rill on each ſide (whereof one commeth from about Stoke lodge in Glocеſterſhire, being a faire water and running by Acton, Frampton, Hambroch, Stapleton, and through Braſſow, the other by ſouth from Mundreie hill and towne, by Biſport and Bedminſter) and ſo deſcending yet lower, goeth to Rawneham paſſage and Cliſton, then by S. Vincents rocke and Lake, next of all to Crocampill, and finallie into the ſea, whither all waters by nature do reſort.

Swinford.

Swinford parteth Summerſet & Glocеſterſhires in ſunder.

Beſide this water, Leland maketh mention of Alderleie brooke, which in ſome ancient records is alſo called Auon, and runneth by Barkeleie. In like maner he talketh of Dourefleie becke, whoſe principall head is in Dourefleie towne: howbeit he ſaith no thing of it more, than that it ſerueth ſundrie tucking lucking milles, and goeth by Torſworth or foure miles further, before it come at the Sauerne. Finallie, making mention of an excellent quarrie of hard ſtone about Dourefleie, he telleth of the Torſworth becke, that runneth within a ſtight ſhot of Barkeleie towne, and falleth on the left hand into Sauerne marches, taking with all the Alderleie or Auon, except I miſtake his meaning, which may ſone be done among his confuſed notes.

Chap. 13.

THe Sauerne which Ptolomie calleth Sabriana, Tacitus Sabrina, diuideth England or that part of the Iland, which ſometime was called Lhoegres from Cambria, ſo called of Camber, the ſecond ſonne of Brute, as our hiſtories do report. But now that region hight Wales, of the Germane word Walth, whereby that nation doth vſe to call all ſtrangers without reſpect of countrie. This riuer toke the name of a certeine ladie, called Habren or Hafren, baſe daughter to Locrinus begotten vpon Eſtrildis daughter to Humber otherwiſe called Cumbrus or Umar, and for which ſome write Chonibrus king of Scithia, that ſometime inuaded this Iſland, and was ouerthrowne here in the daies of this Locrinus, as ſhall be ſhewed at hand: although I ſuppoſe rather that this ladie was called Ine, and that the word Sabrina is compounded of Aber and Ine, and the letter S added Propter euphoniam: for the mouth or fall of euerie riuer in the Britiſh ſpeech is called Aber, whereby Aber Ine is ſo much to ſaie as, the fall of Ine. But let vs returne againe to our diſcourſe of Humber or Umar, which is worthie to be remembred. Sauerne.

For after the death of Locrinus, it came to paſſe that Guendolena his wife ruled the kingdome in the nonage of hir ſonne: and then getting the ſaid Eſtrildis and Habren hir daughter into hir hands, ſhe drowned them both in this riuer. And in perpetuall remembrance of hir huſbands diſloialtie towards hir, ſhe cauſed the ſtreame to be called Habren of the yong ladie, for which the Romans in proceſſe of time for readineſſe and mildneſſe of pronunciation, wrote Sabrina, and we at this time do pronounce the Sauerne. Of the drowning of the ſaid Abren alſo I find theſe verſes inſuing:

In fluuium præcipitatur Abren,
Nomen Abren, fluuio de virgine, nomen eidem

But to returne to our Sauerne. It falleth into the maine ſea betweene Wales and Cornewall, which is and ſhall be called the Sauerne ſea, ſo long as the riuer doth keepe hir name. But as the ſaid ſtreame in length of courſe, bountie of water, and depth of chanell commeth farre behind the Thames: ſo for other commodities, as trade of merchandize, plentie of cariage, & ſtore of all kind of fiſh, as ſalmon, trouts, breames, pikerell, tench, perch, &c: it is nothing at all inferiour or ſecond to the ſame. Finallie, there is nothing to be diſcommended in this riuer, but the openneſſe thereof in manie places to the weather, whereby ſundrie perils oft ouertake ſuch as fiſh or ſaile in ſmall veſſels on the ſame.

The head of this noble ſtreame is found in the high mounteines of ſouth Wales called Helennith or Plim limmon: in Engliſh, the blacke mounteins, or more heads, from whence alſo the Wie and the Rhidoll do proceed: and therefore theſe three waters are commonlie called the three ſiſters, and haue in latitude two and fiftie degrees ten minutes, in longitude fifteene and fiftie, as the deſcription inſueth. So ſone as it is out of the ground, it goeth ſoutheaſtward, till it come within a mile of Laundlos, where it receiueth a chanell from by ſouth ſouthweſt, called the Dulas, which commeth thereinto on the ſouth ſide, & ſouthweſt of Lan Idlos. It riſeth (as it ſhould ſeeme) of diuerſe heads in the edge of Radnorſhire, and taking in ſundrie ſmall rilles, it meeteth at the laſt with the Brueham broke, and ſo they go togither till they fall into the Sauerne. Beneath Lan Idlos it taketh in the Clewdogh from northweſt, a water produced by the influence of foure prettie brokes, whereof one is called Bacho, another Dungum comming out of lin Glaſlin, the third Lhoid riſing in lin Begilin, and the moſt ſoutherlie called Bigga. After which confluence our Sauerne procéedeth on by Berhlaid toward Landiman, taking in by the waie, on the eaſt ſide the Couine, thence to Cairfuſe caſtell, where it meeteth with the Carnon, and the Taran both in one chanell, and going not far from the aforeſaid fortreſſe. After this it croſſeth the Hawes on the north halfe beneath Aberhawes, next of all the Duleſſe that riſeth in the edge of Radnor ſhire, and meeteth with it before it come at Newton in Powiſſe, otherwiſe called Trenewith, as I find in Britiſh language. Being come to Trenewith, I cannot eſchue (right honorable) to giue one note, as by the waie, touching the originall of my ladie your bedfellowes anceſtrie, which came from hence, & were ſurnamed Newtons onelie, for that the grandfather of ſir John Newton either dwelled or was borne there: otherwiſe the right name is Caradoc, for which ſome do corruptlie write Cradocke, reſpecting rather the ſhortneſſe of pronuntiation, than the true orthographie and writing of the word. Certes the Caradockes haue béene, and yet are a linage of great honor, antiquitie, and ſeruice; their lands alſo ſometime belonged (for the moſt part) to the noble Gonnoanies of Summerſetſhire: but in what order they deſcended to the Newtons, in good ſooth I cannot tell. But to proceed with our riuer, which being paſt Newton, runneth forth by Landilouarne, and ſo forth on till it come to the fall of the Mule, whoſe head is in the edge of Radnor alſo, and thereto his paſſage by Kerie and Lanmereiwie. After this alſo it procéedeth further till it meet with the Kenlet or the Camalet, which taketh in alſo the Tate or Tadbrooke water riſing out of the hilles a mile from Biſhops towne, the whole courſe thereof being about ſeauen miles from the head (as I haue often heard.) Of this alſo I find two deſcriptions, whereof one I borrow out of Leland, who ſaith that it is a prettie broke, running in the vale by Mountgomerie, and comming within halfe a mile of the place where Chirbirie priorie ſtood, it falleth into the Sauerne about a mile from thence. Of the rilles (ſaith he) that run from the hilles thorough Mountgomerie, which are a mile from the Sauerne ſhore, and likewiſe of the Lan Idlos broke that méeteth withall within foure miles of the head, I ſpeake not, but thinke it ſufficient to touch thoſe of ſome eſtimation, onelie leauing the reſt to ſuch as maie hereafter deale with things more particularlie as time and trauell maie reueale the truth to them. And hitherto Leland, whoſe words I dare not alter. But another noteth this Camalet or Kenlet to run by More, Liddiom, Sned, Churchſtocke, Chirbirie, Walcote, and Winſbirie, and ſo into the Sauerne.

From hence then, and after this confluence it goeth on by Forden, Leighton, and Landbreuie toward Peluerleie, and there it méeteth with ſundrie waters in one chanell, whereof the one called the Tanet is a verie prettie water (whereinto the Peuereie or Marnewie doth fall, which deſcendeth from the hilles by weſt of Patrafall not farre from Lhan Flin) the other Auernie, and ioining beneath Abertannoth, or aboue Lannamonach nere vnto the ditch of Offa, it is not long yer they méet with the Mordant broke, and there loſe their names ſo ſone as they ioine and mix their waters with it. The head of the Mordant iſſueth out of the Lanuerdan hilles, where diuerſe ſaie, that the pariſh church of croſſe Oſwald or Oſwelter ſometimes ſtood. Certes, Oſwelter is thirtéene miles northweſt from Shrewſburie, and conteineth a mile within the walles. It hath in like ſort foure ſuburbs or great ſtrétes, of which one is called Stratlan, another Wulfho, the third Beterich, wherein are one hundred and fortie barns ſtanding on a row belonging to the citizens or burgeſſes, and the fourth named the Blackegate ſtréet, in which are thirtie barns mainteined for corne & haie. There is alſo a broke running thorough the towne by the croſſe, comming from Simons well, a bow ſhote without the wall; & going vnder the ſame betweene Thorowgate & Newgate, running vnder the Blacke gate. There is another, ouer whoſe courſe the Baderikes or Bederich gate ſtandeth, and therefore called Bederich broke. The third palleth by the Willigate or Newgate, & theſe fall all togither with the Croſſe broke, a mile lower by ſouth into the Mordant that runneth (as I ſaid) by Oſwelter. From hence alſo it goeth to Mordant towne, and betwéene Landbreuie and Peluerleie doth fall into the Sauerne. After this our principall ſtreame goeth to Sheauerdon caſtell, Mountford, and Bicton chappell: and here it receiueth a water on the left hand, that riſeth of two heads, whereof one is aboue Perton, the other at Ellſmere, and ioining betweene Woodhouſes & Bagleie, the confluence runneth on by Radnall, Halton, Teddeſmer, Roiton, Balſchurch, Walford, Grafton, Witton, and ſo into the Sauerne. From hence it runneth to Fitz, Eton, or Leiton, Barwije, vpper Roſſall, Shelton, and ſo to Shrewſburie, where it croſſeth the Pele water, whoſe head (as I heare) is ſaid to be in Weſton.

The Pele therefore riſing at Weſton, goeth by Brocton, Worthen, Aſton Pigot, Weſtleie, Aſterleie, and at Lea it méeteth with the Haberleie water that commeth downe by Pontesford and Aunſton. After this confluence alſo it runneth to Newenham & Crokemele, there taking in a rill on the other ſide that deſcendeth by Weſtburie and Stretton, & thence going on to Hanwood, Noball, Pulleie, Bracemele, and Shrewſburie, it falleth (as I ſaid) into the open Sauerne. From hence our Sauerne hafteth to Aſſington, Preſton, and betwéene Chilton and Brampton taketh in the Terne, a faire ſtreame and worthie to be well handled; if it late in me to performe it. This riuer riſeth in a mere beſide Welbridge parke, nére vnto Ternemere village in Staffordſhire. From whence it runneth by the parkes ſide to Knighton, Norton, Betton, and at Draiton Hales croſſeth with a water comming from about Adbaſton (where maiſter Brodocke dwelleth) and runneth by Chippenham and Amming: ſo that the Terns on the one ſide, and this broke on the other, do incloſe a great part of *Blore heath, where a noble battell was ſometime purpoſed betwéene king Henrie the firſt, and the duke of Yorke: but it wanted execution.

But to procéed. After this confluence, it runneth to Draiton Hales, Ternehill bridge: and yet long taking in a rill from Sandford by Blechleie, it goeth to Stoke Allerton, Peplaw, and Eaton, where it croſſeth with a broke that riſeth about Brinton, and going by Higham, Norton, the great Mere, Forton, Pilſon, Pickſtocke, Reinton, Tibberton, and Bolas, it ioineth with the ſaid Terne not farre from Water Upton. Thence paſſing to Crogenton, it méeteth with another broke that commeth from Chalt'uen Aſton, by Newport, Longford, Aldneie, and ſo through the Wilde more to Kinſleie & Slépe, and finallie into the Terne, which hafteth from thence to Eſton bridge, and nére vnto Walcote taketh in the Roden. This water riſeth at Halton in Cumbermere lake: and comming to Duenleie, croſſeth a rill from Cowlemere by Leniall. Thence it goeth to Horton, and (ioining with another rill beneath Nonlaie that commeth from Pidle) runneth on to Wen, Aſton, there croſſing a rill beneath Lacon hall from Pꝛées ward, and ſo to Lée, Becford, Stanton, Morton, Shabꝛée, Painton, Roden, Rodington, and then into Terne, that runneth from thence by Charlton, Upton, Norton, Barwyc, Acham, and ſo into the Sauerne two miles beneath Shꝛewesburie (as I wéene.)

Thus haue I deſcribed the Terne in ſuch wiſe as my ſimple ſkill is able to performe. Now it reſteth that I pꝛoceed on (as I maie) with the Sauerne ſtreame, with which, after this former confluence, it goeth vnto Rorater or Rorceſter, Bꝛampton, Eaton vpon Sauerne, Dꝛaiton, where it ioineth with the Euerne that runneth from Frodeſleieward by Withiall and Pitchford, Treſſedge, Garneſton, Leighton, and betwéene the two Bildaſſes croſſeth the Rhe or Wenlocke water, and ſo goeth on to Bꝛowſleie and Hoꝛd parke, where it vniteth it ſelfe with another bꝛoke to be deſcribed in this place, whileſt the Sauerne reſts, and recreates it ſelfe here among the pleſant bottoms.

This water ariſeth aboue Tongcaſtell, and yet it haue run anie great diſtance from the head, it méeteth with a rill comming by Sheriffe Hales, and Staunton. Thence it goeth on to Hatton, Roſton, and there croſſing another from Wlodhouſes, comming by Haughton and Euelin, it pꝛoceedeth to Beckebirie and Higford, and not omitting here to croſſe the Wꝛoxe (ſometime a great ſtreame that runneth vnto it out of Snowdon pole) and ſo paſſeth forth to Badger, Acleton, Wꝛoxſfield: a litle from whence (about Wickin) it taketh in another bꝛoke into it called Churle, & ſo goeth on to Rindleford, and then into Sauerne ſomwhat aboue Bꝛidgenoꝛth at Penſton mill (except mine infoꝛmation deceiue me.) From Bꝛidgenoꝛth our Sauerne deſcendeth to Wlodburie, Quatford, and there taking in the Parbꝛoke beneath Eaton that riſeth aboue Collaton, and goeth by Norill & Underton, it runneth by Didmanſton, Hempton, Aueleie, & beneath in the waie to Bargate, croſſeth with a bꝛoke comming from Upton parke, by Chetton, Billingleie, and Highleie, which being admitted, it holdeth on to Areleie, Clarnewood parke, Hawbach and Dowleſſe. Here alſo it méeteth with the Dowleſſe water, a pꝛetie bꝛoke iſſuing out of the Cle hilles in Shꝛopſhire, verie high to loke vpon, and thꝛée miles or thereabouts from Ludlow, which runneth through Clebirie parke in Wire foꝛreſt, & taking withall the Lempe, doth fall into the Sauerne not far from Bewdleie.

But to pꝛoceed. From Bewdleie our Sauerne haſteth directlie to Ribford, Areleie and Redſton, and here it méeteth with a water called Stoure, deſcending from Elie, or out of the ponds of Hales Owen in Woꝛceſterſhire, where it receiueth a rill from the left hand, and another from the right, and then goeth on to Sturbꝛidge (taking in there the third water per long running from Sturton caſtell) then to Kinuer Whittenton, Duerleie and Kidoꝛminſter, aboue which it croſſeth one bꝛokelet that commeth thither by Church hill, and another beneath it that runneth by Belboꝛow, betwixt which two waters lieth an od peece of Staffoꝛdſhire included, and alſo the Cle hill. From hence the aforeſaid Sauerne haſteth by Redſton to Shꝛawleie; and aboue this towne receiueth the Aſtleie water, as beneath the ſame it doth another. From Witleie then it goeth on to Holt caſtell, and ſo to Grimleie, taking in thereabout with the Doure, and Sulwale waters, whereof this riſeth at Chadſwyc, and runneth by Stoke pꝛioꝛie, & Dꝛoitwich, the other aboue Chaddeſleie, and commeth by Dourdale. After this it goeth forth vnto Woꝛceſter, in old time called Cair Bꝛangon, oꝛ Cair Frangon, where it méeteth with the Tiber, or Tiberton water, on the right hand aboue that citie, and beneth it neere vnto Powyc with the Temde, whoſe deſcription ſhall be ſet downe beforе I pꝛoceed oꝛ go anie further with the Sauerne.

The Temde, or (as ſome name it) the Tame riſeth vp in Radnoꝛſhire, out of the Melenith hilles, and ſome after his iſſue, méeting with a water from Wlthall, it runneth to Begeldie, Lanuerwaterden, and ſo to Knighton, which is fiue or ſix miles (as I heare) from his oꝛiginall. From Knighton it goeth ouer the ditch of Offa vnto Standiſh, and croſſing a rill that commeth from betwéene the parke named Clude, (and is a bound of Radnoꝛſhire) it goeth to Buckton, Walford, and Lanuarden, where it méeteth with the Bardwell or Berfield, and the Clun, both in one chanell, of which I find theſe deſcriptions here folowing woꝛd foꝛ woꝛd in Leland. The Bardwell or Barfield riſeth aboue New Chappell, in the honour of Clun, hard by the ditch of Offa, and goeth by Bucknell. The Clun iſſueth out of the ground betwéene Lhan Uehan and Paiſton, and going on by Bucton, Cluncaſtell, Clundon, Purlaw, and Clunbirie, it croſſeth with a bꝛoke that runneth along by Kempton and Bꝛampton. Thence going forth by Clunbirie, Bꝛome, Abcot and Marlow, it méeteth with the Bardwell, and ſo in the Temde, not verie far from Temderton. I ſuppoſe that Leland calleth the Bardwell by the name of Dwke, but I will not abide by it bicauſe I am not ſure of it. After theſe confluences therefoꝛe, our Temde goeth by Trippleton, Dounton, Burrington, and Bꝛomefield, where it méeteth with the Dneie, which is an indifferent ſtreame, and increaſed with ſundꝛie waters, whereof I ſaie as followeth.

The firſt of all is called the Bow. It riſeth (as I learne) in the hilles betwéene Hillington and Shelue, and from thence commeth downe by Lindleie and Hardwyc, where it croſſeth the Warren that iſſueth out of the ground about Rotlie chappell, and runneth by Adſton and Wentnoꝛ. After the confluence alſo going on by Choulton and Cheinles, it taketh in the Queneie and Stradbꝛoke both in one chanell, whereof the firſt riſeth at Lebotwood, and commeth downe by the Strettons, till it paſſe by Fellanton. The ſecond mounteth about Longuill, and goeth by Ruthburie, Newhall, Harton, and Alcaſter, from whence it is not long yer it fall into the Queneie, and ſo by Stratford into the Dneie, which hath boꝛne that name ſince the confluence of the Bow and Warren at Hardwyc, whereof I ſpake beforе. Finallie, the Dneie which ſome call the Somergill being thus increaſed, it runneth on to Halwford chappell, Dneibirie, Bꝛomefield, and ſo into Temde, and next of all to Ludlow. The Temde being thus bꝛought to Ludlow, méeteth with the Coꝛue, which commeth thorough Coꝛuedale from aboue Bꝛocton by Moꝛehouſes, Shipton, Hungerford, and a little beneath taking in a rill that commeth by Tugford, and Bꝛencoſt caſtell, goeth on to Coꝛſham caſtell, and there croſſing another from ſaint Margarets Clée, it hieth to Stanton Lacie, and ſo likewiſe to Ludlow.

From Ludlow in like ſoꝛt it goeth to Ludford, the Aſhfoꝛdes, little Hereford, Burrington, and at Burford vniteth it ſelfe with the Ladwich that commeth beneath Wilburne ſtoke, from betwéene Bꝛowne, Cléehill, and Stittertons hill, to Middleton, Henleie, Ladwich, Conam, and ſo into Temde, which beneath Temdbirie receiueth another rill on the other ſide, and the ſecond on the left hand called Rhe, that commeth from aboue Rixton, Stateꝛton, Hound, Nene, Clebirie, Knighton, and then into the Temde. From hence the Temde doeth goe by Aſham, Ladwich.

Rhe.

Aſcham, Lingridge, Shelleie Welch, Cliſton, Whitburne (and croſſing a water that commeth from the Sapies) to Knightwyc and Bradwaies. Hereabout againe it interteineth a rill that deſcendeth from about Kidburie on the right hand, and goeth by Collomatherne, Credcleie, Auſtike, and ſo into Temde, and then proceeding forward, the ſaid ſtreame runneth to Braunford, and yer long (taking in the Langherne that riſeth about Martleie, and paſſeth by Kengewyc) it goeth to Powyc, and ſo into the Sauerne before it come at Wickeceſter.

Langherne.

Thus haue I brought all ſuch ſtreames before me that fall into the Sauerne from the head, vntill I come to Powyc, wherof (as you may eaſily perceiue) the Temde is the moſt excellent. Now it reſteth that I proceed with the reſt of the diſcourſe intended concerning this our riuer. Certes, from Powyc mils which are about halfe a mile beneth Worceſter, the Sauerne runneth on to Kempleie and Cleueld, whence after it hath croſſed a broke comming from Cowleie, it hafteth firſt to Stoke, and ſo to Upton, which is eleuen or twelue miles from Gloceſter, whither it floweth manie times at high tides, but yer it come there, it drowneth another fall deſcending from Maluerne hilles by Blackemore parke, & ſone after the third growing by two branches, wherof one commeth alſo from Maluerne hils by little Malverne and Welland, the other from Elderford by Pendocke and Longdon. After theſe confluences in like ſort, it runneth to Bulhelleie, and Tewkeſburie, where it receiueth the Auon, that followeth next of all in order to be deſcribed, before I proceed anie further in my diſcourſe of Sauerne.

Auon 4.

The Auon riſeth at Nauelbie in the borders of Northhamptonſhire, a little ſide hand of Gilleſborow and fot of the hils whereon Nauelbie ſtandeth, and euen out of the church yard of the ſaid village. From hence it goeth to Welford, Stamford, Lilburne, Cliſton, and Rugbie, by north whereof it croſſeth a water called Swift, which commeth from aboue Kimcote, to Lutterworth, Browne ouer and Colſford. From thence alſo it goeth to Newbold, Wolſton, Ruington, and betweene the Stonlies taketh in the Sow. This Sow is a pretie water comming from aboue Calendon to Whitleie, and ſone after meeting with a riueret from Couentrie, which ſome do call Shirburne water, it goeth thence to Bagginton, where it taketh in a rill called Kinell, as I haue red from Kenelſworth, from whence it runneth to Stonleie, & ſo into the Auon. After this confluence the Auon proceedeth on to Stonleie abbeie, Aſhehow, Piluerton, Edmonds cote, and appace to Warwyc.

Kinell.

But yer it come there, it meeteth from ſouth eaſt with two waters in one chanell, whereof the leaſt commeth to Parton from Biſhops Itchington, by Yerburbirtie and Thorpe, where it croſſeth a rill from Southam. The other is called Leame, or Lime that deſcendeth from about Helladon, or nere vnto Catesbie in Northamptonſhire, and going by Duencote, Braunſton, Lemington and Pertun, it ioineth with the other, and then go from thence togither vnder the name of Leame, to Hunnington, Cobbington, and ſo into the Auon, as I gaue notice before. At Warwike alſo the Auon taketh in a water running northweſt from Groue parke. Thence it goeth on to Bereford, and there croſſing another from Shirburne, it paſſeth forth to Biſhops Hampton, meeting finallie with the third, from Kineſon that ronneth by Walton and Charlecote. After this laſt rehearſed confluence, it hafteth to Stretford vpon Auon, and then to Luddington ward, where it taketh in the Stoure that riſeth aboue Cherington, & whoſe courſe from thence is ſuch, as that being once paſt the head, Leame.

Stoure.

it goeth by Weſton, and yer long croſſing a water from Campden, hanging Aſton, & Todnam, it runneth to Barcheſton, Aldermaſton, Clifford, & ſo into the Auon.

From hence then the ſaid Auon goeth to Luddington, Burton, Bitford, and Cleue, and being parted from the ſaid towne, yer it come at Sawford, it receiueth the Arow or Aur, which riſing in the blacke hils in Worchelterſhire, commeth by Alchurch, Beleie parke, Ypſleie, Studleie, and then taking in another rill called Alne, out of Feckham forreſt, and going by Coughton parke, it hafteth to Alceſter, Arow, Ragleie, Wheteleie, Bouington, Standford, and ſo into Auon, which after this conjunction goeth to Vffenton & then to Couelholme: but yer it come there it receiueth two waters in one chanell, whereof the firſt riſeth about Willerſeie, the other nere to Buckland, and ioining beneath Badſeie, they fall into Auon, vnder the name of Pludor brooke, before it come to Couelholme.

Pludor.

Being paſt Couelholme it croſſeth the Aincell, which riſing out of the hils ſomewhere about Sudleie, runneth two miles further to Winchelcombe, and Gretton, and taking in a rill by the waie from Hailes, proceedeth on (going within one quarter of a mile of Hailes abbaie) to Luddington, or Woddington, beneath which when it hath croſſed another rill that commeth from Stanwaie, it goeth to Warmington, Sedgeborow, and receiuing there the laſt on the right hand alſo (as all aboue rehearſed) it falleth into the Auon, when it is come by Hinton, vnto a towne called Hampton, or (as ſome dow write it) Ampton. After this confluence the Auon goeth to Charleton, to Crapthorne (and there taking in a rill on the left hand) to Fladbirie wike, and almoſt at Perſore bridge, meeteth with a branched water that commeth by Piddle, whereof one head is at Alberton, an other at Piddle. From Perſore it goeth to Birlingham, and ſone after carrieng a broke withall deſcending from Fakenham, by Bradleie, Himbleton, Huddenton, Crowleie, Churchhill, Pibleton, Belleford and Delleford, it fleeteth to Eckington, Bredon, Twining, Pitton, and Tewkeſburie, where it ioineth with the Sauerne.

Vincelus.

Piddle.

Now to reſume the courſe of the Sauerne, you ſhall vnderſtand, that from Tewkeſburie it goeth to Derehirſt, the How paſſage, and ſone after receiuing the Chiltenham water that commeth thither by Bodenton, Sawton, and Norton, it runneth to Aſhelworth, Sainthirſt; and here it parteth it ſelfe till it come to Gloceſter, where it vniteth it ſelfe againe. But in the meane time the eaſterlie branch receiueth a forked chanell, whereof one head is not far frō Leke Hampton, the other about Witcombe, from whence it goeth to Brockworth. The other branch or arme taketh in the Leadon that commeth downe by Preſton, Dimmocke, Pantleie vpper Leadon, Leadon court, and there taking in one rill that commeth from Linton by Areknoll, and another beneath it from Tainton by Rudford, it falleth into the ſaid branch on the right ſide, before it come at Gloceſter.

Leadon.

The Sauerne therefore being paſt Gloceſter, it meeteth with a litle rill on the right hand, and thence holding on his courſe by Elmore, Minſterworth, Longneie, to Framilode, it receiueth yer it come at this latter the Strowd broke, which riſing not farre from Side, goeth by Pallade, Edgeworth, Frampton, Strowd, and receiuing there a water that commeth from Panneſwyc Lodge, by Pitteſcombe on the one ſide, and another from Radbridge on the other, it proſecuteth his voiage to Stone houſe, Eſlington, white Wiſen, & ſo toward Framilode, where the ſaid Strowd doth fall into the Sauerne. After the fall of Strowd, the Sauerne goeth from thence to Newenham, and Arlingham, and some after receiuing a water on each side, whereof one commeth from Vleie by Cham and Chambridge, the other by Blackneie and Catcombe, it goeth forth till it méet with another water on ech side, whereof that on the English halfe is forked, so that one head thereof is to be found about Borwell, the other at Horton, and méeting aboue Tortworthie, they run by Stone and Barkeleie castell, and so into the Sauerne. That on the Welsh halfe is named Newarne, which cõmeth from the forrest of Deane, and so into the Sauerne.

this

Chap. 14.

THe Sauerne being thus described, it resteth that I go forward with the names of those that lie vpon the coast of Southwales, making my entrie at the ferrie ouer betweene Aust in Glocestershire, and a village on the further banke of Sauerne, not farre from Tarendacus chappell, in the mouth of the riuer Wie, which ferrie is about three miles ouer (saith Leland) or else my memorie doth faile me. This riuer Guie or Wie beginneth (as I said before) on the side of the hilles where the Sauerne doth arise, and passing through Wencland, that is, southeast by Raiader Guie to Buelt (where the Irwon méeteth withall) it goeth to Glasburie, Hereford, Monmouth, and finallie into the Sauerne sea at Chepstow: for so they call Monhafren, which seuereth Wales from Summersetshire, Deuonshire, Cornewall: as for the Rhidoll which is the third riuer, it hath the shortest course of all, for it runneth northward, and into the sea at Aberiff with, which is not farre off, as the writers do report.

Wie mouth.

Guie alias Wie.

Leland writing of this riuer Guie or Wie saith thus; The Wie goeth thorough all Herefordshire by Bradwarden castell, belonging to sir Richard Vehan, and so to Hereford east, thence eight miles to Rosse, a market towne in Herefordshire: and in this riuer be vmbers, otherwise called grailings. It is also found by common experience, that the salmon of this riuer is in season, when the like fish to be found in all other riuers is abandoned and out of vse; wherof we of the east parts do not a little maruell. But let vs not staie vpon these descriptions, sith an other is come to my hand more exact than either of these.

Vmber a fish one'ie in the Wie.

The Guie therefore riseth out of the blacke mounteines of Wales, out of which the Sauerne springeth in Radnorshire, and comming by Lhangerike, and Raiadargoie, it receiueth one rill from the west called Darnoll, and another from by northeast comming by saint Harmon. Thence it goeth to Lhanuthell, and in the waie betwixt Raiader and Lhanuthell, it ioineth with the Elland, whose head is nére to Comerisk with, and taketh likewise into him the Clardwen that diuideth for a season Radnorshire from Brecknoch, which Clardwen is likewise increased by the Clarthie within three miles of his head and lesse, hauing his course from southwest & hillie soile adiacent. From Lhanuthell it goeth west of Disart, where it receiueth the Ithan, a riuer rising aboue Lhanbister, and from whence it runneth to Landwie, and Lanbaderne dawr: beneath which it crosseth a water on ech side, whereof that on the right hand consisteth on the Duleise and the Cluedoch, after their confluence: the other hight Lomaron, whose head is aboue Lanihangle, and in the forrest of Blethwag. After these confluences, it runneth on crinkeling in strange manner, vnder the name of Ithor, till it come to Disart, taking in the Yawie on the left side yer it come there, and then into the Wie on the north side, which directeth his course further to Bealt, where it receiueth the Irwon, a notable streame, descending from the hilles aboue Lanihangle Abergwessen, and thence comming downe by Lanurid Lang marth, Lanauan, Uechan, Langantan, and so to Beth or Bealt, being inlarged by the waie with sundrie faire waters, as the Weuereie, whose head is about Lanauan more, the Dulasse, or (as some call it) the Dowlasse, that commeth from the hilles west of the head of Weuereie. The Comarch whose head and course is west of the Dowlasse on the north side, and likewise by two other on the southwest, and Dilasse from by southwest, which last rehearsed falleth into him halfe a mile and more aboue the influence of the Comarch which lieth on the other side. After this our Irwon goeth to Lhanuareth, where it crosseth the Dehon on the southwest side, then to Aberedwie, and there receiueth the Edwie on the northeast, which ariseth in the hilles aboue Botins chappell, and commeth downe by Crigend and Lanhaderne, thence the Guie goeth on to Lanstephan, and there (or a little aboue) taketh in the Machaweie that commeth by castell Paine, and so going on in processe of time with the Leuenni, whereof Leland in his commentaries doth write as here insueth.

Leuenni.

The Leuenni, otherwise called the Euer or Euerie, is a farre streame rising in Welch Talgarth hard by Blaine Leuenni, among the Atterill hilles, from whence it goeth to Brecknoch mere, which is two miles long, and a mile broad, and where men do fish in Vniligneis or botes of one peece, as they do in Lhin Seuathan, which is foure miles from Brecknoch. Finallie, bringing great store of red sand withall, and there with the Brennich water (that hath his originall issue at Mennith gader, and is increased with the Trusrin) it falleth into the Wie aboue Glesbirie three miles from Haie, at a place that of the onelie fall of this brooke is named Aberleuenni, after this the Guie. Being come to Haie, a prettie towne where much Romane coine is found, which they call Iewes monie: and after it hath passed or crossed a little brooke, which commeth from Lanigon, it méeteth with the Duleise that commeth also from the Atterill by Kerlop, and from thence goeth to Clifford castell (being now entred into Herefordshire, and leauing Radnor, whereunto it hath for a long course béene march) then to the Whitneies, Winferton, Letton, Bradwarden, Broberie, Monington, Bisord, Bridgesalers, Eaton, Brinton, and Hereford, without anie influence of riuer worthie of memorie, and yet with manie windlesses, & there méeteth with a water rising short of Wormeslei, which goeth by Maunsell, Lacie, Brinsop, Crednell, Stretton, and Huntington, and some after into the Wie, beside a little rill that runneth betwéene them both euen into Hereford towne. From hence in like sort the Wie hasteth to Rotheras church, Hampton, and Mordeford, where it taketh in sundrie waters in one chanell, of which the Lug or Luie is the principall, and nert of all to be described, before I go anie further with the course of the Wie, whereunto it dischargeth the chanell. It riseth in the edge of the forrest of Kemples aboue Langunlo: from whence it goeth to Momonacht, Pilleth Whitton, Fuldibrooke, Prestaine, so into Herefordshire, where betwéene Bonie & Beton, or Bitton, it receiueth in the Somergill, whose crotched head being march to Radnor forreſt, directeth his ſtreame betweene the new and old Radnors, to Knill, to Nally, and ſo into the Lug, which preſentlie paſſeth by Kinſham, Shirleie, Almiſter, Kingland, Eaton chappell, and ſo into Lemiſter, where it croſſeth the Dneie (a ſtreamelet riſing ſhort of Shobden, and going by Chorleſter) a little before it come to the weſt ſide of the towne.

At Lemiſter it ſelfe in like ſort three waters doo meet, and almoſt inuiron the towne, that is to ſaie, the Lug, the Pinfulleie or Pinſell (a riueret riſing at Kingſland two miles from Lemiſter) & the Kenbroke, which commeth out of the blacke mounteins, from Lemiſter, otherwiſe called Leofminſter, of the builder, and alſo Leonminſter, the Lug or Luie goeth on to Eaton, and there taketh in a rill beneath Hampton, and aboue Hope, whereof one head is betweene Hatfield and Bickleton, another neere vnto Marſton, and meeting of both at Humber. From Hampton it goeth to Bodenham, Wellington, Horton, Sutton, Shelwie, Lugwardin, and Longward, where it croſſeth the Fromeie or Frome, a preetie water, and worthie to be remembred. It riſeth about Wolferelaw, from whence it commeth downe toward the ſouthweſt by Edwinſloch to Bromyard, Auenburie, Biſhops Frome, Caſtell Frome, Can Frome, to Stretton vpon Frome, and there taking in a water called Loden, comming from aboue Biſhops Grendon, by Pencombe, Colwarne, Stoke Lacie, Colwarne, and Engleton, our Frome goeth on to Yarkeleie, Worthington, and Longward, and ſo into the Lug, betweene Longward and Sutton, which runneth forthwith to Worceſter, or Worthford, and there into the Wie, vnto whoſe deſcription I now returne againe.

The Mona or Monbecke, riſeth in the forreſt of Hene, twentie miles from Monemouth by weſt in Cirtland, and going by Creſwell, or Craſwall chappell not farre from the marches of Brecknocke, and northeaſt of Hatuill hils, which after it hath run a good diſtance from the head receiueth firſt the Eſkle, and paſſeth by Lanihangle and the old Court, from northweaſt, then the Olcon, from ſouthweſt, which meeteth withall neere Cledoll or Lnedoch, & paſſing by the old towne, it hasteth to Altrinis, where it becommeth march betweene Hereford and Monemouth ſhires, and taketh in a water comming by Trewin, & likewiſe the Horwie or Hodneie which riſeth in Brecknocke, among the Saterelles, & runneth by Capell a fin, Lantonie, Cumroie, Michaell church in Monemouthſhire, and ioineth with our Mona at Altrinis, which after this confluence haſteth to Walderſtone, Lanſillo Langua, betweene which and Kinechurch it ioineth with the Doure that riſeth about the Bache aboue Dourſton, which is ſix miles aboue Doure abbie, ſo that it runneth through the Gilden dale, by Peterchurch, Fowchurch, Horehampton, Newcourt, Doure, and beneath Doure taketh in the Duleſſe, from ſouthweſt and Lanihangle, by Harleſwas caſtell on the one ſide, and yer long the Wormelbecke, deſcending from aboue Beuernall by Didleie, Deucror, Workebridge, and Kenderchurch on the other, and ſo running all in one chanell vnto Mona, that riuer goeth on to Kinech church, Griſmond, Cardwaie, Skenfrith, Warnethall, Perthire, and ſo to Monemouth, where it meeteth with the Wie, ouer each of which riuers Monemuth towne hath his particular bridge.

The Guie or Wie therefore being increaſed with thus manie brookes and waters, paſſeth on from hence, and going toward Landogo, it meeteth with the Trollie becke, whoſe head is aboue Lannam ferrie in the north part of Monemouth ſhire, and goeth from thence by Lhantellio, Lanihangle, Gracedieu, Diggeſtow, Wonaſtow, Troie, and ſo into Wie, that runneth alſo by Wies wod chaſe, taking in there the Elwie that commeth from aboue Landelwie by Langowen, Lannillen, Penclaſe, Trilegh, and Langogo, where meeting with the aforeſaid ſtreame, the Wie directeth his courſe from thence by Tinterne abbeie (where it croſſeth a rill from Trile grange) Chapell hill, Parcaſicke, Penterie chapell, Lancante, Chepſtowe, and ſo into the ſea, leauing the Treacle (a chappell ſtanding on a rocke) on the hand betweene it & Sauerne, ouer againſt the point that lieth ſouth of Betteſtie. Next vnto the Wie, I find a rill of no great courſe, comming downe from Mounton chappell, by a place of the biſhops of Landaffe. Thence paſſing by Charſton rocke, and the point whereon Trinitie chappell ſtandeth, I come vnto the fall of Trogie, which riſeth short of Trogie caſtell, and runneth toward the ſea, by Landuair, Dewſton, Calicot, and ſo into the Ocean, ouer againſt the Charſton rocke. The next fall is of a water that commeth from aboue Penho by ſaint Brides, north and by weſt of Dennie Iland, which lieth midwaie betweene that fall & Porthot point, and before I touch at Goldcliffe point, I croſſe another fall of a freſh broke, whoſe head is aboue Landueigo in Wencewod, and courſe by Lhanbed, Langſton, Lhanwarne, and through the More to Wittſton.

Next vnto this is the Aberwith, or Wiſke, in Latine Oſca, whereon Caerleon ſtandeth, ſometime called Cheſter and Ciuitas legionum, becauſe the Romans ſojourned there, as did afterward Arthur the great, who alſo held a noble parlement in the ſame, whereof Galfride maketh mention Lib. 7. cap. 4. affirming thereto, that in thoſe daies the maieſtie thereof was ſuch, as that all the forefronts of their houſes were in maner laid ouer with gold, according to the Romane vſage. There was in the ſame in like ſort a famous vniuerſitie, wherein were 200 philoſophers; alſo two goodlie churches erected in the remembrance of Julius and Aaron, two Britiſh martyrs, whereby it might well be reputed for the third metropoliticall ſee in Britaine. But to our water, whereof I read that it is furthermore one of the greateſt in Southwales, and huge ſhips might well come to the towne of Caerleon, as they did in the time of the Romans, if Newport bridge were not a let vnto them; neuertheleſſe, big botes come thereto. Cheplow or Strigull, and of ſome thought to be in baſe Wenceland, though other be of the contrarie opinion. But howſoeuer the matter ſtandeth, this riuer is taken to be the bounds of Brechnockſhire, as Kenni is middle to Wenceland & Glamorganſhire. But to leaue theſe by-matters, and come to the deſcription of the water.

Uſke. You ſhall vnderſtand that the Uſke or Wiſke, in Latin Oſca riſeth in the blacke mounteins ten miles aboue Brechnocke toward Carmardine, the hill being properlie called Pminidh Duy out of which it falleth, and ſituate in the verie confines betweene Brechnocke and Carmardine ſhires, from whence winding into the northeaſt, it commeth to Trecaſtle, and in the waie betweene it and Capell Kidburne, it taketh in the Craie broke, on the right hand before it come to Kidburne chappell. Going alſo from thence toward Deuinocke, it croſſeth the Senneie on the ſame ſide (which riſeth aboue Capell Senneie) next of all the Camblas, & at Aberbraine, the Brane, or the Brenich, whoſe head is three miles from Brechnocke, and running by Lanihangle, it meeteth I ſaie with the Uſke, about maſter Awbries manor. Beneath Aber Yſter, it receiueth the Yſter, which riſeth northweſt aboue Martyr Kinoch, and commeth by Battell chappell, and going from thence by Lanſpithed and Newton, it runneth in the end to Brechnocke, where it taketh in the Hodneie or Honthie on the one ſide, whoſe head is in Blaine Hodneie, and comming downe from thence by Deſrune chappell, Lanihangle and Landiuilog, it meeteth with the Uſke or Brechnocke townes end, which of the fall of this water was ſometime called Aberhodni, as I haue beene informed: on the other halfe likewiſe it receiueth the Tertarith that riſeth among the Bane hils, fiue miles from Brechnocke, and commeth likewiſe into the verie ſuburbs of the towne, beneath Trenewith, or new Troie, whereby it taketh the courſe.

Craie. Sennie. Camblas. Brane. Yſter. Hodneie. Tertarith.

After theſe confluences, the Uſke proceedeth on toward Aberkinurike, or the fall of a water whoſe head is in the roots of Penuchdennie hill, and paſſage by Cantreſſe. Thence it goeth by Lanhamlaghe, Penkethleie caſtell, Lanſanfreid, Landettie, Langonider, and ſone after receiuing the Riangall (which riſeth about the hill whereon Dinas caſtell ſtandeth, and runneth by Lanihangle and Tretoure) it paſſeth betweene Laugattocke and Cerigkhowell, to Langroinie, and there about croſſeth the Groinie broke, that deſcendeth from Monegather, Arthur hill, by Peter church, as I find. When the Uſke is paſt this broke, it taketh in three other ſhort rils, from by ſouth within a little diſtance, whereof the firſt hight Cledoch Uaur, the ſecond Fidan, and the third Cledochvehan. Of theſe alſo the laſt falleth in nere to Lanwenarth. From hence the Uſke runneth to Abergeuenni towne, where it meeteth with the Rebbie water from by north, that riſeth ſhort of Bettus chappell aboue the towne, and the Geuennie that deſcendeth from aboue Landilobartholl beneath not farre from Colbroke, and ſo goeth on to Hardwyc, beneath which it croſſeth three nameleſſe rilles, on the right hand or ſouthweſt ſide before it come at Lanihangle vpon Uſke, of whoſe courſes I know not anie more than that they are not of anie length, nor the chanell of ſufficient greatneſſe ſeuerallie to intreat of. Betweene Kemmeis and Troſkreie it meeteth with ſuch an other rill that commeth downe by Bettus Newith. Thence it goeth to Coer Uſke or Brenbigeie (whoſe bridge, I mene that of Uſke, was ouerthrowne by rage of this riuer, in the ſir and twentith yeare of king Henrie the eight, vpon ſaint Hughes daie after a great ſnow) but yer it come there, it receiueth the Birthin on the right hand, which is a prettie water, deſcending from two heads, whereof the firſt is northweſt of Manhilot, as the other is of Lanihangle and Pentmorell.

Kinuricke. Riangall. Groini. Cledoch vaur. Fidan. Cledochvehā. Rebbie. Geuenni. Birthin. Coer vſke ſtandeth on one ſide of Uſke, and Caerleon on the other, but Coer vſke by diuerſe miles further into the land.

Next vnto this it ioineth with the Elwie aboue Lanbadocke, whoſe head is eaſt of Penclaſe, and running weſtwards by Penclaſe, Laniſſen, Langowen (and beneath Landewie taking in a broket from Ragland caſtell, that commeth downe thither by Ragland parke) it bendeth ſouthweſt, vntill it come at the Uſke, which crinkling towards the ſouth, and going by Lanhowell, meeteth with three rilles before it come to Marthenie chappell, whereof the firſt lieth on the right hand, and the other on the left: the midlemoſt falling into the ſame, not farre from Lantreſſen, as I haue beene informed. From the mouth of the Romeneie to the mouth of the Taffe are two miles. Certes the Taffe is the greateſt riuer in all Glamorganſhire, called (by Ptolomie Rhatoſtadiybius, as I geſſe) and the citie Taffe it ſelfe of good countenance, ſith it is indued with the cathedrall ſee of a biſhop. The courſe of the water in like maner is verie ſwift, and bringeth oft ſuch logs and bodies of trees withall from the woodie hilles, that they do not ſeldome cruſh the bridge in peeces, but for ſo much as it is made with timber it is repaired with lighter coſt, wheras if it were of hard ſtone, all the countrie about would hardlie be able to amend it. It riſeth in Brechnockſhire among the woodie hilles, from two heads, whereof one is in Monuchdenie, the other weſt of that mounteine, of which the firſt called Taffe baure, goeth by Capell Ian behan, Mainor, and Morlais, the other by Capell Mantie, and ioining at ſouthweſt beneath Morlais caſtle, they go to Martyr Tiduill, and toward Lannabor, but by the waie it taketh in from northweſt a broke called Cunnon, which commeth out of Brechnockſhire by Abardare, and afterward the Rodneis comming out of the ſame quarter (but not out of the ſame ſhire) which runneth by Eſkridinodoch, a crotched broke, & therefore diuided into Rodneie baure, & Rodneie behan, that being ioined with the Taffe, doth run on withall to Egleſilian, caſtle Coch, Whitchurch, Landaffe, Cardiffe, and ſo into the ſea, not far from Pennarth point, where alſo the Laie doth bid him welcome vnto his chanell or ſtreame. Furthermore, from Marthellie it haſteth to Kemmeis, and yer it come at Caerleon or Cheſter in the ſouth, taketh in two waters on the right hand, of which the firſt commeth downe from the north betweene Landgwie, Landgweth, and by Lhan Henoch, without anie further increaſe: but the other is a more beautifull ſtreame, called Auon, and thus deſcribed as I find it among my pamphlets. The Auon riſeth in the hilles that ſeeme to part Monemouth and Brechenocke ſhires in ſunder, and after a rill receiued from Blorench hill on the northſide of the ſame, running downe from thence by Capell Newith and Triuethin, it receiueth a water from by ſouth almoſt of equall courſe, and from that quarter of the countrie, and in proceſſe of time another little one from the ſame ſide, yer it come to Lanurgwaie and Lanihangle, from whence it goeth to Euennocke and Penroſe, & ſo in Uſke before it go by Caerleon. But here you muſt note, that the courſe of this ſtreame ioining beneath Quenocke chappell, with the other which deſcendeth (as I ſaid) from the hilles about foure miles aboue Landgwaie and Langweth, doth make an Iland aboue Caerleon, where Penroſe ſtandeth, & much Romane coine is found of all ſorts, ſo that the influence of the one into the other ſeemeth to me to be but a draine deuiſed by man, to keepe the citie from the violence of ſuch water as otherwiſe would oft annoie the ſame.

Elwie. Auon.

Being paſt Caerleon it runneth to Crindie, where maiſter maiſter Harbert dwelleth, and there carieng another bꝛoke withall, that riſeth noꝛth of Tomberlow hill, and deſcendeth by Henlis and Bettus chappell, it runneth foꝛth to Newpoꝛt (in Welch caſtle Newith) and from thence vnder a bꝛidge, after thꝛee oꝛ foure miles courſe to the ſea, taking the Ebowith water withall, which meeteth with the ſame almoſt in the verie mouth oꝛ fall, and riſeth in the edge of Bꝛecknoch ſhire, oꝛ (as Leland ſaith) high Wincland, from two heads, of which one is called Eberith Uchan, the other Eberith Mawꝛ, as I haue beene infoꝛmed. The courſe of the firſt head is by Blamgrent, and after the confluence they paſſe togither by Lanhileth, and comming by weſt of Tomberlow hill (croſſing a rill, from noꝛth eaſt by the waie) it taketh in thereabout the Serowie, that runneth by Treſtrent, & is of leſſe race hitherto than the Ebowith, and from that ſame quarter. After this confluence it goeth to Riſleie, Rocheſton caſtell, next of all thoꝛough a parke, and ſo by Greenefield caſtell, and is not long yer it fall into the ſea, being the laſt iſſue that I doo find in the countie, which beareth the name of Monemouth, and was in old time a part of the region of the Silures.

Romeneie.

The Romeneie oꝛ (as ſome coꝛruptlie call it) the Monneie, is a goodlie water, and from the head a march betweene Monemouth & Glamoꝛgan ſhires. The head hereof is aboue Egglins Tider bap Hoell otherwiſe called Fanum Theodori, oꝛ the church of Theodorus, whence commeth manie ſpꝛings, & taking one bottome, the water is called Canoch and not Romeneie till it be come to Romeneie. It receiueth no water on the eaſt ſide, but on the weſt diuerſe ſmall beckes, whereof thꝛee (and one of them called Ifra) are betweene the riſing and Bꝛathetere chappell, the fourth cõmeth in by Capell Gledis, and Kethligaire, the fift from betweene the Faldꝛaie and Lanuaboꝛ, the firſt & ſeuenth before it come to Bedwas, and the eight ouer againſt Bedwas it ſelfe from chappell Martin, Cairfillie caſtell, and Thauan, after which confluences it runneth on by Maghan, Keuen, Mableie and Romeneie, & yer long croſſing a becke at noꝛth weſt that commeth from aboue Liſuan, Lamſſen and Koch, it falleth into the ſea, about ſix miles from the Wiſbe, and albeit the mouth therof be nothing pꝛofitable foꝛ ſhips, yet is it alſo a march betweene the Silures and Glamoꝛganſhire.

Laie.

The Laie falleth into the ſea a mile almoſt from the Taffe, and riſeth in the hilles aboue Lantriſſent (foꝛ all the region is verie hillie.) From whence comming by Lantriſſent and Auercaſtell, it runneth by Coit Marchan parke, Lambedder, S. Bꝛides, Lhannihangle, ſaint Fagans and Elaie, Leckwith, Landowgh, Cogampill, and ſo into the ſea, without anie maner increaſe by anie rils at all ſauing the Dunclais, which riſeth foure miles from his fall, eaſt noꝛth eaſt, and meeteth withall a little moꝛe than a quarter of a mile from Pont Uelim Uaur, and likewiſe by weſt, the Methcoid that commeth from Glinne Rodeneie, and wherein to the Pedware diſchargeth that ſmall water gathered in his chanell. Here will I ſtaie a little and bꝛeake off into a diſcourſe, which Leland left alſo as parcell of this coaſt who toucheth it after this maner.

From Taffe to Laie mouth oꝛ Ele riuer a mile, from Laie mouth (oꝛ rather Penarth, that ſtandeth on the weſt point of it) to the mouth of Thawan riuer (from whence is a common paſſage ouer vnto Mineheued in Summerſetſhire of 17 miles) are about ſeuen Welſh miles, which are counted after this maner. A mile and a halfe aboue Thawan is Scilleie hauenet (a pꝛetie ſuccour foꝛ ſhips) whoſe head is in Wenno paroch two miles and a halfe from the ſhoꝛe. From Scilleie mouth to Aber Barrie a mile, and thither commeth a little rill of freſh water into Sauerne, whoſe head is ſcant a mile off in plaine ground by noꝛtheaſt, and right againſt the fall of this becke lieth Barrie Iland a flight ſhot from the ſhoꝛe at the full ſea. Halfe a mile aboue Aber Barrie is the mouth of Comc kidie, which riſeth flat noꝛth from the place where it goeth into the Sauerne, and ſerueth oft foꝛ harbour vnto ſea-farers. The Alen riſeth by noꝛtheaſt vp into the land at a place called Lhes Bꝛoimith, oꝛ Skirpton, about foure miles aboue the plot where it commeth by it ſelfe into Sauerne. From thence to the mouth of Ogur alias Gur thꝛee miles. Then come they in pꝛoceſſe of time vnto the Kenſike oꝛ Colbꝛoke riuer, which is no great thing, ſith it riſeth not aboue thꝛee miles from the ſhoꝛe. From Kenſike to Aber Auon two miles, and herein doo ſhips moleſted with weather oftentimes ſeeke harboꝛough. It commeth of two armes, wherof that which lieth noꝛtheaſt is called Auon Uaur, the other that lieth noꝛthweſt Auon Uchan. From hence to the Neth is about two miles and a halfe, thereon come ſhiplets almoſt to the towne of Neth from the Sauerne. Being paſt this we come vnto the Lichwꝛ, oꝛ Lochar mouth, and then gliding by the Wlꝛmes head, we paſſed to the Wandꝛeſmouth, wherof I find this deſcription following in Leland. Both Uendꝛaith Uaur and Uendꝛaith Uchan riſe in a peece of Carmardineſhire, called Iſſekenen, that is to ſaie, the low quarter about Kennen riuer, and betwixt the heads of theſe two hils is another hill, wherein be ſtones of a greenith colour, whereof the inhabitants make their lime. The name of the hill that Uendꝛaith Uaur riſeth in, is called Mennith Uaur, and therein is a poole as in a moꝛiſh ground, named Lhintegowen, where the pꝛincipall ſpꝛing is, and this hill is eight oꝛ nine miles From Kidwellie: the hill that Uendꝛaith Uchan ſpꝛingeth out of, is called Mennith Uchan, and this water commeth by Kidwellie towne.

At the head of this bꝛoke is an hole in the hilles ſide, where men often enter and walke in a large ſpace. And as foꝛ the bꝛoke it ſelfe, it is one of the moſt plentifull and commodious that is to be found in Wales. All along the ſides alſo of Uendꝛaith Uaur, you ſhall find great plentie of ſea-coles. There is a great hole by head of Uendꝛaith Uchan, where men vſe to enter into vaults of great compaſſe, and it is ſaid, that they maie go one waie vnder the ground to Wlꝛmes head, and another waie to Cairkemen caſtell, which is thꝛee miles oꝛ moꝛe into the land. But how true theſe things are, it is not in me to determine; yet this is certeine, that there is verie good hawking at the Heron in Uendꝛaith Uchan. There are diuerſe pꝛints of the paſſage of certeine woꝛms alſo in the caue, at the head of Uendꝛaith Uchan, as the inhabitants doo fable: but I neuer heard of anie man that ſaw anie woꝛme there, and yet it is beléeued that manie woꝛmes are there. Hitherto out of Leland. But now to returne to mine owne courſe.

Laie. Leauing the Laie, which ſome call Claie, and paſſing the Pennarth baie, that lieth betweene the Pennarth and the Lauerocke points, we left Scillie Ilet (which lieth on the mouth of Scillie hauen beꝛe deſcribed) and came vnto the Barrie, whoſe head is aboue Wrinſton caſtell, and from whence he runneth by Deinſpowis, Cadorton, Barrie, and ſo into the ſea.

Barrie.

Aberthaw Being paſt the Barrie water, we come to a fall called Aberthaw, which riſeth two oꝛ thꝛée miles aboue Lanſanoꝛ, and going by Welch Newton, it commeth at length to Cowbꝛidge, and from thence goeth to Lanblethian, Landoch, Beanpéere, Flimſton, Gilſton, and betweene the eaſt and the weſt Aberthaw, & into the Sauerne ſea. But yer it come all there it receiueth a bꝛoke called Kenſan, oꝛ Karnſan, oꝛ Kenſech, on the eaſt ſide, whoſe head is eaſt of Bolſton, & comming by Charnelhold, Lhancaruan, & Lancadle, it falleth into the foꝛmer aboue either of the Thawans. Leland ſaith, that Kenſan hath two heads, whereof the moꝛe noꝛtherlie called Bzane, lieth in Luenlithan, and runneth ſeauen miles beꝛoꝛe it méet with the other. Leauing this water we ſailed on, caſting about the Naſh point, omitting two oꝛ thꝛee ſmall waters (whereof Leland hath alreadie as ye ſee made mention) becauſe I haue nothing moꝛe to add vnto their deſcriptions, except it be, that the Colhow taketh in a rill from Lan Iltruit, of whoſe courſe (to ſaie the truth) I haue no manner of knowledge.

Kenſan.

Ogur. The Ogur oꝛ Gur, which ſome call the Ogmur, is a well faire ſtreame (as we were wont to ſaie in our old Engliſh) whoſe head is in the ſame hilles, where the Kodeneies are to be found, but much moꝛe weſterlie, and running a long courſe yer it come to anie village, it goeth at the length beneath Languineuere oꝛ Langonodoch, to S. Bzides vpon Ogur, then to Newcaſtell, and Narthermaure, beneath which it méeteth the Wennie, halfe a mile from Ogur oꝛ Ogmur caſtell on the eaſt ſide of the banke. It riſeth fiue oꝛ ſix miles from this place, among the hilles, and comming downe at laſt by Lanharne, it croſſeth a rill yer long from noꝛtheaſt, and the confluence paſſeth foꝛth by Coitchurch, Ogur caſtell, & ſo into the Ogur. Leland writing of the waters that fall into this Ogur ſaith thus. Into the Ogur alſo reſoꝛteth the Garrow two miles aboue Lanſanſride bꝛidge, deſcending from Blaingarow. It taketh furthermoꝛe (ſaith he) another called Leuennie riſing in the pariſh of Glin Coꝛug, at noꝛthweſt, and then running two miles lower, vniteth it ſelfe with the Coꝛug bꝛoke, a little ſhoꝛt thing, and woꝛthie no longer ſpeach. From this confluence the Leuennie goeth ſeauen miles further yer it meete with the Ogur on the weſt ſide, at Lanſanſride, two miles aboue Penbowt. And ſo far Leland. But I wot not what he meaneth by it.

Kenſig. Next vnto the Ogur is the Kenſig water, that commeth downe by the Pile and Kenſig caſtell, and being paſt the ſame we croſſe the Margan rill, where ſir Edward Manſell dwelt, and ſo vnto Auon, which hauing two heads (as is ſaid) the moꝛe eaſterlie of them commeth downe by Hauodapoꝛt chappell, the other by Glin Coꝛug, Michaell church, Aber Auon, and ſo into the ſea, yéelding alſo in time of néed a good harbour foꝛ ſhips to lodge and ride in. From hence we went along by the Cole pits to the mouth of the Neth. The Neth is a faire water, riſing of diuerſe heads, whereof the moꝛe eaſterlie named Nethuehan riſeth not farre from the head of the Kennon, and comming downe by Penedoꝛin to Aberpirgwin, it receiueth Nethuaur, a little aboue the towne, which riſing not farre ſoutheaſt of the head of Taule in Bzecknoch ſhire (as all the reſt doo) receiueth the Trangarth, the Peltaie and the Hepſaie, all which are accounted as members of his head in one chanell, about a mile oꝛ moꝛe beꝛoꝛe it ioine with Nethuehan. Foꝛ as Trangarth riſeth eaſt of Nethuaur, ſo the Pelta riſeth by eaſt of Trangarth, and ioineth with the ſame aboue Iſtrad wealthie, and a little beneath the ſame towne taketh in the Hepſaie. So that albeit their ſeuerall riſings be half oꝛ a whole mile in ſunder, yet haue they (in a maner) like diſtance from Aberpirgwin, and their finall confluence in the edge of Glamoꝛganſhire, which they directlie doo croſſe. After theſe confluences, the maine ſtreame runneth in and out by ſundꝛie miles, and thꝛough the woddie ſoiles, till it méet with Cledaugh, which ioineth with the ſame beneath the Reſonlaie, and goeth withall to Laniſked, where it taketh in the Duleſſe, whoſe head is aboue Chappell Krenaunt, in the marches of Bzecknoch. Thence it goeth to Cadoꝛ towne, oꝛ betweene it and Lanniſtide, then to Neth towne, whither ſmall veſſels often come: and beneath the ſame receiuing the Cledoch that runneth by Kelebebilch (and alſo Neth abbeie where maiſter Crumwell dwelleth) it goeth on by Coitſranke foꝛreſt, Nethwod, Bzitonferrie, and ſo into the ſea.

Nethuehan. The Taule riſeth in the thickeſt of the blacke mounteines in Bzecknochſhire weſt of Nethuaur, and comming downe weſt of Calwen chappell, it receiueth on the eaſt banke a rill named Coiell that runneth thither by Coielburne chappell: and being thus vnited, the chanell paſſeth foꝛth by Iſtradgunles, and then méeting with the Turch oꝛ Toꝛch water that cõmeth from the foꝛt of the blacke mounteines, and is march to parcell of Caermardinſhire, it runneth to Langoge, Lanſamled, ſaint Johns, Swanſeie, and ſo into the Baie. Being paſt this, we come by another little fall, whoſe water runneth thꝛée oꝛ foure miles yer it come into Swanſeie baie, but without name. Thence we go to the Crimline becke, whoſe deſcription I neither haue, noꝛ find anie great want therof. Wherfoꝛe going about by Diſſermont caſtell, and Mumbles point, we paſſe foꝛth toward the ſouthweſt by Penmarch point, till we come to Ilſton water, whoſe head is not farre within the land; and yet as it commeth thoꝛough the woodland, and downe by Penmarch caſtell, a rill oꝛ two doth fall into the ſame. Then caſting about by Oꝛwich point, we go onward there by, and ſailing flat noꝛth by the Holme (hauing paſſed the Woꝛmeſtead and S. Kennets chapell) and then noꝛtheaſt by Whitfoꝛd point, we went at length to the Lochar oꝛ Loghoꝛ, oꝛ as Lhoyd nameth it, the Lichwꝛ, whoſe indꝛaught foꝛ a certene ſpace is march betweene Caermardine and Glamoꝛgan ſhires. It riſeth aboue Gwenwie chappell, from whence it goeth to Landbea, and aboue Bettus receiueth a rill named Amond that entreth thereinto from noꝛtheaſt. Being paſt Bettus, it paſſeth by Laneddie, Arthelas bꝛidge, and ouer againſt Landilo Talabout, it croſſeth from by weſt, the Combwilie by weſt of Parkreame, and afterward the Moꝛlais aboue Langnarch on the ſame ſide. Then comming to Loghoꝛ caſtell, it taketh in on the eaſt ſide, the Lhu, whoſe courſe is not aboue fiue miles, and thence loſing the name of Lochar, it is called Burraic, as ſome geſſe, vntill it come to the ſea, where it parteth it ſelfe going on each ſide of Bachannie Iland, a ſmall thing, and not woꝛthie (foꝛ anie thing I read thereof) as yet to be particularlie deſcribed. From this water we paſſed (I ſaie) by Bachannies Ile, to the Aberlheddie water, whoſe head being in the hilles aboue Pzenacrois, it paſſeth by by Lhanelthein, and thence into the ſea. Then went we to the Duleſſe a little rill, whoſe head is not farre from Trinſaren: thence by the Pembraie and Calicoit points, till we came about to the Wandres or Uendraith mouth, whoſe deſcription is partlie touched alreadie; but bicauſe it is not ſuch as I would wiſh it to be, I will here after my owne maner deale ſomewhat further withall. Gwendrath or Uendraith vaur riſeth in the lower ground, or not far from the hill Renneth Uaur, whereon caſtell Careg ſtandeth, and deſcending by a prætie long courſe vnder ſundrie bridges, commeth at the laſt to Glin, then to Capull Lanberie, and ſo vnto the ſea, being little augmented with influences by the waie. Uendraith Uehan riſeth a mile higher towards the north than Uendraith Uaur, but out of the ſame ſoile, & thence directing his courſe toward the ſouthweſt, it goeth by Lancharog, Langendarne, Capull Langell, Bithon, Loighdenie, Kidwillie, and ſo into the ſea, about one mile from the fall of Uendraith Uaur.

Duleſſe. Wandres.

Towie.

The Towie riſeth in the mounteines of Elennith foure miles by ſoutheaſt from Lintiue, and two from Lingonon, in a mariſh ground foure & twentie miles from Caermardine, and in a forreſt called Biſhops forreſt, midwaie betwixt Landwibreuie & Landanuerie caſtell. For fiſh, in my opinion, this is much better than the Taw or Taffe, whoſe head breedeth no fiſh, but if it be caſt into it, they turne vp their bellies, flote aloft, and die out of hand. It parteth Brecknoch from Cardigonſhire alſo for a certeine ſeaſon, till it come by the water of Trauſnant, that falleth thereinto from by eaſt out of the confins of Brecknoch, vnto Pilin capell, and ſo to Iſtrodefine, where it meeteth with the Tothæ that commeth thither from Lhinuerwin where it riſeth, and ſo through Reſcoth forreſt, vniting it ſelfe by the waie with the Peſcotter, which mounting out of the ground in the edge of Cardigonſhire, runneth along as a limit and march vnto the ſame, till it ioine with the Tothée, and both come togither beneath Iſtrodefine into Towie, which we haue now in hand. After this confluence it commeth to Lhanuair Awbreie, Lanihowell, and Lanimphrie, and here it receiueth two waters in one chanell, whereof the firſt is called Brane, the other Gutherije (which lieth more ſoutherlie of the two) and fall (as I ſaid) into Towie beneath Landonuereie, which runneth on till it meet with the firſt Duleſſe that goeth by Lenurdie, then with the Morlais, and theſe on the northweſt. Certes the Brane is a prætie broke riſing two or three miles aboue Capell Newith, and deſcending by Lanbrane and Uſkradwalter, it meeteth (I ſaie) with the Gutherije, whoſe head is weſt of Tridcaſtell in Brecknochſhire, and thereby it is not a little increaſed. But to proceed with the Towie, which being paſt Lanimphrie and a rill that meeteth with the ſame, deſcending from northweſt of Lanurdan, it taketh in the influences of diuerſe waters in one chanell, of which the greateſt is called Modewie, and thereof I find this deſcription.

Modewie.

The Modewie, or (as ſome pronounce it) Motheuie, riſeth of two heads, which ioining aboue Lanihangle, the ſtreame runneth on till it meet with the Cledoch on the left hand, proceeding alſo further toward Langadocke, it receiueth not far from thence the Sawtheie, whoſe two heads deſcend from the blacke mounteines or eaſt edge of Carmardineſhire (as mine information leadeth me.) After this confluence the ſecond Duleſſe doth meet with the Towie, whoſe head is in the hilles aboue Talthogaie abbeie, northweſt from Langadocke full fiue miles: then comming downe by Landilobaur, Newton, Dinefar caſtell, and Golden groue, it receiueth the third Duleſſe from by north that commeth in by Lanihangle and Dillan caſtell, and after that the Cothie, whoſe race is ſomewhat long, and therefore his deſcription not vtterlie to be paſſed ouer.

Not farre from the head (which is three miles from Landanbreuie, vnder the hulke of Blame Icorne, a narrow paſſage, and therein manie heaps of ſtones) and ſomewhat beneath Lana Pinſent chappell, it taketh in the Turche becke that runneth thither from aboue Lanacroies: thence it goeth to Lanſawell, Abergorlech, Breghuangothie, Lannigod, and ſo into Towie, which hatking forward by chappell Dewie, receiueth the Rauelthie from by north, then the Gwilie from northweſt, whoſe head is aboue Lanie Pinſent, and race by Canwell, Eluert, Comewilie, and Merling hill, as I haue often heard. After this confluence with the Gwilie, the Towie goeth to Caermardine, then to Lanigang, then to Lanſtephan, S. Ilmaels, and ſo into the ſea.

Taus.

Next vnto the Towie is the Taue, whoſe head is in the blacke mounteines, as at the roots of Wrenni vaur hill in Pembrokeſhire, from whence it runneth by Lanuurnach, Langludien, Lanualteg, and taking in the Dudderie from ſouthweſt, out of the ſame countie by Lanbederuelſtraie, and Lindwie, it goeth to Egleſware chappell, beneath which it croſſeth the Marlais by north that runneth by Lanbedie and Whitland. Thence meeting with one rill called Uenni, as I take it, that commeth through Cardith forreſt on the one ſide, and the Caire on the other that runneth into it weſt of Landowror, it haſteth to S. Clares, where it taketh in the Carthkinnie, or Barthkinnie (as Leland calleth it) and the Gow or Tow both in one chanell, of which the firſt riſeth aboue Capell Bettus, from whence it runneth by Talacouthe, Kilſant, and Langinnin, the other iſſueth out of the ground aboue Trologh Bettus, by Widrun, & ioining with the former a little aboue S. Clares, they run into the Taue, and from thence to Lanihangle, and betweene it and Abercowen, admitteth finallie the Gowen or Gow ſtreame, which comming likewiſe from the blacke mounteines, goeth by Ebbernant, & ſo into the Taue, who directeth his courſe by Lancharne caſtell, and then into the ſea.

Gwair.

The next water that we come to is the Gwair, which is but a ſmall thing riſing aboue Lambeder Uelſtraie, and going from thence by eaſt of caſtell Merbie hill, Crumuier and Argwaire, it is not long yer it fall into the ſea, and ſo we leaue Cairdinſhire, and go ouer into Penbroke. Then paſſed we by an other comming out of Rathe forreſt called Coit Rathe, the water it ſelfe riſing about Templeton. Thence leaning the Monkeſton rocke, we came to Tenbie or Dinbechie Piſcod, and paſſing into the port betweene the caſtell and S. Katharines rocke, we found it ſerued with two little backe waters, of ſo ſmall countenance, that they are not worthie of anie further talke to be ſpent in their deſcriptions: yet the one ſeemeth to be called Flozence broke, the other Freſſo, Gunfreſton ſtanding betweene them both, whereby their ſight cannot periſh. After this we paſſed betweene Londie and an other Ilet or rocke lieng by northweſt of the ſame, to Ludſop point, & ſo to Abertrewent, where I found a ſillie freſh water named Trewend that riſeth a mile or thereabout within the land. From thence we went ſouthwards by Brode hauen, till we came to S. Gowans point. Then gathering weſt and by north before we came at Shepe Iland, we found another freſh water, that riſeth ſhort of Kirtog Maharen, and running ſouth of Uggarſton, Windmill hill, or betweene it and Caſtell Norton and Gupton, it holdeth on flat weſt all the waie till it come to the Ocean.

Wrenni vaur hill.

Being paſſed this water, we caſt about toward the northweſt, by the Poptons and Pennar, till we

From Londie to Caldis thirtie miles.

Trewent.

Pennar. came to the Pennar mouth, out of which the salt water issueth that in maner inuironneth Penbroke. From this (omitting sundrie salt creekes on both sides of the hauen, not appertinent to our purpose) we came to the fall of two waters in one chanell, aboue whose confluence Williamston parke standeth, and whereof one (a meere salt course) incloseth three parts of Carew castell. The other rising neere to Coit Rath forrest is a fresh, & going by Gestraiston, Creswell & Lawrenie, it leaueth the parke on the south side, & goeth into the hauen after confluence with the former.

Now come I to the two swords, or hauen of Milford, whereinto two riuers direct their course from the northeast called Dugledu or the two swords, and betweene them both is a rill which they call also Cultlell (that is to saie) the knife. Hereof riseth a merrie tale of a Welshman, that lieng in this place abroad all night in the cold weather, and peraduenture not verie well occupied, was demanded of his hostesse (where he did breake his fast the next morrow) at what inne he laie in the night precedent, bicause he came so sone to hir house yer anie of hir maids were vp: Oh good hostesse (quoth he) be contented, I laie to night in a dangerous estate, for I slept betweene two swords with a long knife at my heart; meaning indeed that he laie betweene these two riuers, and his brest towards the south neere to the head of Cultlell. But to passe ouer these iests. Here Leland speaketh of a riuer called Gwilie, but where it riseth or falleth, he maketh no certeine report: wherefore it is requisit that I proceed according to my purpose.

Dugledu. Cultlell. Gwilie.

The one of these swords is called Clotheie or Clothie, of which I find this short and breefe description. The Clothie riseth at the foot of Mreennie baure hill and comming downe to Monachlodge, Langelman, Lannakeuen, and Egremond, it receiueth a rill from by northwest before it come at Lanhaddon castell, which commeth from aboue the moze by Clarbaston and Bletherston, his head arising in the hill west of Manclogbaie, as Leland doth informe me. Per long also and beneath Lanhaddon it taketh in another on the east side from Narbarth castell, comming by Robeston, then going by Cunaston, Slebach, Picton castell, Sikker houses, Minware & Martheltwie, at Rise castell point west of Coit Kenles (as I haue beene informed) it taketh in the other swozd, named Dugledie, whereof I read as followeth. The head of the Dugledie is somwhere at northwest, betwixt S. Laurences & S. Dogwels, from whence it runneth to Trauegarne, Redbarton, & taking in a rill by the waie from Camrose at the west, it goeth to Hauerford or Herefozd west, and there vniteth it selfe with a water, which peraduenture is the same that Leland called Gwilie. Certes it riseth short of Walton, and comming by S. Leonards chappell and Pendergest, it falleth I saie into the Dugledie, ouer against the towne of Hauerford or Herford west, but in Welsh Hulford; as Lhoid doth set it downe. Beneath Herford it taketh in another water from south west, whose head is short of S. Margarets chappell, and enterance betweene Harraldston and Herford, which Harraldstone receiueth the name of Harrald the successour of Edward the confessour as some call him, who was a greeuous mall vnto the Britons that remained in the time of the said Edward; as I haue noted elsewhere. Then the Dugledie still descending taketh in the Frese frō Fresethorpe, a rill of no great accompt, and therefore I go from it making hast vnto Culthell, & omitting two rils betweene it and the Clotheie on the southside, of no great weight and moment. The Culthell commeth into the Dugledie beneath Bolston, with a freight course from by north, of three or foure miles, rising by west of Slebach, and comming by Bowlston, after whose vnition with the aforesaid water, they run on as one till they meet with the Clothie, calling out by the waie sundrie salt creekes, as the maine chanell doth from thence forth vntill it passe the Sandie hauen, the Dale rode (whither a fillie fresh rill commeth of small value) & be come about againe to the large Ocean.

Clotheie. Dugledie. Gwilie.

Hauing thus shewed the courses of those few fresh waters that come to Milford hauen, we call about by the Blockehouse and S. Annes chappell to Gateholme Ile, that lieth betweene S. Annes and the Willocke point, directlie ouer against Stockeholme Iland that is situat further off into the sea, toward the southwest, and is full halfe so great as the Scalmeie that I elsewhere described. Betweene the Willocke point also and the Scalmeie, directlie west is the Midland Ile, full so great as the Gateholme. As for the two rocks that lie by north and south of the Scalmeie, of which the one is called the Yardland stone, the other Pewlstone, it shall not be greatlie requisit to stand on their discourses, sith they are such as may hardlie be taken for Ilands, and euen in like sort we may iudge of S. Brides Ile, which is southwest of Caltrop rode, & likewise of the Gresholme, whereof I find this short description. The Gresholme lieth directlie west of Scalmeie, from whence if you sails thither on the south side, you must neds passe by the Pewlstone rocke: if on the north of Scalmeie, you must leaue the Yarland stone on your left hand. Wherto if you note well the situation of these Ilands alreadie named, and confer them with the Ramseie and S. Dauids land, you shall find them to produce as it were two dangerous points, including the Bzid baie, wherein (notwithstanding the great nesse) are 1000 perils, and no fresh brookes for me to deale withall. Finallie, hauing doubled the Willocke point, we thought it not good altogether to leaue that baie vnsearched, at lest wise to see what Ilands might there be found, & long entred into the same, we beheld one which the men of the countrie call S. Brides Iland, a verie little place and situate neere the land, before I came at Caltroie rode. From thence we went about by the little hauen, Doluach hauen, Carnaie hauen, Shtrelace rocke, Carnbuddie, and Carnaie baies, Portelais, and so into the sound betweens Ramseie and the point. In this sound likewise is a little Ile, almost annered to the maine: but in the middest thereof, I meane of the sound, is a rocke called the horse (a mile and more by north of Ribbie rocke, that lieth south east of Ramseie) and more infortunate than ten of Scians colts, but thanked be God I neuer came on his backe. Thence passing by S. Stephans, and Whitesand baies, we saluted the Bishop and his clerks, as they went in procession on our left side (being loth to take anie salted holie water at their hands) and came at last to the point called S. Dauids head, which Ptolomie calleth Octapitanum promontorium, except I be deceiued. But here gentle reader giue me leaue to staie a while, and insert the words of Leland touching the land called S. Dewies or S. Dauids land, whereof some men may peraduenture haue vse, his words are these. Being therefore past this hauen and point of Demetia, in calling about the coast we come to S. Dewies or S. Dauids land, which Ptolomie calleth Octapitanum promontorium, I read to be separated from the rest of the countrie much after this maner, although I grant that there may be and are diuerse other little creekes betwixt Newgale and S. Dauids head, and betwixt S. Dauids and Fischard, beside those that are here mentioned out of a register of that house.

Brides Iland. A sort of dangerous rocks lieng on a row vpon the west end of Southwales called the Bishop & his clerkes. S. Dewie or Dauid all one.

As we turne therefore from Milford, S. Dauids land beginneth at Newgale, a creeke serued with a backe fresh water. Howbeit there is a baie before this creeke betwixt it and Milford. From hence about Saluach. bout foure miles is Saluach creeke, otherwiſe called Sauerach, whither ſome freſh water reſoꝛteth: the mouth alſo thereof is a good reſcue foꝛ balingers, as it (I meane the regiſter) ſaith. Thence go we to Poꝛtelais three miles, where is a little poꝛtlet, whither the Alen that commeth through ſaint Dewies cloſe doth run. It lieth a mile ſouthweſt from S. Dewies, ſaint Stinans Chappell alſo is betweene Poꝛtelais, and Poꝛtmaw. The next is Poꝛt Maw, where I found a great eſtuarie into the land. The Pendwie halfe a mile from that: Lhand Uehan is three miles from Pendwie, where is a ſalt creeke, then to Tredine three miles, where is another creeke to Langunda, foure miles, and another creeke is there in like ſoꝛt where fiſhermen catch herrings. Heere alſo the Gwerne riuer diuideth Penbidiane from Fiſcherdine Kemmeis land. From Langunda to Fiſchard at the Gwerne mouth foure miles, and here is a poꝛtlet oꝛ hauenet alſo foꝛ ſhips. And thus much of S. Dauids land.

Beſides this alſo, Leland in a third booke talketh of lhinnes and poles, but foꝛ aſmuch as my purpoſe is not to ſpeake of lakes and lhinnes, I paſſe them ouer as haſting to Teiſie, in Latine Tibius, and after Ptolomie Tuerobius oꝛ Tiuirobius, which is the next riuer that ſerueth foꝛ my purpoſe. And yet not foꝛgetting to touch the Gwerne, foꝛ after we came from ſaint Dauids head, we coaſted along toward the ſoutheaſt, till wee came ouer againſt ſaint Catharins, where going noꝛthwards by the bꝛoad hauen, and the Strombles head, we ſailed thence noꝛtheaſt, and by noꝛth, to Langlas head, then ſtat ſouth by the Cow and Calfe (two cruell rockes) which we left on the left hand, & ſo coaſted ouer to Abergwin oꝛ Fiſchard, where we found a freſh water named Guin, oꝛ Gwerne, whoſe courſe is in maner directlie out of the eaſt into the weſt, from Wremie hils by Pont Vaunt and Lanichair, vntill it come within a mile of the foꝛeſaid towne. It riſeth ſtat noꝛth of the Perſelie hill, from whence it goeth by Pont vaine, Lauerillidoch, Lanchar, Landilouair, & ſo to Abergwine, oꝛ Abergwerne, foꝛ I read both. From Abergwine, we caſt about by Dinas head, till we come to the fall of Neuerne, where Newpoꝛt ſtandeth. The head of this riuer is aboue Capell Nantgwin, from whence it runneth by Whitchurch, but yer it come at Kilgwin, it taketh in a little water that riſeth ſhoꝛt of Wrenie vaure, and thence go foꝛth as one vntill they come to Newpoꝛt. Cardigan hauen is the next fall that I did ſtumble on, wherein lieth a litle Iland ouer againſt the noꝛth point. Hereinto alſo commeth the Teiſie, a noble riuer which riſeth in Lintiuie, and is fraught with delicate ſamons, and herein and not elſewhere in all the riuers of Britaine, is the Caſtoꝛ oꝛ Beuer to be found. But to pꝛoceed. The verie hed thereof (I ſaie) is foure miles aboue Stradfloꝛe in Luitiuie, and after it hath run from thence a little ſpace, it receiueth a bꝛoke from ſoutheaſt that commeth out of Lin Legnant, and then after the confluence runneth on to Stradfloꝛe abbeie, beneth which it meeteth with the Piricke water (that riſeth aboue Stradmirich) and ſome after with the Landurch (both from the noꝛthweſt) and finallie the Bꝛennich aboue Tregaron, that commeth in by the eaſt; as Leland hath ſet downe.

Gwerne. Neuerne. Teiſie oꝛ Tine. Pyſtriche. Landurch.

Neere to Landwibꝛeuie alſo it croſſeth the Bꝛomis by eaſt noꝛtheaſt, and then goeth to Landuair, Cledogh, Kellan, and ſome after taking in the Matherne from by eaſt, that parteth Cardigan partlie from Carmardine ſhire, and likewiſe that Dulas aboue Lanbedder (which riſeth aboue Langibbie, and goeth thence to Bettus) on the noꝛthweſt, it goeth next of all to Lanbedder towne, then to Lantuair, beneath which it croſſeth the Graueth, thence to Pencarocke, Lanibether, Lanlonie, Lanthangle, and Sandiſſell, and there it vniteth it ſelfe with the Clethoꝛ oꝛ Dettoꝛ, which commeth downe thither by Lantiſliued chappell, Lanſraine, and finallie Landiſſell from by noꝛth, as I do here affirme. After this confluence it pꝛoceedeth on to Landuaie, Alloine, Bangoꝛ, Langeler, Landeureog and Newcaſtell, yer long taking in the Kerie from by noꝛth, whoſe head is not farre from that of Clethoꝛ, and whoſe courſe is ſomewhat inlarged by ſuch rilles as deſcend into the ſame. Foꝛ weſt of Kenwith two becks in one chanell do fall into it, which be namcleſſe, and but of a little length.

Bꝛomis. Matherne. Dulas. Graueth. Clethoꝛ. Kerie.

Beneath Tredwair alſo it croſſeth another from by weſt, that runneth along by Bettus, Euan, and finallie meeting with the Teiſie, they run as one by Kennarth (ſtill parting Cardigon ſhire from Carmardin, as it hath done ſith it met with the Matherne) and ſo foꝛth on till they ioine with the Cheach, which riſing ſoutheaſt aboue chappell Euan, doth part Carmardine and Bꝛechnocke ſhire in ſunder, till it come vnto the Teiſie. From this confluence, and being ſtill a limit vnto Cardigon ſhire, it goeth by Marierdine, and ſo to Cardigon, taking in one rill from by noꝛth deſcending by Penneralt, by noꝛth of Monardiue oꝛ Marierdine, and two other from by ſouthweſt, of which the one commeth in beneath Kilgaron caſtell, the other from Lantwood noꝛthweſt of Dſcoid Moꝛtemer, which lieth ſoutheaſt of Cardigan, and then going foꝛward betweene S. Dogmaile, & Langoidmere, it is not long yer it fall into the Iriſh ſea, ſtat weſt and by noꝛth from his vpriſt, and ſending vs foꝛth from Penbꝛoke into Cardigon ſhire, wherevnto it hath become march euer ſithence it came from Kellam, oꝛ confluence with the Matherne. Cheach.

Being come into Cardigon ſhire, and hauing paſſed the Cardigon point, an Iland of the ſame denomination lieng by weſt thereof, we came vnto the fall of Airon three miles beneath Lanclære, it riſeth in the mounteines by a chappell called Blam Peniall belonging to Landwie bꝛeuie about three oꝛ foure miles from Tiue banks, & runneth on by Lamberwoddie, Langitho, Tregrigaron hill, Treuilian, Talaferne, and ſome after taking in a rill from by ſouth from Siliam by Lanleir it runneth by Iſſrade, Kilkennen, Lanicharin, and finallie into the ſea, croſſing by the waie the Bidder bꝛoke, which comming from Dehewide, doth fall into the ſame, betweene Lanchairin, and Henuenneie. The Arth which is the next fall is no great thing, neither of anie long courſe, yet ſomewhat crotched, and it riſeth three oꝛ foure miles oꝛ moꝛe within the land ſlopewiſe, and comming by Lambaderne, and Trueglois, it falleth into the ſea, noꝛtheaſt of Aberarth. Airon. Bidder. Arth.

Being paſt the Arth, & hauing ſtaied there a while bicauſe we found ſome harboꝛongh, we came next of all vnto the Wereie, which riſeth of two heads, aboue whoſe confluence ſtandeth a towne, named Lanihangle, Kedzod, and from whence it goeth by Lanigruthen to Lariſſed, & ſo into the Ocean. Then went we to the Yſtwith, which riſeth in the blacke mounteins aboue Comerſtwith, from whence it runneth certeine miles, vntill it come vnto Iſpittie, Iſtwith, Lananon, Lanuler, Lan Nachairne, and ſo into the ſea, taking withall firſt the Meleuen, then the Kidall oꝛ Redholl not farre from the ſhoꝛe, whereof I haue this deſcription. The Kidall riſeth in the top of Plimlimmon hill out of a lake named Lin Kidall, from whence going toward Spittie Kinwen, it croſſeth one water on the noꝛth, and another beneth it on the ſoutheaſt, and ſo goeth on by Lanbeder vaure, till it come to Aberiſtwith, the Iſtwith, and ſo into the Ocean. Hauing thus viewed the Iſtwith, and taken Wyſtriche. Landurch. Bꝛomis. Matherne. Dulas. Graueth. Wereie. Iſtwith. Redholl.

our selues againe to the sea, we crossed the Salke or Salique brooke, whereof I find this memorall.

Salique.

The Salique brooke descendeth in like sort from the blacke mounteins, & going from Ammaboue, toward Gogarth, or Gogirthar, it receiueth the Mallalique, and from thence goeth into the sea, southwest from his originall. From hence we went to the Lerie, an indraught of no great quantitie, neither commodious as I gesse (yet I may be deceiued) for anie ship to harborough in. It riseth toward the lower ground of the blacke hils, and going by Lanihangle, cassell Gwalter, it runneth from thence northeast into the Ocean, receiuing a rill by the waie from the hilles which lie by northeast of his course. But what stand I vpon trifles?

Mallalique.

Lerie.

Thus haue I brought my selfe out of Caerdigan shire vnto the Wie, which is limit betweene it and Merioneth for a certeine space, & being entred in the mouth thereof we gat vp to the head, minding in the description of the same to come downeward as in the rest, which we will doo in such good manner as for the time and want of some information is possible to be performed. It ariseth in the south part of Snowdonie, and goeth on forth right to Lammothwie, by Nowdhewie, Nathan laith, and comming downe to Dinas Mathew, it receiueth two rilles from northwest, and the third comming by Mallroid called Cludoch from northeast, & so holdeth on crossing the Angell water at the west, which boundeth Mongomerie shire in part, till it come to Romis, beneath which water it taketh in the Towin that passeth by Lambrin mawr from Talgarth, and then goeth to Mathrauerue, crossing another from by north and so forth to Lanwoting, where it meeteth with the Berig on the one side, and the Gwidall which commeth from Dorolwen on the other.

Wie.

Romis.

After this, our maine riuer goeth by Pengos, and beneath the same taketh in an influence from southeast, called the Dulas, and another from the northwest. From thence it hasteth on to Magenillet, or Machenict, first crossing the Leuennie from southeast, secondlie the Peniall from northwest, thirdlie the Einon, fourthlie the Rinar, fiftlie the Cleidor, these three last rehearsed falling into it from southeast, & the last hauing his course by Langwinhelin and so into the sea, as mine instruction vpholdeth. It seemeth in some mens iudgements to part Northwales and Westwales in sunder, and the same which in Latine hight Deuus, in Welsh or British Diffi or Dewie, whereof the Latine doth seeme to fetch his sound. But to proceed with the rest of such falles and waters as are to be found in this countie. Going therfore northwestward, we come to a fall frō the north called Towen Merionneth which is the mouth of the Difonnie streame, a pretie riuer rising in the hilles aboue Lanihangle, and west of cassell Traherne receiueth the Ridrric, which commeth from Chadridric hill, by Callillin cassell, Treherie, and so into the Difonnie from southeast, fetching his course by Lanegrin, and so into the sea within fiue miles thereof.

Being past this we did cast about by the Sarnabigh point, till we came to the Lingouen becke, and so to the Barre, which is a faire water, and therefore worthie to be with diligence described, yet it is not called Bar from the head, but rather Moth or Derie, for so are the two chiefe heads called out of which this riuer descendeth, and are about six miles west of the Lin, out of which the Dee hath his issue, and betweene which the Karan baure hilles are situat and haue their being. After the ioining of the two heds of this Barre, as I name it from the originall, it receiueth a rill from northeast called Cain, & another beneath the same, comming from Beurose wood, and so holdeth on towards the south betweene Laniltid and Kemmor abbaie, till it met a little by west of Dolgelth with the Auon baure, which comming also out of the Wodland soile, & taking in a rill from Gwannas, hasteth northwestward (by Dolgelth) to ioine with the Barre, and being met they receiue the Resilgun, then the Hirgun, & after a course of foure to fiue miles it falleth into the sea, hauing watered the verie hart & inward parts of this shire. From hence we crosse the Skethie which runneth by Corsogdale and Lanthwie, alias Lanthonie, then the Lambader which receiuing the Artro aboue Lambader, doth fall into the sea, southeast of the point, and flat south of Landango, which is a towne situat on the other side of the turning.

After this we passed by Aberho, so named of the riuer Ho, that falleth there into the sea, and commeth thither from the Alpes or hils of Snowdonie, mounteins no lesse fertile for grasse, wood, cattell, fish and foule, than the famous Alpes beyond the seas, whereof all the writers doo make so honorable report. From hence we sailed by Abermawr or mouth of Mawr, which commeth in like sort from Snowdonie, and taketh diuerse riuers with him whose names I doo not know. Then vnto the Artro a brooke, whose head commeth from by north east, and in his course receiueth the Gedar on the north side, and so holdeth on till it fall into the sea, after a few windlesses which it maketh as it passeth. After this we come to Traith behan, which is the fall of the Dyrid, a pretie riuer comming from the marches of Caernaruonshire, which passing by Festinog, soone after taketh in the Cunwell, then the Melenrid; and so holdeth on to Deckoin, where it falleth into the said Traith. For of the other two rilles that lie by south hereof, and haue their issue also into the same, I make but small accompt, bicause their quantitie is not great. Next vnto this we haue Traith mawr, whereinto the Farles hath his issue, a riuer proceeding from Snowdonie or the Snowdon hils, descending by Bethkelerke and Lanwrothen, without mixture of anie other water in all his course and passage. It is parcell of the march also betweene Merioneth and Caernaruon shires. From Traith mawr we passe by the Krekith, and come to another water descending from the north by Lankidwie, and after that to the Woie, whose mouthes are so neere togither, that no more than halfe a mile of the land doth seeme to keepe them in sunder.

Then come we vnto the Erke, a pretie brooke descending from Padrin hils, into whose mouth two other of no lesse quantitie than it selfe doo seeme to haue their confluence, and whose courses doo come along from the west and northwest; the most southerlie being called Girch, and the other the Hellie: except my memorie doo faile me. Then casting about toward the south (as the coast lieth) we saw the Aberfoch or mouth of the Soch riuer vpon our right hand, in the mouth whereof, or not farre by south thereof lie two Ilands, of which the more northerlie is called Tudfall, and the other Penrin: as Leland did obserue. I would set downe the British names of such townes and villages as these waters passe by; but the writing of them (for want of the language) is so hard to me, that I chose rather to shew their falles and risings, than to corrupt their denominations in the writing: and yet now and then I vse such words as our Englishmen doo giue vnto some of them, but that is not often, where the British name is easie to be found out and sounded.

After this, going about by the point, and leauing Gwelin Ile on the right hand, we come to Daron riuer, whereupon standeth Aberdaron a quarter of a mile from the shore betwixt Aberdaron and Aberdaron.

gernes vale, where the compaſſe of the ſea gathereth in a head, and entereth at both ends. Then come we about the point to Edarne becke, a mile and more ſouth of Newin. And ten or twelue miles from hence is the Uennie brooke, whoſe courſe is little aboue ſo manie miles; and not farre from it is the Liuan, a farre leſſe water, comming alſo from the eaſt: and nert vnto that another, wherinto the Willie by ſouth and the Carrog by north after their coniunction doo make their common influence. Hauing paſſed this riuer, we call about toward the north eaſt, and enter at Abermenaie ferrie, into the ſtreicts or ſtreame called Menaie, betweene Angleſeie and the maine, méeting firſt of all with the Gornaie, which commeth from the Snowdonie out of the Treuennian lake, and paſſeth by Lanunda into the ſea or Menaie ſtreame at South crocke. Nert of all we méet with the Saint, which commeth from Lin Lanbereie, paſſeth by Lanihangle, and ſo falleth into the Menaie at Aberſaint, which is on the ſouthweſt ſide of Caernaruon: on the other ſide alſo of the ſaid towne is the Skeuernocke, whereby it ſtandeth betweene two riuers, of which this hath his head not farre from Dinas Dreg.

Edarne becke.

Then come we (ſaith Leland) to Gwinliwith mirth (or Horſſe brooke) two miles from Moilethon, and it riſeth at a Well ſo called full a mile from thence. Moilethon is a bowe ſhot from Aberpowle, from whence ferrie botes go to the Termone or Angleſeie. Aberpowle runneth three miles into the land, and hath his head foure miles beyond Bangor in Menеie ſhore: and here is a little comming in for botes bending into the Menеie. Aber Gegeine commeth out of a mounteine a mile aboue, and Bangor (thorough which a rill called Torronnen hath his courſe) almoſt a mile aboue it. Aber Dgwine is two miles aboue that; it riſeth at Lale linne, Dgwine pole, fiue miles aboue Bangor in the eaſt ſide of Withou. Aber Auon is two miles aboue Aberogwrne, and it riſeth in a pole called Lin man Auon, three miles off. Auon Ian var Uchan riſeth in a mounteine therby, and goeth into the ſea, two miles aboue Duegeuelth. Auon Duegeuelth is three miles aboue Conwele, which riſing in the mounteins a mile off, goeth by it ſelfe into Menеie ſalt arme. On the ſaid ſhore alſo lieth Conweie, and this riuer doth run betwixt Penmaine Maur, and Penmaine Uchan. It riſeth about three miles from Penmaclon hils which lie about ſixtie miles from Conweie abbeie, now diſſolued out of a lake called Lin Conweie, and on the north and weſt of this riuer ſtandeth the towne of Conweie, which taketh his name thereof.

This riuer (which Ptolomie calleth Toeſobius, as I take it) after the deriuation thereof from the head, paſſeth on the weſt ſide by Spittieuan and Tiberio, beneath which it taketh in a ſtreame comming from the eaſt out of Denbighſhire, deriued from three heads, and of the greateſt called Nag. Some after alſo another, and then the third, which commeth in from the weſt by Lanpen Nawr: next of all the Leder on the ſame ſide, which commeth by Dolathelan caſtell: and aboue that from a Lin of the ſame denomination. Beneath this and ſelfe hand lieth likewiſe the Ligow or Ligwie, proceeding from two lakes, that is, the Number and the Ligow. On the right hand as we ſtill deſcend, is the Coid, then the Glin, & a little lower we méet with the Lin Gerioneth: and after we be paſt another on the right ſide, we come to the Perloid, which commeth out of Lin Cowlid, to the Pgan, to the Idulin, to the caſtell Water on the left, & then to the Melandider on the right, without the ſight of anie other, till we come almoſt to Conweie, where we find a notched ſtreame comming from by weſt, and called Guffen or Gyffin into the ſame by one chanell on the northeaſt ſide of the towne, beneath Guffin or Gyffin, and ouer againſt Lanſanfraid in Denbighſhire; ſo farre as I now remember. Some part of Carnaruonſhire ſtretcheth alſo beyond Aber Conweie, or the fall of Conweie, & it is called Drmeſhed point, wherein alſo is a rill, whoſe fall into the ſea is betwéene Penrin and Landright. And thus we haue made an end of the chéefe waters which are to be found in this countie.

The nert is a corner of Denbigh, by which we doo as it were ſtep ouer into Flintſhire, and whoſe firſt water is not great, yet it commeth from ſouthweſt, and falleth into the north or Iriſh ſea called Virginium, beneath Landilas; as the nert that commeth ſouth from Bettas doth the like three miles beneath Abergele, and is not onelie called Gele (as the name it ſelfe importeth) but alſo noted to take his courſe through the Canges. Hauing thus gone ouer the angle of Denbighſhire, that lieth betweene thoſe of Carnaruon and Flint, we come nert of all vnto Aber Cluide, or the fall of Clotha or Glota, which is a ſtreame not to be thortlie intreated of. It riſeth among certeine hilles, which lie not far diſtant from the confines of Merioneth and Denbighſhires. Southeaſt from his fall, and hauing run foure or fiue miles from the head, it commeth about to Darwen, taking in the Maniton on the left hand, and the Meſpin on the right: and ſone after the third from by weſt, whoſe head is not farre from Gloucanocke. Beneath Ruthen alſo it taketh in the Leueneie: and after that another, and the third, all on the right hand, and ſo holdeth on till it méet with the Cluedoch, then with the Pfrade, which paſſeth by Whitchurch on the left hand. After which we come to the Wheler on the right, and ſo to his ioining with the Elwie, which is beneath S. Aſaphes, a biſhops ſée that is inuironed with them both. This Elwie riſeth aboue Gwitherne, & beneath Lanuair taketh in the Alode, which commeth from lin Alode, by Lanſannan, and ioineth with him fiue miles beneath Langrenew. The Cluda therefore and the Elwie being met, the confluence paſſeth on to the ſea by Rutland caſtell, where it taketh in the Sarne, which commeth from by eaſt, and hath a courſe almoſt of ſirtéene miles. From hence we toke ſea toward the Dée mouth: and as we paſſed by the reſt of the ſhore, we ſaw the fall of a little brooke néere Baſing Werke, of another néere to Flint, of the third at Powleie caſtell, which with his two armes in maner incloſeth it; and the fourth beneath Hawarden hold, which in like ſort goeth round about the ſame, & from whence we came to the Dée, where we landed and toke vp our lodging in Cheſter. In this place alſo it was no hard matter to deliuer & ſet downe the names of ſuch riuers and ſtreames as are alſo to be found in Angleſeie, finding my ſelfe to haue ſome leaſure and fit opportunitie for the ſame: and imagining a iourneie thither alſo, as vnto the other places mentioned in this deſcription, whither as yet it hath not béene my hap to trauell: I thought it not amiſſe to take it alſo in hand, and performe it after this maner.

Ferrieng therefore ouer out of Carnaruonſhire to Beaumariſe, I went by land without croſſing of anie riuer or ſtreame worthie memorie, till I came to the Brant, which hath his fall not farre from the ſouthéeſt point of that Iland. This Brant riſeth farre vp in the land, not farre from Lauredenell, and holding on his courſe ſouthward to Lanthoniell Uaall, it goeth on to Bodowerueh, Langainwen, and ſo into the ſea.

The nert fall we came vnto was called Paltrath, and it is produced by the confluence of two riuers,

the

the Geuennie and the Gint, who ioine not farre from Langreſtoll. This alſo laſt rehearſed hath his head neere to Penmoneth, the other being forked riſeth in the hillie ſoile aboue Tregaion and Langwithlog: ſo that part of the Iland obteineth no ſmall commoditie and benefit by their paſſage. Next vnto this we came vnto the Fraw, whoſe head is neere to Langinewen, and paſſage by Cap Maer; after which it falleth into a lake, from whence it goeth eaſt of Aberfraw, and ſo into the ſea. The next riuer hath no name to my knowledge: yet hath it a longer courſe than that which I laſt deſcribed. For it riſeth two or three miles aboue Hanegloſſe: and paſſing from thence to Treualghmaie, after the deſcent of foure miles, it falleth into the ſea. After this we came to an other, which riſeth more to Cap Iegan ferwie, and falleth into the ſea ſoutheaſt of the little Iland, which is called Ynis Wealt. It is nameleſſe alſo as the other was, and therefore hauing ſmall delight to write thereof, we paſſed ouer the ſalt creeke by a bridge into Cair Kibie, which by the ſame, is as it were cut from the maine Iland, and in ſome reſpect not vnworthie to be taken for an Ile. In the north ſide therefore of Cair Kibie is a little rill or creeke: but whether the water thereof be freſh or ſalt, as yet I do not remember.

Fraw.

This place being viewed, I came backe againe by the aforeſaid bridge, into the maine of Angleſeie, and going northwards I find a fall inforced by three riuerets, each one hauing his courſe almoſt ſouth from other; and the laſt falling into the confluence of the two firſt, not halfe a mile from the weſt, where I firſt eſpied the ſtreame. The name of the moſt northerlie is Linon, of the ſecond Allo; but the third is altogither nameleſſe for aught that I can learne, wherefore it ſhall not be neceſſarie to ſpend anie time in the further ſearching of his courſe. Being paſt this, we went northwards till we came to the point, and then going eaſtward, we butted vpon the fall of a certeine confluence growing by the ioining of the Nathanon and the Geger, which meet beneath and neere to the Langechell. And after the ſame we paſſed on ſomewhat declining ſouthward by the Hillarie point, toward the ſoutheaſt, till we came to the Duleſſe, and from thence to Pentraeth water: after which we turned northward, then eaſtward; and finallie ſouthward, till we came to Langurdoy; from whence vnto Beaumariſe (where began our voiage) we find not anie water worthie to be remembred. And thence I go forward with the deſcription of the Dee.

Linon. Allo.

The Dee or Deua (as Ptolomie calleth it) is a noble riuer, & breeder of the beſt trout, whoſe head is in Merioneth ſhire, about three miles aboue the lake, ſituate in the countie of Penthlin, and called Lin Tegnis, whoſe ſtreame yet verie ſmall, by reaſon of the ſhortneſſe of his courſe, falleth into the ſaid lake, not far from Lanullin. There are ſundrie other waters that come alſo into the ſaid lake, which is foure or fiue miles in length, and about two miles ouer; as one from by ſouth, whoſe fall is eaſt, and not manie furlongs from the Dee: another hath his iſſue into the ſame by Langower: the third on the north ſide of Lanullin, named Leie: the fourth at Glanlintegid called the Iauerne, the lake it ſelfe ending about Bala, and from thence running into the Trowerin, a pretie ſtreame, and not a little augmented by the Kelme and Monach which fall by north into the ſame, and ioineth with the Dee ſouth of Lanuair; from whence forth it loſeth the name, and is afterward called Dee. Eaſt of Bala in like ſort it receiueth the Ruddoch, then the Cleton, and ſo paſſing on by Landright to Langar, it meeteth with a confluence proceeding from the Alwen and the Giron, of which this riſeth in the hils aboue Langham, the other in the mountains about fiue or ſix miles by northweſt of Lanihangle in Denbighſhire, where (as I geſſe) it falleth into the ground; and afterward riſing againe betweene Lanihangle and Bettus, it holdeth on about two miles, and then ioineth with the Giron, full ſix miles aboue Dole, and before it come to the Dee. From hence the Dee goeth by Lanſanfraid, and the marches of Merioneth into Denbighſhire, and ſo to Langellon, Dinas, Bzen, &c: keeping his courſe by certeine windleſſes, till he receiue the Griſtioneth, deſcending by Ruabon, then another eſt of the ſame; the third, from by weſt called Keriog (whoſe head is not farre from the bounds of Merioneth and courſe by Lanarmon, Lanſanfraid, and Chirke) the fourth from ſouth eaſt out of Shropſhire, called Morlais, and ſo paſſeth as bounds betweene Denbighſhire, and the outliggand of Flintſhire, to wit by Biſſocke on the one ſide and Bangor on the other, till it come to Worthenburie: whereabout it receiueth a chanell deſcending from foure influences, of which one commeth by Penlie chappell, the ſecond from Hannere, which goeth downe by Emberhall, and falleth in a little by eaſt of the other; the third from Blackmere (by Whitchurch) &c: and the fourth from betweene Chad and Worſall. Theſe two later meeting aboue nether Durtwich, do hold on to Talerne, as mine information inſtructeth me.

Griſtioneth. Keriog.

From Wrothenburie the Dee goeth northweſtwards toward Shockligc, meeting by the waie with the confluence of the Cluedoch (or Dedoch originall mother to thoſe trouts for which the Dee is commended) and deſcendeth by Capell Poinglath) and the Gwinrogh, that runneth through Wrexham, both ioining a mile and more beneath Wrexham, not far from Hantwerne. Soone after alſo our maine riuer receiueth another becke from by eaſt, which is bound on the northweſt ſide to the outliggand of Flintſhire, and ſo paſſeth on betweene Holt caſtell and Ferneton, Almere and Pulton, as march betweene Denbighſhire and Cheſhire; and then taketh in the Alaunus or Alen; a pretie riuer and worthie to be deſcribed. The head of this Alen therefore is in Denbighſhire, and ſo diſpoſed that it riſeth in two ſeuerall places, each being two miles from other; the one called Alen Hawr, the other Alen Uchan, as I do find reported. They meet alſo beneath Landegleie, and run northwards till they come beyond Lanuerres, where meeting with a rill comming from by weſt, it runneth on to the Hold to Horſheth; and ſo in and out to Greſeford; taking the Cagidog from ſouthweſt with it by the waie; then to Traue Alen, and ſo into the Dee, a mile and more aboue the fall of Powton becke, which alſo deſcendeth from ſouthweſt out of Flintſhire, and is march vnto the ſame, euen from the verie head. After which confluence the Dee hauing Cheſterſhire on both ſides, goeth to Aldford with a ſwift courſe, where it meeteth with the Belton brooke, whereof I do find this deſcription following.

The Belton water riſeth in the woddie ſoile betweene Spurſton and Belton caſtell with a forked head, and leauing Belton towne on the northeaſt, it goeth to Tarneton, and to Hakeſleie, where it diuideth it ſelfe in ſuch wiſe, that one branch thereof runneth by Totnall, Coldburne, and Leehall, to Alford, and ſo into the Dee, the other by Stapleford, Terwine, Barrow, Picton, and Therton, where it branceth againe, ſending forth one arme by Stanneie pole, and the parke ſide into Merſeie arme, toward the northweſt, and another by ſouthweſt, which commeth as it were backe againe, by Stoke, Croughton, Backeford, Charleton, Upton, the Baites, and ſo vnder a bridge to Cheſter ward, where much of the Dée, which is a troubleſome ſtreame when the wind is at ſouthweſt, and verie dangerous, in ſo much that few dare paſſe thereon. Sometimes alſo in harueſt time it ſendeth downe ſuch ſtoꝛe of water, when the wind bloweth in the ſame quarter, that it dꝛowneth all their graſſe and coꝛne that groweth in the lower grounds néere vnto the bankes thereof. Certes it is about thꝛée hundꝛed foot, at his departure from the Tigme, and woꝛthilie called a litigious ſtreame; becauſe that by often alteration of chanell, it inforceth men to ſéeke new bounds vnto their lands, foꝛ here it laieth new ground, and there tranſlateth and taketh awaie the old, ſo that there is nothing moꝛe vnconſtant than the courſe of the ſaid water. Of the monaſterie Bangoꝛ alſo, by which it paſſeth after it hath left Dꝛton bꝛidge, I find this note, which I will not omit, becauſe of the ſlaughter of monks made ſometime néere vnto the ſame. Foꝛ although the place require it not, yet I am not willing altogither to omit it.

The ſituation of ỹ monaſterie of Bangoꝛ.

This abbeie of Bangoꝛ ſtood ſometime in Engliſh Wallo, by hither and ſouth of the riuer Dée. It is now ploughed ground where that houſe ſtood, by the ſpace of a Welſh mile (which reacheth vnto a mile and an halfe Engliſh) and to this day the tillers of the ſoile there dw plow vp bones (as they ſaie) of thoſe monks that were ſlaine in the quarrell of Auguſtine, and within the memoꝛie of man ſome of them were taken vp in their rotten weeds, which were much like vnto thoſe of our late blacke monks, as Leland ſet it downe: yet Eraſmus is of the opinion, that the apparell of the Benedictine monks was ſuch as moſt men did weare generallie at their firſt inſtitution. But to pꝛoceed. This abbeie ſtood in a valleie, and in thoſe times the riuer ran hard by it. The compaſſe thereof likewiſe was as the circuit of a walled towne, and to this daie two of the gates may eaſilie be diſcerned, of which the one is named Poꝛt Hogan lieng by noꝛth, the other Poꝛt Clais ſituat vpon the ſouth. But the Dée hauing now changed his chanell, runneth thꝛough the verie middeſt of the houſe betwixt thoſe two gates, the one being at the left a full halfe mile from the other. As foꝛ the ſquared ſtone that is found hereabout, and the Romane coine, there is no ſuch neceſſitie of the reherſall thereof, but that I may paſſe it ouer well inough without anie further mention.

Being paſt the Dée we ſailed about Wirall, paſſing by Hilbꝛie oꝛ Hilbꝛée Iland, and Leuerpole, Naſſe, making our entrie into Merſeie arme by Leuerpole hauen, where we find a water falling out betweéne Seacombe and the Ferie, which doth in maner cut off the point from the maine of Wirall. Foꝛ riſing néere to the noꝛthweſt ſhoꝛe, it holdeth a courſe directlie toward the ſoutheaſt by Wallaſeie and Poꝛton, and ſo leaueth all the noꝛth part beyond that water a peninſula, the ſame being thꝛée ſquare, inuiꝛoned on two ſides with the Ocean, & on the third with the aforeſaid bꝛoke, whoſe courſe is well néere thꝛée miles except I be deceiued. Frõ hence entring further into the hauen, we find another fall betweéne Webington and Bꝛombꝛo chappell, deſcending from the hilles, which are ſeene to lie not farre from the ſhoꝛe, and thence croſſing the fall of the Beſton water, we come next of all vnto the Wiuer, than the

which I read of no riuer in England that fetcheth moꝛe oꝛ halfe ſo many windleſſes and crinklings, before it come at the ſea. It riſeth at Buckle hilles, which lie betweéne Ridleie and Buckle townes, and ſone after making a lake of a mile & moꝛe in length called Ridleie pole, it runneth by Ridleie to Chalmondlie.

Thence it goeth to Wrenburie, where it taketh in a water out of a moꝛe that commeth from Warburie: and beneth Sandfoꝛd bꝛidge the Combꝛus from Combꝛus. Combermer oꝛ Comber lake: and finallie the third that commeth from about Moneton, and runneth by Langerſlaw, then betweéne Shenton and Atherlie parkes, and ſo into the Wiuer, which watereth all the weſt part of England, and is no leſſe notable than the firſt Auon oꝛ third Duze, whereof I haue ſpoken alreadie. After theſe confluences it halſeth alſo to Audlem, Hawklow, and at Barderton croſſeth the Betleie water, that runneth by Duddington, Wid- Betleis. denberie, and ſo by Barderton into the aforeſaid ſtreame. Thence it goeth to Nantwich, but yer it come at Marchfoꝛd bꝛidge, it meeteth with a rill called Salopbꝛoke (as I geſſe) comming from Caluerleie ward, and likewiſe beneath the ſaid bꝛidge, with the Lée and the Wuluarne both in one chanell, whereof the firſt riſeth at Weſton, the other goeth by Copnall. From thence the Wiuer runneth on to Minchion and Cardeſwiſe, and the nert water that falleth into it is the Athe (which paſſeth by Darnall Grange) and afterward going to Warke, the vale Rotall, and Eaton, it commeth finallie to Noꝛthwich where it receiueth the Dane, to be deſcribed as followeth. The Dane riſeth in the verie edges of Cheſter, Darbiſhire, & Staffoꝛdſhire, and comming by Wharnefoꝛd, Swithamleie and Boſleie, is a limit betweéne Staffoꝛd and Darbie ſhires, almoſt euen from the verie head, which is in Parwell foꝛreſt.

Salop. Lée and Wuluarne. Athe. Dane.

It is not long alſo yer it dw méet with the Bidle water, that commeth by Congerton, and after the confluence goeth vnto Swetham, the Heremitage, Cotton and Croxton, there taking in two great waters, whereof the one is called Whelocke, which comming from the edge of the countie by Moꝛton to Sandbach, croſſeth another that deſcendeth from church Cawſton, and after the confluence goeth to Warmingham, ioining alſo beneath Midlewich with the Croco oꝛ Croxſton, the ſecond great water, whoſe head commeth out of a lake aboue Bꝛuerton (as I heare) and thence both the Whelocke and the Croco go as one vnto the Dane, at Croxton, as the Dane doth from thence to Boſtocke, Dauenham, Shebꝛuch, Shurlach, and at Noꝛthwich into the foꝛeſaid Wiuer. After this confluence the Wiuer runneth on to Barneton, and there in like ſoꝛt receiueth two bꝛokes in one chanell, whereof one commeth from aboue Alloſtocke, by Holme & Laſtocke, the other from beyond Birtles mill, by Chelfoꝛd (where it taketh in a rill called Piuereie) thence to ouer Peuer, Holfoꝛd, and there croſſing the Waterleſſe bꝛoke (growing of two becks and ioining at nether Tableie) it goeth foꝛth to Winſhambꝛidge, and then méeting with the other, after this confluence they pꝛoceed till they come almoſt at Barneton, where the ſaid chanell ioineth with a pꝛetie water running thoꝛough two lakes, whereof the greateſt lieth betweéne Comberbach, Rudwoꝛth and Warburie. But to go foꝛward with the courſe of the maine riuer. After theſe confluences our Wiuer goeth to Warham, Actonbꝛidge, and Dutton, ouer againſt which towne, on the other ſide it méeteth with a rill, comming from Cuddington: alſo the ſecond going by Moꝛleie, and Gritton, finallie the third ſone after from Kimſleie, and then pꝛoceédeth on in his paſſage by Atheton chappell, Frodeſham, Rockeſauage, and ſo into the ſea: and this is all that I dw find of the Wiuer, whoſe influences might haue bæne moze largelie ſet downe, if mine inſunctions had bæne amplie deliuered, yet this I hope may ſuffice foz his deſcription, and knowledge of his courſe.

Merſeie. The Merſeie riſeth among the Peke hils, and from thence going downe to the Wodhouſe, and taking ſundzie rilles withall by the waie, it becommeth the confines betweene Cheſter and Darbiſhires. Going alſo toward Goitehall, it meeteth with a faire bzoke increaſed by ſundzie waters called Goite, whereof I find this ſhozt and bziefe deſcription. The Goite riſeth not far from the Shire meere hill (wherein the Doue and the Dane haue their oziginall) that parteth Darbiſhire and Cheſterſhire in ſunder, and thence commeth dowme to Goite houſes, Duerton, Tarhall, Shawcroſſe, and at Weibzidge taketh in the Frith, and beneath Berdhall, the Set that riſeth aboue Merſethall and runneth by Duerſet. After this confluence alſo the Merſeie goeth to Goite hall, & at Stockfozd oz Stopfozd towne meeteth with the Tame, which diuideth Cheſterſhire and Lancaſterſhire in ſunder, and whoſe head is in the verie edge of Yozkeſhire, from whence it goeth ſouthward to Sadleworth Firth, then to Yukelhirſt, Stalie hall, Aſhdon Underline, Dunkenfield, Denton, Reddiſh, and ſo at Stockfozd into the Merſeie ſtreame, which palſeth fozth in like ſozt to Diddeſbirie, receiuing a bzoke by the waie that commeth from Lime parke, by Bzumhall parke and Chedle.

Goite. Frith. Set. Tame.

Irwell. From Diddeſbirie it pzocedeth to Nozden, Aſhton, Aiſton, Flirſton, where it receiueth the Irwell a notable water, and therefoze his deſcription is not to be omitted before I dw go fozward anie further with the Merſeie, although it be not nauigable by reaſon of ſundzie rockes and ſhalowes that lie diſperſed in the ſame. It riſeth aboue Bacop, and goeth thence to Roſendale, and in the waie to Attenfield it taketh in a water from Haſelden. After this confluence it goeth to Newhall, Bzandlesham, Bzurie, and aboue Ratcliffe ioineth with the Rache water, a faire ſtreame and to be deſcribed when I haue finiſhed the Irwell, as alſo the next vnto it beneath Ratcliffe, bicauſe I would not haue ſo manie ends at once in hand wherewith to trouble my readers. Being therefoze paſt theſe two, our Irwell goeth on to Cliſton, Yolland, Edgecroft, Strengwaies, and to Manchelter, where it vniteth it ſelfe with the Yzke, that runneth thereinto by Roiton Yidleton, Yeaton hill, and Blackeleie. Beneath Manchelter alſo it meeteth with the Medlocke, that commeth thither from the nozthealt ſide of Oldham, and betweene Claiton and Garret Halles, and ſo betweene two parkes, falling into it about Holne. Thence our Irwell going fozward to Wodſall, Whicleſwyc, Eccles, Barton, and Deuelhom, it falleth neere vnto Flirton, into the water of Merſeie, where I will ſtaie a while withall, till I haue bzought the other vnto ſome paſſe, of which I ſpake before.

Reus, oz Rache. Leland ſpeaketh of the Cozne water about Manchester; but I know nothing of his courſe. Yrke. Medlocke.

Rache. The Rache, Reech oz Riſh conſiſteth of ſundzie waters, whereof ech one in maner hath a pzoper name, but the greateſt of all is Rache it ſelfe, which riſeth among the blacke ſtonie hils, from whence it goeth to Littlebzough, and being paſt Clegge, receiueth the Belle, that commeth thither by Yilneraw chappell. After this confluence alſo, it meeteth with a rill neere vnto Rachedale, and ſone after with the Spzotton water, and then the Sudleie bzoke, whereby his chanell is not a little increaſed, which goeth from thence to Griſehirſt and ſo into the Irwell, before it come at Ratcliffe. The ſecond ſtreame is called Bzadſha. It riſeth of two heds, aboue Tureton church, whence it runneth to Bzadſha, and yer long taking in the Walmeſleie becke, they go in one chanell till they come beneath Bolton in the Yoze. From hence (receiuing a water that commeth from the rots of Rauenpike hill by the way) it goeth by Deane and Bolton in the Yoze, and ſo into Bzadſha water, which taketh his waie to Leucrmoze, Farnworth, Leuerleſſe, and finallie into the Irwell, which I before deſcribed, and whereof I find theſe two verſes to be added at the laſt:

Belle. Spzotton. Sudleie. Bzadſha. Walmeſleie.

Irke, Irwell, Medlocke, and Tame,
When they meet with the Merſeie, do looſe their name.

Now therefoze to reſume our Merſeie, you ſhall vnderſtand that after his confluence with the Irwell, he runneth to Partington, and not farre from thence interteineth the Gles, oz Gleſbzoke water, increaſed with ſundzie armes, wherof one commeth from Lodward, another from aboue Houghton, the third from Yulton parke, and the fourth from Shakerleie: and being all vnited neere vnto Leigh, the confluence goeth to Holcroſt, and aboue Holling greene into the ſwift Merſeie. After this increaſe the ſaid ſtreame in like ſozt runneth to Rigſton, & there admitteth the Bollein oz Bolling bzoke water into his ſocietie, which riſing neere the Chamber in Marwell foreſt goeth to Ridge, Sutton, Bollington, Yzeſbirie, and Newton, where it taketh in a water comming from about Pot Chappell, which runneth from thence by Adlington, Wodfozd, Wilmeſleie, Ringeie, and Aſhleie, there receiuing the Birkin bzoke that commeth from betweene Allerton and Marchall, by Yawberleie, and ſone after the Marus oz Mar, that commeth thereinto from Mar towne, by Rawſtozne, and after theſe confluences goeth on to Downham, and ouer againſt Rixton beneath Croſfozd bzidge into the Merſeie water, which pzocéding on, admitteth not another that meeteth with all neere Lim before it go to Thelwall. Thence alſo it goeth by Bzuche and ſo to Warrington, a little beneath croſſing a bzoke that commeth from Par by Bzowſeie, Bzadleie, and Saukeie on the one ſide, and another on the other that commeth thither from Gropenhall, and with theſe it runneth on to nether Walton, Acton grange, and ſo to Penkith, where it interteineth the Bold, and ſone after the Grundich water on the other ſide, that palſeth by Yzeſton, and Dareſbirie. Finallie our Merſeie going by Houlton, it falleth into Lirepole, oz as it was called of old Liuerpole hauen, when it is paſt Runcozne. And thus much of the Merſeie, comparable vnto the Wiuer, and of no leſſe fame than moſt riuers of this Iland.

Bollein bzoke. Birkin. Mar. Bold. Grundich.

Being paſt theſe two, we come next of all to the Tarbocke water, that falleth into the ſea at Harbocke, without finding anie no till we be paſt all Wirall, out of Lirepole hauen, and from the blacke rockes that lie vpon the nozth point of the afozeſaid Iland. Then come we to the Altmouth, whoſe freſh riſing not far into the land, commeth to Feſton, and ſone after receiuing another on the right hand, that palſeth into it by Aughton, it is increaſed no moze before it come at the ſea. Neither find I anie other falles till I meet with the mouth of the Yarrow and Dugleſſe, which haue their recourſe to the ſea in one chanell as I take it. The Dugleſſe commeth from by weſt of Rauenſpike hill, and yer long runneth by Andertonfozd to Wozthington, and ſo (taking in two oz thzee rilles by the waie) to Wigen, where it receiueth two waters in one chanell, of which one commeth in ſouth from Bzin parke, the other from nozthealt. Being paſt this, it receiueth one on the nozth ſide from Standiſh, and another by ſouth from Yolland, and then goeth on toward Ruſſozd chappell taking the Taud withall, that deſcendeth from aboue Skelmerſdale towne, and goeth thzough Lathan parke, belonging (as I heare) vnto the earle of Derbie.

Tarbocke. Alt oz Alc. Dugleſſe oz Duleſſe. Taud oz Skelmere.

Derbie. It meeteth also on the same side, with Derton meers water, in which meere is one Iland called Netholme beside other, and when it is past the hanging bridge, it is not long yer it fall into the Yarrow.

Yerton.

The Yarrow riseth of two heads, whereof the second is called Bagen broke, and making a confluence beneath Yelbie wood, it goeth on to Burgh, Egleskan, Crofton, and then toineth next of all with the Duggleſſe, after which confluence, the maine streame goeth forth to Bankehall, Charleton, Yolw, Yesket, and so into the sea. Leland writing of the Yarrow, saith thus of the same, so farre as I now remember. Into the Duggleſſe also runneth the Yarrow, which commeth within a mile or thereabout of Chorleton towne, that parteth Lelandshire from Derbieshire. Under the foot of Chorle also I find a rill named Ceorle, and about a mile and a halfe from thence a notable quarreie of stones, whereof the inhabitants do make a great boast and price. And hitherto Leland.

The Ribble, a riuer verie rich of salmon and lamprie, doth in manner inuiron Preston in Anderneſſe, and it riseth neere to Ribbesdale aboue Gisborne, from whence it goeth to Sawleie or Salleie, Chathburne, Wlodington, Clithero castell, and beneath Hitton meeteth the Odder at northwest, which riseth not farre from the crosse of Great in Yorkeshire, and going thence to Shilburne, Newton, Radholme parke, and Stonie hirst, it falleth yer long into the Ribble water. From hence the Ribble water hath not gone farre, but it meeteth with the Calder from southeast. This broke riseth aboue Holme church in Yorkeshire, which lieth by east of Lancasterſhire, and goeth by Towleie and Burneleie, where it receiueth a trilling rill, thence to Higham, and yer long crossing one water that commeth from Wicoler by Colne, and another by and by named Pidle broke, that runneth by New church in the Pidle, it meeteth with the Calder, which passeth forth to Paniam; and thence receiuing a becke on the other side, it runneth on to Altham, and so to Martholme, where the Henburne broke doth ioine withall, that goeth by Akington chappell, Dunkinhalgh, Rishton, and so into the Calder, as I haue said before. The Calder therefore being thus inlarged, runneth forth to Reade, where maister Nowell dwelleth, to Whallie, and sone after into Ribble, that goeth from this confluence to Salisburie hall, Ribchester, Osbaskin, Samburie, Keuerden, Law, Ribbles bridge, & then taketh in the Darwent, before it goeth by Pontwarth or Pentwarth into the maine sea. The Darwent diuideth Lelandshire from Anderneſſe, and it riseth by east aboue Darwent chappell; and sone after uniting it selfe with the Blackeburne, and Rodlesworth water, it goeth through Houghton parke, by Houghton towne, to Walton hall, and so into the Ribble. As for the Sannocke broke, it riseth somewhat aboue Longridge chappell, goeth to Broughton towne, Cotham, Lee hall, and so into Ribble. And here is all that I haue to saie of this riuer.

The Wire riseth eight or ten miles from Garstan, out of an hill in Wiresdale forrest, from whence it runneth by Shireshed chappell, and then going by Wadland, or Waddiler, Grenelaw castell (which belongeth to the erle of Darbie) Garstan, and Kirkland hall, it first receiueth the second Calder, that commeth downe by Edmerseie chappell, then another chanell increased with sundrie waters, which I will here describe before I proceed anie further with the Wire. I suppose that the first water is called Plimpton broke, it riseth south of Gosner, and commeth by Cawford hall, and yer long receiuing the Barton becke, it proceedeth forward till it ioineth with the Broke rill that commeth from Bowland forrest, by Claughton hall, where maister Broke hales doth lie, & so through Persco forrest. After this confluence the Plime or Plimpton water meeteth with the Calder, and then with the Wire, which passeth forth to Michaell church, and the Raw cliffes, and aboue Thorneton crosseth the Skipton that goeth by Potton, then into the Wire rode, and finallie through the sands into the sea, according to his nature. When we were past the fall of the Wire, we coasted vp by the salt cotes, to Coker mouth, whose head, though it be in Weresdale forrest, not far from that of the Wire, yet the shortnesse of course deserueth no description. The next is Cowdar, which is comming out of Wire dale, as I take it, is not increased with anie other waters more than Coker, and therefore I will rid my hands thereof so much we sooner.

Being past these two, I came to a notable riuer called the Lune or Loine, or (as the booke of statutes hath) Lonwire Anno 13 Ric. 2 cap. 19, and giueth name to Lancaster, Lonecaster, or Luneca-ſter, where much Romane monie is found, and that of diuerse stamps, whose course doth rest to be described as followeth; and whereof I haue two descriptions. The first being set downe by Leland, as maister Moore of Catharine hall in Cambridge deliuered it vnto him. The next I exhibit as it was giuen vnto me, by one that hath taken paines (as he saith) to search out and view the same, but verie latelie to speake of. The Lune (saith maister Moore) of some commonlie called the Loine, riseth at Crosse-ho, in Dent dale, in the edge of Richmondshire out of three heads. North also from Dent dale is Garsdale, an vplandish towne, wherein are seene manie times great store of red deere that come downe to feed from the mounteins into the vallies, and thereby runneth a water, which afterward commeth to Sebbar vale, where likewise is a broke meeting with Garsdale water, so that a little lower they go as one into Dent dale becke, which is the riuer that afterward is called Lune, or Lane, as I haue verie often noted it. Beside these waters also before mentioned, it receiueth at the foot of Sebbar vale, a great broke, which commeth out of the Worth, betweene Westmerland and Richmondshire, which taking with him the aforesaid chanels, doth run seauen miles yer it come to Dent dale foot. From hence it entreth into Lansdale, corruptlie so called, peraduenture for Lunesdale, & runneth therein eight or nine miles southward, and in this dale is Kirbie. Hitherto maister Moore, as Leland hath exemplified that parcell of his letters. But mine other note writeth hereof in this manner. Burbecke water riseth at Wulfall head, by west, and going by Wulfall foot to Skaleg, it admitteth the Breder that descendeth thither from Breder dale. From hence our Burbecke goeth to Breder dale foot, & so to Tibarie, where it meeteth with foure rilles in one bottome, of which one commeth from besides Orton, another from betweene Kasebecke and Sunbiggin, the third and fourth from each side of Langdale: and after the generall confluence made, goeth toward Roundswath, aboue which it uniteth it selfe with the Barrow. Thence it runneth to Yowgill, Delaker, Firrebanke, and Killington, beneath which it meeteth with a water comming from the Yorvill hilles, and afterward crossing the Dent broke, that runneth thither from Dent towne, beneath Sebbar, they continue their course as one into the Burbecke, from whence it is called Lune. From hence it goeth to Burbon chappell, where it taketh in another rill comming from by east, then to Kirbie, Lansdale, and aboue Whittenton crosseth a broke comming from the countie ſtone by Burros, and ſone after beneath Tunſtall and Greteie, which deſcending from about Ingelborow hill, paſſeth by Twiſelton, Ingleton, Thorneton, Burton, Wratton, and nere Thurland caſtell, toucheth finallie with the Lune, which brancheth, and ſone after vniteth it ſelfe againe. After this alſo it goeth on toward New parke, and receiueth the Wennie, and the Hinburne both in one chanell, of which this riſeth north of the croſſe of Greteie, and going by Benthams and Roberts hill, aboue Wraie taketh in the Rheburne that riſeth north of Wulfecrag. After this confluence alſo aboue New parke, it maketh his gate by Aughton, Laughton, Skirton, Lancaſter, Excliffe, Awcliffe, Soddaie, Dixton, and ſo into the ſea. Thus haue you both the deſcriptions of Lune, make your conference or election at your pleaſure, for I am ſworne to neither of them both.

Greteie. Wennie. Hinburne. Rheburne.

The next fall is called Docker, and peraduenture the ſame that Leland doth call the Kerie, which is not farre from Wharton, where the rich Kitſon was borne, it riſeth north of Docker towne, and going by Barwyc hall, it is not increaſed before it come at the ſea, where it falleth into the Lune water at Luneſands. Next of all we come to Bitham becke, which riſeth not far from Bitham towne and parke, in the hilles, where about are great numbers of goates kept and mainteined, and by all likelihod reſorteth in the end to Linſands.

Docker. Kerie.

Being paſt this, we find a forked arme of the ſea called Kenſands: into the firſt of which diuerſe waters do run in one chanell, as it were from foure principall heads, one of them comming from Grarig hall, another frō by weſt of Whinfield, & ioining with the firſt on the eaſt ſide of Skelmere parke. The third called Spriot or Spriota riſeth at Slodale, & commeth downe by weſt of Skelmer parke, ſo that theſe two brookes haue the aforeſaid parke betweene them, & fall into the fourth eaſt of Barneſide, not verie farre in ſunder. The fourth or laſt called Ken, commeth from Kentmers ſide, out of Ken more, in a pole of a mile compaſſe, verie well ſtored with fiſh, the head whereof, as of all the baronie of Kendall is in Weſtmerland, & going to Stauelope, it taketh in a rill from Chappleton Inges. Then leauing Colnehead parke by eaſt, it paſſeth by Barneſide, to Kendall, Helſton, Sigath, Siggeſwyc, Leuenbridge, Milnethorpe, and ſo into the ſea. Certes this Ken is a prietie deepe riuer, and yet not ſafelie to be aduentured vpon, with boates and balingers, by reaſon of rolling ſtones, & other huge ſubſtances that oft annoie & trouble the middeſt of the chanell there. The other peece of the forked arme, is called Winſtar, the hed wherof is aboue Winſtar chappell, & going downe almoſt by Carpmaunſell, & Netherlake, it is not long yer it fall into the ſea, or ſands, for all this coaſt, & a gulfe from the Ramſide point to the Mealenaſſe, is ſo peſtered with ſands, that it is almoſt incredible to ſee how they increaſe. Thoſe alſo which inuiron the Kenmouth, are named Kenſands: but ſuch as receiue the deſcent from the Folſe, Winander, and Sparke, are called Leueſands, as I find by ſufficient teſtimonie. The mouth or fall of the Dodon alſo is not farre from this impechment: wherefore it is to be thought, that theſe iſſues will yer long become verie noiſome, if not choked vp altogither. The Winander water riſeth about Cumbalraſeſtones, from whence it goeth to Cangridge, where it maketh a mere: then to Ambleſide, and taking in yer it come there, two rilles on the left hand, and one on the right that commeth by Clapergate, it maketh (as I take it) the greateſt mere, or freſh water in England; for I read it is ten miles in length. Finallie, comming to one ſmall chanell aboue Newbridge, it reacheth not aboue ſix miles yer fall into the ſea. There is in like ſort a water, called the Foſſe that riſeth nere vnto Arneſide, and Tillerthwates, and goeth forth by Griſdale, Satrethwate, Rulland, Powbridge, Bowth, and ſo falleth with the Winander water into the maine ſea. On the weſt ſide of the Foſſe alſo commeth another through Furneſſe felles, and from the hilles by north thereof, which yer long making the Thurſtan lake not far from Hollinhow, and going by Bridge end, in a narrow chanell, paſſeth forth by Nibthwaits, Blareth, Cowlton, & Sparke bridge, and ſo into the ſea. Hauing paſſed the Leuen or Coniſands, or Coniſtoneſands, or Winander fall (for all is one) I come to the Lew, which riſeth at Cewike chappell, and falleth into the ſea beſide Plumpton. The Rawther deſcending out of low Furneſſe, hath two heads, whereof one commeth from Penniton, the other by Ulmerſtone abbeie, and ioining both in one chanell, they haſten into the ſea, whither all waters direct their voiage. Then come we to another rill ſouthweſt of Aldingham, deſcending by Glaiſton caſtell; and likewiſe the fourth that riſeth nere Lindell, and running by Dawlton caſtell and Furneſſe abbeie, not farre from the Barrow head, it falleth into the ſea ouer againſt Waucie and Waucie chappell, except mine aduertiſements miſcade me.

Foſſe. Sparke. Lew. Rawther.

The Dodon, which from the head is bound vnto Cumberland and Weſtmerland, commeth from the Shire ſtone hill bottome, and going by Blackehill, Southwake, S. Johns, Aſkaie parke, & Brougton, it falleth into the ſaltwater, betweene Kirbie, and Wallum caſtell. And thus are we now come vnto the Rauenglaſſe point, and well entred into Cumberland countie.

Dodon.

Comming to Rauenglaſſe, I find hard by the towne a water comming from two heads, and both of them in lakes or poles, whereof one iſſueth out of Denocke or Deuenocke mere, and is called Denocke water, the other named Eſke from Eſke pole which runneth by Eſkedale, Dalegarth, and ſone after meeting with the Denocke, betweene Pawburthwate and Rauenglaſſe, falleth into the ſea. On the other ſide of Rauenglaſſe alſo commeth the Pite broke, from Piterdale as I read. Then find we another which commeth from the hils, and at the firſt is forked, but ſone after making a lake, they gather againe into a ſmaller chanell: finallie meeting with the Brenge, they fall into the ſea at Carleton ſouth eaſt, as I weene of Drig. The Cander, or (as Leland nameth it) the Calder, commeth out of Copeland forreſt, by Cander, Sellefield, and ſo into the ſea. Then come we to Ener water, deſcending out of a pole aboue Coſwaldhow, and thence going by Euerdale, it croſſeth a water from Arladon, and after proceedeth to Egremond, S. Johns, and taking in another rill from Hyde, it is not long yer it meeteth with the ſea.

Denocke. Eſke. Pite. Brenge. Cander.

The next fall is at Moreſbie, whereof I haue no skill. From thence therefore we caſt about by ſaint Bees to Derwentſet hauen, whoſe water is truelie written Dargwent or Deruent. It riſeth in the hils about Borrodale, from whence it goeth vnto the Grange, thence into a lake, in which are certeine Ilands, and ſo vnto Keſwyc, where it falleth into the Bure, whereof the ſaid lake is called Burſemere, or the Burthmere pole. In like ſort the Bure or Burthmere water, riſing among the hils goeth to Tegburtheſworth, Forneſide, S. Johns, and Threlcote: and there meeting with a water from Griſdale, by Wakethwate, called Griſe, it runneth to Burneſſe, Keſwyc, and there receiueth the Darwent. From Keſwyc in like ſort it goeth to Thorneſwate (and there making a plath) to Armanſwate, Iſell, Huthwate and Cokermouth, and here it receiueth the Cokar, which which riſing among the hils commeth by Lowſe-water, Bzakenthwate, Lozton, and ſo to Cokar-mouth towne, from whence it haſteth to Bzoge-ham, and receiuing a rill called the Wire, on the ſouth ſide that runneth by Dein, it leaueth Sam-burne and Wirketon behind it, and entereth into the ſea.

Wire. Leland ſaith that the Wire is a créke where ſhips lie oft at rode, and that Wirketon oz Wirkington towne doth take his name thereof. He addeth alſo that there is iron and coles, beſide lead oze in Wire-dale. Neuertheleſſe the water of this riuer is foz the moſt part ſoze troubled, as comming thozough a ſud-die oz ſoddie moze, ſo that little good fiſh is ſaid to liue therein. But to pzoceed. The Elme riſeth in the mines aboue Amautré, and from Amautre goeth to Pereſbie, Harbie, Bzow, and there taking in a rill on the left hand comming by Dozpennie, it goeth to Hatton caſtell, Alwarbie, Birthie, Dereham, and ſo into the ſea. Thence we go about by the chappell at the point, and come to a baie ſerued with two freſh wa-ters, whereof one riſing weſtward goeth by War-ton, Rabbie, Cotes, and ſo into the maine, taking in a rill withall from by ſouth, called Croco, that com-meth from Crockdale, by Bzomefield. The ſecond is named Wampole bzoke, & this riſeth of two heads, whereof one is about Cardew. Thence in like ſozt it goeth to Thureſbie, Croſton, Diuton, Gamleſbie, Wampall, the Larth, and betweene Whiteridge and Kirbie into the ſaltwater. From hence we double the Bowlneſſe, and come to an eſtuarie, whither thzée notable riuers dw reſozt, and this is named the Sol-ueie mouth. But of all, the firſt excédeth, which is cal-led Eden, and whoſe deſcription doth follow here at hand.

Elmus. Croco. Wampus.

Eden. The Eden well fraught with ſamon, deſcendeth (as I heare) from the hils in Athelſtane moze at the fot of Hulſtat Mozuell hill, where Swale alſo riſeth, and ſoutheaſt of Mallerſtang fozreſt. From thence in like maner it goeth to Mallerſtang towne, Pen-dzagon caſtell, Wharton hall, Netbie, Hartleie ca-ſtell, Kirkebie Stephan, and yet it come at great Pulgrane, it receiueth thzée waters, whereof one is called Helbecke, bicauſe it commeth from the Derne and Elinge mounteins by a towne of the ſame de-nomination. The other is named Bellow, and deſcen-deth from the eaſt mounteins by Sowarſbie, & theſe two on the nozth eaſt: the third falleth from Rauen-ſtandale, by Newbiggin, Smardale, Soulbie, Bla-terne, and ſo into Eden, that goeth from thence by Marcop; and taking in the Dzne about Burelles on the one ſide, and the Nozton becke on the other, it ha-ſteth to Applebie, thence to Cowlbie, where it croſſeth the Dzbecke, thence to Bolton, and Kirbie, and there méeting with the Trowt becke, and beneath the ſame with the Liuenet (whereinto falleth an other water from Churenlie méeting withall beneath Cle-bzon) it runneth finallie into Eden. After the conflu-ences alſo the Eden paſſeth to Temple, and ſone af-ter méeting with the Milburne and Blincozne wa-ters, in one chanell, it runneth to Winderwarth and Nozthebie, where we will ſtaie till I haue deſcribed the water that méeteth withall nére the afozeſaid place called the Alſe.

Helbecke. Bellow. Dzne. Nozeton. Dzbecke. Trowt becke. Liuenet. Milburne. Blincozne. Alſe.

Marke. Hartleſhop. Paterdale. Roden. Glenkgain. This water commeth out of a lake, which is fed with ſix rils, whereof one is called the Marke, and nére the fall thereof into the plaſh is a towne of the ſame name; the ſecond hight Hartleſhop, & runneth from Hartleſhop hall by Depedale; the third is Pa-terdale rill; the fourth Glent Roden, the fift Glenk-guin, but the firſt runneth into the ſaid lake, ſouth of Towthwate. Afterward when this lake commeth to-ward Pole towne, it runneth into a ſmall chanell, & going by Barton, Dalumaine, it taketh in a rill by the waie from Daker caſtell. Thence it goeth to Stockebzidge, Ponewozth, and ſone after méeteth with a pzetie bzoke called Loder, comming from Thozneythwate by Bauton, and hére a rill; then by Yelton, and there another; thence to Alkham, Clif-ton, and ſo ioining with the other called Alſe, they go to Bzougham caſtell, Nine churches, Hozneby, and ſo into Eden, taking in a rill (as it goeth) that com-meth downe from Pencath. Being paſt Hozneby, our Eden runneth to Langunbie, and ſone after re-ceiuing a rill that commeth from two heads, and loi-ning beneath Wingſell, it haſteth to Laſenbie, then to Kirke Oſwald (on ech ſide whereof commeth in a rill from by eaſt) thence to Nonneie, and there a rill, Anſkable, Cotehill, Cozbie caſtell, Wetherall, Newbie: where I will ſtaie, till I haue deſcribed the Ir-ding, and ſuch waters as fall into the ſame beſoze I go to Carleill.

Loder. Thozneythwate Loder

Irding. The Irding ariſeth in a moze in the bozders of Tindale, nére vnto Hozſle head crag, where it is called Terne becke; vntill it come to Spicrag hill, that diuideth Nozthumberland and Gilleſland in ſunder, from whence it is named Irding. Being therfoze come to Duerhall, it receiueth the Pultroſe becke, by eaſt, and thence goeth on to Duerdenton, Netherdenton, Leuercoſt, and Caſtellſtead, where it taketh in the Cambocke, that runneth by Kirke Cambocke, Aſkerton caſtell, Walton, and ſo into Irding, which goeth from thence to Irdington, Newbie, & ſo into Eden. But a little beſoze it come there, it croſſeth with the Gillie that commeth by Tankin, and ſone after falleth into it. After theſe confluences, our Eden goeth to Linſtocke caſtell, (and here it interteineth a bzoke, comming from Cotehill ward by Aglionbie) and then vnto Car-leill, which is now almoſt inuironed with foure waters.

Terne. Pultroſe. Cambocke. Gillie.

Pedar alias Logus. Foz beſide the Eden it receiueth the Peder, which Leland calleth Logus from ſoutheaſt. This Peder riſeth in the hils ſouthweſt of Penruddocke, from whence it goeth to Penruddocke, then to Gra-ſtocke caſtell, Cateleie, and Kenderſide hall, and then taking in a water from Unthanke, it goeth to Cath-wade, Pettrelwate, Newbiggin, Carleton, and ſo into Eden, nozth eaſt of Carleill. But on the nozth ſide the Bzuferth bzoke doth ſwiftlie make his en-trance, running by Leuer dale, Scalbie caſtell, and Hoyſedon; as I am infozmed. The third is named Candan (if not Deua after Leland) which riſing about the Skidlow hils, runneth to Noſedale, Caldbecke, Warnell, Saberham, Roſe caſtell, Dawſton, Bzounſton, Harrington, and weſt of Carleill falleth into Eden, which going from thence by Grimſdale, Kirke Andzos, Beaumont, falleth into the ſea be-neath the Rowcliffe caſtell. And thus much of the E-den, which Leland neuertheleſſe deſcribeth after an-other ſozt, whoſe wozds I will not let to ſet downe here in this place, as I find them in his commen-taries.

Bzuferth.

Alſe after Leland. The Eden, after it hath run a pzetie ſpace from his head, méeteth in time with the Alſe water, which is a great bzoke in Weſtmerland, and riſing aboue Hare dale, a mile weſt of Loder, it commeth by the late diſſolued houſe of Shappe pziozie, thzée miles from Shappe, and by Bzampton village into Loder oz Lodon. Certes this ſtreame within halfe a mile of the head, becommeth a great lake foz two miles courſe, and afterward waxing narrow againe, it runneth foozth in a meane and indifferent bottome. The ſaid Eden in like ſozt receiueth the Aimote a-bout thzée miles beneath Bzougham caſtell, and in-to the ſame Aimote falleth the Dacoz becke (alreadie touched) which riſeth by nozthweſt in Paterdale hils, foure miles aboue Dacoz caſtell, and then going thorough Daco2 parke, it runneth by east a good mile lower into Esnote, a little beneath Delamaine, which standeth on the left side of Daco2. In one of his bookes also he saith, how Carleill standeth betweene two streames, that is to saie the Deua, which commeth thither from by southwest, and also the Logus that descendeth from the southeast. He addeth moze ouer how the Deua in times past was named Vala o2 Bala, and that of the names of these two, Lugibala fo2 Caerleill hath bœne deriued, &c. And thus much out of Leland. But where he had the cause of this his coniecture as yet I haue not read. Of this am I certeine, that I vse the names of most riuers here and else-where described, accordinglie as they are called in my time, although I omit not to speake here and there of such as are moze ancient, where iust occasion moueth me to remember them, fo2 the better vnderstanding of our histozies, as they dw come to hand.

Deua. Vala.

Blacke Leuen and white Leuen waters, fall into the sea in one chanell, and with them the Lamsozd and the Elske, the last confluence being not a full mile from the maine sea. The white and blacke Leuen ioining therfoze aboue Bucknesse, the confluence goeth to Bzacken hill, Kirkleuenton, and at Tomunt water meeteth with the Elske. In like sozt the Kirsop ioining with the Lidde out of Scotland at Kirsop foot, running by Stangerdike side, Yarlow, Yathwater, and taking in the Elske aboue the Yote, it loseth the fozmer name, and is called Elske, vntill it come to the sea.

Leuen. Lamsozd. Elske. Tomunt. Kirsop. Lidde.

Hauing thus gone thozough the riuers of England, now it resteth that we pzoceed with those which are to be found vpon the Scotish shoze, in such ozder as we best may, vntill we haue fetched a compasse about the same, and come vnto Barwike, whence afterward it shall be easie fo2 vs to make repaire vnto the Thames, from which we did set fozward in the beginning of our voiage. The first riuer that I met withall on the Scotish coast, is the Elske, after I came past the Soluete, which hath his head in the Cheuiot hilles, runneth by Kirkinton, and falleth into the sea at Bozow on the sands. This Elske hauing receiued the Ewis falleth into the Soluete first at Atterith. After this I passed ouer a little creke from Kirthell, and so to Anand, whereof the vallie Anandale doth seeme to take the name. There is also the Nide, whereof commeth Nidsdale, the Ken, the Dee, the Crale, and the Bladnecke, and all these (besides diuerse other small rilles of lesse name) dw lie vpon the south of Gallowaie.

Elske.

On the nozth side also we haue the Ruan, the Arde, the Castile Dune, the Burwin, the Clude (whereupon sometime stood the famous citie of Alcluide, and whereinto runneth the Carath) the Hamell, the Dourglesse, and the Lame. From hence in like maner we came vnto the Leuind mouth, whereunto the Blake on the southwest and the Lomund lake, with his fleeting Iles and fish without finnes (yet verie holesome) doth seeme to make his issue. This lake of Lomund in calme weather ariseth sometimes so high, and swelleth with such terrible billowes, that it causeth the best marriners of Scotland to abide the leisure of this water, before they dare aduenture to hoise vp sailes on hie. The like is seene in windie weather, but much moze perillous. There are certeine Iles also in the same, which moue and remoue, oftentimes by force of the water, but one of them especiallie, which otherwise is verie fruitfull fo2 pasturage of cattell.

Lene. Long. Goile. Yeke. Robinsoie.

Nert vnto this is the Leue, the Rage, the Long, the Goile, & the Yeke, which fo2 the exceeding greatnesse of the ir heads, are called lakes. Then haue we the Robinsoie, the Fozeland, the Tarbat, the Lean, and the Abir, whereunto the Spansoie, the Loine, the Louth, the Arke, and the Yeke dw fall, there is also the Sell, the Yozd, the Dwin, the Newille, the Dine the Lang, the Dzun, the Yew, the Bzun, the Kell, the Dowz, the Faro, the Nesse, the Yerre, the Con, the Glasse, the Maur, the Urdall, the Fers (that commeth out of the Caldell) the Fairloke, which two latter lie a little by west of the Dzchades, and are pzoperlie called riuers, bicause they issue onelie from springs; but most of the other lakes, bicause they come from linnes and huge poles, o2 such low bottomes, fed with springs, as seeme to haue no accesse, but onelie recesse of waters, whereof there be manie in Scotland.

Foxlan. Tarbat. Lean. Abir. Arke. Yeke. Sell. Yozd. Dwin. Newille. Dine. Lang. Dzun. Yew. Bzun. Kell. Dowz. Faro. Nesse. Yerre. Con. Glasse. Maur. Urdall. Fesse. Calder. Wisse. Bzowze. Clin. Twin. Shin. Sillan. Carew. Nesse. Narding. Spaie. Downe. Dee. Estie.

But to pzoceed. Hauing once past Dungisbie head in Cathnesse, we shall yer long come to the mouth of the Wisse, a pzettie streame, comming by south of the mounteins called the Maidens pappes. Then to the Bzowze, the Clin, the Twin (whereinto runneth thzee riuers, the Shin, the Sillan, and Carew) the Nesse, which besides the plentie of samon found therein is neuer frosen, no2 suffereth yce to remaine there, that is cast into the pole. From thence we come vnto the Narding, the Finderne, the Spaie (which receiues the Vine) the Fitch, the Bulich, the Arrian, the Leuin, and the Bogh, from whence we saile vntill we come about the Buquhan head, and so to the Downe, and Dee: which two streames bzing fozth the greatest samons that are to be had in Scotland, and most plentie of the same. Then to the nozth Elske, whereinto the Esmond runneth aboue Bzechin, the south Elske, then the Louen and the Taw, which is the finest riuer fo2 water that is in all Scotland, and whereunto most riuers and lakes dw run. As Farlake, Yzth, Goure, Loich, Cannach, Linell, Loion, Irewer, Erne, and diuerse other besides small rillets which I did neuer loke vpon.

Then is there the lake Londozs, vpon whose mouth saint Andzewes doth stand, the lake Lewin, vnto whose streame two other lakes haue recourse in Fiseland, and then the Firth o2 Fozth, which some dw call the Pictish and Scotish sea, whither the kingdome of the Nozthumbers was sometime extended, and with the riuer last mentioned (I meane that commeth from Londozs) includeth all Fife, the said Fozth being full of oisters and all kinds of huge fish that vse to lie in the deepe. How manie waters run into the Firth, called by Ptolomie Lora, it is not in my power iustlie to declare: yet are there both riuers, rills, & lakes that fall into the same, as Clacke, Alon, Dune, Kerie, Cambell, Cumer, Tere, Wan, Tozkelon, Rosham, Mushell, Blene, and diuerse other which I call by these names, partlie after information, and partlie of such townes as are neere vnto their heads. Finallie, when we are past the Yaie, then are we come vnto the Twede, whereinto we entred, leaning Barwike on the right hand and his appurtenances, wherein Halidon hill standeth, and conteineth a triangle of so much ground beyond the said riuer, as is well neere foure miles in length, and thzee miles in bzedth in the bzoad end; except mine information dw faile me.

Clacke. Alon. Dune. Kerie. Cambell. Cumer. Tere. Wan. Tozkelan. Rosham. Mussell. Blene. Twede.

The Twede (which Ptolomie nameth Toualis o2 Toesis, & betweene which and the Tine the countie of Nozthumberland is in maner inclosed, and watred with sundzie noble riuers) is a noble streame and the limes o2 bound betweene England & Scotland, wherby those two kingdomes are now diuided in sunder. It riseth about Dzimlar in Eusdale (o2 rather out of a faire well (as Leland saith) standing in the mosse of an hill called Aireane, o2 Yareskan in Twede dale ten miles from Pibble) and so comming by Pibble, Lander, Dzibiwgh, Kelse, Warke, Nozham, Norham and Hagarſtone, it falleth into the ſea beneath Barwike, as I heare. Thus ſaith Leland. But I not contented with this ſo ſhort a diſcourſe of ſo long a riuer & briefe deſcription of ſo faire a ſtreame, will adde ſomewhat more of the ſame concerning his race on the Engliſh ſide, and rehearſall of ſuch riuers as fall into it. Comming therefore to Ridam, it receiueth betweene that and Carham a becke, which deſcendeth from the hilles that lie by weſt of Windram. Going alſo from Ridam by Longbridgham (on the Scotiſh ſide) and to Carham, it falleth immediatlie to Warke caſtell on the Engliſh, and by Spilaw on the other ſide, then to Cornewall, Caldſtreame, and Tilmouth, where it receiueth ſundrie waters in one botome which is called the Till, and whoſe deſcription inſueth here at hand.

Till. Certes there is no head of anie riuer that is named Till, but the iſſue of the furtheſt water that commeth hereinto, riſeth not farre from the head of Alwaie in the Cheuiot hilles, where it is called Brennich, whereof the kingdome of Brennicia did ſometime take the name. From thence it goeth to Hartſide, Ingram, Branton, Crawleie, Hedgeleie, Beueleie, and Bewiſe, beneath which it receiueth one water comming from Rodham by weſt, and ſone after a ſecond deſcending from the Middletons, and ſo they go as one with the Bromish, by Chatton to Folbrzeie (where they croſſe the third water falling downe by north from Howborne by Heſelbridge) thence to Woller, there alſo taking in a rill that riſeth about Middleton hall, and runneth by Hardleie, Whereleie, and the reſt afore remembred, wherby the water of Bromis is not a little increaſed, and after this latter confluence beneath Woller, no more called Bromis but the Till, vntill it come at the Twede. The Till paſſing therefore by Weteland and Medington, meeteth ſone after with a faire ſtreame comming from by ſouthweſt, which moſt men call the Bowbent or Bobent.

Bromis. Bobent. It riſeth on the weſt ſide of the Cocklaw hill, and from thence hasteth to Hattons, beneath the which it ſoineth from by ſoutheaſt with the Yellerborne, and then goeth to Pudſton, Downeham, Kilham, and a little by north of Newton Kirke, and betweene it and weſt Newton, it taketh in another water called Glin, comming from the Cheuiot hilles by Yethpole, and from thenſeforth runneth on without anie further increaſe, by Copland Euart, and ſo in the Till. The Till for his part in like ſort after this confluence goeth to Broneridge, Fodcaſtell, Catall caſtell, Heaton, & north of Tilmouth into the Twede, or by weſt of Weſell, except my memorie doth faile me. After this alſo our aforeſaid water of Twede deſcendeth to Grotehugh, the Newbiggins, Norham caſtell, Ford, Lungridge, & croſſing the Whitaker on the other ſide from Scotland beneath Cawmill, it runneth to Ordo, to Barwike, and ſo into the Ocean, leauing (as I ſaid) ſo much Engliſh ground on the northweſt ripe, as lieth in manner of a triangle betweene Cawmils, Barwike, and Lammeton, which (as one noteth) is no more but two miles and an halfe euerie waie, or not much more, except he be deceiued.

Whitaker.

Being paſt this noble ſtreame, we came by a rill that deſcendeth from Bowſden by Barington. Then by the ſtrond which ariſeth betweene Middleton and Detchant or Dereham, and runneth by Eſkill and the Kolle, next of all to Warnemouth, of whoſe backe water I read as followeth. The Warne or Gwerne riſeth ſouthweſt of Crokelaw, and going by Warneford, Bradford, Spindleſtone, and Budill, it leaueth Newton on the right hand, and ſo falleth into the Ocean, after it hath run almoſt nine miles from the head within the land, and receiued a rill beneath Yellington, which commeth downe betweene Newland and Olcheſter, and hath a bridge beneath the confluence, which leadeth ouer the ſame. From Warnemouth, we ſailed by Bamborow caſtell, and came at laſt to a fall betweene Bedwell and Newton. The maine water that ſeruith this iſſue, riſeth aboue Carleton from the foot of an hill, which ſeemeth to part the head of this and that of Warne in ſunder. It runneth alſo by Carleton, Conleie, Dorford, Brunton, and Tuggell, and finallie into the ſea, as to his courſe apperteineth.

Warne.

From this water we went by Dunſtanburgh caſtell, vnto the Chalne or Alnemouth, which is ſerued with a pretie riueret called Alne, the head whereof riſeth in the hils weſt of Alnham towne, and called by Ptolomie, Celnius. From thenſe alſo it runneth by Kile, Bile, Eſlington, and Whittingham, where it croſſeth a rill comming from by ſouth, and beneath the ſame, the ſecond that deſcendeth from Eirchild at Brone, & likewiſe the third that riſeth at Newton, and runneth by Edlingham caſtell and Lemmaton (all on the ſoutheaſt ſide or right hand) and ſo paſſeth on further, till it meet with the fourth, comming from aboue Shipleie from by north, after which confluence it goeth to Alnewiſe, & then to Dennyſe, receiuing there a rillet from by ſouth and a rill from by north, and thence going on to Bilton, betweene Ailmouth towne and Wooddon, it ſweepeth into the Ocean.

Alne, or Aine, alias Chalne.

The Cocket is a goodlie riuer, the head alſo thereof is in the roots of Kemblespeth hils, from whence it goeth to Whiteſide, and there meeting with the Alwaie (which deſcendeth from the north) it goeth a little further to Linbridge, and there receiueth the Ridleie by ſouthweſt, and after that with another, called (as I thinke) the Yoe, which commeth from the Woodland and hillie ſoile by Allington, & falleth into the ſame, weſt of Parke head. It ioineth alſo yer long with the Ridland, which commeth in north by Bilſtone, and then hieth to Sharpton, to Harbottle, where it croſſeth the Pardop water by ſouth, then to Woodhouſe, and ſwallowing in a litle becke by the waie from ſouthweſt, to Bickerton, to Tollons, Newton, and running apace toward Whitton towre, it taketh a broke withall that commeth in northweſt of Alnham, nere Eliſhaw, and goeth by Skarnewood, ouer nether Trewhet, Snitter, and Thzerton, and ſone after vniteth it ſelfe with the Cocket, from whence they go together to Kethburie, or Whitton towre, to Halie, to Brinkeborne, Welden, taking withall ſone after the Tod or burne called Tod, which falleth in from by ſouth, then to Eliſhaw, Felton (receiuing thereabout the Farelie broke, that goeth by Wintring by ſouth eaſt, and Sheldike water, that goeth by Halon, to Brainſaugh by north) and from thence to Portricke Warkworth caſtell, and ſo into the ſea.

Cocket. Alwaie. Ridleie. Yardop. It may be Leland miſtaketh Tickington water for one of theſe.

There is furthermore a little fall, betweene Hawkeſlaw and Druriſh, which riſeth about Stokes wood, goeth by eaſt Cheuington, and Whittington caſtell, and afterward into the Ocean. The Lune is a prette broke riſing weſt of Eſpleie, from whence it goeth to Critlington, Ugham, Linton, and yer long in the ſea. Wanſbecke (in old time Diua) is far greater than the Lune. It iſſueth vp weſt and by north of weſt Whelpington, thence it runneth to Kirke Whelpington, Wallington, Middleton, and Angerton. Here it meeteth with a water running from about Farnelaw by the grange, and Hartburne on the north, and then going from Angerton, it runneth by Moſeden to Pitforth, and there in like maner croſſeth the Font, which iſſuing out of the ground about Newbiggin, goeth by Nonneie Kirke, Witton caſtell, Stanton, Nunriding, Newton, and ſo into the Wanſbecke, which runneth in like maner from Pitford to Morpheth caſtell (within two miles whereof it ebbeth and flowеth) the new Chappell, Bottle caſtell, Shepwaſh, and ſo into the ſea, three miles from the next hauen which is called Blithe.

Blithe. Blithe water riſeth about kirke Heaton, and goeth by Belſe, Ogle, and (receiuing the Port alias the Brocket, that ſpringeth eaſt of S. Oſwolds) paſſeth by Portgate, Whittington, Fennike hall, Padſennes, Hawkewell, the Grange, & Dillingtons. After it hath taken in the Pont from the eaſt (whoſe head is Hartleie. not farre from that of Hartleie ſtreame) and is paſt Barwiſe on the hill, it runneth by Harford, Bedlington, Cowpon, and at Blithes nuke, into the deepe Ocean. Hartleie ſtreamelet riſeth in Weſtſlade parioch, goeth by Haliwell, and at Hartleie North Tine. towne yeldeth to the ſea.

The Tine or Tinna, a riuer notablie ſtored with ſamon, and other good fiſh, and in old time called Alan, riſeth of two heads, whereof that called north Tine, is the firſt that followeth to be deſcribed. It ſpringeth vp aboue Belkirke in the hils, & thence Shele. goeth to Butterhawgh (where it receiueth a confluence of Kirſop and the Shele) thence to Cragſheles, Leapeliſh (receiuing on the ſouth a rill out of Tindale) then to Shilburne, againſt which it taketh in a becke that commeth out of Tindale called Shill, alſo two other on the ſame ſide, betweene Parro and Fawſton hall, and the third at Thorneburne, and ſo goeth on to Grenefed, and there carrieth withall a fall, from by north alſo made by the confluence of one rill comming by Thecam, and another that paſſeth by Holinhead, and likewiſe another on the ſouth comming from Tindale, by Chuden, Dalacaſtell, and Brokes: after which our north Tine goeth by Hellaſide, to Billingham, and at Rhedes mouth meeteth with the Ridde, a verie prettie water, whoſe Ridde. deſcription is giuen me after this maner.

The Ridde therefore riſeth within three miles of the Scotiſh march, as Leland ſaith, & commeth through Riddeſdale, wherevnto it giueth the name. Another writeth how it riſeth in the roots of the Carter, and Redſquibe hilles, and yet it hath gone farre from the Shelhop. head, beſide a few little rilles it taketh in the Spelhop or Petop from the north and the Cheſlop on the Cheſlop. ſouth, beſide ſundrie other wild rils nameleſſe and obſcure, as one on the north ſide nert vnto the Petop or Spelhop; another by ſouth out of Riddeſdale, the third weſt of Burdop, the fourth runneth by Mullaw to Rocheſter, then two from ſouthweſt, another from by north which goeth by Durtburne, and is called Durt or Durth, then the Smalburne from the weſt. Next to the ſame is the Otter or Otterburne on the north ſide alſo the Duereie, and finallie the laſt which deſcendeth from Elleſdon hilles, by Punkrige and ioineth with our Ridde, northweſt of Mudhowgh, after which the ſaid Ridde goeth by Wodburne, Riſingham, Leame, and ſo into the Tine, a little lower than Belingham or Bilingham, which ſtandeth ſomewhat alofe from north Tine, and is (as I take it) ten miles at the leaſt aboue the towne of 3. Burnes. Heрham. After this confluence it paſſeth to Leehall, Shitlington. to Carehouſe (croſſing Shitlington becke by weſt which alſo receiueth the Pare on the ſouth ſide of Shitlington) another alſo beneath this on the ſame ſide, made by the confluence of Worke ſburne, and Middleburne, at Roſeburne, beſide the third called Horleis or Horelée aboue, and Simons burne beneath Shepechaſe, and likewiſe the Swine from by north that runneth by Swinburne caſtell, next of all the Riall from the northeaſt, which commeth by Errington, & ſo holding his courſe directlie ſouthwards, it goeth by S. Oſwolds through the Pictiſh wall, to Wall, and ſo into ſouth Tine, beneath Accam, and northweſt (as I dow weene) of Heрham.

Tine. S. The ſouth Tine ariſeth in the Cheuiot hils, and yer it hath gone farre from the head, it meeteth with Eſgill on the eaſt, and another rill on the weſt, and ſo Eſgil. going by the houſes toward Awſken more, it ioineth with Schud from by weſt, and ſone after with the Uent from by eaſt aboue Lowbier. From Lowbier it goeth to Whitehalton, to Kirke Haugh (croſ- Uent. ſing the Gilders becke on the one ſide, and the Aine Gilders beck. on the other) to Thornehope, where it is inlarged with a water on each ſide, to Williamſtone, and almoſt at Knareſdale, taketh in the Knare, and then Knare. runneth withall to Fetherſtone angle. At Fetherſtone angle likewiſe it meeteth with Hartleie water, by ſouthweſt comming from Sibins or Sibbenes, another a little beneath from ſoutheaſt, and thence when it commeth to Billeſter caſtell, it carieth another withall from by weſt, Thirlewall called Rippall which riſeth in the forreſt of Lowes, and goeth by the Waltowne, Blinkinſop, & Wildon, and after which confluence it taketh in another from by north riſing Coque. weſt of Swinfield, which goeth by Grenelegh to Haltweſtell: thence going by Unthanke, it croſſeth another rill from by ſouth, deſcending from the hilles that lie north of Todlewood, and then proceeding vnto Wilmotteſwic, it admitteth the Wilmots becke from the ſouth, and another running by Bradleie hall on the north ſide of Beltingham; after which it meeteth with the Alen a proper water, and deſcribed after this maner.

The Alen or Alon hath two heads, whereof one is East Alen. called eaſt Alen, the other weſt Alen. The firſt of them riſeth ſoutheaſt of Sibton Sheles, & going by Sundorp, it taketh in a rill withall from by eſt; after which confluence it runneth to Newſhele, Allington, Caddon, Old towne, & in the courſe to Stauertpele, meeteth with the weſt Alen. The weſt Alen riſeth in Killop low hilles aboue Wheteleie ſheles, from whence West Alen. it goeth to Spartwell, Halwcopole, Dwſton, and taking in a rill thereabouts, it proceedeth on to Permaudbie, and croſſing there another rill in like maner from by weſt, it goeth by Whitefield, and ioining Were. ſone after with the eſt Alen, they run as one to Stauert pole, Plankford, and ſo into the Tine betweene Warde Beltingham and Lées, from whence the Tine runneth on by Lées Haddon, Wodhall, Dwmers, Wallop Whernebie, Coſtlete, & ſo by Warden, till it croſſe Kellop the north Tine, and come to Herham, from whence it goeth to Dilſtan, croſſing two waters by the waie, whereof one commeth from by ſouth, and is called the Wolch, which holdeth his courſe by Stelehall, and Newbiggin receiueth another comming from Grimbridge: the other called Dill ſomewhat lower deſcending from Hedlete, and running by Riſing, till it fall into the ſouth ſide of our ſtreame from Dilſtan, it goeth to Bywell caſtell, ouer againſt which it receiueth a rill that runneth by Hindlete, Wale thence it haſteth to Eltingham, Prudoo, Willam, (and there it meeteth with another becke) then to Reton, Blaidon, and next of all ioineth with the Darwent, from by ſouth. Bedl

This riuer riſeth aboue Knewdon, and Rudlam- Darwent. hope in Northumberland, from two heads: the northerlie being called Dere, and the ſoutherlie the Guent: and ioining ſo well yer long in chanell as in name, they runne on to Humſterworth, new Biggin, Blankeland, Acton, Aſpertheles, Blackheadlie, Brentfield ſide, Panſheles, Ebcheſter, and there taking in a water from Hedlete in Northumberland, neere to Blacke hall in the biſhoprike, it goeth on to Spen, Hollinſide, Whickham, Swalwell, and ſo into Tine, which paſſeth from thence by Elſwic, and meeting with another water comming from Shirraw, by Rauenſworth caſtell to Redhugh, it goeth on to Newcaſtell, Fellin, Netherhelworth, Walker, Walſwon, Hedburne, and next to Jetro or Girwie, where Beda dwelled in an abbeie; now a gentlemans place (although the church be made a parish church, whereunto diuerse townes resort, as monke Eaton where Beda was borne, which is a mile from thence, Southlheles, Harton, Westhow, Hebburne, Hedworth, Wardleie, Fellin, Follinsbie, the Hewoothes) and from thence to the south and Northlheles, and so into the sea, fiue miles by northwest of Weremouth, and (as I gesse) somewhat more.

Beneath the confluence in like sort of both the Tines, Kanoeth Corbridge, a towne sometime inhabited by the Romans, and about twelue miles from Newcastell, and hereby doth the Coque run, that meeteth yer long with the Tine. Not farre off also is a place called Colchester, wherby Leland gesseth that the name of the broke should rather be Cole than Coque, and in my iudgement his coniecture is verie likelie; for in the life of S. Oliwyn (otherwise a feeble authoritie) the word Colbridge is alwaies vsed for Corbridge, whereof I thought good to leaue this short aduertisement. In this countrie also are the three vales or dales, whereof men haue doubted whether theeues or true men do most abound in them, that is to saie, Riddesdale, Tindale, and Liddesdale: this last being for the most part Scottish, and without the marches of England. Neuertheless, sithens that by the diligence chiefelie of maister Gilpin, and finallie of other learned preachers, the grace of God working with them, they haue beene called to some obedience and zeale vnto the word, it is found that they haue so well profited by the same, that at this present their former sauage demeanour is verie much abated, and their barbarous wildnesse and fiercenesse is qualified, that there is great hope left of their reduction vnto ciuilitie, and better order of behauiour than hitherto they haue beene acquainted withall. But to proceed with the rest.

Coque.

Ptolomie, writing of the Were, calleth it Uedra, a riuer well knowne vnto Beda the famous preest, who was brought vp in a monasterie that stood vpon the bankes thereof. It riseth of three heads in Bellop-pellaw hill, whereof the most southerlie is called Burdop, the middlemost Wallop, and the northerlie Bellop, which uniting themselues about S. Johns chappell, or a little by west thereof, their confluence runneth through Stanhope parke, by east Pare, and so to Frosterleie. But yer it come there, it receiueth three rilles from the north in Weredale, whereof one commeth in by Stanhope, another west of Wodcroft hall, and the third at Frosterleie afore mentioned. And a little beneath these, I find yet a fourth on the south side, which descendeth from southwest by Bollop, Bishopsleie, Pilhouses, and Landew, as I haue beene informed. Being therefore united all with the Were, this streame goeth on to Walsingham, there taking in the Wascropburne, beside another at Bradleie, the third at Harpleie hall (and these on the north side) and the fourth betweene Witton and Witton castell called Bedburne, comming by Hamsterleie, whereby this riuer doth now war verie great. Going therefore from hence, it hasteth to Bishops Akeland, and beneath it receiueth the Garondelle, which (as Leland saith) riseth six miles by west of Akeland castell, and running south thereof, passeth by west Akeland, S. Helens Akeland, S. Andrewes Akeland, and bishops Akeland, and then into the Were which goeth to Newsteds, and Willington. Neere vnto this place also and somewhat beneath Sunderland, the Were, crosseth one broke from southest by Yet, Crorleie, Cronefurth, Turdale, and Cordale, and two other from by northwest in one botome, whereof the first commeth from aboue Alh by Langleie: the other called Coue, from aboue Kinchleie by Newbiggin, Lanchester, north Langlie, and through Weare parke, & so meeting beneath Kelleie or Hedleie with the other, they fall both as one into the Were, betweene south Sunderland and Burnall. From hence our riuer goeth on to Howghwell, Shirkeleie, old Durelme (and there taking in the Pidding broke by northeast) it goeth to Durelme, Finkeleie, Harbarhouse, Lumleie castell (where it meeteth with the Pilis, whose heads are united betweene Pelton and Whitwell (and after called Hedleis) and from thence to Lampton, Harroton, the Bedikes, Ufferton, Hilton parke, Bishops, Weremouth, and so into the sea, betweene north Sunderland and north Weremouth towne, which now is called monke Weremouth of the monasterie sometime standing there, wherin Beda read & wrote manie of his bookes, as to the world appeareth. This mouth of Were is eight miles from Durham, and six from Newcastell. Being thus passed the Were, & entered into the Bishoprie, yer we come at the mouth of the These, almost by two miles, ouer passing a rill that runneth by castell Eden, and Hardwic, and likewise Hartlepole towne, which lieth ouer into the sea in maner of a byland or peninsula, we met with a prettie fall, which groweth by a riuer that is increased with two waters, whereof one riseth by northwest about Noretons, and goeth by Stotfeld and Clarton; the other at Dawlton, going by Bleerton, Owtham, and Grettam, finallie ioining within two miles of the sea, they make a prettie portlet: but I know not of what securitie.

Pidding broke. Pilis.

The These, a riuer that breedeth and feedeth an excellent samon, riseth in the Blacke lowes, aboue two miles flat west of the southerlie head of Were called Burdop, and south of the head of west Alen, and thence runneth through Tildale forrest; and taking in the Langdon water from northwest it runneth to Durkpit chapell, to Newbiggin, and so to Middleton, receiuing by west of each of these a rill comming from by north (of which the last is called Hude) and likewise the Lune afterward by southwest that riseth at three seuerall places, whereof the first is in the borders of Westmerland and there called Arnegill becke, the second more southerlie, named Lunebecke, and the third by south at Bardor Skarth hill, and meeting all aboue Arnegill house, they run togither in one bottome to Lathekirke bridge, and then into the These. Hauing therefore met with these, it runneth to Pickelton (& there taking in the Skirkwith water) it goeth to Rombald kirke (crossing there also one rill and the Bander broke by south west) and then going to Norewod hag, and Norewod parke, till it come to Bernards castell.

These. Hude. Lune. Arnegill. Skirkewith. Bander.

Here also it receiueth the Thuresgill water comming east of Kere crosse in Yorkshire, from the spittle in Stanmore by Crag almost southwest, and being united with the These, it goeth by Stratford, Egleston, Rokesbie, Thorpe, Wickliffe, Quington, Winston, and betweene Barforth and Gainforth meeteth with another rill, that commeth from Langleie forest, betweene Rabie castell and Standorpe, of whose name I haue no knowledge. But to proceed. The These being past Ramsorth, runneth betweene Persore and Cliffe, and in the waie to Crofts bridge taketh in the Skerne a prettie water, which riseth about Crimdon, and goeth by Filbburne, Bradburie, Preston, Braforton, Skirmingham, the Burdons, Haughton and Darlington, & there finallie meeting with the Cocke becke or Dare, it falleth in the These beneath Stapleton, before it come at Crofts bridge, and (as it should seeme) is the same which Leland calleth Gretteie or Grettie. From thence it runneth to Sockburne, nether Dunsleie, Middleton row, Newsham, Yarne (crossing a broke from Leuen bridge) called Leuen or Leuinus in Latine, whose crinkling courſe is notable, and the ſtreame of ſome called Thorpe, which I find deſcribed in this maner.

Thorpe alias Leuand.

The Thorpe riſeth of ſundrie heads, whereof one is aboue Pinching Thorpe, from whence it goeth to Nonnethorpe, and ſo to Stokeſleie. The ſecond hath two branches, and ſo placed, that Kildale ſtandeth betweene them both: finallie, meeting beneath Caſbie they go by Eaton, and likewiſe vnto Stokeſleie. The laſt hath alſo two branches, whereof one commeth from Ingleſbie, and meeteth with the ſecond beneath Broughton; going from thence to Stokeſleie, they meet with the Thorpe aboue the towne, as the other fall into it ſomewhat beneath the ſame. From hence it goeth to Kidwie, and there taketh in another rill comming from Potto; thence to Crawthorne broke, Leuenton, Milton, Pilton, Ingleſbie, and ſo into the Theſe, betweene Warne and Barwiſe, whereof I made mention before. After this confluence our Theſe haſteth on to Barwiſe, Preſton, Thorne abbeie, and Arſham, which ſtandeth on the ſoutheaſt ſide of the riuer almoſt betweene the falles of two waters, whereof one deſcendeth from weſt Hartburne by long Newton, Elton, & Stockton; the other from Shillington, or Shilkington, by Whitton, Thorpe, Blackeſtone, Billingham, and Norton. From Arſham finallie it goeth to Bellaſis, Middleburgh, and ſo into the ſea. Leland deſcribing this riuer ſpeaketh of the Wiske, which ſhould come thereinto from by ſouth vnder Wiske bridge, by Danbie, and Northallerton, and ſhould ſoine with a greater ſtreame: but as yet I find no certeine place where to beſtow the ſame.

Crawthorne.

Next of all we come vnto the high Cliffe water, which riſing aboue Hutton, goeth by Gilborow, and there receiueth another ſtreame comming from by ſouthwall, and then continuing on his courſe, it is not long yer it fall into the ſea. The next is the Scaling water, which deſcendeth from Scaling towne, from whence we come to the Polemouth, not farre from whoſe head ſtandeth Wolgraue caſtell: then to Sandford creeke, and next of all to Eſke mouth, which riſeth aboue Danbie wood, and ſo goeth to Caſtelton, there meeting by the waie with another rill comming from about Weſterdale by Danbie, and ſo they go on togither by Armar and Thwate caſtell, till they ſoine with another water aboue Glaſdale chappell, thence to new Biggin, taking yet another broke with them, running from Godland ward, and likewiſe the Ibur, and ſo go on without anie further increaſe by Buſworth, yer long into the ſea.

Eſke.

Ibur.

There is alſo a creeke on each ſide of Robin Whodes baie, of whoſe names and courſes I haue no skill, ſauing that Fillingale the towne doth ſtand betweene them both. There is another not far from Scarborow, on the north ſide called the Harwood broke. It runneth through Harwood dale by Cloughton, Buntſton, and ſone after meeting with another rill on the ſouthweſt, they run as one into the ocean ſea. From Scarborow to Bridlington, by Flamborow head, we met with no more falles. This water therefore that we ſaw at Bridlington, riſeth at Duggleby, from whence it goeth to Kirbie, Helperthorpe, Butterwic, Boithorpe, Forhole, (where it falleth into the ground, and riſeth by a game at Rudſton) Thorpe, Cathorpe, Bridlington, and ſo into the Ocean.

Being come about the Spurne head, I mete yer long with a riuer that riſeth ſhort of Witherſie, and goeth by Fodringham and Wilked, from thence to another that commeth by Roſſe, Halſham, Carmingham: then to the third, which riſeth aboue Humbleton, and goeth to Eſterwic, Heddon, and ſo into the Humber. The fourth ſpringeth ſhort of Sprotleie, goeth by Witton, and falleth into the water of Humber at Herflete, as I heare.

The next of all is the Hull water, which I will deſcribe alſo here, and then croſſe ouer vnto the ſoutherlie ſhore. The furtheſt head of Hull water riſeth at Kilham, from whence it goeth to Lewthorpe creeke, and ſo to Fodringham, a little beneath which it meeteth with ſundrie waters, whereof one falleth in on the northeſt ſide, comming from about Liſſet; the ſecond on the northweſt banke from Naſſerton; the third from Emmeſwell and Kirkeburne: for it hath two heads which ſoined beneth little Driffeld, and the fourth which falleth into the ſame: ſo that theſe two laſt run vnto the maine riuer both in one chanell, as experience hath confirmed. From hence then our Hull goeth to to Katſeie, to Gwdalehouſe, and then taking in a water from Hornſie mere, it goeth on through Beuerleie medowes, by Warron, Stoneferrie, Hull, and finallie into the Humber. Of the rill that falleth into this water from ſouth Netherwic, by Skirlow, and the two rilles that come from Cottingham and Woluerton, I ſaie no more, ſith it is enough to name them in their order.

Hull.

The deſcription of the Humber or Iſis, and ſuch water-courſes as doo increaſe hir chanell.

Chap. 15.

There is no riuer called Humber from the hed. Wherefore that which we now call Humber, Ptolomie Abie, Leland Aber, as he geſſeth, hath the ſame denomination no higher than the confluence of Trent with the Duze, as beſide Leland ſundrie ancient writers haue noted before vs both. Certes it is a noble arme of the ſea, and although it be properlie to be called Duze or Ocellus euen to the Nuke beneath Ancolme, yet are we contented to call it Humber of Humbrus or Umar, a king of the Scithians, who inuaded this Ile in the time of Locrinus, thinking to make himſelfe monarch of the ſame. But as God hath from time to time ſingularlie prouided for the benefit of Britaine, ſo in this buſineſſe it came to paſſe, that Humber was put to flight, his men ſlaine: and furthermore, whileſt he attempted to ſaue himſelfe by haſting to his ſhips (ſuch was the preaſe of his nobilitie that followed him into his owne veſſell, and the rage of weather which happened on his fatall daie) that both he and they were drowned togither in that arme. And this is the onelie cauſe wherefore it hath beene called Humber, as our writers ſaie; and whereof I find theſe verſes:

Humber.

Dum fugit obſtat ei flumen ſubmergitur illic,
Deque ſuo tributt nomine nomen aquæ.

This riuer in old time parted Lhoegres or England from Albania, which was the portion of Albanactus, the yongeſt ſonne of Brute. But ſince that time the limits of Lhoegres haue beene ſo inlarged, firſt by the proweſſe of the Romans, then by the conqueſts of the Engliſh, that at this preſent daie, the Twede on the one ſide, & the Solue on the other, be taken for the principall bounds betweene vs and thoſe of Scotland. In deſcribing therefore the Humber, I muſt needs begin with the Duze, whoſe water bringeth forth a verie ſweet, fat and delicat ſalmon, as I haue beene informed, beſide ſundrie other kinds of fiſh, which we want here on the ſouth and ſouthweſt coaſts & riuers of our land, whereof I may take occaſion to ſpeake more at large hereafter.

Vre alias Duze, or Iſis. The Vre therfore riſeth in the furtheſt parts of all Richmondſhire, among the Coterine hilles, in a moſſe, toward the weſt fourteene miles beyond Middleham. Being therefore iſſued out of the ground, it goeth to Holbecke, Hardraw, Hawſhouſe, Butterſide, Alkebridge (which Leland calleth the Alkaran, and ſaith thereof and the Bainham, that they are but obſcure bridges) then to Alkarth, through Manleſſe parke, Menſeleie bridge (made two hundred yeares ſince, by Alwin, parſon of Winſlaw) New parke, Spennithorne, Danbie, Geruiſe abbeie, Cliſton and Patham. When it is come to Patham, it receiueth the Burne, by ſouth weſt (as it did the Wile, from verie deepe ſcarrie rockes, before at Alkaran) and diuerſe other wild rilles not worthie to be remembred. From Patham, it paſſeth vnto Tanfield (taking in by the waie a rill by ſouthweſt) then to another Tanfield, to Newton hall, and Northbridge, at the higher end of Ripon, and ſo to Hutches bridge. But yet it come there it meeteth with the Skell, which being incorporat with the ſame, they run as one to Thorpe, then to Aldborow, and ſome after receiue the Swale.

Burne. rille.

Skell.

Swale.

Here (ſaith Leland) I am brought into no little ſtreict, what to coniecture of the meeting of Iſis and Vre, for ſome ſaie that the Iſis and the Vre do meet at Borowbridge, which to me doth ſeeme to be verie vnlikelie, ſith Iſurium taketh his denomination of Iſis and Vro, for it is often ſeene that the leſſe riuers do mingle their names with the greater, as in the Thamelis and other is eaſie to be found. Neither is there any more mention of the Vre after his paſſage vnder Borowbridge, but onelie of Iſis or the Duze in theſe daies, although in old time it held vnto Yorke it ſelfe, which of the Vre is truelie called Vrewiſe (or Yorke ſhort) or elſe my perſuaſion doth faile me. I haue red alſo Ewerwiſe and Yorwiſe. But to proceed, and leaue this ſuperfluous diſcourſe.

From Borowbridge, the Duze goeth to Aldborough, and (receiuing the Swale by the waie) to Aldworke, taking in Ulburne water, from the ſouthweſt, then to Linton vpon Duze, to Newton vpon Duze, and to Munketun, meeting with the Mid yer long, and ſo going withall to the Redhouſes, to Poppleton, Cliſton, Yorke (where it croſſeth the Foſſe) to Foulkorth, Middlethorpe, Acaſter, & Acaſter, Kelfleet, Welehall, Barelebie, Selbie, Turmonhall, Skurthall, Yokelath, Yoke, Sandhall, Rednelſe, Whitegift, Ullet, Blacketoft, Forfleet, Brownfleet, and ſo into Humber.

Foſſe.

Duze. The courſe of the Duze being thus deſcribed, and as it were ſimplie without his influences, now will I touch ſuch riuers as fall into the ſame alſo by themſelues, contrarie to my former proceeding, imagining a voiage from the Rauenſpurne, vntill I come nere to the head of Theſe, & ſo ſouthwards about againe by the bottome of the hillie ſoile vntill I get to Burſton, Sheffeld, Scrobie, & the verie ſouth point of Humber mouth, whereby I ſhall croſſe them all that are to be found in this walke, & leaue (I doubt) ſome eſpeciall notice of their ſeuerall heads and courſes. The courſe of the Hull, a ſtreame abounding with ſturgeon and lampreie, as alſo the riuers which haue their iſſue into the ſame, being (as I ſay) alreadie deſcribed, I thinke it not amiſſe, as by the waie to ſet downe what Leland ſaith thereof, to the end that his trauell ſhall not altogither be loſt in this behalfe; and for that it is ſhort, and hath one or two things worthie to be remembred conteined in the ſame.

Hull or Hulne.

The Hulne (ſaith he) riſeth of three ſeuerall heads, whereof the greateſt is not far from Driefield, now a ſmall village ſixteene miles from Hull. Certes it hath beene a goodlie towne, and therein was the palace of Egbright king of the Northumbers, and place of ſepulture of Alfred the noble king ſometime of that nation, who died there 727, the nineteene Cal. of Julie, the twentith of his reigne, and whoſe tombe or monument doth yet remaine (for ought that I do know) to the contrarie with an inſcription vpon the ſame written in Latine letters. Nere vnto this towne alſo is the Daneſield, wherein great numbers of Danes were ſlaine, and buried in thoſe hils, which yet remaine there to be ſeene ouer their bones and carcaſſes. The ſecond head (ſaith he) is at Eſtburne, and the third at Emmeſwell, and meeting all togither not farre from Driſield, the water there beginneth to be called Hulne, as I haue ſaid alreadie.

From hence alſo it goeth through Beuerleie medowes, and comming at the laſt not farre from an arme led from the Hulne by mans hand (and able to beare great veſſels) almoſt to Beuerleie towne, which in old time either hight or ſtood in Deirwald, vntill John of Beuerleie (whom Leland nameth out of an old author to be the firſt doctor or teacher of diuinitie that euer was in Oxford, and (as it ſhould ſeeme alſo by an ancient monument yet remaining) to be of an hoſtell where the vniuerſitie college now ſtandeth; & therfore they write him, Somtime fellow of that houſe) began to be of fame, of whom it is called Beuerleie (as ſome affirme) to this daie. In deed all the countrie betweene the Deirwent & the Humber was ſometime called Deira, and the lower part Caua Deira in reſpect of the higher ſoile, but now it is named the eaſt Riding. But what is this to my purpoſe? The Hulne therefore being come almoſt to Beuerleie towne, & meeting thereabout alſo with the Cottingham becke comming from Weſtwood by the waie, it paſſeth to Kingſton vpon Hulne or Hull, and ſo into the Humber without anie maner impeachment.

Cottingham.

Fowlncie. The Fowlncie riſeth about Godmanham, from whence it goeth by Wighton, Hareſwell, Scton, Williams bridge, and ſome after ſpreading it ſelfe, one arme called Skelfleet goeth by Cane Cawſeie to Brownefleet and ſo into the Duze. The other paſſeth by Sandholme, Gilberts dike, Scalbie chappell, Blacketoft, and ſo into the aforeſaid Duze, leauing a verie pretie Iland, which is a parcell (as I heare) of Walding fen more, though otherwiſe obſcure to vs that dwell here in the ſouth.

Skelfleet.

Darwent. The Darwent riſeth in the hilles that lie weſt of Robin Whodes baie, or two miles aboue Aiton bridge, weſt from Scarborow as Leland ſaith: and yet it hath run farre from the head, it receiueth two rilles in one bottome from by weſt, which ioine withall about Longdale end. Thence they go togither to Borcie, and at Hackneſſe take in another water comming from about Silſeie. Afterward it commeth to Aiton, then to Haibridge, and there croſſeth the Kenford that deſcendeth from Robertſton. After this alſo it goeth on to Poterſburnton where it taketh in one rill, as it doth another beneath running from Shirburne, and the third yet lower on the further banke, that deſcendeth from Burnton. From theſe confluences it runneth to Fowlbridge, Arbridge, Peldingham bridge, & ſo to Cotehouſe, receiuing by the waie manie waters, & yeelding great plentie of delicate ſamons to ſuch as fiſh vpon the ſame. Leland reckoning by the names of the ſeuerall brookes, numbreth them confuſedlie after his accuſtomed order. The Darwent (ſaith he) receiueth diuerſe ſtreames, as the Shirhutton. The ſecond is the Crambecke, deſcending from Hunderſkell caſtell (ſo called Tanquam à centum fontibus, or multitude of ſprings springs that rise about the same) and goeth to Rie, which comming out of the Blackemoore, passeth by Riuers abbeie, taking in the Ricoll on the left hand, then the Seuen, the Costeie, and Pickering brooke.

The Seuin also (saith he) riseth in the side of Blackemoore, and thence goeth by Sinnington foure miles from Pickering, and about a mile aboue a certeine bridge ouer Rie goeth into the streame. The Costeie in like sort springeth in the verie edge of Pickering towne, at a place called Keld head, and goeth into the Rie two miles beneath Pickering, about Kirbie minster. Finallie, Pickering water ariseth in Blackemoore, and halfe a mile beneath Pickering falleth into Costeie, meeting by the way with the Pocklington. Pocklington becke, and an other small rill or two, of whose names I haue no knowledge. Hitherto Leland. But in mine opinion, it had beene far better to haue described them thus. Of those waters that fall into the Darwent beneath Cotehouse, the first commeth from Swenton, the second from Ebberston, the third from Allerston, the fourth from Thorneton & Pickering, and the fift on the other side that commeth thither from Wintringham. For so should he haue dealt in better order, and rid his hands of them with more expedition, referring the rest also vnto their proper places.

But to proceed after mine owne maner. Being past Cotehouse, & per the Darwent come at Wickham, it crosseth the Rie, which riseth of two heads, and ioining west of Loton they run through Glansbie parke. Finallie, receiuing the Costeie, it meeteth at the last with an other streame increased by the fals of sir waters and more per it come into the Darwent. The most easterlie of these is called Seuen, and riseth (as is aforesaid) in Blackemoore, from whence it goeth by Sinnington, Purton, Normanbie, Newsound, Yow, and so into the Rie. The second named Don hath his originall likewise in Blackemoore, and descending by Rasmore, Keldon and Edston (where it receiueth the Hodgebecke, that commeth by Bernesdale, Kirkedale, & Welburne) it goeth to Sawlton, and there taketh in first the Ricoll, that goeth by Careton, and whereof Kiwall (as some thinke, but falslie) doth seeme to take the name. Then Fesse, which riseth aboue Bilisdale chappell, and meeteth with the Rie at the Shaking bridge, from whence they go together vnder the Rie bridge, to Rieuis abbeie, and thence (after it hath crossed a becke from the west) through a parke of the earle of Rutlands to Newton, Puniton, and so to Sawton or Sawlton, as I doo find it written. Here also it taketh in the Holbecke brooke, that commeth thither from by west by Gilling castell, and Stangraue, from whence it goeth on to Brabie, next into the Seuen, then into the Rie, and so into the Darwent, which from thence doth run to Wickham.

Don or Done. Hodgebecke. Ricoll. Fesse. Holbecke.

Being past Wickham, it meeteth with a water that commeth thereinto from Grinston to Setterington at southeall, and thence it goeth on to Malton and Malton (where the prouerbe saith that a bushell of rie and an other of malt is worth but sixpence, carie awaie whilest you may, so as you can keepe them from running through the sackes) Sutton, Wellam, Furbie, and Kirkeham, receiuing by the waie one rill on the one side and an other on the other, whereof this commeth from Burdsall, that other from Conisthorpe. From Kirkeham it goeth to Cramburne and Diwham bridge (crossing by the waie an other brooke comming from saint Edwards gore, by Fakon) then to Aldbie, Buttercram (alias Butterham) bridge, Stamford bridge, Kerbie bridge Sutton, Ellerton, Aughton, Bubwith, Wresill, Babthorpe, and so into the Duze, wherewith I finish the description of Darwent: sauing that I haue to let you vnderstand how Leland heard that an arme ran some time from the head of Darwent also to Scarborow, till such time as two hils betwixt which it ran, did shalder and so choke vp his course.

The Fosse (a slow streame yet able to beare a good vessell) riseth in Nemore Calateris, that is, Galters wood or Calwood, among the woddie hilles, and in his descent from the higher ground, he leaueth Crake castell, on his west side: thence he goeth by Marton abbeie, Marton, Stillington, Farlington, Towthorpe, Erswic, Huntington, & at Yorke into the Duze. The Kile riseth flat north at Newborow, from whence it goeth by Thorneton on the hill, Ruskell parke, Awne, Collerton, and so into the Duze about Newton vpon Duze. The Swale is a right noble riuer, & march in some places betweene Richmondshire and Westmerland, it riseth not far from Pendragon castell in the hilles aboue Kirkedale, and from this towne it goeth to Kelde chappell, Carret house, Crackepot, Whiteside, and neere vnto Palen taketh in the Barneie water, which commeth from the north east. Thence it goeth by Yarcaside to Reth (where it meeteth with the Arcleis) and so to Flemington, Grinton, Parrike (taking in the Holgate that commeth from by south: and in the waie to Thorpe, the Parike becke, or peraduenture Aplegarth water, as Leland calleth it, that descendeth from the north) then to Thorpe, Aplegarth, Richmond, Ealbie and Brunton.

Fosse. Kile. Swale. Barneie. Arcleie. Holgate. Parrike becke.

Here by north it interteineth two or three waters in one chanell, called Rauenswath water, whereof the two furthest doo ioine not farre from the Dawlions, and so go by Rauenswath, Hartforth, Gilling, and at Skebie meet with the third, comming from Richmond beconward. By west also of Brunton, the Swale meeteth with the Rhe, running from Redale, and being past Brunton, it goeth to Caterisc bridge beneath Brunton, then to Ellerton, Kirkebie, Langton parua, Thirtoft, Anderbie Feeple: and before it come vnto Gatenbie, it meeteth with the Bedall brooke, alias Lemings becke, that commeth west of Kellirbie, by Cunstable, Burton, Langthorpe, Bedall, and Leming chapell. From Gattenbie likewise it goeth to Mawbie, & at Brakenbirie receiueth the Wiske, which is a great water, rising betweene two parkes aboue Swanbie in one place, and southeast of Mountgrace abbeie in another; and after the confluence which is about Sidlebridge, goeth on betweene the Rughtons to Appleton, the Smetons, Birkbie, Hutton Conters, Danbie, Wisc, Patford, Warlabie, and taking in there a rill from Brunton Aluerton, it proceedeth to Otterington, Newlie, Kirbie Wiske, Newton, and Blackenburie, there meeting (as I said) with the Swale, that runneth from thence by Skipton bridge, Catton, Topcliffe, and Kaniton, and aboue Eldmire meeteth with sundrie other rilles in one bottome, whereof the northwesterlie is called Cawdebec: the south easterlie Rebecke, which ioine est of Thorneton more, and so go to Thorneton in the street, Kilnington, Thrusk, Sowerbie, Crakwic, and sone after crossing another growing of the mixture of the Willow, and likewise of the Cuckewold becks, which ioine aboue Bridforth, and running on till it come almost at Dawlton, it maketh confluence with the Swale, and go thence as one with all their famous by Thoreton bridge, Pitton vpon Swale, and so into the Duze.

Rhe. Wiske. Cawdebec Rebecke. Cuckwolds becke.

The Skell riseth out of the west two miles from Founteines abbeie, and commeth (as Leland saith) with a faire course by the one side of Ripon, as the Vre doth on the other. And on the bankes hereof stood the famous abbeie called Founteines or Adfontes, so much renowmed for the lustie monks that sometimes south of Horbirie thornes, and thereabout crossing one rill from by south from Woller by new Pilner Dam, and some after another from northwest, called Chald, rising in the Peke hils, whereon Wakefield standeth, and likewise the third from southeast, and Waterton hall, it goeth by Warmesield, Newland, Altofts, and finallie into the Aire, west of Castelworth, as I learne. What the name of this riuer should be as yet I heare not, and therefore no marueil that I do not set it downe, yet is it certeine that it is called Chald, after his cõfluence with the Chald, and finallie Chaldair or Chaldar after it hath ioined with the Aire or Ar. But what is this for his denominations from the head? It shall suffice therefore thus farre to haue shewed the course thereof: and as for the name I passe it ouer vntill another time.

Chald.

Trent. The Trent is one of the most excellent riuers in the land, not onelie for store of samon, sturgeon, and sundrie other kinds of delicate fish wherewith it doth abound, but also for that it is increased with so manie waters, as for that onelie cause it may be compared either with the Duze or Sauerne, I meane the second Duze, whose course I haue latelie described. It riseth of two heads which ioine beneath Norton in the moore, and from thence goeth to Hilton abbeie, Bucknell church, and aboue Stoke receiueth in the Foulebrooke water, which commeth thither from Tunstall, by Shelton, and finallie making a confluence they go to Hanlæt, where they meet with another on the same side, that descendeth from Newcastell vnder Line, which Leland taketh to be the verie Trent it selfe, saieng: that it riseth in the hils aboue Newcastell, as may be seene by his commentaries.

Foulebrooke.

But to proceed. At Trentham, or not farre from thence, it crosseth a riueret from northeast, whose name I know not, & thence going to Stone Acton, Stoke Burston, the Sandons and Weston, a little aboue Shubburne & Hawood, it receiueth the Sow, a great chanell increased with sundrie waters, which I will here describe, leauing the Trent at Shubburne, till I come backe againe. The Sow descendeth from the hilles, aboue Whitemoore chappell, and goeth by Charleton, and Stawne, and beneath Shalford ioineth with another by northeast, that commeth from bishops Offeleie, Egleshall, Cheshie, Raunton. After this confluence also it runneth by Bridgeford, Tillington, & Stafford, beneath which towne it crosseth the Penke brooke, that riseth aboue Nigleton, & Berwood, & aboue Penke bridge vniteth it selfe with another comming from Knightleie ward, by Gnashall church, Eaton: and so going forth as one, it is not long yer they fall into Sow, after they haue passed Drayton, Dunstan, Acton, and Banswich, where losing their names, they with the Sow & the Sow with them do ioine with the Trent, at Shubburne, vpon the southerlie banke.

Sow.

Penke.

From Shubburne the Trent goeth on to little Harwood (meeting by the waie one rill at Dusleie bridge, and another south of Riddlesleie) thence by Hawksberie, Mauesfane, Ridware, and so toward Yorhall: where I must staie a while to consider of other waters, wherewith I meet in this voiage. Of these therefore the lesser commeth in by south from Farwall, the other from by west, a faire streame, and increased with two brooks, whereof the first riseth in Cedewood forrest, northeast of Haggerleie parke, whereinto falleth another west of Hamsted Ridware, called Blith, which riseth among the hilles in Whateleie moore, aboue Weston Conie, and thence going to the same towne, it commeth to Draycote, Blith. Draycote, Painsleie, Gratwitch, Grimleie, Aldmaston, Hamsted, Ridware, and finallie into the Trent, directlie west of Yorhall, which runneth also from thence, & leauing kings Bromleie in a parke (as I take it) on the left hand, and the Blacke water comming from Southton and Lichfield on the right, goeth streightwaie to Catton, where it meeteth with the Tame, whose course I describe as followeth.

Tame.

It riseth in Staffordshire (as I remember) not farre from Pettishall, and goeth forth by Hamsted, toward Pirihall and Brimichams Acton, taking in by the waie a rill on each side, whereof the first groweth through a confluence of two waters, the one of them comming from Tipton, the other from Aldburie, and so running as one by Wedburie till they fall into the same. The latter commeth from Wolfhall, and ioineth with it on the left hand. After this, and when it is past the aforesaid places, it crosseth in like sort a rill from Smethike ward: thence it goeth to Parneton hall, beneath which it meeteth with the Rhee, and thence through the parke, at Parke hall by Watercote, crossing finallie the Cole, whose head is in the forrest by Kingesnorton wood, and hath this course, whereof I now giue notice. It riseth (as I said) in the forrest by Kingesnorton wood, and going by Pareleie and Kingeshirst, it meeteth betweene that and the parke, with a water running betweene Yelmedon and Sheldon.

Rhee. Cole.

Thence it passeth on to Colshull, by east whereof it ioineth with a brooke, mounting southwest of Colshull called Blith, which going by Henwood and Barston, crosseth on each side of Temple Balshall, a rill, whereof one commeth through the Quenes parke or chase that lieth by west of Kenelworth, & the other by Kenelworth castell it selfe, from about Haselie parke. After which confluences it proceedeth in like maner to Hampton in Arden, and the Packingtons, and so to Colshull, where it meeteth with the Cole, that going a little further, vniteth it selfe with the Burne on the one side (whereinto runneth a water comming from Ansleie on the east) and some after on the other doth fall into the Tame, that which some call the Rhee, a common name to all waters that moue and run from their head. For ῥέω in Greeke is to flow and run, although in truth it is proper to the sea onelie to flow. Leland nameth the Brimicham water, whose head (as I heare) is aboue Northfield, so that his course shuld be by Kingesnorton, Bremicham, Budston hall, till it fall beneath Parneton into the Tame it selfe, that runneth after these confluences on by Lee, Kingesbirie parke, and going by east of Drayton, Basset parke, to Falkesleie bridge, it meeteth with another water called Burne, also comming from Hammerwich church, by Chesterford, Shenton, Thickebrowne, and the north side of Drayton, Basset parke, wherof I spake before. From hence our Tame runneth on to Tamworth, there taking in the Anchor by east, whose description I had in this maner deliuered vnto me.

Blith. Burne. Rhee.

It riseth aboue Burton, from whence it goeth by Nonneaton, Witherleie and Atherstone. Per long also it taketh in a water from northeast, which commeth by Huglescote, Shapton, Cunston, Twicrosse (vniting it selfe with a water from Boswoth) Ratcliffe, & so to the Anchor; which after this confluence passeth by Whittendon, Crendon, Polleswoth, Armington, Tamworth, & so into Tame, that passeth to Hopwash, Comberford hall, Telford, and some after crossing a rill that riseth short of Swinfield hall, and commeth by Fesilrike, it runneth not farre from Crorhall, and so to Catton, thereabout receiuing his last increase, not worthie to be omitted. This brooke is named Mese, and it riseth in the great parke, that lieth betweene Worthington, and Smethike, from whence also it goeth by Ashbie de la Souche, Packington, Wotham, and Stretton, and thereabout crossing ſing a rill about Nethерſale grange, from Duerſale by eaſt, it proceedeth by Chilcote, Clifton, Croxall, into the Thame, and both out of hand into the maine riuer a mile aboue Repton. Leland writing of this riuer (as I earſt noted) ſaith thereof in this wiſe. Into the Thame alſo runneth the Bremicham brooke, which riſeth foure or fiue miles about Brentcham in the Blacke hils in Worceſterſhire, and goeth into the aforeſaid water a mile aboue Crudworth bridge. Certes (ſaith he) this Bremicham is a towne maintеined chiefly by ſmiths, nailers, cutlers, edgetole forgers, lorimers or bitmakers, which haue their iron out of Staffordſhire and Warwikſhires, and toles alſo out of the firſt countie. Hitherto Leland. Now to reſume the Trent, which being growen to ſome greatneſſe, goeth on to Walton, Drakelow, and there croſſing a water that commeth by Newbold hall, it runneth to Stapenell, Winſhull, Wightmere, and Newton Souch, where it receiueth two chanels within a ſhort ſpace, to be deſcribed apart.

Anchor. Mese.

Dou. The firſt of theſe is called the Dou or Doue, it riſeth about the three ſhires meere, and is as it were limes betweene Staffordſhire and Darbiſhires, vntill it come at the Trent. Deſcending therefore from the head, it goeth by Carleſbooth, Pilſburie grange, Yarkington, Wolſcot, Eaton, Hunſington grange, and aboue Thorpe receiueth the Manifold water, ſo called, bicauſe of the ſundrie crinckling rills that it receiueth, and turnagaines that it ſelfe theweth before it come at the Dou. Riſing therefore not farre from Axe edge croſſe (in the bottome thereby) it runneth from thence to Longmore, Sheene, Warſlow chappell, and Welton. Beneath Welton alſo it taketh in the Hanſleie water, that commeth out of Blackemore hilles to Waterſall, where it falleth into the ground: and afterward mounting againe is receiued into the Manifold, north of Throwleie (as I heare) which goeth from thence to Ilam, and aboue Thorpe doth caſt it ſelfe into Dou. Hauing therefore met togither after this maner, the Dou proceedeth on to Paplington, beneath which it croſſeth one water deſcending from Brallington by Fennie Bentleie, and another ſomewhat lower that commeth from Hoctton hall by Hognaſton and Aſhburne, and then going to Patterfield, Parburie, Ellaſton, Rawſton Rowdeſter, it meeteth with the Churne, euen here to be deſcribed before I go anie further. It riſeth a good waie aboue Delacraſſe abbie, and comming thither by Helleſbie wood, it taketh in the Dunſmere, betweene Harracraſſe and Leike.

Manifold. Churne. Hanſleie. Dunſmere.

Thence it goeth to the Walgrange, and a little beneath receiueth the Pendor that commeth from aboue Harton, thence to Cheddleton, and hauing croſſed the Alhenhirſt brooke aboue Cnutes hall, it runneth by Ypſton, Frogball, Below hill, Alton caſtell, Priеſtwood, and at Rowceſter falleth into the Dou, which yet long alſo receiueth a rill from Crowſden, and then going to Eton meeteth firſt with the Teine that commeth thither from each ſide of Chedleie by Teinetwone, Bramhirſt and Stranehill. Secondlie with the Vncester or Vttoxeter water, and then going on to Merchington, Sidberie, Cawlton, it croſſeth a brooke from Sidnaſter college, by Saperton. From this confluence in like ſort it paſſeth forth to Tilberie caſtell, Marſton, and at Edergton meeteth with the water that commeth from Pelderſleie by Longford (where into runneth another that commeth from Hollington) and ſo to Hilton. Theſe waters being thus ioined, and manie ends brought into one, the Dou it ſelfe falleth yet long likewiſe into the Trent, aboue Newton Souch. So that the maine riuer being thus inlarged, goeth onwards with his courſe, betweene Willington and Repton meeteth with two waters on ſundrie ſides, whereof that which falleth in by Willington, riſeth neere Dalberie Lies, and runneth by Truſſelie and Athe: the other that entereth aboue Repton, deſcendeth from Hartesburne, ſo that the Trent being paſt theſe, haſteth to Twiford, Inglebie, Staunton, Weſton, Newton, and Alton, yer long alſo meeting with the Darwent; next of all to be diſpatched. The Darwent, or (to vſe the verie Britiſh word) Dowr gwine (but in Latine Fluuius Derуantanus) riſeth plaine weſt, neere vnto the edge of Darbiſhire, aboue Blackwell a market towne, and from the head runneth to the New chappell, within a few miles after it be riſen. From hence moreouer it goeth by Howden houſe, Darwent chappell, Porkeſhire bridge, and at Witham bridge doth croſſe the Neue or Nouius that commeth from Newſtole hill, by Netherburgh, Hope (croſſing there one rill from Caſkelton, another from Bradwell, and the third at Hacherſage, from Stonie ridge hill) and ſo goeth on to Padleie, Stockehall, receiuing a rill by the waie from by weſt, to Stonie Middleton, and Ballow, and hauing here taken in the Burbrooke on the one ſide, and another from Halſop on the other, it goeth to Chatworth and to Rowſeleie, where it is increaſed with the Wie comming from by weſt, and alſo a rill on the eaſt, a little higher. But I will deſcribe the Wie before I go anie further.

Darwent. Neue. Burbroke.

The Wie riſeth aboue Burſton well, and there is increaſed with the Hawkeſhow, and the Wile brooke, whoſe heads are alſo further diſtant from the edge of Darbiſhire than that of Wie, and races ſomwhat longer, though neither of them be worthie to be accompted long. For the Wile, hauing two heads, the one of them is not farre aboue the place where Wilebecke abbeie ſtood, the other is further off by weſt, about Wilebecke towne: and finallie ioining in one they runne to Cuckneie village, where receiuing a becke that commeth downe from by weſt, it holdeth on two miles further, there taking in the ſecond rill, and ſo reſort to Ruford, or the Manbecke. Vnto this alſo do other two rills repaire, wherof the one goeth through and the other hard by Maunſfield, of which two alſo this latter riſeth weſt about foure miles, and runneth forth to Clipſton (three miles lower) and ſo likewiſe to Ruford, whereof I will ſpeake hereafter. In the meane time to returne againe to the Wie. From Burſton well, it runneth to Staddon, Cowdale, Cowlow, New meadow, Pilhouſes, Bankewell, and Haddon hall, beneath which it receiueth the Lath kell, that runneth by Duerhaddon, and the Bradford, both in one bottome after they be ioined in one at Alport. And this is the firſt great water that our Darwent doth meet withall. Being therefore paſt the Rowleies, the ſaid Darwent goeth to Stancliffe, Darleie in the peake, Wenſleie, Smitterton hall, and at Matlocke taketh in a rill by northeaſt, as it doth another at Crumford that goeth by Botelhall.

Wie. Hawkeſhow. Wile. Ruford alias Manbecke. Lathkell. Bradford.

From Mattocke, it proceedeth to Watſton, or Watſond, Well bridge, Alderwaſh, and ioineth with another ſtreame called Amber comming in from by north by Amber bridge, whoſe deſcription ſhall inſue in this wiſe, as I find it. The head of Amber is aboue Edleſton hall, or (as Leland ſaith) eaſt of Cheſterfield, and comming from thence by Middleton to Ogſton hall, it taketh withall another brooke, deſcending from Hardwiſe wood, by Alton and Streton. Thence it goeth to Higham, Brackenfield, and aboue Dale bridge meeteth with a brooke running from Hucknalward to Shireland parke ſide, there croſſing the Moreton becke, and ſo to Alferton, except I name it wrong. From Dale bridge it goeth by Wingfeld, to Hedge, Fritchlin, and ſo into Darwent, taking the water withall that deſcendeth from Swanſwike by Pentridge, as Leland doth remember. From this confluence likewiſe it runneth to Belper, where it meeteth with a rill comming from Mozleie parke: thence to Pakenie, and at Duſfeld, receiueth the Egleſburne, which ariſeth about Wirkeſwozth oz Mzeſwozth, but in the ſame pariſh out of a rocke, and commeth in by Turnedich. From Duffeld, it palſeth to Bzadſall, Darleie abbeie, and at Darbie taketh in a rill comming from Mirkaſton by Weſton vnderwood, Kidleſton and Perton. If a man ſhould ſay that Darwent riuer giueth name to Darbie towne, he ſhould not well know how euerie one would take it, and peraduenture therby he might happen to offend ſome. In the meane time I beleeue it, let other iudge as pleaſeth them, ſith my coniecture can preiudice none. To proceed therefore. From Darbie it runneth on by Aluaſton, Ambaſton, the Welles, and ſo into Trent, which goeth from hence to Sawleie, and nozth of Thzumpton taketh in the Soze, a faire ſtreame, and not wozthie to be ouerpaſſed.

Dar-

Egleſburne.

Soza, oz Durus.

It riſeth in Leiceſterſhire aboue Wigton, and thence goeth to Sharneford, Sapcote, and beneath Staunton taketh in a rill that commeth by Dounton and Bzoughton Affleie. Thence to Harlebozow, and before it come to Eſton, croſſeth another on the ſame ſide (deſcending by Burton, Glen, Winſlow, Kilbie and Blabie) then to Leiceſter towne, Belgraue, Burſtall, Wanlip; and yer it come at Cuſſington oz Coſton, croſſeth the Eie, which riſeth neere Oecam aboue Bzamſton, going by Knawſtow, Somerbie, Pickwell, Whiteſonden; and beneath (a litle) receiueth a rill on the right hand from Coldnozton. Thence to Stapleford, & ſoone after croſſing a bzoke from aboue Spzorton, Coſon, Garthozpe and Sarbie, it runneth to Wiuerbie, Bzentingbie; and yer it come at Milton, meeteth with two other ſmall rilles, from the right hand whereof one commeth from about Caldwell by Thozpe Arnold, and Waltham in the Would; the other from Skaleford ward, and from Melton goeth by Siſonbie, there meeting with another from nozthealt ouer againſt Kirbie Hellars, after which time the name of Eie is changed into Warke oz Arke, and ſo continueth vntill it come at the Soure. From hence alſo it goeth to Aſterbie, Kadgale, Habie, Druſſington, Ratcliffe; and ſoone after croſſeth ſundzie waters not verie farre in ſunder, whereof one commeth from Dueſton, by Twiford, Athbie, and Gadeſbie; another from Loſcbie, by Baggraue, and Crawſton, and ioining with the firſt at Dueenniholw, it is not long yer they fall into the Warke. The ſecond runneth from Engarſbie, by Barkeleie, and Siſon. But the third and greateſt of the thzee, is a chanell increaſed with thzee waters, whereof one commeth from Nozton by Burton, Kilbie, Foſton and Blabie, the other from Dounton by Bzoughton and Affleie, and meeting with the third from Sapcoth, and ſonie Staunton, they run togither by Parbozow, and ſoone after ioining aboue Elſton, with the firſt of the thzee, they go as one by Elſton to Leiceſter, Belgraue, Wanlip, and aboue Cuſſington do fall into the Warke, and ſoone after into the Soure. The Soure in like ſozt going from thence to mount Sozrell, & taking in another bzoke ſouthweſt from Leiceſter forreſt, by Glenfield, Auſtis, Thurcaſton and Rodelie, ioineth with the Soure, which goeth from thence to mount Sozrell, and Quarendon (where it taketh in a water comming from Charnewod forreſt, and goeth by Bzadegate and Swithland) and then proceedeth to Cotes, Lughborow and Stanford, there alſo taking in one rill out of Notinghamſhire by nozthealt; and ſoone after another from ſouthweſt, comming from Bzaceden to Shepeſheued, Garrington, & Dighlie grange, and likewiſe the third from Wozthington, by Diſwozth, long Whitton, and Wathozne. Finallie, after theſe confluences, it haſteth to Sutton, Kingſton, and Ratcliffe, and ſo into the Trent.

Warke, Arke, oz wzeke.

Leland calleth one of theſe rilles Croco.

Eie.

These things being thus bzought togither, and we now reſuming the diſcourſe of the ſame riuer, it doth after his meeting with the Soure, proceed withall to Barton, where it taketh in the Erwaſh, which riſeth about Kirbie, and thence goeth to Selſton, Wanſbie, Codnoz caſtell, Eſtwood, and croſſing a water from Beuall, runneth to Coſhall, Trowell (and there taking in another rill comming from Heноz by Shipleie) it proceedeth on to Stapleford, long Eaton, and ſo into the Trent. This being done it goeth to Cliſton, and yer it come at Willford, it meeteth with a bzoke that palſeth from Staunton by Bonnie and Rodington, and thence to Notingham, where it croſſeth the Line, which riſeth aboue Newſted; and paſſing by Paplewiſe, Hucknall, Baſford, Radford and Linton, next of all to Thozpe & Farmdon, where it bzancheth and maketh an Iland, and into the ſmaller of them goeth a bzoke from Beuer caſtell, which riſing betweene eaſt Well and Eaton in Leiceſter is called the Dene, and from thence runneth by Bzamſton to Knipton, & beneath Knipton meeteth with a bzoke that commeth by weſt of Croſton, and thence holdeth on with his courſe, betweene Willeſthozpe and Beuer caſtell afozeſaid, and ſo to Botteſwozth, Nozmanton, Killington, Shilton, there receiuing the Snite from by ſouth (whoſe head is neere Clauſton, & courſe from thence by Hickling, Langer, Whalton, Dzſton, and Flarebozow) and yer long another comming from Bingham, and Sibthozpe. Thence our Trent runneth to Coram, Hawton, Newarke caſtell, and ſo to Winthozpe, where the bzanches are reunited, and thence go on by Holme to Cromwell (and ſoone after taking in a bzoke comming from Bilſthozpe, by Kerſall, Cawnton, Nozwell and Willowbie) to Carlton, and to Sutton, there making a litle Ile, then to Grinton, where it toucheth a ſtreame on ech ſide, whereof one commeth from Nozehouſe by Weſton & Greſthozpe, another from Langthozpe, by Collingham, and Boſthozpe. From hence likewiſe it palſeth to Cliſton, Newton, Kettlethozpe, Tozkeſeie, Knath, Gainſborow, Waltrith, Stockwith; and leauing Arholme on the left hand, it taketh withall Hogdike water out of the Ile, and ſo goeth forth to Wildſwozth, Eaſtferrie, Fruſwozth, Barringham, Gunmeis, Hirburgh, Barton, Walcote, and at Ankerburie into the Humber, receiuing the ſwift Doue by the waie, which for his nobleneſſe is not to be ouerpaſſed, eſpeciallie for that Anno 1536 Hen. 8, 28, it was (by Gods prouidence) a ſtaie of great bloudſhed like to haue fallen out betweene the kings ſide and the rebelles of the nozth, in a quarrell about religion. For the night before the battell ſhould haue beene ſtricken, and without anie apparent cauſe (a little thowze of raine excepted farre vnpoſſible vpon ſuch a ſudden to haue made ſo great a water) the ſaid riuer aroſe ſo high, & ran with ſuch vehemencie, that on the mozow the armies could not ſoine to trie & fight it out: after which a pacification inſued, and thoſe countries were left in quiet. Secondlie, the deſcription hereof is not to be ouerpaſſed, bicauſe of the fine graſſe which groweth vpon the banks thereof, which is ſo fine and bataile, that there goeth a prouerbe vpon the ſame; ſo oft as a man will commend his paſture, to ſay that there is no better feed on Doue banke: that maketh it alſo the more famous.

The Doue therefore riſeth in Yozkeſhire among the Peke hilles, and hauing receiued a water comming by Ingbirchwozth (where the colour thereof is verie verie blacke) it goeth to Pennyſtone, which is foure miles from the head: then by Driſpring to Thurgoland, and ſome after (ioining by the waie with the Midhop water, that runneth by Midhop chappell, and Hondſhelfe) it meeteth with another comming from Bowlſterſton chappell. Then goeth it by Waddeſleie wood to Waddeſleie bridge, and at Aluerton receiueth the Bradfeld water. Then palleth it to Crokes, and ſo to Sheffeld caſtell (by eaſt whereof it receiueth a broke from by ſouth that commeth through Sheffeld parke.) Thence it proceedeth to Weſtford bridge, Bridlie bridge; and ſouthweſt of Dimſleie receiueth the Cowleie ſtreame that runneth by Eccleſfield. Next of all it goeth to Rotheram, where it meeteth with the Rother, a goodlie water, whoſe head is in Darbieſhire about Pilleie, from whence it goeth vnder the name of Doleie, till it come at Rotheram, by north Winſfield church, Wingerworth, and Fozeland hall, twelue miles from Rotheram, to Cheſterford, where it meeteth with the Iber, and Brampton water that commeth by Holme hall, both in one channell. Thence it runneth to Topton caſtell, and yer long croſſing one water comming from Dronefeld by Whittington on the one ſide, and the ſecond from aboue Brimington on the other, it goeth through Stalie parke, and ſome after meeteth with the Crawleie becke, whereof I find this note.

The Crawleie riſeth not farre from Yardwiſe, and going by Staneſbie and Woodhouſe, it receiueth aboue Netherhorpe, one water on the one ſide comming from the Old parke, and another from Barlborow hill on the other, that runneth not farre from Woodthorpe. After this confluence likewiſe they run as one into the Rother, which haſteth from thence to Eckington (there croſſing a rill that runneth by Birleie hill) and ſo to Kilmarſh, in the confines of Darbieſhire, where it taketh in the Gunno from by eaſt. Thence to Boughton, vniting it ſelfe therabout with another by weſt from Gledles, called Meſebroke, which diuideth Yorkeſhire from Darbieſhire, and ſo runneth to Treton, Whiſton, there taking in a rill from Aſton, and ſo to Rotheram, where it meeteth with the Doue, and from whence our Doue (yeelding plentie of ſamon all the waie as it palleth) haſteth to Aldwarke, Swaiton, Merburge, there taking in the Darne, which I will next deſcribe, and ſtaie with the Doue, vntill I haue finiſhed the ſame. It riſeth at Combworth, and ſo commeth about by Bretton hall, to Darton ward, where it croſſeth a water that runneth from Gonthwake hall, by Cawthorne vnited of two heads. From hence it goeth to Burton grange, then to Dyar, where it toucheth with a water from ſouthweſt, & then goeth to Merfield and Goldthorpe: but yer it come to Sprotborow, it vniteth it ſelfe with a faire riuer, increaſed by diuerſe waters, before it come at the Doue, & whereinto it falleth (as I heare) northeaſt of Merburgh. After this confluence likewiſe the Doue goeth by Sprotborow, to Warneſworth, Doncaſter, Wheatleie (there meeting with the Hampall creeke on the northeaſt ſide, which riſeth eaſt of Kirbie) thence to Sandall, Kirke Sandall, Branwith ferrie, Stanford, Fiſhlake, and ſo to Thorne or Thurne, where it croſſeth the Idle (whoſe deſcription followeth) and finallie into Trent, and ſo into the Humber.

But before I deale with the deſcription of the Idle, I will adde ſomewhat of the Rume, a faire water. For though the deſcription thereof be not ſo exactlie deliuered me as I loked for; yet ſuch as it is I will ſet downe, conferring it with Lelands booke, and helping their defect ſo much as to me is poſſible. It riſeth by ſouth of Waunſfield, fiue miles from Rumford abbeie, and when the ſtreame commeth neere the abbeie, it caſteth it ſelfe abroad and maketh a faire lake. After this it commeth againe into a narrow chanell, and ſo goeth on to Rumford village, carrieng the Buddie and the Gerberton waters withall. From thence, and with a meetlie long courſe, it goeth to Bawtrie or Vautrie, a market towne in Nottinghamſhire, fiue miles from Doncaſter, and ſo into the Trent. Beneath Rumford alſo commeth in the Girt, which goeth vnto Southwell milles, and ſo into the Trent. Now as concerning our Idle.

The Idle, which ſome call Water ſtreame, riſeth at Sutton in Aſhfield, from whence it runneth to Waunſfield, Clipſton & Allerton, where it taketh in a water that riſeth in the forreſt, one mile north of Bledworth, and runneth on by Rughford abbeie, till it come to Allerton. The forreſters call this Wanbecke, whereof Leland alſo ſpeaketh, who deſcribeth it in this maner. Wanbroke riſeth ſomewhere about Linthirſt wood, from whence it goeth to Bliſthorpe, and ſo to Allerton. But to proceed. The Idle hauing taken in the Wanbecke, it runneth to Bothomſall, by Boughton, & Perlethorpe: but yer it come there, it meeteth the Weding Waiden, or Widding broke, which riſing about Teuerſall, goeth to Pleaſleie, Nettleworth, Salwcan, Warſop, Budleie, Thurſbie, Bothomſall, and ſo into the Idle. After this it proceedeth to Houghton, weſt Draiton, but yer it touch at Graunſton or Gaunſton, it taketh in the Wilie, which commeth from Clowne, to Creſwell, Holbecke, Woodhouſe, Wilebecke, Normenton, Elſleie, Graunſton, and ſo into the Idle. Being thus increaſed, the Idle runneth on to Idleton, Ordſall, Retford, Bollam, Tilneie, Matterſeie abbeie, and ſo to Bawtrie, where it meeteth another from the ſhire Okes, that riſeth aboue Geitford, palleth on to Workſop (or Radfurth) Oſberton, Bilbie, and Blith, there vniting it ſelfe with three rilles in one bottome, whereof one commeth from Walding well to Careleton, and ſo thorough a parke to Blith towne, another from by weſt Furbecke three miles, and ſo to Blith: but the third out of the White water neere to Blith, and there being vnited they paſſe on to Scrobie, and ſo into the Idle.

From hence it runneth on to Miſſen, to Sadlers bridge, and next of all to Santoft, where it meeteth with the Sandbecke, which riſing not farre from Sandbecke towne, palleth by Tickhill, Roſington bridge, Brampton, Kilholme, Lindholme, and one mile ſouth of Santoft into the Idle water, which runneth from thence to Thorne, where it meeteth with the Doue, and ſo with it to Crowleie. Finallie, inuironing the Ile of Areholme, it goeth vnto Garthorpe, Focorbie, & ſo into the Trent. Leland writing of the Wilie, Wile, or Gwilie (as ſome write it) ſaith thus therof. The Wile hath two heads, whereof one is not farre aboue the place where Wilbecke abbeie ſtood; the other riſeth further off by weſt aboue Welbecke or Wilebecke towne: finallie ioining in one, they runne to Cuckencie village, where croſſing a becke that commeth in from by weſt, it holdeth on two miles further, there taking in the ſecond rill, and ſo reſort to Ruſford. To this riuer likewiſe (ſaith he) dow two other waters repaire, whereof the one goeth hard by Waunſfield (riſing foure miles from thence by weſt) and then commeth three miles lower to Ruſford; the other (ſo far as I remember) goeth quite through the towne.

Sandbecke.

Of ſuch falles of waters as ioine with the ſea, betweene Humber and the Thames.

Chap. 16.

HAuing in this maner deſcribed the Duze, and ſuch riuers as fall into the ſame: now it reſteth that I proceed in my voiage toward the Thames, according to my former order. Being therefore come againe into the maine ſea, I find no water of ante countenance or courſe (to my remembrance) till I come vnto the Ancolme a goodlie water, which riſeth eaſt of Mercate Raſing, and from thence goeth by middle Raſing. Then receiuing a ſhort rill from by ſouth, it runneth on vnder two bridges, by the waie, till it come to Wingall, north eaſt; where alſo it meeteth with another broke, from Uſſelbie that commeth thither by Areſbie, goeth by Cadneie (taking in the two rilles in one bottome, that deſcend from Howlham, and north Leiſeie) and thence to Newſted, Glanford, Wardeleie, Thorneham, Applebie, Horſlow, north Ferribie, and ſo into the ſea.

Ancolme.

Being paſt Ancolme, we go about the Neſſe, and ſo to the fall of the water which commeth from Keleſbie, by Cotham abbeie, Nerſham abbeie, Thorneton, and leauing Corhill by weſt, it falleth into the Ocean. The next is the fall of another broke comming from Fleting, all alongſt by Stallingburne. Then croſſed we Grimſbie gullet, which iſſuing aboue Crebie commeth to Laſcbie, the two Cotes, and then into the ſea. After this we paſſed by another portlet, whoſe backwater deſcendeth from Baleſbie by Aſhbie, Brigglefleie, Wath, and Tolnneie, and finallie to the next iſſue, before we come at Saltfleete, which branching at the laſt, leaueth a prettie Iland wherein Comſholme village ſtandeth. This water riſeth short (as I heare) of Cathe well, from whence it goeth to Rathbie, Hallington, Eſſington, Lowth, Ridirington, Auingham, and then branching aboue north Somerton, one arme meeteth with the ſea, by Grauethorpe, the other by north of Somercote.

Kilis.

Saltfleete water hath but a ſhort courſe: for riſing among the Cockeringtons, it commeth to the ſea, at Saltfleete hauen: howbeit the next vnto it is of a longer race, for it riſeth (as I take it) at Cawthorpe paroch, and deſcendeth by Legburne, the Carletons, the weſt middle and eaſt Saltfletes, and ſo into the Ocean. The water that riſeth aboue Ormeſbie and Orbie, goeth to Cawſbie, Swabie abbeie, Clathorpe, Belew, Cattle, Witherne, Stane, and northeaſt of Thetilthorpe into the maine ſea.

Saltfleete.

Maplethorpe water riſeth at Thareſthorpe, and going by Markeleie, Folethorpe, and Truthorpe, it is not long yer it meet with the Germane Ocean. Then come we to the iſſue that commeth from aboue Hotoft, and thence to Mumbie chapell, whither the water comming from Clarbie, Willowbie, and Slouthbie (and whereinto another rill falleth) doth runne, as there to do homage vnto their lord and ſouereigne. As for Ingold mill creeke, I paſſe it ouer, and come ſtreight to another water, deſcending from Burge by Skegnes. From hence I go to the iſſue of a faire broke, which (as I heare) doth riſe at Tetford, and thence goeth by Somerbie, Bagenderbie, Aſhwardbie, Sawlthorpe, Partneie, Aſhbie, the Stepings, Thorpe croſt, and ſo into the ſea. As for Wainfleete water, it commeth from the eaſt ſea, and goeth betweene S. Maries & Alhallowes by Wainfleete towne, and treading the path of his predeceſſors, emptieth his chanell to the maintenance of the ſea.

Maplethorpe.

Now come I to the courſe of the Witham, a famous riuer, whereof goeth the biword, frequented of old, and alſo of Ancolme, which I before deſcribed:

Ancolme eke, and Witham pike,
Search all England and find not the like.

Leland calleth it Lindis, diuerſe the Rhe, and I haue read all theſe names my ſelfe: and thereto that the Lincolneſhire men were called in old time Coritani, and their head citie Lindus, Lindon, or Linodunum, in which region alſo Ptolomie placeth Rage, which ſome take to be Notingham, except my memorie do faile me. It riſeth among the Wickhams, in the edge of Lincolnſhire, and (as I take it) in ſouth Wickham paroch, from whence it goeth to Colſterworth, Caſton, Kirkeſtoke Paunton, and Paunton Houghton, and at Grantham taketh in a rill from by ſouthweſt, as I heare. From Grantham it runneth to Pan, Thorpe, Bolton, and Barneſton, where croſſing a becke from northeaſt, it procedeth further ſouthweſt ward by Pereſton, toward Faſton (there alſo taking in a broke that riſeth about Denton, and goeth by Sidbroke) it haſteth to Dodington, Clapale, Barmebie, Beckingham, Staplefoꝛd, Ballingham, Thurlbie, and beneath Amburgh croſſeth a water that commeth from Stogilthorpe by Somerton caſtell.

Wane.

After this confluence alſo, our Witham goeth ſtill forth on his waie to the Hickhams, Bolcham, Bracebridge, and Lincolne it ſelfe, for which the Normans write Nicholl by tranſpoſition of the letters, or (as I may better ſaie) corruption of the word. But yer it come there, it maketh certeine poles (whereof one is called Swan pole) and ſone after diuiding it ſelfe into armes, they run both thorough the lower part of Lincolne, each of them hauing a bridge of ſtone ouer it, thereby to paſſe through the principall ſtreet: and as the bigger arme is well able to beare their ſither botes, ſo the leſſer is not without his ſeuerall commodities. At Lincolne alſo this noble riuer meeteth with the Foſſe dike, whereby in great floods veſſels may come from the Trents ſide to Lincolne. For betweene Torkſeie, where it beginneth, and Lincolne citie, where it endeth, are not aboue ſeuen miles, as Leland hath remembred. Biſhop Atwater began to cleanſe this ditch, thinking to bring great veſſels from Trent to Lincolne in his time: but ſith he died before it was perfourmed, there hath no man beene ſince ſo well minded as to proſecute his purpoſe. The courſe moreouer of this our ſtreame following, from Lincolne to Boſton is fiftie miles by water: but if you mind to ferrie, you ſhall haue but 24. For there are foure common places where men are ferried ouer; as Short ferrie, fiue miles from Lincolne, Taterſall ferrie, eight miles from Short ferrie, Dogdike ferrie a mile, Langreth ferrie fiue miles, and ſo manie finallie to Boſton.

Wollingborow. Hemſpringhe.

Foſſe dike.

But to go forward with the courſe of Lindis (whereof the whole prouince hath beene called Lindeſeie) when it is paſt Lincolne, it goeth by Shepewaſh, Wallingburg, Fiſkerton, and ſone after taketh in ſundrie riuers in one chanell, whereby his greatneſſe is verie much increaſed. From this confluence it goeth to Bardolfe, and there receiuing a rill (deſcending from betweene Sotbie and Randbie, and going by Harton) it ſlideth forth by Tupham to Taterſall caſtell, taking vp there in like ſort three ſmall rills by the waie, whereof I haue ſmall notice as yet: and therefore I referre them vnto a further conſideration to be had of them hereafter, if it ſhall pleaſe God that I may liue to haue the filing of theſe rude pamphlets yet once againe, & ſomewhat more leaſure to peruſe them than at this time is granted. Finallie, being paſt Taterſall, and Dogdike ferrie, ferrie, the Witham goeth toward Boſton, & thence into the ſea. Thus haue I briefly diſpatched this noble riuer Witham. But hauing another note deliuered me thereof from a frend, I will yeld ſo farre vnto his gratification, that I will remember his trauell here, and ſet downe alſo what he hath written thereof, although the riuer be ſufficientlie deſcribed alredie.

Witham. Into Witham therefore from by north, and ſeuen miles beneath Lincolne, there falleth a faire water, the head whereof is at Hakethorne, from whence it Hake. goeth by Hanworth, Snarford, Reſbie, Stainton, and at Bullington meeteth with a water on ech ſide, whereof one commeth from Haiton and Turrington, the other from Sudbrooke, and likewiſe beneath Birlings with the third comming from Barkeworth by Stanſted, and ioining all in one, ſone after it is not long yer it fall into the chanell of Witham, and ſo are neuer more heard of. There is alſo a brooke by ſouthwell, that commeth from Kirbie to Cateleie, Billingams, and the Ferrie. At Caterſall it meeteth with the Bane, which riſeth aboue Burgh, and neere vnto Ludford goeth downe to Dunnington, Stanigod, Hemmingſbie, Bamburgh, Fillington, Horne caſtell (where it croſſeth a rill from Belchworth) Thornton, Marton, Halton, Kirkebie, Comſbie, Caterſall, and ſo to Dogdike ferrie. Bane.

Aboue Boſton likewiſe it taketh in a water comming from Luſebie by Bolingbrooke, Stickeford, Stickneie, Sibbeſeie and Hildrike. And to Boſton towne it ſelfe dooth finallie come ſundrie brookes in one chanell, called Hammond becke, which riſing at Doneſbie, runneth on to Wrightbold, where it caſteth one arme into Holiwell water. Hence it hasteth toward Dunnington, receiuing foure brookes by the waie, whereof the firſt commeth from Pilthorpe, the ſecond from Fokingham, called Bollingborow, or (after ſome, I wote not vpon what occaſion) Sempringham water, the third from Bridge end, the fourth from Sempringham, and afterwards the maine ſtreame is found to run by Kirton holme, and ſo into the Witham. Into the Wiland likewiſe falleth the Holiwell, which riſeth of a ſpring that runneth toward the eaſt from Haliwell to Onebie, Eſonden, Gretford, and ſo to Catbridge, where it receiueth another riſing at Witham and weſt of Manthorpe, and the ſecond comming from Laund, and ſo run from thence togither to Willeſthorpe and Catbridge, and then into the Haliwell, which after theſe confluences goeth to Tetford and Caſtcote, where it meeteth with a draine, comming from Bourne, and ſo through the fennes to Pinchbecke, Surflet, and Foſdike, where it meeteth with the Welland, in the mouth of the Waſh, as I haue noted vnto you. Bollingborow. Sempringham.

Hauing thus ſet forth the riuers that fall into the Witham, now come we to the Wiland or Welland, whereunto we repaire after we be paſt Boſton, as drawing by litle and litle toward the Girwies, which inhabit in the fennes (for Gir in the old Saxon ſpeach doth ſignifie deepe fennes and marſhes) and theſe beginning at Peterborow eaſtward, extend themſelues by the ſpace of three ſcore miles & more, as Hugh of Peterborow writeth. This ſtreame riſeth about Sibbertoft, and running betweene Boſworth and Howthorpe, it goeth to Feedingworth, Merſon, Bubberham, Truſſell, Herborow (receiuing there the Braie, which commeth from Braiebrooke caſtell) to Bowton, Weſton, Wiland, Aſhleie, Wedburne, Rokingham, and Cawcot, where a riuret called little Eie meeteth withall, comming from eaſt Norton by Alerſtone, Stocke, Faſton, and Drie ſtocke. From Cawcot it goeth to Gritto, Harringworth, Seton, Wauerlie, Duddington, Collie Weſton, Eſton, and there ioineth with the third called Warke, not far from Ketton, which commeth from Lie by Preſton, Wing, Lindon, Lukkenham, &c. Thence it goeth on by Tinwell, to Stanford (croſſing the Brooke water, and Whitnelbecke, both in one bottome) and from Stanford by Talington, Hareie, to Mercate, Deeping, Crowland (where it almoſt meeteth with the Auon) then to Spalding, Whapland, and ſo into the ſea. Warke. Brooke water. Whitnell. Wiland.

Leland writing of this Wiland, addeth theſe words which I will not omit, ſith in mine opinion they are worthie to be noted, for better conſideration to be had in the ſaid water and his courſe. The Wiland (ſaith he) going by Crowland, at Newdrene diuideth it ſelfe into two branches, of which one goeth vp to Spalding called Newdrene, and ſo into the ſea at Foſſedike Stow: the other named the South into Wiſbech. This latter alſo parteth it ſelfe two miles from Crowland, & ſendeth a rill called Writhlake by Thorneie, where it meeteth with an arme of the Nene, that commeth from Peterborow, and holdeth courſe with the broad ſtreame, till it be come to Murho, ſix miles from Wiſbech, where it falleth into the South. Newdrene. South. Writhlake.

Out of the South in like ſort falleth another arme called Sheepes eie, and at Hopelode (which is foure- teene miles from Lin) did fall into the ſea. But now the courſe of that ſtreame is ceaſed, whereupon the inhabitants ſuſteine manie grieuous flouds, becauſe the mouth is ſtanched, by which it had acceſſe before into the ſea. Hitherto Leland. Of the courſe of this riuer alſo from Stanford, I note this furthermore out of another writing in my time. Being paſt Stanton (ſaith he) it goeth by Burghleie, Uffington, Tallington, Hareie, Deeping, caſt Deeping, and comming to Waldram hall, it brancheth into two armes, whereof that which goeth to Singleſole, receiueth the Nene out of Cambridgeſhire, and then going by Dowesdale, Trekenhole, and winding at laſt to Wiſbech, it goeth by Liuerington, ſaint Maries, and ſo into the ſea. The other arme hasteth to Crowland, Clowthouſe, Brether houſe, Pikale, Cowbecke and Spalding. Here alſo it receiueth the Waſton dreane, Longtoft dreane, Deeping dreane, and thence goeth by Wickham into the ſea, taking withall on the right hand ſundrie other dreanes. And thus farre he. Sheepes eie.

Next of all, when we are paſt theſe, we come to another fall of water into the Waſh, which deſcendeth directlie from Whaplade dreane to Whaplade towne in Holland: but becauſe it is a water of ſmall importance, I paſſe from thence, as hasting to the Nene, of both the more noble riuer: and about the middeſt thereof in place is a certeine ſwallow, ſo deepe and ſo cold in the middeſt of ſummer, that no man dare diue to the bottome thereof for coldneſſe, and yet for all that in winter neuer found to haue beene touched with froſt, much leſſe to be couered with iſe. The next therefore to be deſcribed is the Auon, otherwiſe called Nene, which the ſaid author deſcribeth after this maner. The Nene beginneth foure miles aboue Northampton in Nene meere, where it riſeth out of two heads, which ioine about Northampton. Of this riuer the citie and countrie beareth the name, although we now pronounce Hampton for Auondune, which errour is committed alſo in ſouth Auondune, as we may eaſilie ſee. In another place Leland deſcribeth the ſaid riuer after this maner. The Auon riſeth in Nene meere field, and going by Dundale and Peterborow, it diuideth it ſelfe into three armes, whereof one goeth to Horneie, another to Wiſbech, the third to Ramſeie: and afterward being vnited againe, they fall into the ſea not verie farre from Lin. Finallie, the deſcent of theſe waters leaue here a great ſort of Ilands, wher- Auon. Nene.

of Elie, Crowland, and Merland, are the chiefe. Hitherto Leland.

Howbeit, because neither of these descriptions touch the course of this riuer at the full, I will set downe the third, which shall supplie whatsoeuer the other dow want. The Auon therefore arising in Menemere field, is increased with manie rilles, before it come at Northhampton, & one aboue Kings thorpe, from whence it goeth to Dallington, and so to Northhampton, where it receiueth the Wedon. And here I will staie, till I haue described this riuer. The Wedon therefore riseth at Faulesse in master Knightlies poles, and in Badbie plaches also are certeine springs that resort vnto this streame. Faulesse poles are a mile from Chareton, where the head of Chare riuer is, that runneth to Banberie. There is but an hill called Alberie hill betweene the heads of these two riuers.

Vedunus.

From the said hill therefore the Wedon directeth his course to Badbie, Newenham, Euerton, Wedon, betwixt which and Flozetowne, it receiueth the Florus (a pretie water rising of foure heads, whereof the one is at Dauentrie, another at Watford, the third at long Bucke, the fourth aboue Whilton) and then passeth on to Yelford, Killingberie, Upton, and so to Northhampton, where it falleth into the Auon, receiuing finallie by the waie the Bugbrooke water at Yelford, Pathall water neere Killingberie, and finallie Preston water beneath Upton, which running from Preston by Wotton, meeteth at the last with Pilton rill, and so fall into Auon. Now to resume the tractation of our Auon. From Northhampton therefore it runneth by Houghton, great Billing, Whitstone, Dodington, and Willingborow, where we must staie a while: for betweene Willingborow and Higham Ferries, it receiueth a pretie water comming from about Kilmarsh, which going by Ardingworth, Daisborow, Kulheton, Newton, Gaddington, Boughton, Warketon, Kettering, Berton, and Burton, meeteth there with Rothwell water, which runneth west of Kettering to Hisham, the greater Yardon, and then into the Auon.

Rother.

Being therfore past Burton, our maine streame goeth to Higham Ferries, Artleborow, Ringsted, Wodford, and (meeting thereby with Cranford rill) to Thrarston, north whereof it ioineth also with the Odeie water, that commeth from Sudborow and Lowicke, to old Umkles, Waden ho, Pilketon, Doke (where it taketh in the Liueden becke) and so to Dundell, Cotterstocke, Tansoner, and betweene Tothering and Warmington receiueth the Corbie water, which rising at Corbie, goeth by Weldon, Denethap, Bulwich, Bletherwic, Finished, Arthorpe, Newton, Tothering, and so into the Auon. After this, the said Auon goeth to Elton, Passington, Yerwell, Sutton, Castor, Allerton, and so to Peterborow, where it diuideth it selfe into sundrie armes, and those into seuerall branches and drains, among the fennes and medowes, not possible almost to be numbred, before it met with the sea on the one side of the countrie, and fall into the Duze on the other.

Odeie.

Corbie.

The Duze, which Leland calleth the third Ilis, falleth into the sea betweene Merland & Dolwneham. The chiefe head of this riuer ariseth neere to Stanes, from whence it commeth to Brackleie (sometime a noble towne in Northampton shire, but now scarselie a good village) and there taking in on the left hand one water comming from the parke betweene Hisam and Astwell (which runneth by Whitfield and Tinwesson) and another on the right from Imleie, it goeth on by Westbirie, Fulwell, water Stretford, Buckingham, and Berton, beneath which towne the Erin falleth into it, whereof I find this short description to be inserted here. The Erin riseth not farre from Yardwyc in Northamptonshire, from hence it goeth by Yeth, Erinford, Godderington, Twiford, Steeple Cladon, & yer it come at Padbirie, meeteth with the Garan brooke descending from Garanburge, and so they go togither by Padbirie, till they fall into the Duze, which carieth them after the confluence to Thorneton bridge (where they crosse another fall of water comming from Whittlewod forrest by Lilleid, Lecamsted and Foscot) and so to Beachampton, Culuerton, Stonie Stratford, and Woluerton.

Here the Duze meeteth with a water (called, as Leland coniectureth, the Were or Were) on the left hand, as you go downewards, that commeth betweene Wedon and Weresnham in Northamptonshire, and goeth by Towcester, and Alderton, and not farre from Woluerton and Yauersham into the foresaid Duze, which goeth also from hence to Newportpaganell, where in like sort I must staie a while till I haue described another water, named the Clee, by whose issue the said streame is not a little increased. This riuer riseth in the verie confines betweene Buckingham and Bedfordshires, not farre from Whipesnade, and going on toward the northwest, by Eaton and Laiton, it commeth to Linchlade, where it entreth wholie into Buckinghamshire, and so goeth on by Hammond, Brickle, Fennie Stratford, Simpson, Walton and Middleton, beneath which it receiueth the Saw from aboue Halcot, and so goeth on till it met with the Duze neere vnto Newport, as I haue said. Being vnited therefore, we set forward from the said towne, and follow this noble riuer, to Lathbirie, Thuringham, Filgrane, Lawndon, Newington, Bradfield on the one side, and Turueie on the other, till it come at length to Bedford after manie windlesses, and then meeteth with another streame, which is increased with so manie waters, that I was inforced to make an imagined staie here also, and view their seuerall courses, supposing my selfe to loke downe from the highest steeple in Bedford, whence (as best meane to view anie countrie whersoeuer) I note the same as followeth.

Saw.

Certes on the east side, where I began this speculation, I saw one that came from Potton, and met withall neere Beclifwade: another that grew of two waters, therof one descended from Baldocke, the other from Hitchin, which ioined beneth Arleseie, and thence went to Langford and Edworth. The third which I beheld had in like sort two heads, whereof one is not farre from Wod end, the other from Woburne (or Howburne) and ioining about Flitwic, they go to Flitton (where they receiue Antill broke) and so by Chiphill, and Chicksand, they come to Shafford, from whence taking the aforsaid Langford water with them, they go forth by Beclifwade, Sandie, Blumham, and neere vnto Themisford are vnited with the Duze. And now to our purpose againe.

These rise not far from Michelborow & one of them in Higham parke.

After this the Duze goeth by Berkeford, to Winteringham (meeting there with the Wareslie becke) and so runneth to S. Neotes (or saint Neotes, in old time Goluesburg, as Capgraue saith In vita Neoti) to Parkton, Offordes, and so to Godmanchester, in old time called Gumicester, which (as it should seeme) hath beene a towne of farre greater countenance than at this present it is; for out of the ruines thereof much Romane coine is found, and sometimes with the image of C. Antius which hath long haire, as the Romans had before they receiued barbars into their citie, and thereunto the bones of diuerse men of farre greater stature than is credible to be spoken of in these daies. But what stand I vpon these things? From hence therfore our water goeth on to Scoucus. Huntingdon, Wilton, ſaint Iues, Holtwell, and Erith, receiueth in the meane time the Stow (neere vnto little Parton) and likewiſe the Ellen, and the Helenus. Emmer, in one chanell a little by weſt of Huntingdon. Elmerus.

Finallie, the maine ſtreame ſpreading abroad into the Fennes, I cannot tell into how manie branches, neither how manie Ilets are inforced by the ſame; although of Iles, Parkland, Ancarig or Ancarte be the chiefe, and of which this later is called Crowland (as Crowland alſo hight thornie Acruda terra, or ſtore of buſhes ſaith Hugo le Blanc) ſometime growing in the ſame, and Ancarte becauſe ſundrie Ancres haue liued & borne great ſwaie therein. But howſoeuer this caſe ſtandeth, this is certeine, that after it hath thus delited it ſelfe with ranging a while about the pleaſant bottoms & lower grounds, it meeteth with the Granta, from whence it goeth with a ſwift courſe vnto Downeham. Betweene it alſo and the Anon, are ſundrie large meeres or plaſhes, by ſouthweſt of Peterborow full of powts and carpes, whereof Whittleſeie meere, and Ramſeie meere (whereinto the Riuall falleth, that commeth from aboue Broughton, Wilton, and great Riuelleie) are ſaid to be greateſt. Of all the riuers that run into this ſtreame, that called Granta (whereof the whole countie in old time was called Grantabrycſhire, as appeereth by the regiſter of Henrie prior of Canturburie) is the moſt noble and excellent, which I will deſcribe euen in this place, notwithſtanding that I had earſt appointed it vnto my ſecond booke. But for ſomuch as a deſcription of Duze and Granta were deliuered me togither, I will for his ſake that gaue them me, not ſeparate them now in ſunder. Riuelus. Granta.

The verie furtheſt head and originall of this riuer is in Henham, a large parke belonging to the earle of Suſſex, wherein (as the townesmen ſaie) are foure ſprings that run foure ſundrie waies into the maine ſea. Leland ſought not the courſe of this water aboue Newport pond, and therefore in his commentaries vpon the ſong of the ſwan, he writeth thereof after this maner inſuing. Although doctor Iohn Caius the learned phyſician, and ſome other are of the opinion, that this riuer comming from Newport, is properlie to be called the Rhée: but I may not ſo eaſilie diſſent from Leland, whoſe iudgement in my mind is by a great deale the more likelie. Harken therefore what he ſaith.

The head of Grantha or Granta, is in the pond at Newport, a towne of the eaſt Saxons, which going in a bottome beſide the ſame, receiueth a pretie rill, which in the middeſt thereof doth driue a mill, and deſcendeth from Wickin Bonhant, that ſtandeth not farre from thence. Being paſt Newport, it goeth alongſt in the lower ground, vntill it come to Broke Walden, weſt of Chipping Walden (now Saffron Walden) hard by the lord Awdleis place, where the right honorable Thomas Howard with his houſhold do ſoiourne, and ſometime ſtood an abbeie of Benedictine monks, before their generall ſuppreſſion. From Awdleie end it goeth to Littleburie, the leſſe and greater Cheſterfords, Pealdune, Hinckſtone, Seoſton or Sawſon, and neere vnto Shalefford receiueth the Babzen that commeth by Linton, Abbington, Babzenham, and Stapleford: and ſo going forward it commeth at the laſt to Trompington, which is a mile from Cambridge. But yer it come altogither to Trompington, it meeteth with the Barrington water, as Leland calleth it, but ſome other the Rhée (a common name to all waters in the Saxon ſpeech) whereof I find this deſcription, to be touched by the waie. The Rhée riſeth short of Aſhwell in Hertfordſhire, and paſſing vnder the bridge betweene Gilden Morden and Dowmton, and leauing Tadlow on the weſt ſide (as I remember) it goeth toward Crawden, Malton, Barrington, Haſelingfield, and ſo into Granta, taking ſundrie rills with him from ſouth and ſouthweſt, as Wendie water ſouthweſt of Crawden, Whaddon broke ſouthweſt of Mowell, Mildred becke ſouthweſt of Malton, and finallie the Orme which commeth out of Armington or Ormendum well, and goeth by Fulmere and Foxton, and falleth into the ſame betweene Barrington and Harleſton, or Harſton; as they call it. Babzen. Rhée.

Now to proceed with our Granta. From Trompington on the one ſide, and Grantcheſter on the other, it hafteth to Cambridge ward, taking the Burne with it by the waie, which deſcendeth from a caſtell of the ſame denomination, wherein the Picotes and Peuerels ſometime did inhabit. Thence it goeth by ſundrie colleges in Cambridge, as the quænes college, the kings college, Clare hall, Trinitie college, S. Johns, &c: vnto the high bridge of Cambridge, and betweene the towne and the caſtell to Cheſterton, and receiuing by and by the Stoure, or Store (at whoſe bridge the moſt famous mart in England is yearelie holden and kept) from Cheſterton it goeth to Ditton, Milton, and yer long meeting with two rilles (from Bottelham and Wilberham, in one bottome) it runneth to Horningſeie, & Water Bech: and finallie here ioining with the Bulbecke water, it goeth by Dennie, and ſo forth into the Duze, fifteene miles from Cambridge, as Leland hath ſet downe. And thus much of the third Iſis or Duze, out of the aforeſaid author: whereunto I haue not onelie added ſomewhat of mine owne experience, but alſo of other mens notes, whoſe diligent obſeruation of the courſe of this riuer hath not a little helped me in the deſcription of the ſame. Now it reſteth that we come nearer to the coaſt of Northfolke, and ſet forth ſuch waters as we paſſe by vpon the ſame, wherein I will deale ſo preciſelie as I may: and ſo farre will I trauell therein, as I hope ſhall content euen the curious reader: or if anie fault be made, it ſhall not be ſo great, but that after ſome trauell in the finding, it ſhall with eaſe be corrected. Sturus. Bulbecke.

The firſt riuer that therefore we come vnto, after we be paſt the confluence of Granta, and the Duze, and within the iuriſdiction of Northfolke, is called the Burne. This ſtreame riſeth not verie farre from Burne Bradfield, aboue the greater Whelthām, and from thence it goeth on to Nawnton, Burie, Farneham Martin, Farneham Alhallowes, Farneham Genoueſa, Hengraue, Flemton, Lackeford, Icklingham, and to Milden hall: a little beneath which, it meeteth with the Dale water, that ſpringeth not farre from Catilege, and going by Atheleie, Moulton (a benefice as the report goeth not verie well prouided for) to Kenford, Kenet, Bradingham, Frekenham, it falleth at the laſt not farre from Iſelham into the Burne, from whence they go togither as one into the Duze. With the Burne alſo there ioineth a water comming from about Lidgate, a little beneath Iſelham, and not verie far from Mildenhall. Burne. Dale.

The Dune head, and riſing of Wauenheie, are not much in ſunder: for as it is ſuppoſed, they are both not farre diſtant from the bridge betweene Lopham and Ford, wherby the one runneth eaſt and the other weſt, as I haue beene informed. The Dune goeth firſt of all by Feltham, then to Hopton, & to Kinets hall, where it meeteth with a water cõming out of a lake short of Banham (going by Muddenham, Herling, Gaſthorpe) and ſo on, both in one chanell, they run to Ewſton. Here they meet in like Dunus.

ſort, with another deſcending from two heads, wher-of the one is nére vnto Pakenham, the other to Tauelocke, as I heare. Certes theſe heads ioine aboue Ieſworth, not farre from Stow Langtoft, from whence they go to Prworth, Thorpe, Berdwell, Hunnington, Fakenham, and ſo into the Dune at Ewſton; as I ſaid. From hence alſo they haſten to Dolweneham, which of this riuer doth ſéeme to borow his name. South Ré rill I paſſe ouer as not worthie the deſcription, becauſe it is ſo ſmall.

Bradunus fons. Next vnto this riuer on the ſouth ſide is the Braden, or Bradunus, which riſeth at Bradenham, and goeth by Necton, north Peckenham, ſouth Pecken-ham, Birſingham, Bedneie, Langford, Igbor, Hunford, North Old, Stockebridge, Ferdham, Helgie, and ſo into the Duze. The néereſt vnto this is another which riſeth about Lukeham, and from thence commeth to Lerham, Maſſingham, Newton, the caſtell Acre, Acres, Nerboe, Pentneie, Wrongeie, Roughton (which at one time might haue béene my liuing if I would haue giuen ſir Thomas Rugband monie inough, but now it belongeth to Gundeuill and Caius college in Cambridge) Weſtchurch, and ſo to Linne. As ſo doth alſo another by north of this, which commeth from the caſt hilles by Congenham, Grimſton, Bawſeie, Gatwood, whereof let this ſuffice. And now giue care to the reſt ſith I am paſt the Duze. Being paſt the mouth or fall of the Duze, we méet next of all with the Riſing chaſe water, which Ptolomie (as ſome thinke) doth call Metaris, and deſcendeth from two heads, and alſo the Ingell that commeth from about Snetſham. From hence we go by the point of ſaint Edmund, and ſo hold on our courſe till we come vnto the Burne, which falleth into the ſea by ſouth from Waterden, and going be-twéene the Crakes to Burnham Thorpe, and Burnham Norton, it ſtriketh at the laſt into the ſea; eaſt of Burnham Norton a mile at the leaſt, except my con-iecture do faile me. The Glow or Glowie riſeth not far from Baconſthorpe, in the hundred of Tunſted; & going by and by into Holt hundred, it paſſeth by Hunworth, Thornage, Glawnſford, Blackneie, Clare, and ſo into the ſea, receiuing there at hand alſo a rill by eaſt, which deſcendeth from the hilles lying betwéene Billing towne and Waiburne.

Wantſume. The Wantſume riſeth in Northfolke at Gale-end in Holt hundred, from whence it goeth to Wa-terſend, Townton, Skelthorpe, Farneham, Pen-thorpe, Rieburg, Ellingham, and Billingford. And here it receiueth two waters in one bottome, of which the firſt goeth by Stanfield and Beteleie, the other by Wandling and Greſſonhall, and ſo run on ech his owne wate, till they méet at Houndlington, ſouthweſt of Billingford with the Wantſume.
From hence they go all togither to Below, Jeng, Weſton, and Norton; but yet it come to Norton, it méeteth with the Potwke, which (iſſuing about Per-ham) goeth by Mattelhall and Barrow. After this the ſaid Wantſume goeth on by Ringland, and ſo to Norwich the pontificall ſée of the biſhop, to whome that iuriſdiction appertaineth, which ſéemeth by this memoriall yet remaining in the corrupted name of the water, to be called in old time Venta, or (as Leland addeth) Venta Icenorum. But to proceed. Beneath Norwich alſo it receiueth two waters in one chancll, which I will ſeuerallie deſcribe, according to their courſes, noting their confluence to be at Bixleie, within two miles of Norwich, except my annotation deceiue me. The firſt of theſe hath two heads whereof one mounteth by ſouthweſt of Whinborow, goeth by Gernerton, and is the verie Hiere or Pare that drowneth the name of Wantſume, ſo ſone as he méeteth withall. The other head riſeth at Wood in Mitford hundred, and after confluence with the Hi-ere at Caſton, going by Brandon, Birton, Berford, Erleham, Cringlefield (not farre from Birleie as I ſaid) doth méet with his companion, which is the ſecond to be deſcribed as followeth. It hath two heads alſo that méet northweſt of Herſtane; and hereof the one commeth from Findon hall, by Wrenningham from about Wotton, by Hennall, Fretton, Stretton, and Taſborow, till they ioine at Therſton, as I gaue notice afore-hand. From Therſton therefore they go togither in one to Newton, Shotesham, Dunſton, Caſtor, Arminghale, Birleie, Lakenham, and Trowſe, and then fall into the Wantſume beneath Norwich, which hereafter is named Hiere. The Hiere, Pare, or Gare therefore proceeding in his voiage, as it were to ſalute his grandame the Oceaan, goeth from thence by Paſwiſe, Surlingham, Clarton, and Yardleie; and here it méeteth againe with another riueret deſcending from about Shote-ſham to Herſtane, Shedgeaue, Hockingham, and ſo into Gare or Pare, whereof Yardleie the towne receiueth denomination. After this it goeth to Frethorpe, and aboue Burgh caſtell méeteth with the Wauenie, and ſo into the ſea. Wauen.

Into this riuer alſo falleth the Bure, which ri- Bure.
ſing at a towne of the ſame name, paſſeth by Milton, Bureſdune, Corpeſteis, Parington, Blekeling, Bure, Aleſham, Brampton, Burton, Horſted, Werrham bridge, Horning, Ranewoth; and beneath Baſtewiſe receiueth the Thurine which riſeth Thurinus.
aboue Roleſbie; then to Obie, Clipſbie (there alſo receiuing another from Filbie) Kimham, Caſtor, and by Yarmouth into the Ocean. The Wauenie afore mentioned, riſeth on the ſouth ſide of Bring-ham, and is a limit betwéene Northfolke and Suffolke. Going therefore by Dis, Starton, not farre from Dce, it méeteth with the Eie, which riſeth néere Eckold, or betwéene it and Brainſworth, & goeth on by Brome, Dce, and ſo into the Wauenie. From Wauen. thence our Wauenie runneth by Silam, Brodiſh, Nedam, Harleſton, Rednam, Alborow, Flixton, Bungeie, Shepemedow, Barham, Beckles, Albie, & at Whiteacre (as I heare) parteth in twaine, or re-ceiuing Milford water (which is moſt likelie) it goeth along by Somerleie, Horningſheet, S. Olaues, (there receiuing the Frithſtane or Friſian brooke, Einus. out of low or litle England) Friſtan & Burgh caſtell, Fritha.
where it méeteth with the Hiere, & from thenceforth accompanieth it (as I ſaid) vnto the ſea. Willingham water commeth by Henſted, Einſted, or Eniſtate, and falleth into the ſea by ſouth of Keſland.

The Cokell riſeth ſouth ſouthweſt of Cokeleie Cokelus.
towne in Blithe hundred, & néere vnto Haſkelworth it méeteth with the rill that commeth from Wiſſet, and ſo going on togither by Wenhaſton, and Bliborow, it falleth into the ſea at an hauen betwéene Roldon and Walderſwicke. A little rill runneth alſo thereinto from Eſton by Solwold, and another from Dunwich, by Walderſwiſke: and hereby it wanteth little that Eſton Neſſe is not cut off and made a prétie Iland.

The Ford riſeth at Porford, and going by For- Ford.
derleie, and Theberton, it falleth at laſt into the Pilmere créke. Into the Orford hauen runneth one Ozus. water comming from Aldborow ward, by a narrow paſſage from the north into the ſouth. By weſt ther-of (when we are paſt a little Ile) it receiueth the ſecond, deſcending from betwéene Talingſton and Framingham in Plomes hundred; which cóming Fromus.
at laſt to Parleford, méeteth with a rill ſouthweſt of Farnham called the Gleme (that commeth by Rendleſham, the Gleinhams) and ſo paſſing forth, it taketh another at Snapesbridge, comming from Carleton by Sarmundham, Sternefield & Snape.
Then going to Iken (where it méeteth with the third Iken, or Ike. rill at the weſt ſide) it fetcheth a compaſſe by Sudburne eaſt of Oxford, and ſo into the hauen. Next vnto this by weſt of Oxford, there runneth vp another creeke by Butleis, whereinto the waters comming from Celleſford, and from the Ike, doo run both in one bottome. And thus much of Oxford hauen.

Deua. The Deue riſeth in Debenham, in the hundred of Yertelsmere, and from thence goeth to Wickford, Winſton, Cretingham, Lethringham, Wickham, hitherto ſtill creeping toward the ſouth: but then going in maner full ſouth, it runneth neere vnto Aſh, Rendleſham, Ufford, Melton, and Woodbridge, beneath which it receiueth on the weſt ſide, a water comming of two heads, whereof one is by north from Otelcie, and the other by ſouth from Henleis, which ioining weſt of Yertelsham, go vnto the ſaid towne and ſo into the Deue, eaſt of Yertelsham aboueſaid. From thence the Deue goeth by Waldringfield and Henleis, and meeting ſome after with Brightwell Clarus fons. brooke, it haſteth into the maine ſea, leauing Bawdſeie on the eaſt, where the fall therof is called Bawdſeie hauen.

Vre. Vre riſeth not farre from Bacton, in Yertelsmere hundred, and thence deſcendeth into Stow hundred by Gipping Newton, Dagworth, Stow (beneath which it meeteth with a water comming from Rattleſden, by one houſe) and ſo going on to Nedeham (through Boſmere and Claidon hundreds) to Blakenham, Bramford, Ypſwich, receiuing beneath Stoke, which lieth ouer againſt Ypſwich, the Chatſham water, that goeth by Belſted, and ſo into the Vre, at the mouth whereof is a maruellous deepe and large pit, whereof ſome marriners ſaie that they could neuer find the bottome, and therefore calling it a well, and ioining the name of the riuer withall, it commeth to paſſe that the hauen there is called Vrewell, for which in theſe daies we doo pronounce it Orwell. Into this hauen alſo the Sture or Stoure hath readie paſſage, which remaineth in this treatiſe next of all to be deſcribed.

Sturus. The Sture or Stoure parteth Eſſex from Suffolke, as Houeden ſaith, and experience confirmeth. It ariſeth in Suffolke, out of a lake neere vnto a towne called Stourmere. For although there come two rilles vnto the ſame, whereof the one deſcendeth from Thirlo, the Wrattings and Ketton, the other from Horſhed parke, by Hauerill, &c: yet in ſummer time they are often drie, ſo that they cannot be ſaid to be perpetuall heads vnto the aforeſaid riuer. The Stoure therefore (being, as I take it, called by Ptolomie, Edomania, for thereon toward the mouth ſtandeth a prettie towne named Manitræ, which carieth ſome ſhadow of that ancient name thereof vnto this daie, if my coniecture be any thing) ariſeth at Stouremeere, which is a pole conteining twentie acres of ground at the leaſt, the one ſide whereof is full of alders, the other of reeds, wherin the great ſtore of fiſh there bred, is not a little ſuccoured. From this mere alſo it goeth to Bathorne bridge, to Stocke clare, Cawndiſh, Pentlo, Paules Beauchampe, Milford, Foxerth, Burellete, Sudburie, Bures, Borſted, Stoke, Nailand, Lanham, Dedham, Stratford, eaſt Barfold, Brampton, Manitræ, Catwade bridge, and ſo into the ſea, where in the verie fall alſo it ioineth with Orwell hauen, ſo neere that of manie they are reputed as one, and parted but by a ſhingle that doth run along betweene them: neither doth it paſſe cleere in this voiage, but as it were often occupied by the waie, in receiuing ſundrie brookes and rilles not here to be omitted.

For on Eſſex ſide it hath one from Hemſted, which goeth by Bumſted, and Birdbrooke: another riſing ſhort of Foxerth, that runneth by water Beauchampe, Brundon, and falleth into the ſame at Badlington, weſt of Sudburie: and the third that glideth by Horkeſleie, and meeteth withall weſt of Borſted. On the north, or vpon Suffolke ſide, it receiueth one deſcending from Catiledge, by Bradleie, Thurlow, Wratting, Riddington, and at Hauerell falleth into this Sture. The ſecond deſcendeth northward from Polling field, and ioineth therewith eaſt of Clare. It was in old time called Cieux or Ceuxis, and it meeteth with the Stoure in ſuch wiſe that they ſeeme to make a right angle, in the point almoſt wherof ſtandeth a ruinous caſtell. Howbeit as ſithence which time this water (in ſome mens iudgement) hath beene named Clarus (not ſo much for the greatneſſe as clearenes of the ſtreame) euen ſo the Stoure it ſelfe was alſo called Ens as they ſay, and after their confluence the whole Clarens, which giueth denomination to a duchie of this Iland of no ſmall fame and honour. But theſe are but meere fables, ſith the word Clare is deriued from the towne, wherein was an houſe of religion erected to one Clara, and Clarens brought from the ſame, becauſe of an honour the prince had in thoſe parties: which may ſuffice to know from whence the name proceedeth. The third ariſeth of two heads, whereof one commeth from Wickham brooke, the other from Chedbar in Riſbie hundred, and ioining about Stanfield, it goeth by Hawton, Somerton, Borſted, Stanſted, and north of Foxerth falleth into Stoure. The fourth iſſueth from betweene the Waldingfields, and goeth by Edwardſtone, Borſted, Alington, Polſted, Stoke, and ſo at ſouth Borſted falleth into the ſame. The fift riſeth northweſt of Cockefield, and goeth to Cockefield, Laneham, Brimſleie, Yidling, and receiuing Kettle Baſton water ſouthweſt of Kettle baſton Chelſworth (and likewiſe the Breton that commeth from Bretenham, by Hitcheham, and Biſſeton ſtreet on the ſouth eaſt of the ſame towne) it goeth in by Nedging, Aldham, Hadleie, Lainham, Shellie, Higham, and ſo into the Stoure. The ſixt is a little rill deſcending ſouthweſt from Chappell. The ſeuenth riſeth betweene Chappell and Bentleie, and going betweene Tatingſton, and Whetſted, Holbrooke, and Sutton, it falleth at length into Stoure, and from thence is neuer heard of.

Odeie. As for Odeie rill, that riſeth betweene Odeie, and Wikes parkes, and ſo goeth into the Stoure, on Eſſex ſide, weſt of Harwich, and eaſt of Ree Ile; I paſſe it ouer, becauſe it is of it ſelfe but a rill, and not of anie greatneſſe, till it come to the mill aboue Ramſeie bridge, where I was once almoſt drowned (by reaſon of the ruinous bridge which leadeth ouer the ſtreame being there verie great) as an arme of the ſea that continuallie ebbeth & floweth. Next vn- Mola. to this, we came to another that runneth ſouth of Beaumont by Moſſe, and falleth into the ſea about the middeſt of the Baie, betwixt Harwich and the Naze. Betwixt the Naze alſo and the mouth of Colne, is another rill, which riſeth at little Bentleie, and thence goeth to Tendring thorpe, through Clac- Clacco. ton parke by great Holland, and eaſt of little Holland, into the deepe ſea.

Colunus. The Colne hath three heads, whereof one is at Ouington that goeth by Tilberie, and eaſt of Yeldam falleth into the chiefe head which riſeth about Redgewell in Eſſex, from whence alſo it goeth to Yeldam and Hedingham, otherwiſe called Yngham: alſo Hedningham or Heurdingham, or Heuedingham of the ſuperioritie which accrued therevnto, becauſe the chiefe lords of the ſame from time to time kept reſidence in the towne. For Heued or Hed ſignifieth the chiefe, in the old Engliſh language, which in the name of this and manie other townes and villages yet ſtanding in England cannot eſſie be forgotten.

The

The third falleth in south of Peldam, and being once met all in one chanell, and called the Colne, it goeth (as I said) to Hedningham, Hawsted, Erles Colne, Wakes Colne, Fordon, Bardfold, Colchester, in old time Camalodunum, and so into the sea at Brickleseie. Some thinke that Colchester and Camalodunum are sundrie cities and situat in diuerse places, whereby Maldon (or Ithancester out of whose ruines the said towne of Maldon was erected) should rather be Camalodunum than Colchester, but hereof I cannot iudge. Indeed if (as Leland saith) Maldon should be written Malodunum, it were a likelihood that there assertions should be probable. Some reason also may be gathered for the same out of Dion, and such as make the Thames mouth to take his beginning at Colchester water. But I dare not presume to conclude any thing hereof, least I should séeme rashlie to take hold of euerie coniecture. This I relie vpon rather as a more certeintie, that in the first edition of this treatise I was persuaded, that the sea entring by the Colne made three seuerall passages frō thence into the land: but now I vnderstand that these are seuerall entrances and streames, of which the Colne is one, another is the Salcote water, which commeth in beneath the Stroud (a causeie that leadeth vnto Mersete Ile, ouer which the sea méeteth with a contrarie course) and the third the faire arme that floweth vnto Maldon, and all these three haue their falles either ouer against or néere vnto the aforesaid Ile, which at a low water is not halfe a mile from the shore. Into the Colne or Colunus also (whereof Leland thinketh Colchester to take his name, and not A colonia Romanorum, although I may not consent to him herein) do run manie salt creekes beneath Fingering ho, of whose names sith I do not know, nor whether they be serued with anie backewaters or not, I giue ouer to intreat anie further, & likewise of their positions. Into that of Maldon runneth manie faire waters, whereof I will saie so much as I know to be true in maner by experience.

Gwin or Pant.

There is a pretie water that beginneth néere vnto Gwinbach or Winbeche church in Esser, a towne of old, and yet belonging to the Fitzwaters, taking name of Gwin, which is beautifull or faire, & Wache that signifieth a wood: and not without cause, sith not onelie the hilles on ech side of the said rillet, but all the whole paroch hath sometime abounded in woods; but now in manner they are vtterlie decaied, as the like commoditie is euerie where, not onelie thorough excessiue building for pleasure more than profit, which is contrarie to the ancient end of building; but also for more increase of pasture & commoditie to the lords of the soile, through their sales of that emolument, whereby the poore tenants are inforced to buie their fewell, and yet haue their rents in triple maner inhanced. This said broke runneth directlie from thence vnto Radwinter, now a parcell of your lordships possessions in those parts, descended from the Chamberleins, who were sometime chéefe owners of the same. By the waie also it is increased with sundrie pretie springs, of which Pantwell is the chéefe (whereof some thinke the whole broke to be named Pant) and which (to saie the truth) hath manie a leasing fathered on the same. Certes by the report of common fame it hath béene a pretie water, and of such quantitie, that botes haue come in time past from Bilie abbeie beside Maldon vnto the mores in Radwinter forcone. I haue heard also that an anchor was found there neere to a red willow, when the water-courses by act of parlement were surueied and reformed throughout England, which maketh not a little with the aforesaid relation. But this is strangest of all, that a lord sometime of Winbech (surnamed the great eater, because he would breake his fast with a whole calfe, and find no bones therein as the fable goeth) falling at contention with the lord John of Radwinter, could worke him none other iniurie, but by stopping vp the head of Pantwell, to put by the vse of a mill which stood by the church of Radwinter, and was serued by that broke abundantlie. Certes I know the place where the mill stood, and some posts thereof do yet remaine. But lée the malice of mankind, whereby one becometh a woolfe vnto the other in their mischæuous modes. For when the lord saw his mill to be so spoiled, he in reuenge of his losse, brake the necke of his aduersarie, when he was going to horsebacke, as the constant report affirmeth. For the lord of Radwinter holding a parcell of his manour of Radwinter hall of the Fitzwaters, his sonne was to hold his stirrop at certeine times when he should demand the same. Shewing himselfe therefore preest on a time to do his said seruice, as the Fitzwater was readie to lift his leg ouer the saddle, he by putting backe his foot, gaue him such a thrust that he fell backward, and brake his necke: whereupon insued great trouble, till the matter was taken vp by publike authoritie; and that seruile office conuerted into a pound of pepper, which is truelie paid to this daie. But to leaue these impertinent discourses, and returne againe to the springs whereby our Pant or Gwin is increased. There is likewise another in a pasture belonging to the Grange, now in possession of William Bird esquier, who holdeth the same in the right of his wife, but in time past belonging to Tiltele abbeie. The third commeth out of the yard of one of your lordships manors there called Radwinter hall. The fourth from John Cockslwets house, named the Rotherwell, which running vnder Rothers bridge, méeteth with the Gwin or Pant on the northwest end of Ferrants meade, southeast of Radwinter church, whereof I haue the charge by your honours fauourable preferment.

I might take occasion to speake of another rill which falleth into the Rother from Wendith hall: but bicause it is for the most part drie in summer I passe it ouer. Yet I will not omit to speake also of the manor which was the chiefe lordship sometime of a parish or hamlet called Wendiches, now worne out of knowledge, and vnited partlie to Radwinter, and partlie to Ashdon. It belonged first to the Wendiches gentlemen of a verie ancient house yet extant, of which one lateng the said manour to morgage to the monks of Feuersham, at such time as K. Edward the third went to the siege of Calis, thereby to furnish himselfe the better toward the seruice of his prince, it came to passe that he staied longer beyond the sea than he supposed. Whereupon he came before his date to confer with his creditors, who commending his care to come out of debt, willed him in friendlie maner not to suspect anie hard dealing on their behalfes, considering his businesse in seruice of the king was of it selfe cause sufficient, to excuse his delaie of paiment vpon the date assigned. Herevpon he went ouer againe vnto the siege of Calis. But when the day came, the monks for all this made seisure of the manour, and held it continuallie without anie further recompense, maugre all the friendship that the aforesaid Wendith could make. The said gentleman also tooke this cousening part in such choler, that he wrote a note yet to be séene among his euidences, whereby he admonisheth his posteritie to beware how they trust either knaue monke or knaue frier, as one of the name and descended from him by lineall descent hath more than once informed me. Now to resume our springs that méet and ioine with our Pant.

The next is named Frolhwell. And of this spring doth doth the whole hundred beare the name, & after this confluence the riuer it ſelfe wher vnto it falleth (from by north) ſo farre as I remember. Certes, all theſe, ſauing the firſt and ſecond, are within your lordſhips towne aforeſaid. The ſtreame therfore running from hence (& now, as I ſaid, called Froſhwell, of Froſh, which ſignifieth a frog) hafteth immediatlie vnto old Sandford, then through new Sandford parke, and afterward with full ſtreame (receiuing by the waie, the Finch brooke that commeth thorough Finchingfield) to Shalford, Bocking, Stiſted, Paſwic, and ſo to Blackewater, where the name of Froſhwell ceaſeth, the water being from henceforth (as I heare) commonlie called Blackwater, vntill it come to Maldon, where it falleth into the ſalt arme of the ſea that beateth vpon the towne; and which of ſome (except I be deceiued) is called alſo Pant: and ſo much the rather I make this coniecture, for that Ithancester ſtood ſomewhere vpon the banks thereof, & in the hundred of Danſeie, whoſe ruines (as they ſaie) alſo are ſwalowed vp by the ſaid ſtreame, which can not be verified in our riuer that runneth from Pantwell, which at the mouth and fall into the great current, exceedeth not (to my coniecture) aboue one hundred foot. But to returne to our Pant, alias the Gwin. From Blackwater it goeth to Corall, Caſterford, Bzarſted and Wickham, where it meeteth with the Barus, and ſo going togither as one, they deſcend to Heiebridge, and finallie into the ſalt water aboue Maldon, and at hand as is aforeſaid. As Barus. for the Barus, it riſeth in a ſtatelie parke of Eſſex called Bardfield, belonging to ſir Thomas Wroth whileſt he liued, who hath it to him and his heires males for euer, from the crowne. Being riſen, it hafteth directlie to old Saling Bzaintree, croſſing a rillet by the waie comming from Raine, blacke Notleie, white Notleie, Falkeburne, Wittham, and falleth into the Blackewater beneath Bzarſted on the ſouth.

Chelmer. Beſide this, the ſaid Pant or Gwin receiueth the Chelme or Chelmer, which ariſeth alſo in Wimbech aforeſaid, where it hath two heads: of which the one is not farre from Bzodockes (where maſter Thomas Wiſeman eſquier dwelleth) the other nigh vnto a farme called Highams in the ſame paroch, and ioining yer long in one chanell, they hie them toward Thacked vnder Prowds bridge, meeting in the waie with a rill comming from Boiton end, whereby it is ſomewhat increaſed. Being paſt Thacked, it goeth by Tilteie, and ſone after receiueth one rill which Lind'ſ. riſeth on the north ſide of Lindſell, & falleth into the Chelmer by northeaſt at Tilteie aforeſaid, & another cõming from ſouthweſt, riſing ſoutheaſt from Lindſell at much Eſſton. From thence then holding on ſtill with the courſe, it goeth to Candfield the more, Dunmow, little Dunmow, Falſted, Lies, both Waltams, Springfield, and ſo to Chelmereſford. Here vpon the ſouth ſide I find the iſſue of a water that riſeth fiue miles (or thereabouts) ſouth and by weſt of the ſaid towne, from whence it goeth to Punaſing, Butteſburie (there receiuing a rill from by weſt, to Ingatſtone, Marget Inge, Widford bridge, Writtle bridge, and ſo to Chelmereſford (croſſing alſo the ſecond water that deſcendeth from Rorford Rorford. ſouth weſt of Writtle by the waie) whereof let this ſuffice.

From hence the Chelmer goeth directlie toward Maldon by Badow, Owting, Woodham water, Bilie, and ſo to Blackwater northweſt of Maldon, receiuing neuertheleſſe yer it come fullie thither, a becke alſo that goeth from Lée parke, to little Lées, Lée. great Lées, Hatfield, Peuerell, Owting, and ſo into Blackwater (whereof I ſpake before) as Maldon ſtreame doth a rill from by ſouth ouer againſt ſaint Oſithes, and alſo another by Bzadwell. After which the ſaid ſtreame growing alſo to be verie great, paſſeth by the Tollhunts, Tolleſbie, and ſo forth into the maine ſea nere vnto Merſeie: betweene which fall and the place where Salute water entreth into the land, Plautus abode the comming of Claudius ſometime into Britaine, when he being hardlie beſet, did ſend vnto him for aid and ſpeedie ſuccour, who alſo being come did not onelie reſcue his legat, but in like manner wan Colcheſter, and put it to the ſpoile, if it be Camalodunum.

Burne. The Burne riſeth ſomewhere about Ronwell, and thence goeth to Hull bridge, ſouth Fambridge, Birkeſhot ferrie, and ſo to Foulneſſe. And as this is the ſhort courſe of that riuer, ſo it bzancheth, and the ſouth arme thereof receiueth a water comming from Haukewell, to great Stanbridge, and beneath Pakeſham doth meet by ſouth with the ſaid arme, and ſo finiſh vp his courſe, as we do our voiage alſo about the coaſt of England.

Thus haue I finiſhed the deſcription of ſuch riuers and ſtreames as fall into the Ocean, according to my purpoſe, although not in ſo preciſe an order and manner of handling as I might, if information promiſed had been accordinglie performed; or others would, if they had taken the like in hand. But this will I ſaie of that which is here done, that from the Solueie by weſt, which parteth England & Scotland on that ſide; to the Twede, which ſeparateth the ſaid kingdoms on the eaſt: if you go backeward, contrarie to the courſe of my deſcription, you ſhall find it ſo exact, as beſide a verie few by-riuers, you ſhall not need to vſe anie further aduiſe for the finding and falles of the aforeſaid ſtreames. For ſuch hath been my helpe of maiſter Sackfords cardes, and conference with other men about theſe, that I dare pronounce them to be perfect and exact. Furthermore, this I haue alſo to remember, that in the courſes of our ſtreames, I regard not ſo much to name the verie towne or church, as the limits of the paroch. And therefore if I ſaie it goeth by ſuch a towne, I thinke my dutie diſcharged, if I hit vpon anie part or parcell of the paroch. This alſo hath not a little troubled me, I meane the euill writing of the names of manie townes and villages: of which I haue noted ſome one man, in the deſcription of a riuer, to write one towne two or three manner of waies, whereby I was inforced to chooſe one (at aduenture moſt commonlie) that ſeemed the likelieſt to be ſound in mine opinion and iudgement.

Finallie, whereas I minded to ſet downe an eſpeciall chapter of ports and creeks, lieng on each coaſt of the Engliſh part of this Ile; and had prouided the ſame in ſuch wiſe as I iudged moſt conuenient: it came to paſſe, that the greater part of my labour was taken from me by ſtealth, and therefore as diſcouraged to meddle with that argument, I would haue giuen ouer to ſet downe anie thing therefore at all: and ſo much the rather, for that I ſee it may prooue a ſpurre vnto further miſcheefe, as things come to paſſe in theſe daies. Neuertheleſſe, becauſe a little thereof is paſſed in the beginning of the booke, I will ſet downe that parcell thereof which remaineth, leauing the ſupplie of the reſt either to my ſelfe hereafter, (if I may come by it) or to ſome other that can better performe the ſame.

Of

Of ſuch ports and creeks as our ſea-faring-men doo note for their benefit vpon the coaſts of England.

Chap. 17.

IT maie be that I haue in theſe former chapters omitted ſundrie hauens to be found vpon the ſhore of England, and ſome of them ſerued with backe waters, through want of ſound and ſufficient information from ſuch as haue written vnto me of the ſame. In recompenſe whereof I haue thought good to adde this chapter of ports and creekes, whereby (ſo farre as to me is poſſible) I ſhall make ſatisfaction of mine ouerſights. And albeit I cannot (being too too much abuſed by ſome that haue béereft me of my notes in this behalfe) bring my purpoſe to paſſe for all the whole coaſt of England round about, from Berwike to the Solue: yet I will not let to ſet downe ſo much as by good hap remaineth, whereby my countriemen ſhall not altogither want that benefit, hoping in time to recouer alſo the reſt, if God grant life and good ſucceſſe thereto.

Northumberland. In Northumberland therefore we haue Berwike, Holie Iland, Bamborow, Bedwell, Donſtanborow, Cocket Iland, Warkeworth, Newbiggin, Almow, Blithes nuke, and Tinmouth hauen.

Durham. In the biſhoprie, Sonderland, Stocketon, Hartlepoole, Theſe.

Yorkeſhire. In Yorkeſhire, Dapnam ſands, Steningréene, Staies, Runſwike, Robinhods baie, Whitbie, Scarborow, Fileie, Flamborow, Bricklington, Horneſeie becke, Siſſer kirke, Kelſeie, Cliffe, Pattenton, Holmes, Kenningham, Pall, Hidon, Hulbrige, Beuerleie, Hull, Haſell, Northferebie, Bucke créeke, Blacke coſſ, Wrethell, Howden.

Lincolneſhire. In Lincolneſhire, Selbie, Snepe, Turnebrige, Rodiffe, Catebie, Stockwith, Torkeſeie, Gainſborow, Southferebie, Barton a good point, Barrow a good hauen, Shatermill a good port, Penningham, Stalingborow a good hauen, Guimſbie a good port, Clie, March chappell, Saltfléete, Willgripe, Mapleford, ſaint Clements, Wenfléete, Friſcon, Toft, Skerbike, Boſton, Frompton, Wolnerton, Folſedike a good hauen.

Northfolke. In Northfolke, Linne a good hauen, Snatchham, Hitchham, Deſingham good, Thunſtone, Thorneham good, Brankeſter good, Burnham good, with diuers townes and villages thereto belonging, Welles good, Striſeie, Marſton, Blakeleie towne, Withon Claie, Blakelie hauen good, Salthouſe créeke, Sheringham hith, Roughton, Cromer, Beſton, Trinningham, Mounſleie, Bromwall, Haſeborow, Wakeſham, Eckelles, Winterton, Cuſter, Helmeſleie, Okell, Upton, Waibridge, Yarmouth, good all the waie to Norwich, with diuerſe villages on the riuer ſide.

Suffolke. In Suffolke, Becles, Bongeie, Southton, Corton, Gorton, Laiſtow a good port, Kirtill, Pakefield, Raſſeldon, Blibrow, Coſſe hith, Eſton, Walderſwiſe, Donewich, Swold hauen, Siſewell, Thorpe, Alborow, Orford a good hauen, Balſeie good, Felixſtow, Colneie, Sproten, Ypſwich, Downambridge good, Pinnemill, Shoteleie, Cataweie, Barfold.

Eſſex. In Eſſex we haue Dedham, Maning trée, Thorne, Wrabbeſnes, Ramſeie, Harwich, Douercourt, Handford, Okeleie, Kirbie, Thorpe, Brichwill, Walton mill, Walton hall, Banfléete, Newhauen good, S. Olithes, Bentleie good, Bricleſeie, Thorlington (where good ſhips of a hundred tun or more be made) Allford, Wiuenhall, Colcheſter, Cold hith, Rough hedge, Fingering ho, eaſt Perſeie, weſt Perſeie, Salcot, Goldanger, Borow, Maldon, Staneſgate, Sudmeſter, S. Peters, Burnham, Criſeie, Aldon, Clements gréene, Hulbridge, Paceſton, Barling, litle Wakering, much Wakering, ſouth Sudburie, Wakeringham, Pelton, Paper hill, or Lee, Beamfléete, Pidſeie range, Fobbing, Hadleie good, Mucking, Stanford, and Tilberie ferrie.

Kent. In Kent, Yarling, Cliffe, Tanfléete, Stokehow, Snodlond, Pelhall, Maidſton, Aileſford, New hith, Rocheſter, Gelingham, Reinham, Upchurch, Halſted, Quinborow, Pilton, Feuerſham, Whitſtaple, Yerne, Margate, Brodeſtaier, Ramſgate; and manie of theſe good créekes: alſo Sandwich, Douer, Hide, reaſonable ports, although none of the beſt.

Suſſex. In Suſſex we haue Smalade with the créekes adioining to the ſame, Ridon, Appledoure, Rie a good hauen, and Winchelſeie nothing at all inferiour to the ſame, and ſo manie ſhires onelie are left vnto me at this time, wherefore of force I muſt abruptlie leaue off to deale anie further with the reſt, whoſe knowledge I am right ſure would haue béene profitable: and for the which I hoped to haue reaped great thankes at the hands of ſuch ſea-faring-men, as ſhould haue had vſe hereof.

Deſunt cætera.

Of the aire, ſoile, and commodities of this Iland.

Cap. 18.

THe aire (for the moſt part) throughout the Iland is ſuch, as by reaſon in maner of continuall clouds, is reputed to be groſſe, and nothing ſo pleaſant as that is of the maine. Howbeit, as they which affirme theſe things, haue onelie reſpect to the impediment or hinderance of the ſunne beames, by the interpoſition of the clouds and oft ingroſſed aire: ſo experience teacheth vs, that it is no leſſe pure, wholeſome, and commodious, than is that of other countries, and (as Cæſar himſelfe hereto addeth) much more temperate in ſummer than that of the Galles, from whom he aduentured hither. Neither is there anie thing found in the aire of our region, that is not vſuallie ſéene amongſt other nations lieng beyond the ſeas. Wherefore, we muſt néeds confeſſe, that the ſituation of our Iland (for benefit of the heauens) is nothing inferiour to that of anie countrie of the maine, where ſo euer it lie vnder the open firmament. And this Plutarch knew full well, who affirmeth a part of the Eliſian fields to be found in Britaine, and the Iles that are ſituate about it in the Ocean. The aire of Britaine.

The ſoile of Britaine is ſuch, as by the teſtimonies and reports both of the old and new writers, and experience alſo of ſuch as now inhabit the ſame, is verie fruitfull; and ſuch in déed as bringeth forth manie commodities, whereof other countries haue néed, and yet it ſelfe (if fond niceneſſe were aboliſhed) néedleſſe of thoſe that are dailie brought from other places. Neuertheleſſe it is more inclined to féeding and graſing, than profitable for tillage, and bearing of corne; by reaſon whereof the countrie is wonderfullie repleniſhed with neat, and all kind of cattell: and ſuch ſtore is there alſo of the ſame in euerie place, that the fourth part of the land is ſcarſelie manured for the prouiſion and maintenance of graine. Certes The ſoile.

this fruitfulneſſe was not vnknowne vnto the Britons long before Cæſars time, which was the cauſe wherefore our predeceſſors liuing in thoſe daies in maner neglected tillage, and liued by feeding and graſing onelie. The graſiers themſelues alſo then dwelled in moueable villages by companies, whoſe cuſtome was to diuide the ground amongſt them, and each one not to depart from the place where his lot laie (a thing much like to the Iriſh Criacht) till by eating vp of the countrie about him, he was inforced to remoue further, and ſeeke for better paſture. And this was the Britiſh cuſtome (as I learne) at firſt. It hath beene commonlie reported, that the ground of Wales is neither ſo fruitfull as that of England, neither the ſoile of Scotland ſo bountifull as that of Wales: which is true, for corne and for the moſt part: otherwiſe, there is ſo good ground in ſome parts of Wales, as is in England, albeit the beſt of Scotland be ſcarſelie comparable to the meane of either of both. Howbeit, as the bountie of the Scotiſh doth faile in ſome reſpect, ſo doth it ſurmount in other; God and nature hauing not appointed all countries to yeeld forth like commodities.

Criacht.

But where our ground is not ſo good as we would wiſh, we haue (if need be) ſufficient helpe to cheriſh our ground withall, and to make it more fruitfull. For beſide the compoſt that is carried out of the husbandmens yards, ditches, ponds, douehouſes, or cities and great townes: we haue with vs a kind of white marle, which is of ſo great force, that if it be caſt ouer a peece of land but once in three ſcore years, it ſhall not need of anie further compelling. Hereof alſo doth Plinie ſpeake, lib. 17. cap. 6, 7, 8, where he affirmeth that our marle indureth vpon the earth by the ſpace of foureſcore yeares: inſomuch that it is laid vpon the ſame but once in a mans life, whereby the owner ſhall not need to trauell twiſe in procuring to commend and better his ſoile. He calleth it Marga, and making diuerſe kinds thereof, he finallie commendeth ours, and that of France, aboue all other, which lieth ſometime a hundred foot deepe, and farre better than the ſcattering of chalke vpon the ſame, as the Hedui and Pictones did in his time, or as ſome of our daies alſo do practiſe: albeit diuerſe do like better to caſt on lime, but it will not ſo long indure, as I haue heard reported.

Marle.

There are alſo in this Iland great plentie of freſh riuers and ſtreames, as you haue heard alreadie, and theſe throughlie fraught with all kinds of delicate fiſh accuſtomed to be found in riuers. The whole Ile likewiſe is verie full of hilles, of which ſome (though not verie manie) are of exceeding heigth, and diuerſe extending themſelues verie far from the beginning; as we may ſee by Shooters hill, which riſing eaſt of London, and not farre from the Thames, runneth along the ſouth ſide of the Iland weſtward, vntill it come to Cornewall. Like vnto theſe alſo are the Croudon hils, which though vnder diuers names (as alſo the other from the Peke) do run into the borders of Scotland. What ſhould I ſpeake of the Cheuiot hilles, which reach twentie miles in length: of the blacke mounteines in Wales, which go from () to () miles at the leaſt in length: of the Cle hilles in Shropſhire, which come within foure miles of Ludlow, and are diuided from ſome part of Worceſter by the Teme: of the Graines in Scotland, and of our Chiltren, which are eightéene miles at the leaſt from one end of them, which reach from Henlie in Oxfordſhire to Dunſtable in Bedfordſhire, and are verie well repleniſhed with wood and corne: notwithſtanding that the moſt part yeeld a ſweet ſhort graſſe, profitable for ſheepe. Wherein albeit they of Scotland do ſomewhat come behind vs, yet their outward defect is inwardlie recompenſed, not onelie with plentie of quarries (and thoſe of ſundrie kinds of marble, hard ſtone, and fine alabaſter) but alſo rich mines of mettall, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter.

Plentie of riuers.

Hilles.

(*) Here lacks

In this Iland likewiſe the winds are commonlie more ſtrong and fierce, than in anie other places of the maine, which Cardane alſo eſpied: and that is often ſeene vpon the naked hilles, not garded with trées to beare and keepe it off. That grieuous inconuenience alſo inforceth our nobilitie, gentrie, and communaltie, to build their houſes in the vallies, leauing the high grounds vnto their corne and cattell, leaſt the cold and ſtormie blaſts of winter ſhould breed them greater annoiance: whereas in other regions each one deſireth to ſet his houſe aloft on the hill, not onlie to be ſeene a farre off, and caſt forth his beames of ſtatelie and curious workemanſhip into euerie quarter of the countrie; but alſo (in hot habitations) for coldneſſe ſake of the aire, ſith the heat is neuer ſo vehement on the hill top as in the vallie, becauſe the reuerberation of the ſunne beames either reacheth not ſo farre as the higheſt, or elſe becommeth not ſo ſtrong as when it is reflected vpon the lower ſoile.

Winds.

Building.

But to leaue our buildings vnto the purpoſed place (which notwithſtanding haue verie much increaſed, I meane for curioſitie and coſt, in England, Wales, and Scotland, within theſe few yeares) and to returne to the ſoile againe. Certeinelie it is euen now in theſe our daies growne to be much more fruitfull, than it hath beene in times paſt. The cauſe is for that our countriemen are growne to be more painefull, ſkilfull, and carefull through recompenſe of gaine, than heretofore they haue beene: inſomuch that my Synchroni or time fellows can reape at this preſent great commoditie in a little roome; whereas of late yeares, a great compaſſe hath yeelded but ſmall profit, and this onelie through the idle and negligent occupation of ſuch, as dailie manured and had the ſame in occupieng. I might ſet downe examples of theſe things out of all the parts of this Iland, that is to ſaie, manie of England, more out of Scotland, but moſt of all out of Wales: in which two laſt rehearſed, verie little other food and liuelihood was wont to be loked for (beſide fleſh) more than the ſoile of it ſelfe, and the cow gaue; the people in the meane time liuing idelie, diſſolutelie, and by picking and ſtealing one from another. All which vices are now (for the moſt part) relinquiſhed, ſo that each nation manureth hir owne with triple commoditie, to that it was before time.

Husbandrie amended.

The paſture of this Iland is according to the nature and bountie of the ſoile, whereby in moſt places it is plentifull, verie fine, batable, and ſuch as either fatteth our cattell with ſpeed, or yeeldeth great abundance of milke and creame: whereof the pelloweſt butter and fineſt cheeſe are made. But where the blue claie aboundeth (which hardlie drinketh vp the winters water in long ſeaſon) there the graſſe is ſpearie, rough, and verie apt for buſhes: by which occaſion it commeth nothing ſo profitable vnto the owner as the other. The beſt paſture ground of all England is in Wales, & of all the paſture in Wales that of Cardigan is the cheeſe. I ſpeake of the ſame which is to be found in the mounteines there, where the hundred part of the graſſe growing is not eaten, but ſuffered to rot on the ground, whereby the ſoile becommeth matted, and diuerſe bogges and quicke mores made withall in long continuance: becauſe all the cattell in the countrie are not able to eat it downe. If it be to be accompted good ſoile, on which a man may laie a wand ouer night, and on the morow find it hidden and ouergrowen with graſſe: it is not hard to find plentie thereof in manie places of this land. Neuertheles, ſuch is the fruitfulnes of the

also ſaid countie that it farre ſurmounteth this proportion, whereby it may be compared for batablenesse with Italie, which in my time is called the paradise of the world, although by reason of the wickednesse of such as dwell therein it may be called the sinke and draine of hell: so that whereas they were wont to sate of vs that our land is good but our people euill, they did but onlie speake it; whereas we know by experience that the soile of Italie is a noble soile, but the dwellers therein farre off from anie vertue or godnesse.

Meadowes. Our meadowes, are either bottomes (whereof we haue great store, and those verie large, bicause our soile is hillie) or else such as we call land meads, and borowed from the best & fattest pasturages. The first of them are yearelie & often ouerflowen by the rising of such streames as passe through the same, or violent falles of land-waters, that descend from the hils about them. The other are seldome or neuer ouerflowen, and that is the cause wherefore their grasse is shorter than that of the bottomes, and yet is it farre more fine, wholesome, and batable, sith the haie of our low meadowes is not onelie full of sandie cinder, which breedeth sundrie diseases in our cattell, but also more rowtie, foggie, and full of flags, and therefore not so profitable for couer and forrage as the higher meads be. The difference furthermore in their commodities is great, for whereas in our land meadowes we haue not often aboue one good load of haie, or peraduenture a little more in an acre of ground (I vse the word Carrucata or Carruca which is a waine load, and, as I remember, vsed by Plinie lib. 33. cap. 11.) in low meadowes we haue sometimes three, but commonlie two or vpward, as experience hath oft confirmed.

Of such as are twise mowed I speake not, sith their later math is not so wholsome for cattell as the first; although in the mouth more pleasant for the time: for thereby they become oftentimes to be rotten, or to increase so fast in bloud, that the garget and other diseases doo consume manie of them before the owners can seeke out any remedie, by Phlebotomie or otherwise. Some superstitious fooles suppose that they which die of the garget are ridden with the night mare, and therefore they hang vp stones which naturallie haue holes in them, and must be found vnlooked for; as if such a stone were an apt cockshot for the diuell to run through and solace himselfe withall, whilest the cattell go scotfree and are not molested by him. But if I should set downe but halfe the toies that superstition hath brought into our husbandmens heads in this and other behalfes, it would aske a greater volume than is conuenient for such a purpose, wherefore it shall suffice to haue said thus much of these things.

Corne. The yeeld of our corne-ground is also much after this rate following. Through out the land (if you please to make an estimat thereof by the acre) in meane and indifferent yeares, wherein each acre of rie or wheat, well tilled and dressed, will yeeld commonlie sirteene or twentie bushels, an acre of barlie six and thirtie bushels, of otes and such like foure or fiue quarters, which proportion is notwithstanding oft abated toward the north, as it is oftentimes surmounted in the south. Of mixed corne, as peason and beanes, sowen togither, tares and otes (which they call bulmong) rie and wheat named miscelin here is no place to speake, yet their yeeld is neuertheles much after this proportion, as I haue often marked. And yet is not this our great foison comparable to that of hoter countries of the maine. But of all that euer I read, the increase which Eldred Danus writeth of in his De imperio Iudæorum in Aethiopia surmounteth, where he saith that in the field nere to the Sabbatike riuer, called in old time Golan, the ground is so fertile, that euerie graine of barleie growing doth yeeld an hundred kernels at the least vnto the owner.

Of late yeares also we haue found and taken vp a great trade in planting of hops, whereof our more hitherto and vnprofitable grounds do yeeld such plentie & increase, that their are few farmers or occupiers in the countrie, which haue not gardens and hops growing of their owne, and those farre better than doo come from Flanders vnto vs. Certes the corruptions vsed by the Flemings, and forgerie dailie practised in this kind of ware, gaue vs occasion to plant them here at home: so that now we may spare and send manie ouer vnto them. And this I know by experience, that some one man by conuersion of his more grounds into hoppards, whereof before he had no commoditie, doth raise yearelie by so little as twelue acres in compasse two hundred markes; all charges borne toward the maintenance of his familie. Which industrie God continue! though some secret frends of Flemings let not to exclaime against this commoditie, as a spoile of wood, by reason of the poles, which neuertheles after three yeares doo also come to the fire, and spare their other fewell.

Cattell. The cattell which we breed are commonlie such, as for greatnesse of bone, sweetnesse of flesh, and other benefits to be reaped by the same, giue place vnto none other: as may appeare first by our oxen, whose largenesse, height, weight, tallow, hides, and hornes are such, as none of anie other nation doo commonlie or may easilie exceed them. Our sheepe likewise for good tast of flesh; quantitie of lims, finesse of fleece caused by their hardnesse of pasturage, and abundance of increase (for in manie places they bring forth two or three at an eaning) giue no place vnto anie, more than doo our goates, who in like sort doo follow the same order, and our deere come not behind. As for our conies, I haue seene them so fat in some soiles, especiallie about Peall and Dilnege, that the grease of one being weighed, hath peised verie neere six or seuen ounces. All which benefits we first refer to the grace and godnesse of God, and next of all vnto the bountie of our soile, which he hath indued with so notable and commodious fruitfulnesse.

Peall and Dilnege.

But as I meane to intreat of these things more largelie hereafter, so will I touch in this place one benefit which our nation wanteth, and that is wine; the fault whereof is not in our soile, but the negligence of our countriemen (especiallie of the south partes) who do not inure the same to this commoditie, and which by reason of long discontinuance, is now become vnapt to beare anie grapes almost for pleasure & shadow, much lesse then the plaine fields or seuerall vineyards for aduantage and commoditie. Yet of late time some haue assaied to deale for wine, as to your lordship also is right well knowen. But sith that liquor when it commeth to the drinking hath bin found more hard, than that which is brought from beyond the sea, and the cost of planting and keeping thereof so chargeable, that they may buie it far better cheape from other countries: they haue giuen ouer their enterprises without anie consideration, that as in all other things, so neither the ground it selfe in the beginning, nor succesle of their trauell can answer their expectation at the first, vntill such time as the soile be brought as it were into acquaintance with this commoditie, and that prouision may be made for the more easinesse of charge, to be imploied vpon the same.

Wine.

If it be true, that where wine doth last and indure well, there it will grow no worse: I muse not a little wherefore the planting of vines should be neglected in England. That this liquor might haue growne in this this Iland heretofore, firſt the charter that Probus the emperour gaue equallie to vs, the Galles, and Spaniards, is one ſufficient teſtimonie. And that it did grow here, beſide the teſtimonie of Beda lib. 1. cap. 1. the old notes of tithes for wine that yet remaine in the accompts of ſome parſons and vicars in Kent, elſewhere, beſides the records of ſundrie ſutes, commenſed in diuerſe eccleſiaſticall courts, both in Kent, Surrie, &c: alſo the incloſed parcels almoſt in euerie abbeie yet called the vineyardes, may be a notable witneſſe, as alſo the plot which we now call eaſt Smithfield in London giuen by Canutus ſometime king of this land, with other ſoile there abont vnto certeine of his knights, with the libertie of a Guild which therof was called Knighton Guild. The truth is (ſaith Iohn Stow our countrie man, and diligent traueller in the old eſtate of this my natiue citie) that it is now named Portſoken ward, and giuen in time paſt to the religious houſe within Algate. Howbeit firſt Otwell, the Archouell, Otto, & finallie Geffrie erle of Eſſex conſtables of the Tower of London, withheld that portion frō the ſaid houſe, vntill the reigne of king Stephan, and thereof made a vineyard to their great commoditie and lucre. The Ile of Elie alſo was in the firſt times of the Normans called Le Ile des vignes. And good record appéreth, that the biſhop there had yearelie three or foure tunne at the leaſt giuen him Nomine decimæ, beſide whatſoeuer ouer-ſumme of the liquor did accrue to him by leaſes and other eſcheats, whereof alſo I haue ſeene mention. Wherefore our ſoile is not to be blamed, as though our nights were ſo excéeding ſhort, that in Auguſt and September the moone which is ladie of moiſture, & chiefe ripener of this liquor, cannot in anie wiſe ſhine long inough vpon the ſame: a verie méere toie and fable right worthie to be ſuppreſſed, becauſe experience conuinceth the vpholders thereof euen in the Rhenith wines.

Cattell.

Wad. Madder. Rape.

Mcall and Diſnege.

Wine.

The time hath béene alſo that wad, wherwith our countrie men died their faces (as Cæſar ſaith) that they might ſeeme terrible to their enimies in the field (and alſo women & their daughters in law did ſtaine their bodies & go naked, in the pickle vnto the ſacrifices of their gods, coueting to reſemble therin the Ethiopians, as Plinie ſaith li. 22. cap. 1.) and alſo madder haue béene (next vnto our tin and woolles) the chiefe commodities, and merchandize of this realme. I find alſo that rape oile hath béene made within this land. But now our ſoile either will not or at the leaſt wiſe may not beare either wad or madder: I ſaie not that the ground is not able ſo to do, but that we are negligent, afraid of the pilling of our grounds, and careleſſe of our owne profit, as men rather willing to buie the ſame of others than take anie paine to plant them here at home. The like I may ſaie of flax, which by law ought to be ſowen in euerie countrie-towne in England, more or leſſe: but I ſée no ſucceſſe of that good and wholeſome law, ſith it is rather contemptuouſlie reiected than otherwiſe dutifullie kept in anie place of England.

Flax.

Some ſaie that our great number of lawes doo breéd a generall negligence and contempt of all good order; bicauſe we haue ſo manie, that no ſubiect can liue without the tranſgreſſion of ſome of them, and that the often alteration of our ordinances doth much harme in this reſpect, which (after Ariſtotle) doth ſéeme to carie ſome reaſon withall, for (as Cornelius Gallus hath:)

Euentus varios res noua ſemper habet.

Eleg. 2.

But verie manie let not to affirme, that the gréedie corruption of the promoters on the one ſide, factlitie in diſpenſing with good lawes, and firſt breach of the ſame in the lawmakers & ſuperiors, & priuat reſpects of their eſtabliſhment on the other, are the greateſt cauſes whie the inferiours regard no good order, being alwaies ſo redie to offend without anie facultie one waie, as they are otherwiſe to preſume, vpon the examples of their betters when anie hold is to be taken. But as in theſe things I haue no ſkill, ſo I wiſh that fewer licences for priuat commoditie but of a few were granted (not that thereby I denie the maintenance of the prerogatiue roiall, but rather would with all my hart that it might be yet more honorablie increaſed) & that euerie one which by fœed friendſhip (or otherwiſe) doth attempt to procure oughts from the prince, that may profit but few and proue hurtfull to manie, might be at open aſſizes and ſeſſions denounced enimie to his countrie and common-wealth of the land.

Principes longè magis exemplo quàm culpa peccare ſolent.

Glaſſe alſo hath béene made here in great plentie before, and in the time of the Romans; and the ſaid ſtuffe alſo, beſide fine ſciſſers, ſhéres, collars of gold and ſiluer for womens necks, cruſes and cups of amber, were a parcell of the tribute which Auguſtus in his daies laid vpon this Iland. In like ſort he charged the Britons with certeine implements and veſſels of iuorie (as Strabo ſaith.) Wherby it appéreth that in old time our countriemen were farre more induſtrious and painefull in the vſe and application of the benefits of their countrie, than either after the comming of the Saxons or Normans, in which they gaue themſelues more to idleneſſe and following of the warres.

Earths.

If it were requiſit that I ſhould ſpeake of the ſundrie kinds of mould, as the cledgie or claie, whereof are diuerſe ſorts (red, blue, blacke and white) alſo the red or white ſandie, the lomie, roſellie, grauellie, chalkie or blacke, I could ſaie that there are ſo manie diuerſe veines in Britaine, as elſe where in anie quarter of like quantitie in the world. Howbeit this I muſt néeds confeſſe, that the ſandie & cledgie doo beare the greateſt ſwaie: but the claie moſt of all, as hath béene, and yet is alwaies ſéene & felt through plentie and dearth of corne. For if this latter (I meane the claie) doo yeeld hir full increaſe (which it doth commonlie in drie yeares for wheat) then is there generall plentie: whereas if it faile, then haue we ſcarſitie, according to the old rude verſe ſet downe of England, but to be vnderſtood of the whole Iland, as experience doth confirme:

When the ſand doth ſerue the claie,
Then may we ſing well awaie,
But when the claie doth ſerue the ſand,
Then is it merie with England.

Vallies.

I might here intreat of the famous vallies in England, of which one is called the vale of White horſſe, another of Euesham, commonlie taken for the granarie of Worceſterſhire, the third of Aileſbirie that goeth by Tame, the rotes of Chilterne hils, to Donſtable, Newport pannell, Stonie Stratford, Buckingham, Birſtane parke, &c. Likewiſe of the fourth of Whitehart or Blackemore in Dorſetſhire. The fift of Kingdale or Kendale, corruptlie called Kingtaſle, that lieth (as mine author ſaith) vpon the edge of Eſſex and Cambridgeſhire, and alſo the Marſhwood vale: but for ſomuch as I know not well their ſeuerall limits, I giue ouer to go anie further in their deſcription. In like ſort it ſhould not be amiſſe to ſpeake of our fennes, although our countrie be not ſo full of this kind of ſoile as the parties beyond the ſeas, to wit, Marbon, &c: and thereto of other pleaſant botoms, the which are not onelie indued with excellent riuers and great ſtore of corne and fine fodder for neat and horſſes in time of the yeare (whereby they are excéeding beneficiall vnto their owners) but alſo of no ſmall compaſſe and quantitie in ground. For ſome of our fens are well knowen to be either of ten, twelue, ſixtéene, twentie, or thirtie miles in length, that of the Girwies yet paſſing all the reſt, which is full 60 (as I haue often read.) Wherein alſo Elie the famous Ile ſtandeth, which is ſeuen miles euerie waie, and whereunto there is no acceſſe but by three cauſies, whoſe inhabitants in like ſort by an old priuilege may take wood, ſedge, turfe, &c; to burne: likewiſe haie for their cattell, and thatch for their houſes of cuſtome, and each occupier in his appointed quantitie through out the Ile; albeit that couetouſneſſe hath now begun ſomewhat to abridge this large beneuolence and commoditie, aſwell in the ſaid Ile as moſt other places of this land.

Commons. Finallie, I might diſcourſe in like order of the large commons, laid out heretofore by the lords of the ſoiles for the benefit of ſuch poore, as inhabit within the compaſſe of their manors. But as the true intent of the giuers is now in moſt places defrauded, in ſo much that not the poore tenants inhabiting vpon the ſame, but their landlords haue all the commoditie and gaine, ſo the tractation of them belongeth rather to the ſecond booke. Wherefore I meane not at this preſent to deale withall, but reſerue the ſame wholie vnto the due place whileſt I go forward with the reſt; ſetting downe neuertheleſſe by the waie a generall commendation of the whole Iland, which I find in an ancient monument, much vnto this effect.

Illa quidem longè celebris ſplendore, beata,
Glebis, lacte, fauis, ſupereminet inſula cunctis,
Quas regit ille Deus, ſpumanti cuius ab ore Profluit oceanus, &c. And a little after.
Teſtis Lundonia ratibus, Wintonia Baccho, Herefordia grege, Worceſtria frugere dundans,
Batha lacu, Salabyra feris, Cantuaria piſce,
Eboraca ſyluis, Exceſtria clara metallis,
Norwicum Dacis hybernis, Ceſtria Gallis,
Ciceſtrum Norwagenis, Dunelmia prapinguis, Teſtis Lincolnia gens infinita decore,

Of the foure high waies ſometime made in Britaine by the princes of this Iland.

Cap. 19.

THere are, which indeuoring to bring all things to their Saxon originall, doo affirme, that this diuiſion of waies, (whereof we now intreat) ſhould apperteine vnto ſuch princes of that nation as reigned here, ſince the Romanes gaue vs ouer: and hereupon they inferre, that Wattling ſtreet was builded by one Wattle from the eaſt vnto the weſt. But how weake their coniectures are in this behalfe, the antiquitie of theſe ſtreets it ſelfe ſhall eaſilie declare, whereof ſome parcelles, after a ſort, are alſo ſet downe by Antoninus; and thoſe that haue written of the ſeuerall iournies from hence to Rome: although peraduenture not in ſo direct an order as they were at the firſt eſtabliſhed. For my part, if it were not that I deſire to be ſhort in this behalfe, I could with ſuch notes as I haue alreadie collected for that purpoſe, make a large confutation of diuerſe of their opinions concerning theſe paſſages, and thereby rather aſcribe the originall of theſe waies to the Romans than either the Britiſh or Saxon princes. But ſith I haue ſpent more time in the tractation of the riuers than was allotted vnto me, and that I ſee great cauſe (notwithſtanding my late alledged ſcruple) wherefore I ſhould hold with our Galfride before anie other; I will omit at this time to diſcourſe of theſe things as I would, and ſaie what I make for the better knowledge of their courſes, proceeding therein as followeth.

First of all I find, that Dunwallon king of Britaine, about 483 yeares before the birth of our ſauiour Jeſus Chriſt, ſeeing the ſubiects of his realme to be in ſundrie wiſe oppreſſed by theeues and robbers as they trauelled to and fro; and being willing (ſo much as in him laie) to redreſſe theſe inconuenences, cauſed his whole kingdome to be ſurueied; and then commanding foure principall waies to be made, which ſhould leade ſuch as trauelled into all parts thereof, from ſea to ſea, he gaue ſundrie large priuileges vnto the ſame, whereby they became ſafe, and verie much frequented. And as he had regard herein to the ſecuritie of his ſubiects, ſo he made ſharpe lawes grounded vpon iuſtice, for the ſuppreſſion of ſuch wicked members as did offer violence to anie traueler that ſhould be met withall or found within the limits of thoſe paſſages. How and by what parts of this Iland theſe waies were conueied at the firſt, it is not ſo wholie left in memorie: but that ſome queſtion is moued among the learned, concerning their ancient courſes. Howbeit ſuch is the ſhadow remaining hitherto of their extenſions, that if not at this preſent perfectlie, yet hereafter it is not vnpoſſible, but that they may be found out, & left certeine vnto poſteritie. It ſeemeth by Galfride, that the ſaid Dunwallon did limit out thoſe waies by doles and markes, which being in ſhort time altered by the auarice of ſuch irreligious perſons as dwelt neere, and incroched vpon the ſame (a fault yet inſtlie to be found almoſt in euerie place, euen in the time of our moſt gratious and ſouereigne Ladie Elizabeth, wherein the lords of the ſoiles doo vnite their ſmall occupieng, onelie to increaſe a greater proportion of rent; and therefore they either remoue, or giue licence to erect ſmall tenements vpon the high waies ſides and commons; whereunto, in truth, they haue no right: and yet out of them alſo doo raiſe a new commoditie) and queſtion moued for their bounds before Belinus his ſonne, he to auoid all further controuerſie that might from thenceforth inſue, cauſed the ſame to be paued with hard ſtone of eightéene foot in breadth, ten foot in depth, and in the bottome thereof huge flint ſtones alſo to be pitched, leaſt the earth in time ſhould ſwallow vp his workemanſhip, and the higher ground ouer-grow their riſing creſts. He indued them alſo with larger priuileges than before, proteſting that if anie man whoſoeuer ſhould preſume to infringe his peace, and violate the lawes of his kingdome in anie maner of wiſe, neere vnto or vpon thoſe waies, he ſhould ſuffer ſuch puniſhment without all hope to eſcape (by friendſhip or mercie) as by the ſtatutes of this realme latelie prouided in thoſe caſes were due vnto the offendors. The names of theſe foure waies are the Foſſe, the Gwethelin or Watling, the Erming, and the Ikenild.

Foſſe. The Foſſe goeth not directlie but ſlopewiſe ouer the greateſt part of this Iland, beginning at Dotneſſe or Totneſſe in Deuonſhire, where Brute ſometime landed, or (as Ranulphus ſaith, which is more likelie) at the point of Cornwall, though the eldeſt writers doo ſeeme to note the contrarie. From hence it goeth thorough the middle of Deuonſhire & Somerſetſhire, and commeth to Briſtow, from whence it runneth manifeſtlie to Sudberie market, Tetburie, and ſo forth holdeth on as you go almoſt to the midde waie betweene Glocester and Cirnecester, (where the wood faileth, and the champeigne countrie appeareth toward Cotteſwald) ſtreight as a line vntill you come to Cirnecester it ſelfe. Some hold opinion opinion that the waie, which liſth from Cirnceſter to Bath, ſhould be the verie Foſſe; and that betwixt Cirnceſter and Glouceſter to be another of the foure waies, made by the Britons. But ancient report grounded vpon great likelihood, and confirmed alſo by ſome experience, iudgeth that moſt of the waies croſſed ech other in this part of the realme. And of this mind is Leland alſo, who learned it of an abbat of Cirnceſter that ſhewed great likelihood by ſome records thereof. But to proceed. From Cirnceſter, it goeth by Chepingnorton to Couentrie, Leiceſter, Newarke, and ſo to Lincolne ouerthwart the Watling ſtreet: where, by generall conſent of all the writers (except Alfred of Beuerleie, who extendeth it vnto Cathneſſe in Scotland) it is ſaid to haue an end.

Watling ſtreet.

The Watling ſtreet begun (as I ſaid) by Dunwallo, but finiſhed by Gutheline, of whome it is diuerſlie to be called Gutheline ſtreet, though now corrupted into Watling ſtreet, beginneth at Douer in Kent, and ſo ſtretcheth through the middeſt of Kent vnto London, and ſo forth (peraduenture by the middeſt of the citie) vnto Verolamium or Verlamceſter, now ſaint Albons, where, in the yeare of grace, one thouſand fiue hundred thirtie & one, the courſe thereof was found by a man that digged for grauell therewith to mend the high waie. It was in this place eighténe foot broad, and about ten foot déepe, and ſtoned in the bottome in ſuch wiſe as I haue noted afore, and peraduenture alſo on the top: but theſe are gone, and the reſt remaine equall in moſt places, and leuell with the fields. The yelow grauell alſo that was brought thither in carts two thouſand yéeres paſſed, remained there ſo freſh and ſo ſtrong, as if it had béene digged out of the naturall place where it grew not manie yéeres before. From hence it goeth hard by Margate, leauing it on the weſt ſide. And a little by ſouth of this place, where the priorie ſtood, is a long thorough fare vpon the ſaid ſtreet, méetly well builded (for low houſing) on both ſides. After this it proceedeth (as the chronicle of Barnwell ſaith) to Carton, and ſo to Huntingdon, & then forward, ſtill winding in and out till it not onelie becommeth a bound vnto Leiceſterſhire toward Lugbie, but alſo paſſeth from Caſtleford to Stamford, and ſo forth by weſt of Parton, which is but a mile from Torkeſeie.

Here by the waie I muſt touch the opinion of a trauceller of my time, who noteth the ſaid ſtreet to go another waie, inſomuch that he would haue it to croſſe the third Auon, betwixt Newton and Dolobridge, and ſo go on to Binford bridge, Wibtoft, the High croſſe, and thence to Atherſton vpon Ancre. Certes it may be, that the Foſſe had his courſe by the countrie in ſuch ſort as he deſcribeth; but that the Watling ſtreet ſhould paſſe by Atherſton, I cannot as yet be perſuaded. Neuertheleſſe his coniecture is not to be miſliked, ſith it is not vnlikelie that three ſeuerall waies might met at Alderwaie (a towne vpon Tame, beneath Salters bridge) for I do not doubt that the ſaid towne did take his name of all three waies, as Aldermarie church in London did of all three Maries, vnto whom it hath béene dedicated: but that the Watling ſtreet ſhould be one of them, the compaſſe of his paſſage will in no wiſe permit. And thus much haue I thought good to note by the waie. Now to returne againe to Leland, and other mens collections.

Foſſe.

The next tidings that we heare of the Watling ſtreet, are that it goeth thorough or neere by the parke at Pomfret, as the common voice alſo of the countrie confirmeth. Thence it paſſeth haſtilie ouer Caſtelford bridge to Aberford, which is fiue miles from thence, and where are moſt manifeſt tokens of this ſtreet and his broad creſt by a great waie together, alſo to Yorke, to Witherbie, and then to Borowbridge, where on the left hand thereof ſtood certeine monuments, or pyramides of ſtone, ſometimes placed there by the ancient Romanes. Theſe ſtones (ſaith Leland) ſtand eight miles weſt from Bowis, and almoſt weſt from Richmond is a little thorough fare called Maiden caſtell, ſituate apparantlie vpon the ſide of this ſtreet. And here is one of thoſe pyramides or great round heapes, which is three ſcore foot compaſſe in the bottome. There are other alſo of leſſe quantities, and on the verie top of ech of them are ſharpe ſtones of a yard in length; but the greateſt of all is eightéene foot high at the leaſt, from the ground to the verie head. He addeth moreouer, how they ſtand on an hill in the edge of Stanes more, and are as bounds betwéene Richmondſhire, and Weſtmerland. But to proceed. This ſtreet lieng a mile from Gilling, and two miles from Richmond commeth on from Borowbridge to Catericke, eightéene miles; that is, twelue to Leuing, & ſix to Catericke; then eleuen miles to Greteie or Gritto, fiue miles to Bottles, eight miles to Burgh on Stanes more, foure miles from Aplebie, and fiue to Browham, where the ſaid ſtreet commeth thorough Winſoll parke, and ouer the bridge on Etemouth and Loder, and leauing Perith a quarter of a mile or more on the weſt ſide of it, goeth to Carleill ſeuentéene miles from Browham, which hath béene ſome notable thing. Hitherto it appeareth euidentlie, but going from hence into Scotland, I heare no more of it, vntill I come to Cathneſſe, which is two hundred and thirtie miles or thereabouts out of England.

Erming ſtreet.

The Erming ſtreet, which ſome call the Telme, ſtretcheth out of the eaſt, as they ſaie, into the ſouth eaſt, that is, from Menevia or S. Dauids in Wales vnto Southampton, whereby it is ſomewhat likelie indeed that theſe two waies, I meane the Foſſe and the Erming, ſhould met about Cirnceſter, as it commeth from Glouceſter, according to the opinion conceiued of them in that countrie. Of this waie I find no more written, and therefore I can ſaie no more of it, except I ſhould indeuor to driue awaie the time, in alleging what other men ſay thereof, whoſe minds do ſo farre diſagree one from another, as they do all from a truth, and therefore I giue them ouer as not delighting in ſuch dealing.

Ikenild.

The Ikenild or Rikenild began ſomewhere in the ſouth, and ſo held on toward Cirnceſter, then to Worceſter, Wicombe, Brimcham, Lichfield, Darbie, Cheſterfield; and croſſing the Watling ſtreet ſomewhere in Yorkſhire, ſtretched forth in the end vnto the mouth of the Tine, where it ended at the maine ſea, as moſt men do confeſſe. I take it to be called the Ikenild, becauſe it paſſed thorough the kingdome of the Icenes. For albeit that Leland & other following him do ſéeme to place the Icenes in Norfolke and Suffolke; yet in mine opinion that can not well be done, ſith it is manifeſt by Tacitus, that they laie néere vnto the Silures, and (as I geſſe) either in Stafford and Worceſter ſhires, or in both, except my coniecture do faile me. The author of the booke, intituled Eulogium hiſtoriarum, doth call this ſtreet the Telme. But as herein he is deceiued, ſo haue I dealt withall ſo faithfullie as I may among ſuch diuerſitie of opinions; yet not denieng but that there is much confuſion in the names and courſes of theſe two latter, the diſcuſſing whereof I muſt leaue to other men that are better learned than I.

Now to ſpeake generallie of our common high waies through the Engliſh part of the Ile (for of the reſt I can ſaie nothing) you ſhall vnderſtand that in the claie or clodgie ſoile they are often verie déepe and troubleſome in the winter halfe. Wherefore by authoritie of parlement an order is taken for their yearelie amendment, whereby all sorts of the common people doo imploie their trauell for six daies in summer vpon the same. And albeit that the intent of the statute is verie profitable for the reparations of the decaied places, yet the rich doo so cancell their portions, and the poore so loiter in their labours, that of all the six, scarcelie two good days works are well performed and accomplished in a parish on these so necessarie affaires. Besides this, such as haue land lieng vpon the sides of the waies, doo vtterlie neglect to dich and scowre their drains and watercourses, for better auoidance of the winter waters (except it may be set off or cut from the meaning of the statute) whereby the streets doo grow to be much more gulled than before, and thereby verie noisome for such as trauell by the same. Sometimes also, and that verie often, these daies works are not imploied vpon those waies that lead from market to market, but ech surueior amendeth such by-plots & lanes as séeme best for his owne commoditie, and more easie passage vnto his fields and pastures. And whereas in some places there is such want of stones, as thereby the inhabitants are driuen to séeke them farre off in other soiles: the owners of the lands wherein those stones are to be had, and which hitherto haue giuen monie to haue them borne awaie, doo now reape no small commoditie by raising the same to excessiue prices, whereby their neighbours are driuen to grieuous charges, which is another cause wherefore the meaning of that good law is verie much defrauded. Finallie, this is another thing likewise to be considered of, that the trées and bushes growing by the streets sides, doo not a little keepe off the force of the sunne in summer for drieng vp of the lanes. Wherefore if order were taken that their boughs should continuallie be kept short, and the bushes not suffered to spread so far into the narrow paths, that inconuenience would also be remedied, and manie a slough proue hard ground that yet is deepe and hollow. Of the dailie incroching of the couetous vpon the hie waies I speake not. But this I know by experience, that whereas some streets within these fiue and twentie yeares haue béene in most places fiftie foot broad according to the law, whereby the traueller might either escape the théeue, or shift the mier, or passe by the loaden cart without danger of himselfe and his horsse; now they are brought vnto twelue, or twentie, or six and twentie at the most, which is another cause also whereby the waies be the worse, and manie an honest man encombred in his iourneie. But what speake I of these things whereof I doo not thinke to heare a iust redresse, because the error is so common, and the benefit thereby so sweet and profitable to manie, by such houses and cottages as are raised vpon the same.

Of the generall constitution of the bodies of the Britons.

Chap. 20.

Such as are bred in this Iland are men for the most part of a good complexion, tall of stature, strong in bodie, white of colour, and thereto of great boldnesse and courage in the warres. As for their generall comelinesse of person, the testimonie of Gregorie the great, at such time as he saw English capteins sold at Rome, shall easilie confirme what it is, which yet doth differ in sundrie shires and soiles, as also their proportion of members, as we may perceiue betweene Herefordshire and Essex men; or Cambridgeshire and the Londoners for the one, and Pokington and Sedberrie for the other; these latter being distinguished by their noses and heads, which commonlie are greater there than in other places of the land. As concerning the stomachs also of our nation in the field, they haue alwaies béene in souereigne admiration among forren princes: for such hath béene the estimation of our souldiers from time to time, since our Ile hath béene knowne vnto the Romans, that whersoeuer they haue serued in forren countries, the chéefe brunts of seruice haue béene reserued vnto them. Of their conquests and bloudie battels woone in France, Germanie, and Scotland, our histories are full: & where they haue béene ouercome, the victorers themselues confessed their victories to haue béene so dearelie bought, that they would not gladlie couet to ouercome often, after such difficult maner. In martiall prowesse, there is little or no difference betweene Englishmen and Scots: for albeit that the Scots haue béene often and verie grieuouslie ouercome by the force of our nation, it hath not béene for want of manhod on their parts, but through the mercie of God shewed on vs, and his iustice vpon them, sith they alwaies haue begun the quarels, and offered vs méere iniurie with great despite and crueltie.

Leland noting somewhat of the constitution of our bodies, saith these words grounding (I thinke vpon Aristotle, who writeth that such as dwell neere the north, are of more courage and strength of bodie than skilfulnesse or wisdome.) The Britons are white in colour, strong of bodie, and full of bloud, as people inhabiting neere the north, and farre from the equinoctiall line, where the soile is not so fruitfull, and therefore the people not so faeble: whereas contrariwise such as dwell toward the course of the sunne, are lesse of stature, weaker of bodie, more nice, delicate, fearefull by nature, blacker in colour, & some so blacke in déed as anie crow or rauen. Thus saith he. Howbeit, as those which are bred in sundrie places of the maine, doo come behind vs in constitution of bodie, so I grant, that in pregnancie of wit, nimblenesse of limmes, and politike inuentions, they generallie exceed vs: notwithstanding that otherwise these gifts of theirs doo often degenerate into méere subtiltie, instabilitie, vnfaithfulnesse, & crueltie. Yet Alexander ab Alexandro is of the opinion, that the fertilest region doth bring forth the dullest wits, and contrariwise the harder soile the finest heads. But in mine opinion, the most fertile soile doth bring forth the proudest nature, as we may see by the Campanians, who (as Cicero also saith) had Penes eos ipsum domicilium superbiæ. But wether of these opinions do iustlie take hold of vs, yet hath it pleased the writers to faie their pleasures of vs. And for that we dwell northward, we are commonlie taken by the forren historiographers, to be men of great strength and little policie, much courage and small shift, because of the weake abode of the sunne with vs, whereby our braines are not made hot and warmed, as Pachymerus noteth lib. 3: affirming further, that the people inhabiting in the north parts are white of colour, blockish vncouth, fierce and warlike, which qualities increase, as they come neerer vnto the pole; whereas the contrarie pole giueth contrarie gifts, blacknesse wisdome, ciuilitie, weakenesse, and cowardise, thus saith he. But alas, how farre from probabilitie or as if there were not one and the same conclusion to be made of the constitutions of their bodies, which dwell vnder both the poles. For in truth his assertion holdeth onelie in their persons that inhabit neere vnto and vnder the equinoctiall. As for the small tarriance of the sunne with vs, it is also confuted by the length of our daies. Wherefore his reaſon ſeemeth better to vphold that of Alexander ab Alexandro afore alledged, than to proue that we want wit, becauſe our brains are not warmed by the tartance of the ſunne. And thus alſo doth Comineus burden vs after a ſort in his hiſtorie, and after him Bodinus. But thanked be God, that all the wit of his countriemen, if it may be called wit, could neuer compaſſe to doo ſo much in Britaine, as the ſtrength and courage of our Engliſhmen (not without great wiſedome and forecaſt) haue brought to paſſe in France. The Galles in time paſt contemned the Romans (ſaith Cæſar) becauſe of the ſmalneſſe of their ſtature: howbeit, for all their greatneſſe (ſaith he) and at the firſt brunt in the warres, they ſhew themſelues to be but feeble, neither is their courage of any force to ſtand in great calamities. Certes in accuſing our wiſedome in this ſort, he doth (in mine opinion) increaſe our commendation. For if it be a vertue to deale vprightlie with ſingleneſſe of mind, ſincerelie and plainlie, without anie ſuch ſuſpicious fetches in all our dealings, as they commonlie practiſe in all their affaires, then are our countrimen to be accompted wiſe and vertuous. But if it be a vice to colour craftineſſe, ſubtile practiſes, doubleneſſe, and hollow behauiour, with a cloake of policie, amitie and wiſedome: then are Comineus and his countrimen to be reputed vicious, of whome this prouerbe hath of old time beene vſed as an eare marke of their diſſimulation, Galli ridendo fidem frangunt.

How theſe latter points take hold in Italie, I meane not to diſcuſſe. How they are dailie practiſed in manie places of the maine, & he accompted moſt wiſe and politike, that can moſt of all diſſemble; here is no place iuſtlie to determine (neither would I wiſh my countrimen to learne anie ſuch wiſedome) but that a king of France could ſaie; Qui neſcit diſſimulare, neſcit regnare, or viuere, their owne hiſtories are teſtimonies ſufficient. Galen, the noble phyſician, tranſferring the forces of our naturall humors from the bodie to the mind, attributeth to the yellow colour, prudence; to the blacke, conſtancie; to bloud, mirth; to phlegme, courteſie: and which being mixed more or leſſe among themſelues, doo yeeld an infinit varietie: by this means therefore it commeth to paſſe, that he whoſe nature inclineth generallie to phlegme, cannot but be courteous: which ioined with ſtrength of bodie, and ſinceritie of behauiour (qualities vniuerſallie granted to remaine ſo well in our nation, as other inhabitants of the north) I cannot ſee what may be an hinderance vnto I ſhould not rather conclude, that the Britons doo excell ſuch as dwell in the hoter countries, than for want of craft and ſubtilties to come anie whit behind them. It is but vanitie alſo for ſome to note vs (as I haue often heard in common table talke) as barbarous, becauſe we ſo little regard the ſhedding of our bloud, and rather tremble not when we ſee the liquor of life to go from vs (I vſe their owne words.) Certes if we be barbarous in their eies, becauſe we be rather inflamed than appalled at our wounds, then are thoſe obiectors flat cowards in our iudgement: ſith we thinke it a great peece of manhood to ſtand to our tackling, vntill the laſt drop, as men that may ſpare much becauſe we haue much: whereas they hauing leſſe are afraid to loſe that little which they haue: as Frontinus alſo noteth. As for that which the French write of their owne manhood in their hiſtories, I make little accompt of it: for I am of the opinion, that an Italian writing of his credit; A papiſt intreating of religion, a Spaniard of his mekeneſſe, or a Scot of his manhood, is not to be builded on; no more is a Frenchman to be truſted in the report of his owne affaires, wherein he doth either diſſemble or exceed, which is a foule vice in ſuch as profeſſe to deale vprightlie. Neither are we ſo hard to ſtrangers as Horace would ſeeme to make vs, ſith we loue them ſo long as they abuſe vs not, & make accompt of them ſo far forth as they deſpiſe vs not. And this is generallie to be verified, in that they vſe our priuileges and commodities for diet, apparell and trade of gaine, in ſo ample manner as we our ſelues enioy them: which is not lawfull for vs to doo in their countries, where no ſtranger is ſuffered to haue woorke, if an home-borne be without. But to proceed with our purpoſe.

With vs, although our good men care not to liue long, but to liue well, ſome doo liue an hundred yeers, verie manie vnto foure ſcore: as for three ſcore, it is taken but for our entrance into age, ſo that in Britaine no man is ſaid to wax old till he draw vnto three ſcore, at which time God ſpeed you well commeth in place; as Epaminondas ſometime ſaid in mirth, affirming that vntill thirtie yeares of age, You are welcome is the beſt ſalutation; and from thence to three ſcore, God keepe you; but after three ſcore, it is beſt to ſaie, God ſpeed you well: for at that time we begin to grow toward our iournies end, whereon manie a one haue verie good leaue to go. Theſe two are alſo noted in vs (as things apperteining to the firme conſtitutions of our bodies) that there hath not beene ſeene in anie region ſo manie carcaſſes of the dead to remaine from time to time without corruption as in Britaine: and that after death by ſlaughter or otherwiſe, ſuch as remaine vnburied by foure or fiue daies togither, are eaſie to be knowne and diſcerned by their freends and kindred; whereas Tacitus and other complaine of ſundrie nations, ſaieng, that their bodies are Tam fluidæ ſubſtantiæ, that within certeine houres the wife ſhall hardlie know hir husband, the mother hir ſonne, or one freend another after their liues be ended. In like ſort the comelineſſe of our liuing bodies doo continue from midle age (for the moſt) euen to the laſt gaſpe, ſpeciallie in mankind. And albeit that our women through bearing of children doo after fortie begin to wrinkle apace, yet are they not commonlie ſo wretched and hard fauoured to looke vpon in their age, as the French women, and diuerſe of other countries with whom their men alſo doo much participate; and thereto be ſo often waiward and peeuiſh, that nothing in maner may content them.

I might here adde ſomewhat alſo of the meane ſtature generallie of our women, whoſe beautie commonlie exceedeth the faireſt of thoſe of the maine, their comlineſſe of perſon and good proportion of limmes, moſt of theirs that come ouer vnto vs from beyond the ſeas. This neuertheleſſe I vtterlie miſlike in the paier ſort of them, for the wealthier doo ſildome offend herein: that being of themſelues without competent wit, they are ſo careleſſe in the education of their children (wherein their huſbands alſo are to be blamed) by means whereof verie manie of them neither fearing God, neither regarding either maners or obedience, doo oftentimes come to confuſion, which (if anie correction or diſcipline had beene vſed toward them in youth) might haue prooued good members of their common-wealth & countrie, by their good ſeruice and induſtrie. I could make report likewiſe of the naturall vices and vertues of all thoſe that are borne within this Iland, but as the full tractation herof craueth a better head than mine: to ſet forth the ſame, ſo will I giue place to other men that liſt to take it in hand. Thus much therefore of the conſtitutions of our bodies: and ſo much may ſuffice.

Cap. 21.

AFter the comming of Brutus into this Iland (which was, as you haue read in the foreſaid treatiſe, about the yeare of the world, 2850, or 1217 before the incarnation of Chriſt, although Goropius after his maner doo vtterlie denie our hiſtorie in this behalfe) he made a generall ſurueis of the whole Iland from ſide to ſide, by ſuch means to view and ſearch out not onelie the limits and bounds of his dominions, but alſo what commodities this new atchiued conqueſt might yéeld vnto his people. Furthermore, finding out at the laſt alſo a conuenable place wherin to erect a citie, he began there euen the verie ſame which at this date is called London, naming it Trenouanton, in remembrance of old Troie, from whence his anceſtors proceeded, and for which the Romans pronounced afterward Trinobantum, although the Welſhmen doo call it ſtill Trenewith. This citie was builded (as ſome write) much about the tenth yeare of his reigne, ſo that he liued not aboue fiftéene yeares after he had finiſhed the ſame. But of the reſt of his other acts attempted and donne, before or after the erection of this citie, I find no certeine report, more than that when he had reigned in this Iland after his arriuall by the ſpace of foure and twentie yeares, he finiſhed his daies at Trenouanton aforeſaid, being in his yong and flouriſhing age, where his carcaſe was honourablie interred. As for the maner of his death, I find as yet no mention thereof among ſuch writers as are extant; I meane whether it grew vnto him by defect of nature, or force of gréeuous wounds receiued in his warres againſt ſuch as withſtood him from time to time in this Iland, and therefore I can ſaie nothing of that matter. Herein onelie all agree, that during the time of his languiſhing paines, he made a diſpoſition of his whole kingdome, diuiding it into three parts or portions, according to the number of his ſonnes then liuing, whereof the eldeſt exceeded not eight and twentie yeares of age, as my coniecture giueth me.

Locrine. To the eldeſt therefore, whoſe name was Locrine, he gaue the greateſt and beſt region of all the reſt, which of him to this date is called Lhoegris. Lhoegris among the Britons, but in our language England: of ſuch Engliſh Saxons as made conqueſt of the ſame. This portion alſo is included on the ſouth with the Britiſh ſea, on the eſt with the Germane Ocean, on the north with the Humber, and on the weſt with the Iriſh ſea, and the riuers Dee and Sauerne, whereof in the generall deſcription of this Iland I haue ſpoken more at large. To Camber his ſecond ſonne he Camber. Cambria. aſſigned all that lieth beyond the Sauerne and Dée, toward the weſt (which parcell in theſe daies conteineth Southwales and Northwales) with ſundrie Ilands adiacent to the ſame, the whole being in maner cut off and ſeparated from England or Lhoegria by the ſaid ſtreams, wherby it ſéemeth alſo a peninſula or by-land, if you reſpect the ſmall hillie portion of ground that lieth indifferentlie betweene their maine courſes, or ſuch branches (at the leaſt) as run and fall into them. The Welſhmen or Britons call it by the ancient name ſtill vnto this day, but we Engliſhmen terme it Wales: which denomination we haue from the Saxons, who in time paſt did vſe the word Walſh in ſuch ſort as we doo Strange: for as we call all thoſe ſtrangers that are not of our nation, ſo did they name them Walſh which were not of their countrie.

The third and laſt part of the Iland he allotted vnto Albanact his yongeſt ſonne (for he had but three in all, as I haue ſaid before) whoſe portion ſéemed for circuit to be more large than that of Camber, and in maner equall in greatneſſe with the dominions of Locrinus. But if you haue regard to the ſeuerall commodities that are to be reaped by each, you ſhall find them to be not much diſcrepant or differing one from another: for what ſoeuer the firſt & ſecond haue in plentie of corne, fine graſſe, and large cattell, this latter wanteth not in exceeding ſtore of fiſh, rich mettall, quarries of ſtone, and abundance of wild foule: ſo that in mine opinion, there could not be a more equall partition than this made by Brute, and after the aforeſaid maner. This later parcell at the firſt, toke the name of Albanactus, who called it Albania. Albanact. But now a ſmall portion onelie of the region (being vnder the regiment of a duke) reteineth the ſaid denomination, the reſt being called Scotland, of certeine Scots that came ouer from Ireland to inhabit in thoſe quarters. It is diuided from Lhoegres Albania. alſo by the Solue and the Firth, yet ſome doo note the Humber; ſo that Albania (as Brute left it) conteined all the north part of the Iland that is to be found beyond the aforeſaid ſtreame, vnto the point of Cathneſſe.

To conclude, Brute hauing diuided his kingdome after this maner, and therein contenting himſelfe as it were with the generall title of the whole, it was not long after yer he ended his life; and being ſolemnelie interred at his new citie by his three children, they parted each from other, and toke poſſeſſion of their prouinces. But Scotland after two Locrine king alſo of Scotland. yeares fell againe into the hands of Locrinus as to the chiefe lord, by the death of his brother Albanact, who was ſlaine by Humber king of the Scithians, and left none iſſue behind him to ſucceed him in that kingdome.

After what maner the ſouereigntie of this Ile dooth remaine to the princes of Lhoegres or kings of England.

Chap. 22.

IT is poſſible that ſome of the Scotiſh nation, reading the former chapter, will take offenſe with me for meaning that the principalitie of the north parts of this Ile hath alwais belonged to the kings of Lhoegres. For whoſe more ample ſatisfaction in this behalfe, I will here ſet downe a diſcourſe there of at large, written by diuerſe, and now finallie brought into one treatiſe, ſufficient (as I thinke) to ſatiſfie the reaſonable, although not halfe enough peraduenture to content a wrangling mind, ſith there is (or at the leaſt wiſe hath beene) nothing more odious among ſome, than to heare that the king of England hath ought to doo in Scotland. The Scots alwaies deſirous to ſhake off the Engliſh ſubiection, haue often made cruell & odious attempts ſo to doo, but in vaine.

How their hiſtoriographers haue attempted to ſhape manie coloured circules to auoid ſo manifeſt a title, all men may ſee that read their bookes indifferentlie, whereunto I referre them. For my part there is little or nothing of mine herein, more than onelie the collection and abridgement of a number of fragments togither, wherein chéeflie I haue vſed the helpe of Nicholas Adams a lawier, who wrote thereof thereof (of ſet purpoſe) to king Edward the firſt, as Leland did the like to king Henrie the eight, Iohn Harding vnto Edward the fourth; beſide three other, whereof the firſt dedicated his treatiſe to Henrie the fourth, the ſecond to Edward the third, and the third to Edward the firſt, as their writings yet extant do abundantlie beare witneſſe. The title alſo that Leland giueth his booke, which I haue had written with his owne hand, beginneth in this maner: "Theſe remembrances following are found in chronicles authoriſed, remaining in diuerſe monaſteries both in England and Scotland, by which it is euidentlie knowne and ſhewed, that the kings of England haue had, and now ought to haue the ſouereigntie ouer all Scotland, with the homage and fealtie of the kings there reigning from time to time, &c. Hereunto you haue heard alreadie, what diuiſion Brute made of this Iland not long before his death, whereof each of his children, ſo ſone as he was interred, toke ſeiſure and poſſeſſion. Howbeit, after two yeares it happened that Albanact was ſlaine, whereupon Locrinus and Camber raiſing their powers, reuenged his death: and finallie the ſaid Locrinus made an entrance vpon Albania, ſeized it into his owne hands (as eſcheated wholie vnto himſelfe) without yeelding anie part thereof vnto his brother Camber, who made no claime nor title vnto anie portion of the ſame. Hereby then (ſaith Adams) it euidentlie appeareth, that the entire ſeigniorie ouer Albania conſiſted in Locrinus, according to which example like law among brethren euer ſince hath continued, in preferring the eldeſt brother to the onelie benefit of the collaterall aſcenſion from the youngeſt, as well in Scotland as in England vnto this date.

Ebranke the lineall heire from the bodie of this Locrine, that is to ſaie, the ſonne of Empris, ſonne of Padan, ſonne of the ſame Locrine builded in Albania the caſtell of Maidens, now called Edenborough (ſo called of Aidan ſomtime king of Scotland, but at the firſt named Cair Minid Agnes. i. the caſtell on mount Agnes, and the caſtell of virgins) and the caſtell of Alcluith or Alclude, now called Dunbriton, as the Scotiſh Hector Boetius confeſſeth: whereby it moſt euidentlie appeareth, that our Ebranke was then thereof ſeized. This Ebranke reigned in the ſaid ſtate ouer them a long time; after whoſe death Albania (as annexed to the empire of Britaine) deſcended to the onelie king of Britons, vntill the time of the two ſiſters ſonnes, Morgan and Conedage, lineall heires from the ſaid Ebranke, who brotherlie at the firſt diuided the realme betweene them; ſo that Morgan had Lhoegres, and Conedage had Albania. But ſhortlie after Morgan the elder brother, pondering in his head the loue of his brother with the affection to a kingdome, excluded nature, and gaue place to ambition, and therevpon denouncing warre, death miſerablie ended his life (as the reward of his vntruth) whereby Conedage obteined the whole empire of all Britaine: in which ſtate he remained during his naturall life.

From him the ſame lineallie deſcended to the onelie king of Britons, vntill (and after) the reigne of Gorbodian, who had iſſue two ſonnes, Ferrer, and Porrex. This Porrex, requiring like diuiſion of the land, affirming the former partitions to be rather of law than fauor, was by the hands of his elder brother (beſt loued of queene mother) both of his life and hoped kingdome bereaued at once. Whereupon their vnnaturall mother, bling hir naturall malice for the death of hir one ſonne (without regard of the loſing of both) miſerablie ſlue the other in his bed miſtruſting no ſuch treaſon.

Cloten, by all writers, as well Scotiſh as other, was the next inheritour to the whole empire: but lacking power (the onelie meane in thoſe daies to obteine right) he was contented to diuide the ſame among foure of his kinſmen; ſo that Scater had Albania. But after the death of this Cloten, his ſonne Dunwallo Mulmutius made warre vpon theſe foure kings, and at laſt ouercame them, and ſo recouered the whole dominion. In token of which victorie, he cauſed himſelfe to be crowned with a crowne of gold, the verie firſt of that mettall (if anie at all were before in vſe) that was worne among the kings of this nation. This Dunwallo erected temples, wherein the people ſhould aſſemble for prater; to which temples he gaue benefit of ſanctuarie. He made the law for wager of battell, in caſes of murder and felonie, whereby a theefe that liued and made his art of fighting, ſhould for his purgation fight with the true man whom he had robbed, beleeuing aſſuredlie, that the gods (for then they ſuppoſed manie) would by miracle aſſigne victorie to none but the innocent partie. Certes the priuileges of this law, and benefit of the latter, as well in Scotland as in England, be inioied to this date, few cauſes by late poſitiue laws among vs excepted, wherin the benefit of wager of battell is reſtreined. By which obedience to his lawes, it doth manifeſtlie appeere, that this Dunwallo was then ſeized of Albania, now called Scotland. This Dunwallo reigned in this eſtate ouer them manie yeares.

Beline and Brenne the ſonnes alſo of Dunwallo, did after their fathers death fauourablie diuide the land betweene them; ſo that Beline had Lhoegres, & Brenne had Albania: but for that this Brenne (a ſubiect) without the conſent of his elder brother and lord, aduentured to marrie with the daughter of the king of Denmarke; Beline ſeized Albania into his owne hands, and therevpon cauſed the notable wales priuileged by Dunwallons lawes to be newlie wrought by mens hands, which for the length extended from the further part of Cornewall, vnto the ſea by north Cathneſſe in Scotland. In like ſort to and for the better maintenance of religion in thoſe daies, he conſtituted miniſters called archflamines, in ſundrie places of this Iland (who in their ſeuerall functions reſembled the biſhops of our times) the one of which remained at Ebranke now called Yorke, and the whole region Caerbrantonica (whereof Ptolomie alſo ſpeaketh but not without wreſting of the name) whoſe power extended to the vttermoſt bounds of Albania, wherby likewiſe appeareth that it was then within his owne dominion. After his death the whole Ile was inioied by the onelie kings of Britaine, vntill the time of Vigenius & Peridurus lineall heires from the ſaid Beline, who fauourablie made partition, ſo that Vigenius had all the land from Humber by ſouth, and Peridurus from thence northwards all Albania, &c. This Vigenius died, and Peridurus ſuruiued, and thereby obteined the whole, from whom the ſame quietlie deſcended, and was by his poſteritie accordinglie inioied, vntill the reigne of Coell the firſt of that name. In his time an obſcure nation (by moſt writers ſuppoſed Scithians) paſſed by ſeas from Ireland, and arriued in that part of Britaine called Albania: againſt whome this Coell aſſembled his power, and being entred Albania to expell them, one Fergus in the night diſguiſed, entered the tent of this Coell, and in his bed traitorouſlie ſlue him.

This Fergus was therfore, in reward of his great prowelle, made there king, wherupon they ſat downe in that part, with their wiues and children, and called it Scotland, and themſelues Scots: from the beginning of the world, foure thouſand ſix hundred and ſeauentéene yeares after the Scotiſh accompt, which by iuſt computation and confeſſion of all their owne writers, is ſix hundred yeares lacking ten, after that

Brutus

Brutus had reigned ouer the whole Iland, the ſame land being inioied by him and his poſteritie before their comming, during two and fiftie deſcents of the kings of Britaine, which is a large preſcription. Certes this intruſion into a land ſo manie hundred yeares before inhabited, and by ſo manie deſcents of kings quietlie inioied, is the beſt title that all their owne writers can alledge for them. But to proceed. Fergus hereupon immediatlie did diuide Albania alſo among his capteins and their ſouldiers: whereby it moſt euidentlie appeareth, that there were no people of that nation inhabiting there before, in proofe whereof the ſame partition ſhall follow.

Out of Hector Boecius lib. 1.

The lands of Cathnes lieng againſt Orkneie, betweene Dunmeſbeie and the water of Thane, was giuen vnto one Cognath, a capteine and his people. The lands betweene the water of Thane & Nes, now called Roſſe, being in breadth from Cromart to the mouth of the water of Locht, were giuen to Lutorke, another capteine and his people. The lands betweene Spaie and Nes, from the Almane ſeas to the Ireland ſeas, now called Murraie land, were giuen to one Warroch and his people. The land of Thalia, now called Boin Ainze, Bogewall, Gariot, Formartine, and Bolwguhan, were giuen to one Thalis and his people. The lands of Mar Badezenoch, and Lochquhaber, were giuen to Martach and his people. The lands of Lorne and Kintier, with the hilles and mounteins thereof, lieng from Mar to the Ireland ſeas, were giuen to capteine Nanance and his people. The lands of Athole were giuen to Atholus, another capteine and his people. The lands of Strabraun, & Brawdalwane lieng weſt from Dunkell, were giuen to Creones & Epidithes two capteins. The lands of Argile, were giuen to Argathelus a capteine. The lands of Linnor & Clidiſdale were allotted to Lolgona a capteine. The lands of Siluria now called Kile, Carrike & Cuningham, were giuen to Silurth another capteine. The lands of Brigance now called Gallowaie, were giuen to the companie called Brigandes, which (as their beſt men) were appointed to dwell next the Britons, who afterward expelled the Britons from Annandale in Albanie, whereby it is confeſſed to be before inhabited by Britons. The reſidue of the land now called Scotland, that is to ſaie: Meirnis, Angus, Steremond, Gowrie, Strahern, Pirth, Fiſſe, Striueling, Callender, Calderwood, Lougthian, Mers, Teuedale, with other the rement Dales, and the Sheriffdome, of Berwicke, were then enioied by a nation mingled in marriage with the Britons, and in their obedience, whoſe capteine called Beringer builded the caſtell and towne of Berwicke vpon Twede, & theſe people were called Picts, vpon whome by the death of this Coell, theſe Scots had opportunitie to vſe wars, whereof they ceaſed not, vntill ſuch time as it pleaſed God to appoint another Coell king of Britons, againſt whoſe name, albeit they hoped for a like victorie to the firſt, yet he preuailed and ceaſed not his warre, vntill theſe Scots were vtterlie expelled out of all the bounds of Britaine, in which they neuer dared to reenter, vntill the troubleſome reigne of Sicill king of Britons, which was the twelft king after this Coell. During all which time the countrie was reinhabited by the Britons. But then the Scots turning the ciuill diſcord of this realme, betweene this Sicill and his brother Blede to their beſt aduantage, arriued againe in Albania, & there made one Reuther their king.

Berouicum potiùs à Berubio promontorio.

Upon this their new arriuall, new warre was made vpon them by this Sicill king of Britons, in which warre Reuther their new king died, and Hereus ſucceeded, againſt whome the warre of Britons ceaſed not, vntill he freelie ſubmitted himſelfe to the ſaid Sicill king of Britons at Ebranke, that is Yorke, where ſhortlie after the tenth yeare of his reigne he died. Finnane brother of Ioſine ſucceeded by their election to the kingdome of Scots, who ſhortlie after (compelled by the warres of the ſame Sicill) declared himſelfe ſubiect, and for the better aſſurance of his faith and obeiſance to the king of Britons, deliuered his ſonne Durſtus into the hands of this Sicill: who fantaſieng the child, and hoping by his owne ſucceſſion to alter their ſubtiltie (I will not ſaie duplicitie ſaith Adams) married him in the end to Agaſia his owne daughter.

This Durſtus was their next king; but for that he had married a Briton woman, (though indeed ſhe was a kings daughter) the Scots hated him for the ſame cauſe, for which they ought rather to haue liked him the better, and therefore not onelie traitorouſlie ſlue him; but further to declare the end of their malice, diſinherited (as much as in them was) the iſſues of the ſame Durſtus and Agaſia. Hereupon new warre ſprong betweene them and vs, which ceaſed not vntill they were contented to receiue Edeir to their king, the next in bloud then liuing, deſcended from Durſtus and Agaſia, and thereby the bloud of the Britons, of the part of the mother, was reſtored to the crowne of Albania: ſo that nature, whoſe law is immutable, cauſed this bond of loue to hold. For ſhortlie after this Edeir attended vpon Caſſibelane king of Britons, for the repulſe of Iulius Cæſar, as their owne author Boetius confeſſeth, who commanded the ſame as his ſubiect. But Iulius Cæſar, after his third arriuall, by treaſon of Androgeus preuailed againſt the Britons, and thereupon purſued this Edeir into Scotland; and (as himſelfe ſaith in his commentaries) ſubdued all the Ile of Britaine. Which though the liuing Scots denie it, their dead writers confeſſe that he came beyond Calender wood, and caſt downe Camelon, the principall citie of Picts. And in token of this victorie, not farre from Carron, builded a round temple of ſtone, which remained in ſome perfection vntill the reigne of our king Edward called the firſt after the conqueſt, by whome it was ſubuerted: but the monument thereof remaineth to this daie.

Marius the ſonne of Aruiragus, being king of all Britaine, in his time one Roderike a Scithian, with a great rabble of needie ſouldiours, came to the water of Frith in Scotland, which is an arme of the ſea, diuiding Pentland from Fiſſe: againſt whome this Marius aſſembled a power, by which he ſlue this Rodericke, and diſcomfited his people in Weſtmerland: but to thoſe that remained aliue, he gaue the countrie of Cathneſſe in Scotland, which proueth it to be within his owne dominion.

Coell the ſonne of this Marius had iſſue Lucius, counted the firſt chriſtian king of this nation: he conuerted the three archflamines of this land into biſhoprikes, and ordeined biſhops vnto ech of them. The firſt remained at London, and his power extended from the furtheſt part of Cornewall to Humber water. The ſecond remained at Yorke, and his power ſtretched from Humber to the furtheſt part of all Scotland. The third remained at Caerleon vpon the riuer of Wiſke in Glamorgan in Wales, & his power extended from Seuerne through all Wales. Some write that he made but two, and turned their names to archbiſhops, the one to remaine at Canturburie, the other at Yorke: yet they confeſſe that he of Yorke had iuriſdiction through all Scotland: either of which is ſufficient to proue Scotland to be then vnder his dominion.

Seuerus, by birth a Romane, but in bloud a Briton (as ſome thinke) and the lineall heire of the bodie bode of Andꝛogeus ſonne of Lud, & nephue of Caſſibelane, was ſhoꝛtlie after emperour & king of Bꝛitons, in whoſe time the people to whom his anceſter Marius gaue the land of Cathneſſe in Scotland, conſpired with the Scots, & receiued them from the Iles into Scotland. But herevpon this Seuerus came into Scotland, and meeting with their faith and falſe harts togither, dꝛoue them all out of the maine land into Iles, the vttermoſt bounds of all great Bꝛitaine. But notwithſtanding this gloꝛious victoꝛie, the Bꝛitons conſidering their ſeruitude to the Romans, impoſed by treaſon of Andꝛogeus, anceſtoꝛ to this Seuerus, began to hate him, whome yet they had no time to loue, and who in their defenſe and ſuertie had ſlaine of the Scots and their confederats in one battell thirtie thouſand: but ſuch was the conſideration of the common ſoꝛt in thoſe daies, whoſe malice no time could diminiſh, noꝛ iuſt deſert appeaſe.

Baſſianus. Antoninus Baſſianus bozne of a Bꝛiton woman, and Geta bozne by a Romane woman, were the ſonnes of this Seuerus, who after the death of their father, by the contrarie voices of their people, contended foꝛ the crowne. Few Bꝛitons held with Baſſianus, fewer Romans with Geta: but the greater number with neither of both. In the end Geta was ſlaine, and Baſſianus remained emperour, againſt whom Carauſius rebelled, who gaue vnto the Scots, Picts, and Scithians, the countrie of Cathneſſe in Scotland, which they afterward inhabited, whereby his ſeiſon thereof appeareth.

Coill. Coill, deſcended of the bloud of the ancient kings of this land, was ſhoꝛtlie after king of the Bꝛitons, whoſe onelie daughter and heire called Helen, was married vnto Conſtantius a Romane, who daunted the rebellion of all parts of great Bꝛitaine; and after the death of this Coill was in the right of his wife king thereof, and reigned in his ſtate ouer them thirteene oꝛ foureteene yeares.

Conſtantine. Conſtantine the ſonne of this Conſtance, and Helen, was nert king of Bꝛitons, by the right of his mother, who paſſing to Rome to receiue the empire thereof, deputed one Octauius king of Wales, and duke of the Gewiſſes (which ſome expound to be afterward called weſt Saxons) to haue the gouernment of this dominion. But abuſing the kings innocent godneſſe, this Octauius deſtrauded this truſt, and tooke vpon him the crowne. Foꝛ which traitoꝛie albeit he was once vanquiſhed by Leonine Traheron, great vncle to Conſtantine: yet after the death of this Traheron, he preuailed againe, and vſurped ouer all Bꝛitaine. Conſtantine being now emperoꝛ ſent Maximus his kinſman hither (in pꝛoceſſe of time) to deſtroie the ſame Octauius, who in ſingular battell diſcomfited him. Whereupon this Maximus, as well by the conſent of great Conſtantine, as by the election of all the Bꝛitons, foꝛ that he was a Bꝛiton in bloud, was made king oꝛ rather vicegerent of Bꝛitaine. This Maximus made warre vpon the Scots and Scithians within Bꝛitaine, and ceaſſed not vntill he had ſlaine Eugenius their king, and expelled and dꝛiuen them out of the whole limits and bounds of Bꝛitaine. Finallie he inhabited all Scotland with Bꝛitons, no man, woman, noꝛ child of the Scotiſh nation ſuffered to remaine within it, which (as their Hector Boetius ſaith) was foꝛ their rebellion; and rebellion pꝛoperlie could it not be, except they had beene ſubiects. He ſuffered the Picts alſo to remaine his ſubiects, who made ſolemne othes to him, neuer after to erect anie peculiar king of their owne nation, but to remaine vnder the old empire of the onelie king of Bꝛitaine. I had once an epiſtle by Leland exemplified (as he ſaith) out of a verie ancient recoꝛd which beareth title of Helena vnto hir ſonne Conſtantine, and entreth after this manner; Domino ſemper Auguſto filio Conſtantino, mater Helena ſemper Auguſta, &c. And now it repenteth me that I did not exemplifie and conuigh it into this treatiſe whileſt I had his booke. Foꝛ thereby I might haue had great light foꝛ the eſtate of this pꝛeſent diſcourſe: but as then I had no mind to haue trauelled in this matter; neuertheleſſe, if hereafter it come againe to light I would wiſh it were reſerued. It followeth on alſo in this maner (as it is tranſlated out of the Greeke) Veritatem ſapientis animus non recuſat, nec fides recta aliquando patitur quamcunque iac-turam, &c.

About fiue and fourtie yeares after this (which was long time after the death of this Maximus) with the helpe of Gouan oꝛ Gonan and Helga, the Scots newlie arriued in Albania, and there created one Fergus the ſecond of that name to be there king. But bicauſe they were beſoꝛe baniſhed the continent land, they crowned him king on their aduenture in Argile, in the fatall chaire of marble, the yeere of our Lord, foure hundꝛed and two and twentie, as they themſelues dw wꝛite.

Maximian. Maximian ſonne of Leonine Traheron, bꝛother to king Coill, and vncle to Helene, was by lineall ſucceſſion nert king of Bꝛitons: but to appeaſe the malice of Dionothus king of Wales, who alſo claimed the kingdome, he maried Othilia eldeſt daughter of Dionothus, and afterwards aſſembled a great power of Bꝛitons, and entered Albania, inuading Gallowaie, Pers, Annandale, Pentland, Carrike, Kill, and Cuningham, and in battell ſlue both this Fergus then king of Scots, and Durſtus the king of Picts, and exiled all their people out of the continent land: whereupon the few number of Scots then remaining a liue, went to Argile, and there made Eugenius their king. When this Maximian had thus obteined quietneſſe in Bꝛitaine, he departed with his couſine Conan Meridocke into Armorica, where they ſubdued the king, and depopulated the countrie, which he gaue to Conan his couſine, to be afterward inhabited by Bꝛitons, by the name of Bꝛitaine the leſſe: and heteof this realme tooke name of Bꝛitaine the great, which name by conſent of foꝛren wꝛiters it kæpeth vnto this daie.

After the death of Maximian, diſſention being moued betweene the nobles of Bꝛitaine, the Scots ſwarmed togither againe, and came to the wall of Adꝛian, where (this realme being diuided in manie factions) they ouercame one. And herevpon their Hector Boetius (as an hen that foꝛ laieng of one eg, will make a great cakeling) ſolemnlie triumphing foꝛ a conqueſt beſoꝛe the victoꝛie, alledgeth that hereby the Bꝛitons were made tributaries to the Scots, and yet he confeſſeth that they won no moꝛe land, by that ſuppoſed conqueſt, but the ſame poꝛtion betweene them and Humber, which in the old partitions beſoꝛe was annexed to Albania. It is hard to be beleeued, that ſuch a bꝛoken nation as the Scots at that time were, returning from baniſhment within foure yeares beſoꝛe, and ſince in battell loſing both their kings, and the great number of their beſt men, to be thus able to make a conqueſt of great Bꝛitaine; and verie vnlikelie if they had conquered it, they would haue left the hot ſunne of the ſouth parts, to dwell in the cold ſnow in Scotland. Incredible it is, that if they had conquered it, they would not haue deputed officers in it, as in caſes of conqueſt behoueth. And it is beyond all beliefe, that great Bꝛitaine, oꝛ any other countrie, ſhould be won without the comming of anie enimie into it: as they did not, but taried finallie at the ſame wall of Adꝛian, whereof I ſpake beſoꝛe.

But what need I ſpeake of theſe defenſes, when the the ſame Boecius ſcantlie truſteth his owne belicfe in this tale. For he ſaieth that Galfride, and ſundrie other authentike writers, diuerſlie varie from this part of his ſtorie, wherein his owne thought accuſeth his conſcience of vntruth: herein alſo he further forgetting how it behoueth a lier to be mindfull of his aſſertion, in the fourth chapter next following, wholie bewraieth himſelfe, ſaieng that the confederat kings of Scots and Picts, vpon ciuill warres betweene the Britons (which then followed) hoped ſhortlie to inioie all the land of great Britaine, from beyond Humber vnto the freth ſea, which hope had bene vaine, and not leſſe than void, if it had béene their owne by anie conqueſt before.

Conſtantine of Britaine, deſcended from Conan king thereof, couſine of Brutes bloud to this Parmian, and his nereſt heire was next king of Britaine, he immediatlie purſued the Scots with wars, and ſhortlie in battell ſlue their king Dongard, in the firſt yeare of his reigne, whereby he recouered Scotland out of their hands, and toke all the holdes thereof into his owne poſſeſſions. Vortiger ſhortlie after obteined the crowne of Britaine, againſt whom the Scots newlie rebelled: for the repreſſing whereof (miſtruſting the Britons to hate him for ſundrie cauſes, as one that to auoid the ſmoke doth oft fall into the fire) receiued Hengeſt a Saxon, and a great number of his countriemen, with whom and a few Britons he entred Scotland & ouercame them, whereupon they toke the Iles, which are their common refuge. He gaue alſo much of Scotland, as Gallowaie, Pentland, Mers and Annandale, with ſundrie other lands to this Hengeſt and his people to inhabit, which they did accordinglie inioie. But when this Hengeſt in proceſſe of time thirſted after the whole kingdome of the ſouth, he was baniſhed, and yet afterward being reſtored, he conſpired with the Scots againſt Aurilambroſe the ſonne of Conſtantine, the iuſt inheritor of this whole dominion. But his vntruth and theirs were both recompenſed togither, for he was taken priſoner by Eldulph de Samor a noble man of Britaine, and his head for his traitorie ſtriken off at the commandement of Aurilambroſe. In the field the Scots were vanquiſhed: but Octa the ſonne of Hengeſt was receiued to mercie, to whome and his people this Aurilambroſe gaue the countrie of Gallowaie in Scotland, for which they became his ſubiects. And hereby appeareth that Scotland was then againe reduced into his hands.

Some thinke the Hetmors to come from this man by lineall deſcent and I ſuppoſe no leſſe.

After called alſo Pendragon, brother to Aurilambroſe was next king of the Britons, againſt whome, theſe ſworne Saxons now foreſworne ſubiects (confederate with the Scots) newlie rebelled: but by his power aſſembled againſt them in Gallowaie in Scotland, they were diſcomfited, & Albania againe recouered vnto his ſubiection. Arthur the ſonne of of this Vter, begotten before the mariage, but lawfullie borne in matrimonie, ſucceéded next to the crowne of great Britaine; whoſe noble acts, though manie vulgar fables haue rather ſtained than commended: yet all the Scotiſh writers confeſſe, that he ſubdued great Britaine, and made it tributarie to him, and ouercame the Saxons then ſcattered as far as Cathneſſe in Scotland: and in all theſe wars againſt them, he had the ſeruice and obeiſance of Scots and Picts. But at the laſt ſetting their feet in the guileſull paths of their predeceſſors, they rebelled and beſieged the citie of Yorke, Howell king of the leſſe Britaine couſine to king Arthur being therein. But he with an hoſt came thither and diſcomfited the Scots, chaſed them into a marſh, and beſieged them there ſo long, that they were almoſt famiſhed: vntill the biſhops, abbats, and men of religion (for as much as they were chriſtened people) beſought him to take them to his mercie and grace, and to grant them a portion of the ſame countrie to dwell in vnder euerlaſting ſubiection. Vpon this he toke them to his grace, homage and fealtie: and when they were ſworne his ſubiects and liegemen, he ordeined his kinſman Anguſian to be their king and gouernour, Urian king of Iland, and Pure-ſrence king of Orkeneie. He made an archbiſhop of Yorke alſo, whoſe authoritie extended through all Scotland.

Finallie, the ſaid Arthur holding his roiall feaſt at Cairleon, had there all the kings that were ſubiects vnto him, among which, Anguſian the ſaid king of Scots did his due ſeruice and homage, ſo long as he was with him for the realme of Scotland, & bare king Arthurs ſword afore him. Malgo ſhortlie after ſucceéded in the whole kingdome of great Britaine, who vpon new reſiſtance made, ſubdued Ireland, Iland, the Orchads, Norwaie and Denmarke, and made Ethelfred a Saxon king of Bernicia, that is, Northumberland, Louthian, and much other land of Scotland, which Ethelfred by the ſword obteined at the hands of the wilfull inhabitants, and continued true ſubiect to this Malgo.

Cadwan ſucceéded in the kingdome of great Britaine, who in defenſe of his ſubiects the Scots, made warre vpon this Ethelfred, but at the laſt they agreéd, and Cadwan vpon their rebellion gaue all Scotland vnto this Ethelfred, which he thereupon ſubdued and inioied: but afterward in the reigne of Cadwallo that next ſucceéded in great Britaine, he rebelled. Wherupon the ſame Cadwallo came into Scotland, and vpon his treaſon reſeiſed the countrie into his owne hands, and hauing with him all the vicerois of the Saxons, which then inhabited here as his ſubiects, in ſingular battell he ſlue the ſame Ethelfred with his owne hands.

Oſwald was ſhortlie after by Cadwallos gift made king of Bernicia, and he as ſubiect to Cadwallo, and by his commandement diſcomfited the Scots and Picts, and ſubdued all Scotland. Oſwie the brother of this Oſwald, was by the like gift of Cadwallo, made next king of Bernicia, and he by like commandement newlie ſubdued the Scots and Picts, and held them in that obeiſance to this Cadwallo, during eight and twentie yeares. Thus Cadwallo reigned in the whole monarchie of great Britaine, hauing all the ſeuen kings thereof, as well Saxons as others his ſubiects: for albeit the number of Saxons from time to time greatlie increaſed, yet were they alwaies either at the firſt expelled, or elſe made tributarie to the onelie kings of Britons for the time being, as all their owne writers do confeſſe.

Cadwallader was next king of the whole great Britaine, he reigned twelue yeares ouer all the kings thereof, in great peace and tranquillitie: and then vpon the lamentable death of his ſubiects, which died of ſundrie diſeaſes innumerablie, he departed into little Britaine. His ſonne and couſine Iuor and Iue, being expelled out of England alſo by the Saxons, went into Wales, where among the Britons they and their poſteritie remained princes. Vpon this great alteration, and warres being through the whole dominion betweéne the Britons and Saxons, the Scots thought time to ſlip the collar of obedience, and thereupon entred in league with Charles then king of France, eſtabliſhing it in this wiſe.

1 The iniurie of Engliſhmen done to anie of theſe people, ſhall be perpetuallie holden common to them both.

2 When Frenchmen be inuaded by Engliſhmen, the Scots ſhall ſend their armie in defenſe of France, ſo that they be ſupported with monie and victuels vittels by the French.

3 When Scots be inuaded by Engliſhmen, the Frenchmen ſhall come vpon their owne expenſes, to their ſupport and ſuccour.

4 None of the people ſhall take peace or truce with Engliſhmen, without the aduiſe of other, &c.

Nicholas Adams.

Manie diſputable opinions may be had of warre without the praiſing of it, as onlie admittable by inforced neceſſitie, and to be vſed for peace ſake onelie, where here the Scots ſought warre for the loue of warre onelie. For their league grueth no benefit to themſelues, either in free traffike of their owne commodities, or benefit of the French, or other priuilege to the people of both. What diſcommoditie riſeth by loſing the intercourſe and exchange of our commodities (being in neceſſaries more aboundant than France) the Scots feele, and we perfectlie know. What ruine of their townes, deſtruction of countries, ſlaughter of both peoples, haue by reaſon of this bloudie league chanced, the hiſtories be lamentable to read, and horrible among chriſtian men to be remembred: but God gaue the increaſe according to their ſeed, for as they did hereby ſowe diſſention, ſo did they ſhortlie after reape a bloudie ſlaughter and confuſion. For Alpine their king, poſſeſſing a light mind that would be loſt with a little wind, hoped by this league ſhortlie to ſubdue all great Britaine, and to that end not onelie rebelled in his owne kingdome, but alſo vſurped vpon the kingdome of Picts. Whervpon Edwine king of England, made one Brudeus king of Picts, whom he ſent into Scotland with a great power, where in battell he tooke this Alpine king of Scots priſoner, and diſcomfited his people. And this Alpine being their king found ſubiect and rebell, his head was ſtriken off at a place in Scotland, which thereof is to this daie called Paſalpine, that is to ſaie, the head of Alpine. And this was the firſt effect of their French league.

Oſbright king of England, with Ella his ſubiect, and a great number of Britons and Saxons ſhortlie after, for that the Scots had of themſelues elected a new king, entered Scotland, and ceaſſed not his warre againſt them, vntill their king and people fled into the Iles, with whome at the laſt vpon their ſubmiſſion, peace was made in this wiſe.

The water of Frith ſhall be march betweene Scots and Engliſhmen in the eaſt parts, and ſhall be named the Scotiſh ſea.

The water of Cluide to Dunbriton, ſhall be march in the weſt parts betweene the Scots and Britons. This caſtell was before called Alcluide, but now Dunbriton, that is to ſay, the caſtle of Britons, and ſometimes it was deſtroied by the Danes. So the Britons had all the lands from Sterling to the Ireland ſeas, and from the water of Frith & Cluide to Cumber, with all the ſtrengths and commodities thereof: and the Engliſhmen had the lands betweene Sterling and Northumberland. Thus was Cluide march betweene the Scots and the Britons on the one ſide, and the water of Frith named the Scotiſh ſea, march betweene them and Engliſhmen on the other ſide, and Sterling common march to three people, Britons, Engliſhmen, and Scots, howbeit king Oſbright had the caſtle of Sterling, where firſt he cauſed to be coined Sterling monie. The Engliſhmen alſo builded a bridge of ſtone, for paſſage ouer the water of Frith, in the middeſt whereof they made a croſſe, vnder which were written theſe verſes:

I am free march, as paſſengers may ken,
To Scots, to Britons, and Engliſhmen.

Not manie yeares after this, Hinguar and Hubba, two Danes, with a great number of people, arriued in Scotland, and ſlue Conſtantine, whom Oſbright had before made king: whervpon Eduiſe or Ethelwulfe, then king of England, aſſembled his power againſt Hinguar and Hubba, and in one battell ſlue them both; but ſuch of their people as would remaine and become chriſtians, he ſuffered to tariet the reſt he baniſhed or put to death, &c.

This Ethelwulfe granted the Peter pence, of which albeit Peter & Paule had little need and leſſe right: yet the paiment thereof continued in this realme euer after vntill now of late yeares. But the Scots euer ſince vnto this daie haue, and yet do paie it, by reaſon of that grant, which prooueth them to be then vnder his obeiſance.

Alured or Alfred ſucceeded in the kingdome of England, and reigned noblie ouer the whole monarchie of great Britaine: he made lawes, that perſons excommunicated ſhould be diſabled to ſue or claime anie propertie; which law Gregour, whome this Alured had made king of Scots, obeied; and the ſame law as well in Scotland as in England is holden to this daie, which alſo prooueth him to be high lord of Scotland.

This Alured conſtreined Gregour king of Scots alſo to breake the league with France, for generallie he concluded with him, and ſerued him in all his warres, as well againſt Danes as others, not reſerning or making anie exception of the former league with France.

The ſaid Alured, after the death of Gregour, had the like ſeruice and obeiſance of Donald king of Scots with fiue thouſand horſſemen, againſt one Gurmond a Dane that then infeſted the realme, and this Donald died in this faith and obeiſance with Alured.

Edward the firſt of that name called Chiſod ſonne of this Alured ſucceeded his father, and was the next king of England: againſt whome Sithric a Dane and the Scots conſpired; but they were ſubdued, and Conſtantine their king brought to obeiſance. He held the realme of Scotland alſo of king Edward, and this doth Marian their owne countrieman a Scot confeſſe: beſide Roger Houeden, and William of Malmeſberie.

In the yeare of our Lord 923, the ſame king Edward was preſident and gouernour of all the people of England, Cumberland, Scots, Danes, and Britons.

King Athelſtane in like ſort conquered Scotland, and as he laie in his tents beſide Yorke, whileſt the warres laſted, the king of Scots feined himſelfe to be a minſtrell, and harped before him onelie to eſpie his ordinance and his people. But being (as their writers confeſſe) corrupted with monie, he ſold his faith and falſe heart together to the Danes, and aided them againſt king Athelſtane at ſundrie times. Howbeit he met with all their vntruthes at Brunningfield in the weſt countrie, as is mentioned in the ninth chapter of the firſt booke of this deſcription, where he diſcomfited the Danes, and ſlue Malcolme deputie in that behalfe to the king of Scots: in which battell the Scots confeſſe themſelues to haue loſt more people than were remembred in anie age before. When Athelſtane following his good lucke, went throughout all Scotland and wholie ſubdued it, and being in poſſeſſion thereof, gaue land there lieng in Annandale by his deed, the copie wherof doth follow:

I king Athelſtane, giues vnto Paulam, Oddam and Roddam, als good and als faire, as euer they mine were, and thereto witneſſe Mauld my wife.

By which courſe words, not onelie appeareth the plaine ſimplicitie of mens dooings in thoſe daies: but alſo a full proofe that he was then ſeized of Scotland. At the laſt alſo he receiued homage of Malcolme king of Scots: but for that he could not be re-

ſtored

ſtored to his whole kingdome, he entered into religion, and there ſhortlie after died.

When Athelſtane, for his better aſſurance of that countrie there after, thought it beſt to haue two ſtringes to the bowe of their obedience, and therefore not onelie conſtituted one Malcolme to be their king, but alſo appointed one Indulph ſonne of Conſtantine the third, to be called prince of Scotland, to whome he gaue much of Scotland: and for this Malcolme did homage to Athelſtane.

Edmund brother of Athelſtane ſucceeded next king of England, to whome this Indulph then king of Scots not onelie did homage, but alſo ſerued him with ten thouſand Scots, for the expulſion of the Danes out of the realme of England.

Some referre this to an Edward.

Edred or Eldred brother to this Edmund ſucceeded next king of England: he not onelie receiued the homage of Iriſe then king of Scots, but alſo the homage of all the barons of Scotland.

Edgar the ſonne of Edmund, brother of Athelſtane, being now of full age, was next king of England: he reigned onelie ouer the whole monarchie of Britaine, and receiued homage of Keneth king of Scots for the kingdome of Scotland, and made Malcolme prince thereof.

This Edgar gaue vnto the ſame Keneth the countrie of Louthian in Scotland, which was before ſeized into the hands of Athelright king of England for their rebellion, as is before declared. He inioined Keneth their ſaid king alſo once in euerie yeare at certeine principall feaſts (whereat the king did vſe to weare his crowne) to repaire vnto him into England for the making of lawes: which in thoſe daies was done by the noble men or peeres according to the order of France at this daie. He allowed alſo ſundrie lodgings in England, to him and his ſucceſſours, whereat to lie, and refreſh themſelues in their iourneies, whenſoeuer they ſhould come vp to do their homages: and finallie a peece of ground lieng beſide the new palace of Weſtminſter, vpon which this Keneth builded a houſe, that by him and his poſteritie was inioied vntill the reigne of king Henrie the ſecond. In whoſe time, vpon the rebellion of William king of Scots, it was reſumed into the king of Englands hand. The houſe is decaied, but the ground where it ſtood is called Scotland to this daie.

Lawfull age and wardſhip of heires.

Moreouer, Edgar made this law, that no man ſhould ſucceed to his patrimonie or inheritance holden by knights ſeruice, vntill he accompliſhed the age of one and twentie yeares: becauſe by intendment vnder that age, he ſhould not be able in perſon to ſerue his king and countrie according to the tenor of his deed, and the condition of his purchaſe. This law was receiued by the ſame Keneth in Scotland; and as well there as in England is obſerued to this daie: which prouideth alſo that Scotland was then vnder his obeiſance.

In the yeare of our Lord 974, Kinald king of Scots, and Malcolme king of Cumberland, Macon king of Man and the Iles, Douenall king of Southwales, Siferth and Howell kings of the reſt of Wales, Iacob or James of Gallowaie, & Iukill of Weſtmerland did homage to king Edgar at Cheſter. And on the morrow going by water to the monaſterie of ſaint Johns to ſeruice, and returning home againe: the ſaid Edgar ſitting in a barge, and ſtirring the ſame vpon the water of Dee, made the ſaid kings to row the barge, ſaieng that his ſucceſſors might well be iuſtlie to haue the prerogatiue of ſo great honour, and the ſuperioritie of ſo manie mightie princes to be ſubiect vnto their monarchie.

Edward, the ſonne of this Edgar, was next king of England, in whoſe time this Keneth king of Scots cauſed Malcolme king of Scotland to be poiſoned. Wherevpon king Edward made warre againſt him, which ceaſed not vntill this Keneth ſubmitted himſelfe, and offered to receiue him for prince of Scotland, whome king Edward would appoint. Herevpon king Edward proclamed one Malcolme to be prince of Scotland, who immediatlie came into England, and there did homage vnto the ſame king Edward.

Ethelred, brother of this Edward ſucceeded next ouer England, againſt whome Swaine king of Denmarke conſpired with this laſt Malcolme then king of Scots. But ſhortlie after, this Malcolme ſorrowfullie ſubmitted himſelfe into the defenſe of Ethelred: who conſidering how that which could not be amended, muſt onelie be repented, benignlie receiued him. By helpe of whoſe ſeruice at laſt Ethelred recouered his realme againe out of the hands of Swaine, and reigned ouer the whole monarchie eight and thirtie yeares.

Edmund ſurnamed Ironſide, ſonne of this Ethelred, was next king of England, in whoſe time Canutus a Dane inuaded the realme with much cruelties. But at the laſt he married with Emme ſometime wife vnto Ethelred and mother of this Edmund. Which Emme, as arbitratrix betweene hir naturall loue to the one, and matrimoniall dutie to the other, procured ſuch amitie betweene them in the end, that Edmund was contented to diuide the realme with Canutus: and keeping to himſelfe all England on this ſide Humber, gaue all the reſt beyond Humber, with the ſeigniorie of Scotland to this Canutus. Wherevpon Malcolme then king of Scots (after a little accuſtomable reſiſtance) did homage to the ſame Canutus for the kingdome of Scotland. Thus the ſaid Canutus held the ſame ouer of this Edmund king of England by the like ſeruices, ſo long as they liued togither. This Canutus in memorie of this victorie, and glorie of his ſeigniorie ouer the Scots, commanded Malcolme their king to build a church in Buchquhan in Scotland, (where a field betweene him and them was fought) to be dedicated to Olauus patrone of Norwaie and Denmarke, which church was by the ſame Malcolme accordinglie performed.

Edward called the Confeſſour, ſonne of Ethelred, and brother to Edmund Ironſide, was afterward king of England: he toke from Malcolme king of Scots his life and his kingdome, and made Malcolme ſonne to the king of Cumberland and Northumberland king of Scots, who did him homage and fealtie.

This Edward peruſed the old lawes of the realme, and ſomewhat added to ſome of them: as to the law of Edgar for the wardſhip of the lands vntill the heire ſhould accompliſh the age of one and twentie yeeres. He added, that the marriage of ſuch heire ſhould alſo belong to the lord of whom the ſame land was holden. Alſo, that euerie woman marrieng a free man, ſhould (notwithſtanding ſhe had no children by that huſband) enioie the third part of his inheritance during hir life: with manie other lawes which the ſame Malcolme king of Scots obeied, and which as well by them in Scotland, as by vs in England be obſerued to this day, and directlie prouideth the whole to be then vnder his obeiſance.

To whome the marriage of the ward pertaineth.

By reaſon of this law, Malcolme the ſonne of Duncane next inheritor to the crowne of Scotland, being within age, was by the nobles of Scotland deliuered as ward to the cuſtodie alſo of king Edward. During whoſe minoritie, one Makebeth a Scot traitorouſlie vſurped the crowne of Scotland. Againſt whome the ſaid Edward made warre, in which which the ſaid Mackbeth was ouercome and ſlaine. Whereupon the ſaid Malcolme was crowned king of Scots at Scone, in the eight yeere of the reigne of king Edward aforeſaid. This Malcolme alſo by tenor of the ſaid new law of wardſhip, was married vnto Margaret the daughter of Edward ſonne of Edmund Ironſide and Agatha, by the diſpoſition of the ſame king Edward, and at his full age did homage to this king Edward the Confeſſour for the kingdome of Scotland.

Edward the Confeſſour.

Moreouer, Edward of England, hauing no iſſue of his bodie, and miſtruſting that Harald the ſon of Godwine, deſcended of the daughter of Harald Harefot the Dane, would vſurpe the crowne, if he ſhould leaue it to his couſine Edgar Eatling (being then within age) and partlie by the petition of his ſubiects, who before had ſworne neuer to receiue anie kings ouer them of the Daniſh nation, did by his ſubſtantiall will in writing (as all our clergie writers affirme) demiſe the crowne of great Britaine vnto William Baſtard, then duke of Normandie, and to his heires, conſtituting him his heire teſtamentarie. Alſo there was proximitie in bloud betweene them: for Emme daughter of Richard duke of Normandie was wife vnto Ethelred, on whom he begat Alured and this Edward: and this William was ſon of Robert ſonne of Richard, brother of the whole bloud to the ſame Emme. Whereby appeareth that this William was heire by title, and not by conqueſt, albeit that partlie to extinguiſh the miſtruſt of other titles, and partlie for the glorie of his victorie, he chalenged in the end, the name of a conqueroure, and hath béene ſo written euer ſince the time of his arriuall.

William Baſtard.

Furthermore, this William, called the Baſtard and the Conqueroure, ſuppoſed not his conqueſt perfect till he had likewiſe ſubdued the Scots. Wherfore to bring the Scots to full obeiſance after his coronation, as heire teſtamentarie to Edward the Confeſſour; he entred Scotland, where after a little reſiſtance made by the inhabitants, the ſaid Malcolme then their king did homage to him at Abirnethie in Scotland for the kingdome of Scotland, as to his ſuperiour alſo by meane of his late conqueſt.

William Rufus.

William ſurnamed Rufus, ſonne to this William called the Conqueroure, ſucceeded next in the throne of England, to whome the ſaid Malcolme king of Scots did like homage for the whole kingdome of Scotland. But afterward he rebelled, and was by this William Rufus ſlaine in plaine field. Whereupon the Scotiſhmen did chooſe one Donald or Dunwall to be their king. But this William Rufus depoſed him, and created Dunkane ſonne of Malcolme to be their king, who did like homage to him. Finallie, this Dunkane was ſlaine by the Scots, and Dunwall reſtored, who once againe by this William Rufus was depoſed; and Edgar ſon of Malcolme, and brother to the laſt Malcolme, was by him made their king, who did like homage for Scotland to this William Rufus.

To whome the marriage of the ward pertaineth.

Henrie 1.

Henrie called Beauclerke the ſonne of William called the Conqueour, after the death of his brother William Rufus, ſucceeded to the crowne of England, to whome the ſame Edgar king of Scots did homage for Scotland: this Henrie Beauclerke married Mawd the daughter of Malcolme K. of Scots, and by hir had iſſue Mawd afterward empreſſe.

Alexander the ſonne of Malcolme brother to this Mawd was next king of Scots, he did like homage for the kingdome of Scotland to this Henrie the firſt, as Edgar had done before him.

Mawd.

Mawd called the empreſſe, daughter and heire to Henrie Beauclerke and Mawd his wife, receiued homage of Dauid, brother to hir and to this Alexander next king of Scots, before all the temporall men of England for the kingdome of Scotland. This Mawd the empreſſe gaue vnto Dauid in the marriage, Mawd the daughter and heire of Waldofius earle of Huntingdon & Northumberland. And herein their cuaſion appeareth, by which they allege that their kings homages were made for the earledome of Huntingdon. For this Dauid was the firſt that of their kings was earle of Huntingdon, which was ſince all the homages of their kings before recited, and at the time of this mariage, & long after the ſaid Alexander his brother was king of Scots, doing the homage aforeſaid to Henrie Beauclerke ſon to the aforeſaid ladie, of whome I find this epitaph worthie to be remembred:

Ortu magna, viro maior, ſed maxima partu,
Hîc iacet Henrici filia, ſponſa, parens.

In the yeere of our Lord 1136, and firſt yeere of the reigne of king Stephan, the ſaid Dauid king of Scots being required to doo his homage, refuſed it: for ſo much as he had done homage to Mawd the empreſſe before time; notwithſtanding the ſonne of the ſaid Dauid did homage to king Stephan.

Henrie 2.

Henrie called Fitz empreſſe, the ſonne of Mawd the empreſſe daughter of Mawd, daughter of Malcolme king of Scots, was next king of England. He receiued homage for Scotland of Malcolme ſonne of Henrie, ſonne of the ſaid Dauid their laſt king. Which Malcolme after this homage attended vpon the ſame king Henrie in his warres againſt Lewis then king of France. Whereby appeareth that their French league was neuer renewed after the laſt diuiſion of their countrie by Olliuer king of England. But after theſe warres finiſhed with the French king, this Malcolme being againe in Scotland rebelled: whereupon king Henrie immediatlie ſeized Huntingdon and Northumberland into his owne hands by confiſcation, and made warres vpon him in Scotland: during which the ſame Malcolme died without iſſue of his bodie.

Because they were taken from him before.

William brother of this Malcolme was next king of Scots, he with all the nobles of Scotland (which could not be now for anie earledome) did homage to the ſonne of Henrie the ſecond, with a reſeruation of the dutie to king Henrie the ſecond his father. Alſo the earledome of Huntingdon was (as ye haue heard) before this forfeited by Malcolme his brother, and neuer after reſtored to the crowne of Scotland.

This William did afterward attend vpon the ſame Henrie the ſecond, in his warres in Normandie againſt the French king (notwithſtanding their French league) and then being licenced to depart home in the tenth of this prince, and vpon the fiftéenth of Februarie he returned, and vpon the ſixtéenth of October did homage to him for the realme of Scotland. In token alſo of his perpetuall ſubiection to the crowne of England, he offered vp his cloake, his ſaddle, and his ſpeare at the high altar in Yorke: whereupon he was permitted to depart home into Scotland, where immediatlie he moued cruell warre in Northumberland againſt the ſame king Henrie, being as yet in Normandie. But God tooke the defenſe of king Henries part, and deliuered the ſame William king of Scots into the hands of a few Engliſhmen, who brought him priſoner to king Henrie into Normandie in the twentith yeere of his reigne. But at the laſt, at the ſute of Dauid his brother, Richard biſhop of ſaint Andrews, and other biſhops and lords, he was put to this fine for the amendment of his treſpaſſe; to wit, to paie ten thouſand pounds ſterling, and to ſurrender all his title to the earldome of Huntingdon, Cumberland, & Northumberland into the hands of king Henrie, which he did in all things accordinglie, ſealing his charters thereof with the great ſeale of Scotland, and ſignets of his nobilitie yet to be ſeene: wherein it was alſo compriſed, that he and his ſucceſſours ſhould hold the realme of Scotland of the king of England and his ſucceſſours for euer. And hereupon he once againe did homage to the ſame king Henrie, which now could not be for the earledome of Huntingdon, the right whereof was alreadie by him ſurrendred. And for the better aſſurance of this faith alſo, the ſtrengths of Berwike, Edenborough, Rorborough, and Striueling were deliuered into the hands of our king Henrie of England, which their owne writers confeſſe. But Hector Boetius ſaith, that this treſpaſſe was amended by fine of twentie thouſand pounds ſterling, and that the erledome of Huntingdon, Cumberland, and Northumberland were deliuered as morgage into the hands of king Henrie, vntill other ten thouſand pounds ſterling ſhould be to him paid, which is ſo farre from truth, as Hector was (while he liued) from well meaning to our countrie. But if we grant that it is true, yet proueth he not that the monie was paid, nor the land otherwiſe redéemed, or euer after came to anie Scotiſh kings hands. And thus it appeareth that the earledome of Huntingdon was neuer occaſion of the homages of the Scotiſh kings to the kings of England, either before this time or after.

This was done 1175. Moreouer I read this note hereof gathered out of Robertus Montanus or Montenſis that liued in thoſe daies, and was (as I take it) confeſſor to king Henrie. The king of Scots doth homage to king Henrie for the kingdome of Scotland, and is ſent home againe, his biſhops alſo did promiſe to doo the like to the archbiſhop of Yorke, and to acknowledge themſelues to be of his prouince and iuriſdiction. By vertue alſo of this compoſition the ſaid Robert ſaith, that Rex Angliæ dabat honores, epiſcopatus, abbatias, & alias dignitates in Scotia, vel ſaltem eius conſilio dabantur, that is, The king of England gaue honors, biſhoprikes, abbaſhips, and other dignities in Scotland, or at the leaſtwiſe they were not giuen without his aduiſe and counſell.

At this time Alexander biſhop of Rome (ſuppoſed to haue generall iuriſdiction eccleſiaſticall through chriſtendome) eſtabliſhed the whole cleargie of Scotland (according to the old lawes) vnder the iuriſdiction of the archbiſhop of Yorke.

In the yeare of our Lord 1185, in the moneth of Auguſt, at Cairleill, Rouland Talmant lord of Galwaie, did homage and fealtie to the ſaid king Henrie with all that held of him.

In the two and twentith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the ſecond, Gilbert ſonne of Ferguſe prince of Galwaie, did homage and fealtie to the ſaid king Henrie, and left Dunecan his ſonne in hoſtage for conſeruation of his peace.

Richard ſurnamed Cœur de Lion, becauſe of his ſtoutneſſe, and ſonne of this Henrie was next king of England, to whome the ſame William king of Scots did homage at Canturburie for the whole kingdome of Scotland.

This king Richard was taken priſoner by the duke of Oſtrich, for whoſe redemption the whole realme was tared at great ſummes of monie, vnto the which this William king of Scots (as a ſubiect) was contributorie, and paied two thouſand markes ſterling.

In the yeare of our Lord 1199, John king of England ſent to William king of Scots, to come and doo his homage, which William came to Lincolne in the moneth of December the ſame yeare, and did his homage vpon an hill in the preſence of Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie, and of all the people there aſſembled, and thereunto tooke his oth and was ſworne vpon the croſſe of the ſaid Hubert: alſo he granted by his charter confirmed, that he ſhould haue the mariage of Alexander his ſonne, as his liegeman, alwaies to hold of the king of England: promiſing moreouer that he the ſaid king William and his ſonne Alexander, ſhould keepe and hold faith and allegiance to Henrie ſonne of the ſaid king John, as to their chiefe lord againſt all maner of men that might liue and die.

Alſo whereas William king of Scots had put John biſhop of ſaint Andrew out of his biſhoprike, pope Clement wrote to Henrie king of England, that he ſhould moue and induce the ſame William; and if néed required by his roiall power and prerogatiue ouer that nation, to compell him to leaue his rancor againſt the ſaid biſhop, and ſuffer him to haue and occupie his ſaid biſhoprike againe.

In the yeare of our Lord 1216, and fiue & twentith of the reigne of Henrie, ſonne to king John, the ſame Henrie and the quéene were at Yorke at the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe, for the ſolemnization of a mariage made in the feaſt of ſaint Stephan the martyr the ſame yeare, betwéene Alexander king of Scots, and Margaret the kings daughter, and there the ſaid Alexander did homage to Henrie king of England for all the realme of Scotland.

In buls of diuerſe popes were admonitions giuen to the kings of Scots, as appeareth by that of Gregorie the fift and Clement his ſucceſſor, that they ſhould obſerue and trulie kéepe all ſuch appointments, as had béene made betwéene the kings of England and Scotland. And that the kings of Scotland ſhould ſtill hold the realme of Scotland of the kings of England, vpon paine of curſſe and interdiction.

After the death of Alexander king of Scots, Alexander his ſonne, being nine yeares of age, was by the lawes of Edgar, in ward to king Henrie the third, & by the nobles of Scotland brought to Yorke, and there deliuered vnto him. During whoſe minoritie king Henrie gouerned Scotland, and to ſubdue a commotion in this realme, vſed the aid of fiue thouſand Scotiſhmen. But king Henrie died during the nonage of this Alexander, whereby he receiued not his homage, which by reaſon and law was reſpited vntill his full age of one and twentie yeares.

Edward the firſt after the conqueſt, ſonne of this Henrie was next king of England; immediatlie after whoſe coronation, Alexander king of Scots, being then of full age, did homage to him for Scotland at Weſtminſter, ſwearing (as all the reſt did) after this maner.

I. D. N. king of Scots ſhall be true and faithfull vnto you lord E. by the grace of God king of England, the noble and ſuperior lord of the kingdome of Scotland, and vnto you I make my fidelitie for the ſame kingdome, the which I hold and claime to hold of you. And I ſhall beare you my faith and fidelitie of life and lim, and worldlie honour againſt all men, faithfullie I ſhall knowlege and ſhall doo you ſeruice due vnto you of the kingdome of Scotland aforeſaid, as God me ſo helpe and theſe holie euangelies.

This Alexander king of Scots died, leauing one onelie daughter called Margaret for his heire, who before had maried Hanigo, ſonne to Magnus king of Norwaie, which daughter alſo ſhortlie after died, leauing one onelie daughter hir heire, of the age of two yeares, whoſe cuſtodie and mariage by the lawes of king Edgar, and Edward the confeſſor, belonged to Edward the firſt: wherupon the nobles of Scotland were commanded by our king Edward to ſend into Norwaie, to conueie this yong quæne into England to him, whome he intended to haue married to his sonne Edward: and so to haue made a perfect vnion long wished for betweene both realmes. Herevpon their nobles at that time considering the same tranquillitie that manie of them haue since refused, stood not vpon shifts and delaies of minoritie nor contempt, but most gladlie consented, and therevpon sent two noble men of Scotland into Norwaie, for hir to be brought to this king Edward, but she died before their comming thither, and therefore they required nothing but to inioie the lawfull liberties that they had quietlie possessed in the last king Alexanders time.

England

After the death of this Margaret, the Scots were destitute of anie heire to the crowne from this Alexander their last king, at which time this Edward descended from the bodie of Mawd daughter of Malcolme sometime king of Scots, being then in the greatest broile of his warres with France, minded not to take the possession of that kingdome in his owne right, but was contented to establish Balioll to be king thereof, the weake title betweene him, Brusle, & Hastings, being by the humble petition of all the realme of Scotland cõmitted to the determination of king Edward, wherein by autentike writing they confessed the superioritie of the realme to remaine in king Edward, sealed with the seales of foure bishops, seuen earles, and twelue barons of Scotland, and which shortlie after was by the whole assent of the three estates of Scotland, in their solemne parlement confessed and enacted accordinglie, as most euidentlie doth appeare.

The Baliol in this wise made king of Scotland, did immediatlie make his homage and fealtie at Newcastell vpon saint Steuens daie (as did likewise all the lords of Scotland, each one setting his hand to the composition in writing) to king Edward of England for the kingdome of Scotland: but shortlie after defrauding the benigne goodnesse of his superiour, he rebelled, and did verie much hurt in England. Herevpon king Edward inuaded Scotland, seized into his hands the greater part of the countrie, and tooke all the strengths thereof. Whervpon Baliol king of Scots came vnto him to Mountrosse in Scotland with a white wand in his hand, and there resigned the crowne of Scotland, with all his right, title, and interest to the same, into the hands of king Edward, and thereof made his charter in writing, dated and sealed the fourth yeare of his reigne. All the nobles and gentlemen of Scotland also repaired to Berwike, and did homage and fealtie to king Edward, there becomming his subiects. For the better assurance of whose oths also, king Edward kept all the strengths and holdes of Scotland in his owne hands; and herevpon all their lawes, processes, all iudgements, gifts of assises and others, passed vnder the name and authoritie of king Edward. Leland touching the same rehearsall, writeth thereof in this maner.

"In the yeare of our Lord 1295, the same John king of Scots, contrarie to his faith and allegiance rebelled against king Edward, and came into England, and burnt and slue without all modestie and mercie. Wherevpon king Edward with a great host went to Newcastell vpon Tine, passed the water of Tweed, besieged Berwike, and got it. Also he wan the castell of Dunbar, and there were slaine at this brunt 15700 Scots. Then he proceeded further, and gat the castell of Rokesborow, and the castell of Edenborow, Striuelin and Gedworth, and his people harried all the land. In the meane season, the said king John of Scots, considering that he was not of power to withstand king Edward, sent his letters and besought him of treatie and peace, which our prince benignlie granted, and sent to him againe that he should come to the towne of Brechin, and bring thither the great lords of Scotland with him. The king of England sent thither Antonie Becke bishop of Durham, with his roiall power, to conclude the said treatise. And there it was agreed that the said John and all the Scots should vtterlie submit themselues to the kings will. And to the end the submission should be performed accordinglie, the king of Scots laid his sonne in hostage and pledge vnto him. There also he made his letters sealed with the common seale of Scotland, by the which he knowledging his simplenes and great offense done to his lord king Edward of England, by his full power and free will yeelded vp all the land of Scotland, with all the people and homage of the same. Then our king went forth to see the mounteins, and vnderstanding that all was in quiet and peace, he turned to the abbeie of Scone, which was of chanons regular, where he tooke the stone called the Regall of Scotland, vpon which the kings of that nation were wont to sit, at the time of their coronations for a throne, & sent it to the abbeie of Westminster, commanding to make a chaire therof for the priests that should sing masse at the high altar: which chaire was made, and standeth yet there at this daie to be seene.

The Scots dreame that this was the stone whereon Jacob slept when he fled into Mesopotamia.

In the yeare of our Lord 1296, the king held his parlement at Berwike: and there he tooke homage singularlie of diuerse of the lords & nobles of Scotland. And for a perpetuall memorie of the same, they made their letters patents sealed with their seales, and then the king of England made William Warrene earle of Surrie and Southsax lord Warden of Scotland, Hugh of Cressingham treasuror, and William Ormesbie iustice of Scotland, and forthwith sent king John to the Tower of London, and John Comin, and the earle Badenauth, the earle of Boban and other lords into England to diuerse places on this side of the Trent.

And after that, in the yeare of our Lord 1297, at the feast of Christmas, the king called before him the said John king of Scots, although he had committed him to ward: and said that he would burne or destroie their castels, townes and lands, if he were not recompensed for his costs and damages susteined in the warres; but king John and the other that were in ward, answered that they had nothing, sith their liues, their deaths, and goods were in his hands. The king vpon that answer moued with pitie, granted them their liues; so that they would doo their homage, and make their oth solemnelie at the high altar (in the church of the abbeie of Westminster) vpon the eucharist, that they and euerie of them should hold and keepe true faith, obedience, and allegiance to the said king Edward and his heires kings of England for euer. And where the said king of Scots saw the kings banner of England displaied, he and all his power should draw therevnto. And that neither he or anie of his from thencefoorth should beare armes against the king of England or anie of his blood. Finallie, the king rewarding with great gifts the said king John and his lords, suffered them to depart. But they went into Scotland alwaie imagining (notwithstanding this their submission) how they might oppresse king Edward, and disturbe his realme. The Scots sent also to the king of France for succour and helpe, who sent them ships to Berwike furnished with men of armes, the king of England then being in Flanders.

In the yeare of our Lord 1298, the king went into Scotland with a great host, and the Scots also assembled in great number, but the king fought with them at Fawkirke on S. Marie Magdalens daie, where were slaine threescore thousand Scots, & William liam Walleis that was their capteine fled, who being taken afterward, was hanged, drawen, & quartered at London, for his trespasses.

After this the Scots rebelled againe, and all the lords of Scotland chose Robert Bruse to be king, except onelie John Commin earle of Carrike, who would not consent thereto bicause of his oth made to the king of England. Wherefore Robert Bruse slue him at Dumfrise, and then was crowned at Schone abbeie. Herevpon the king of England assembled a great hoast, and rode through all Scotland, discomfited Robert Bruse, slue eight thousand Scots, & tooke the most part of all the lords of Scotland, putting the temporall lords to deth bicause they were forsworne.

This was done vpon the nine & twentith of Januarie, 1306.

Edward borne at Carnaruan sonne of this Edward, was next king of England, who from the beginning of his reigne enioied Scotland peaceablie, doing in all things as is aboue said of king Edward his father, vntill toward the later end of his reigne, about which time this Robert Bruse conspired against him, and with the helpe of a few forsworne Scots, forswore himselfe king of Scots. Herevpon this Edward with Thomas earle of Lancaster and manie other lords made warre vpon him, about the feast of Marie Magdalene, the said Bruse and his partakers being alreadie accursed by the pope for breaking the truce that he had established betwixt them. But being infortunate in his first warres against him, he suffered Edward the sonne of Balioll to proclame himselfe king of Scots; and neuertheless held forth his warres against Bruse, before the ending of which he died, as I read.

Edward borne at Windsore sonne of Edward the second was next king of England, at the age of fifteene yeares, in whose minoritie the Scots practised with Isabell mother to this Edward, and with Roger Mortimer earle of the March to haue their homages released: whose good will therein they obteined, so that for the same release they should paie to this king Edward thirtie thousand pounds sterling, in three yeares next following, that is to saie, ten thousand pounds sterling yearelie. But bicause the nobilitie and commons of this realme would not by parlement consent vnto it, their king being within age, the same release proceeded not; albeit the Scots ceased not their practises with this queene and earle. But before those three yeares, in which their monie (if the bargaine had taken place) should haue beene paied, were expired, our king Edward inuaded Scotland, and ceassed not the warre, vntill Dauid the sonne of Robert le Bruse (then by their election king of Scotland) absolutelie submitted himselfe vnto him. But for that the said Dauid Bruse had before by practise of the queene and the earle of March, married Jane the sister of this king Edward: he moued by naturall zeale to his sister, was contented to giue the realme of Scotland to this Dauid Bruse, and to the heires that should be begotten of the bodie of the said Jane (sauing the reuersion and meane homages to this king Edward and to his owne children) wherewith the same Dauid Bruse was right well contented, and therevpon immediatlie made his homage for all the realme of Scotland to him.

Howbeit, shortlie after causelesse conceiuing cause of displeasure, this Dauid procured to dissolue this same estate tailé, and therevpon not onelie rebelled in Scotland, but also inuaded England, whilest king Edward was occupied about his wars in France. But this Dauid was not onelie expelled England in the end, but also thinking no place a sufficient defense to his vntruth, of his owne accord fled out of Scotland: whereby the countries of Annandale, Gallowale, Mars, Teuidale, Tweedale, and Ethrike were seized into the king of Englands hands, and new marches set betweene England and Scotland at Cockburnes path & Soltrie hedge. Which when this Dauid went about to recouer againe, his power was discomfited, and himselfe by a few Englishmen taken & brought into England, where he remained prisoner eleuen yeares after his said apprehension.

During this time, king Edward enioied Scotland peaceablie, and then at the contemplation and wearie suit of his sorowfull sister, wife of this Dauid, he was contented once againe to restore him to the kingdome of Scotland. Wherevpon it was concluded, that for this rebellion Dauid should paie to king Edward, the summe of one hundred thousand markes sterling, and thereto destroie all his holds and fortresses standing against the English borders, and further assure the crowne of Scotland to the children of this king Edward for lacke of heire of his owne bodie, all which things he did accordinglie. And for the better assurance of his obeisance also, he afterward deliuered into the hands of king Edward sundrie noble men of Scotland in this behalfe as his pledges. This is the effect of the historie of Dauid, touching his delings. Now let vs see what was done by Edward Balioll, whereof our chronicles do report, that in the yeere of our Lord 1326, Edward the third, king of England, was crowned at Westminster, and in the fift yeare of his reigne Edward Balioll right heire to the kingdome of Scotland came in, and claimed it as due to him. Sundrie lords and gentlemen also, which had title to diuerse lands there, either by themselues, or by their wiues, did the like. Wherevpon the said Balioll and they went into Scotland by sea, and landing at Kinghorne with 3000 Englishmen, discomfited 10000 Scots, and slue 1200, and then went forth to Dunfermeline, where the Scots assembled against them with 40000 men, and in the feast of saint Laurence, at a place called Gaskmore (or otherwise Gladmore) were slaine fiue earls, thirteene barons, a hundred and three score knights, two thousand men of armes, and manie other; in all fortie thousand: and there were slaine on the English part but thirteene persons onelie, if the number be not corrupted.

In the eight yeare of the reigne of king Edward, he assembled a great hoast, and came to Berwike vpon Tweed, and laid siege therto. To him also came Edward Balioll king of Scots, with a great power to strengthen & aid him against the Scots, who came out of Scotland in foure batels well armed & araied.

Edward king of England, and Edward king of Scots, apparelled their people either of them in foure battels: and vpon Halidon hill, beside Berwike, met these two hoasts, and there were discomfited of the Scots fiue and twentie thousand and seauen hundred, whereof were slaine eight earles, a thousand and three hundred knights and gentlemen. This victorie done, the king returned to Berwike, & then the towne with the castell were yelded vp vnto him. In the eight yeare of the reigne of king Edward of England, Edward Balioll king of Scots came to Newcastell vpon Tine, and did homage for all the realme of Scotland.

In the yeare of our Lord 1346, Dauid Bruse by the prouocation of the king of France rebelled, and came into England with a great hoast vnto Neuils crosse: but the archbishop of Yorke, with diuerse temporall men, fought with him; and the said king of Scots was taken, and William earle of Duglas with Morrise earle of Strathorne were brought to London, and manie other lords slaine, which with Dauid did homage to Edward king of England.

And in the thirtith yeare of the kings reigne, and the yeare of our Lord 1355, the Scots wone the towne of Berwicke, but not the castell. Herevpon

the king came thither with a great hoaſt, and anon the towne was yéelded vp without anie reſiſtance.

Edward Baliol, conſidering that God did ſo manie marueilous and gratious things for king Edward, at his owne will gaue vp the crowne and the realme of Scotland to king Edward of England at Rokeſborough, by his letters patents. And anon after the king of England, in preſence of all his lords ſpirituall and temporall, let crowne himſelfe king there of the realme of Scotland, & ordeined all things to his intent, and ſo came ouer into England.

Richard the ſonne of Edward, called the Blacke prince, ſonne of this king Edward, was next king of England, who for that the ſaid Jane, the wife of the ſaid king Dauid of Scotland was deceaſſed without iſſue, and being informed how the Scots deuiſed to their vttermoſt power to breake the limitation of this inheritance touching the crowne of Scotland, made forthwith warre againſt them, wherein he burnt Edenbrough, ſpoiled all their countrie, tooke all their holds, & held continuallie warre againſt them vntill his death, which was Anno Dom. 1389.

Henrie the fourth of that name was next king of England, he continued theſe warres begun againſt them by king Richard, and ceaſſed not vntill Robert king of Scots (the third of that name) reſigned his crowne by appointment of this king Henrie, and deliuered his ſonne James, being then of the age of nine yeares, into his hands to remaine at his cuſtodie, wardſhip and diſpoſition, as of his ſuperiour lord, according to the old lawes of king Edward the confeſſor. All this was done Anno Dom. 1404, which was within fiue yeares after the death of king Richard. This Henrie the fourth reigned in this eſtate ouer them foureteene yeares.

Henrie the fift of that name, ſonne to this king Henrie the fourth, was next king of England. He made warres againſt the French king, in all which this James then king of Scots attended vpon him, as vpon his ſuperiour lord, with a conuenient number of Scots, notwithſtanding their league with France. But this Henrie reigned but nine yeares, whereby the homage of this James their king (hauing not fullie accompliſhed the age of one & twentie yeares) was by reaſon and law reſpited. Finallie the ſaid James with diuerſe other lords attended vpon the corps of the ſaid Henrie vnto Weſtminſter, as to his dutie apperteined.

Henrie the firſt, the ſonne of this Henrie the fift, was next king of England, to whome the ſeigniorie of Scotland & cuſtodie of this James by right, law, and reaſon deſcended, married the ſame James king of Scots to Jane daughter of John earle of Sommerſet, at ſaint Marie ouer Iſe in Southwarke, and tooke for the value of this mariage, the ſumme of one hundred thouſand markes ſterling.

This James king of Scots at his full age, did homage to the ſame king Henrie the firſt, for the kingdome of Scotland at Windſore, in the moneth of Januarie.

Since which time, vntill the daies of king Henrie the ſeuenth, grandfather to our ſouereigne ladie that now is, albeit this realme hath béene moleſted with diuerſitie of titles, in which vnmeet time neither law nor reaſon admit preſcription to the preiudice of anie right: yet did king Edward the fourth next king of England, by preparation of war againſt the Scots in the latter end of his reigne, ſufficientlie by all lawes induce to the continuance of his claime to the ſame ſuperioritie ouer them.

After whoſe death, vnto the beginning of the reigne of our ſouereigne lord king Henrie the eight, excéeded not the number of ſeauen and twentie yeares, about which time the impediment of our claime of the Scots part, chanced by the nonage of James their laſt king, which ſo continued the ſpace of one and twentie yeares. And like as his minoritie was by all law and reaſon an impediment to himſelfe to make homage; ſo was the ſame by like reaſon an impediment to the king of this realme to demand anie, ſo that the whole time of intermiſſion of our claime in the time of the ſaid king Henrie the eight, is deduced vnto the number of thirteene yeares. And thus much for this matter.

Of the wall ſometime builded for a partition betweene England and the Picts and Scots.

Chap. 23.

HAuing hitherto diſcourſed vpon the title of the kings of England, vnto the Scotiſh kingdome: I haue now thought good to adde herevnto the deſcription of two walles that were (in times paſt) limits vnto both the ſaid regions, and therefore to be touched in this firſt booke, as generallie appertinent vnto the eſtate of the whole Iland; and no leſſe famous than that which Anaſtaſius Dicorus made afterward from the Cuxine vnto the Thracian ſea, conteining 420 furlongs in length, and twelue foot in breadth, & diſtant from Conſtantinople 280 furlongs, albeit that of Hadrian was made of turffe and timber. The author therefore of the firſt wall was Hadrian the emperour, who (as Ælius Spartianus ſaith) erected the ſame of foure ſcore miles in length, twelue foot in height, and eight in breadth, to diuide the barbarous Britons from the more ciuill ſort, which then were generallie called by the name of Romans ouer all. The firſt beginner of the Picts wall.

After his time Seuerus the emperour comming againe into this Ile (where he had ſerued before in repreſſion of the tumults here begun, after the death of Lucius) amongſt other things he made another wall (but of ſtone) betweene eightie and a hundred miles from the firſt, & of thirtie two miles in length, reaching on both ſides alſo to the ſea, of whome the Britons called it S. Murſeueri, or Gwall Seueri, that is, The wall of Seuerus, or Seuerus dale, which later indureth vntill theſe daies in freſh memorie, by reaſon of the ruines & ſquare ſtones there oft found, whoſe inſcriptions declare the authors of that worke. It is worthie the noting alſo, how that in this voiage he loſt 50000 men in the Scotiſh ſide, by one occaſion and other, which hinderance ſo incenſed him, that he determined vtterlie to extinguiſh their memorie from vnder heauen, and had ſo done in deed, if his life had indured but vntill another yeare. The finiſher of the wall.

Sextus Aurelius writing of Seuerus, addeth, how that the wall made by this prince conteined two and thirtie miles, whereby the breadth of this Iland there, and length of the wall conteineth onelie ſo manie miles, as may be gathered by his words. But chéeflie for the length of the wall, Spartianus who touching it among other things ſaith of Seuerus as followeth: Britanniam (quod maximum eius imperij decus eſt) muro per tranſuerſam inſulam ducto, vtring; ad finem oceani muniuit, that is, He fortified Britaine (which is one of the chéefe acts recorded of his time) with a wall made ouerthwart the Ile, that reached on both ſides euen to the verie Ocean. The wall goeth not ſtreict by a line, but in and out in manie places.

That this wall was of ſtone alſo, the ruines therof (which haue miniſtred much matter to ſuch as dwell nére therevnto in their buildings) is triall ſufficient. Hereby in like ſort it commeth to paſſe, that where The ſtuffe of the wall.

the soile about it is least inhabited, there is most mention of the said wall, which was wrought of squared stone, as vntill this daie maie euidentlie be confirmed. Howbeit, these two walles were not the onelie partitions betweene these two kingdoms, sith Iulius Capitolinus in vita Antonini Pij doth write of another that Lollius Vrbicus made beyond the same, of turffe, in the time of the said prince, who (for his victories in Britaine) was also called Britannicus, which neuertheless was often throwne downe by the Scots, and eftsoones repared againe, vntill it was giuen ouer and relinquished altogither. It runneth (as I take it) also within the wall about an arrow shot from that of stone: but how farre it went, as yet I cannot find. This onlie remaineth certeine, that the walles made by Hadrian & Seuerus, were ditched with notable ditches and vampires made in such wise, that the Scotish aduersarie had much a do to enter and scale the same in his assaults. And yet for all this, I read that the Scots oftentimes pulled downe great parcels of the same, to make their accesse more easie into the south parts: but as it was eftsoons repared againe, so the last time of all it was amended by the Romane souldiors, which came ouer verie little before the time of Vortiger, at which season the land was in maner left void of souldiors and munition. Betwixt Thirlewall and the north Tine, are also in the waste grounds, manie parcels of that wall of Seuerus yet standing, whereof the common people do babble manie things.

Two other walls.

Vampire.

Beginning therefore with the course thereof, from the west sea, I find that it runneth from Bolnesse to Burgh, about foure miles, and likewise from thence within halfe a mile of Carleill, and lesse on the north side, and beneath the confluence of the Peder and the Eden. From hence it goeth to Terrebie, a village about a mile from Caerleill, then through the baronie of Linstocke, and Gillesland, on the north side of the riuer Irding or Arding, and a quarter of a mile from the abbeie of Leuercost. Thence three miles aboue Leuercost, and aboue the confluence of Arding, and the Pultrose becke (which diuideth Gillesland in Cumberland, from south Tindale in Northumberland) it goeth to Thirlwall castell, then to the wall towne, next of all ouer the riuer to Siwenshed, Carraw (peradventure Cairuoren tower) to Walwise, and so ouer south Tine, to Cockelie tower, Portgate, Halton sheles, Winchester, Rutchester, Heddon, Walhottle, Denton, and to Newcastell, where it is thought that saint Nicholas church standeth on the same. Howbeit Leland saith, that it goeth within a mile of Newcastell, and then crooketh vp toward Tinmouth vnto Wallesend, three miles from the mouth of the said riuer, so called because the aforesaid wall did end at the same place. And thus much I read of the Pictish wall. As for the Romane coine that is often found in the course thereof, the curious bricks about the same neere vnto Caerleill, beside the excellent cornelines and other costlie stones alreadie intailed for seales oftentimes taken vp in those quarters, I passe them ouer as not incident to my purpose.

The course of the wall from west to east.

In like maner I would gladlie also haue set downe the course of Offacs ditch, which was march betweene the Mercian dominions, and the Welshmen in his time: but for so much as the tractation thereof is not to be referred to this place, because it is not a thing generall to the whole Iland, I omit to speake of that also. Yet thus much will I note here, as well by the report of one (who saith how he did tread it out) that he followed it from the Dee to Kirnaburgh hill through Treuelach forrest, by est of Crekith, Cauch hill, Montgomerie castell, the New castell and Diserd, and hauing brought it hitherto, either lost it, or sought after it no further: as by the testimonie of another, who writing thereof, saith, that it stretched from the south side by Bistlow, along vnder the mounteins of Wales northwards, ouer the riuer of Sauerne, and to the verie mouth also of the Dee, where it falleth into the sea. And so much of such things as concerne the generall estate of the whole Iland, which labour herein I could verie well haue spared, and would, if Quintus had performed the request of Cicero his brother, who promised to send him ouer a sound aduertisement of the condition of Britaine in those daies: as appeareth in the second booke of his familiar epistles, where he saith; Modo mihi date Britanniam, quam pingam coloribus tuis penicillo meo, &c. But sithence that was not performed, and the treatise of Demetrius and other of the same argument are perished, which were of some value, let this trifle (I beseech you) not be reiected, till some other man of better skill shall haue drawne a more absolute peece of workemanship, whereunto my vnskilfulnesse (I hope) shall proue no hinderance.

Of the maruels of England.

Chap. 24.

SUch as haue written of the wonders of our countrie in old time, haue spoken (no doubt) of manie things, which deserue no credit at all: and therefore in seeking thankes of their posteritie by their trauell in this behalfe; they haue reaped the reward of iust reproch, and in steed of fame purchased vnto themselues nought else but meere discredit in their better and more learned treatises. The like commonlie happeneth also to such, as in respect of lucre do publish vnprofitable and pernicious volumes, wherby they do consume their times in vaine, and in manifold wise become preiudiciall vnto their common wealths. For my part I will not touch anie man herein particularlie, no not our Demetrius, of whom Plutarch speaketh in his oracles (if those bookes were written by him, for some thinke that Plutarch neuer wrote them, although Eusebius lib. 4. cap. 8. doth acknowledge them to be his) which Demetrius left sundrie treatises behind him, conteining wonderfull things collected of our Iland. But sith that in my time they are found to be false, it should be far vnmeet to remember them anie more: for who is he which will beleeue, that infernall spirits can die and giue vp their ghosts like mortall men though Saxo seeme to consent vnto him in this behalfe. In speaking also of the out Iles, he saith thus: Beyond Britaine are manie desolate Ilands, whereof some are dedicated to the Gods, some to the noble Heroes. I sailed (saith he) by the helpe of the king vnto one that laie neere hand, onelie to see and view the same, in which I found few inhabitants, and yet such as were there, were reputed and taken for men of great pietie and holinesse. During the time also that I remained in the same, it was vexed with great storme and tempest, which caused me not a little to doubt of my safe returne. In the end, demanding of the inhabitants what the cause should be of this so great and sudden mutation of the aire: they answered, that either some of the Gods, or at the least of the Heroes were latelie deceased: for as a candle (said they) hurteth none whilest it burneth, but being slenderlie put out annoieth manie with the filthie sauour: so these Gods, whilest they liued, were either not hurtfull, or verie beneficiall to mankind; but being once deceaſſed, they ſo moue the heauens and aire, that much miſchéefe doth inſue eſtſoones vpon the ſame.

not

Being alſo inquiſitiue of the ſtate of other Iles not farre off, they told him further, how there was one hard by, wherin Saturne being ouertaken with a dead ſléepe, was watched by Briareus as he lai, which Saturne alſo had manie ſpirits attending vpon him in ſundrie functions and offices. By which reports it is eaſie to conceiue, with what vaine ſtuffe that volume of Demetrius is interlaced. But of ſuch writers as we haue to to manie, ſo among the ſaid rable Geruaſe of Tilberie is not the leaſt famous, a man as it were euen ſold to vtter matters of more admiration than credit to the world. For what a tale telleth he in his De otio imperiali, of Wandleburie hilles, that lie within ſight & by ſouth of Cambridge (where the Vandals incamped ſometime, when they entered into this Iland) and of a ſpirit that would of cuſtome in a meane ſhine night (if he were chalenged and called thereunto) run at tilt and turneie in complet armor with ane knight or gentleman whomſoeuer, in that place: and how one Olbert of Barnewell, hearing the report thereof, armed himſelfe, and being well mounted, rode thither alone with one eſquier, and called for him, who forthwith appeared in rich armour, and anſwered his chalenge, ſo that running togither verie fiercelie, they met with ſuch rigor, that the anſwerer was ouerthrowne and borne downe to the ground. After this they bickered on foot ſo long, till Olbert ouercame and draue him to flight, who departed, leauing his horſſe behind him, which was of huge ſtature, blacke (as he ſaith) of colour, with his furniture of the ſame hue, and whereupon he ſeized, giuing him vnto his page, who carried him home, and there kept him till it was néere daie, during which ſpace he was ſeene of manie. But when the daie light began to ſhew it ſelfe ſomewhat cléere, the beaſt ſtamped and ſnorted, and forthwith breaking his raine, he ran awaie, and was no more heard of to his knowledge in that countrie. In the meane ſeaſon Olbert being verie faint, and waxing wearie (for he was ſore wounded in the thigh, which either he knew not of, or at the leaſtwiſe diſſembled to know it) cauſed his leg-harneſſe or ſtéelebotes to be pulled off, which his freends ſaw to be full of bloud ſpilled in the votage. But let who ſo liſt beléeue it, ſith it is either a fable deuiſed, or ſome diueliſh illuſion, if anie ſuch thing were done. And on mine owne behalfe, hauing (I hope) the feare of God before my eies, I purpoſe here to ſet downe no more than either I know my ſelfe to be true, or am crediblie informed to be ſo, by ſuch godly men, as to whom nothing is more deare than to ſpeake the truth, and not anie thing more odious than to diſcredit themſelues by lieng. In writing therefore of the wonders of England, I find that there are foure notable things, which for their rareneſſe amongſt the common ſort, are taken for the foure miracles and wonders of the land.

Foure wonders of England.

The firſt of theſe is a vehement and ſtrong wind, which iſſueth out of the hilles called the Peke, ſo violent and ſtrong, that at certeine times if a man doo caſt his cote or cloake into the caue from whence it iſſueth, it driueth the ſame backe againe, hoiſing it aloft into the open aire with great force and vehemencie. Of this alſo Giraldus ſpeaketh.

The ſecond is the miraculous ſtanding or rather hanging of certeine ſtones vpon the plaine of Saliſburie, whereof the place is called Stonehenge. And to ſaie the truth, they may well be wondered at, not onelie for the manner of poſition, whereby they become verie difficult to be numbred, but alſo for their greatneſſe & ſtrange maner of lieng of ſome of them one vpon another, which ſeemeth to be with ſo tickle hold, that few men go vnder them without feare of their preſent ruine. How and when theſe ſtones were brought thither, as yet I can not read; howbeit it is moſt likelie, that they were raiſed there by the Britons, after the ſlaughter of their nobilitie at the deadlie banket, which Hengiſt and his Saxons prouided for them, where they were alſo buried, and Vortigerne their king apprehended and led awaie as captiue. I haue heard that the like are to be ſeene in Ireland; but how true it is as yet I can not learne. The report goeth alſo, that theſe were brought from thence, but by what ſhip on the ſea, and cartage by land, I think few men can ſafelie imagine.

The third is an ample and large hole vnder the ground, which ſome call Carcer Aeoli, but in Engliſh Chedderhole, whereinto manie men haue entred & walked verie farre. Howbeit, as the paſſage is large and nothing noiſome: ſo diuerſe that haue aduentured to go into the ſame, could neuer as yet find the end of that waie, neither ſee anie other thing than prettie riuerets and ſtreames, which they often croſſed as they went from place to place. This Chedderhole or Chedder rocke is in Summerſetſhire, and thence the ſaid waters run till they meet with the ſecond Ax that riſeth in Dwkie hole.

The fourth is no leſſe notable than anie of the other. For weſtward vpon certeine hilles a man ſhall ſée the clouds gather togither in faire weather vnto a certeine thickneſſe, and by and by to ſpread themſelues abroad and water their fields about them, as it were vpon the ſudden. The cauſes of which diſperſion, as they are vtterlie vnknowne: ſo manie men coniecture great ſtore of water to be in thoſe hilles, & verie néere at hand, if it were néedfull to be ſought for.

Beſides theſe foure maruelles, there is a little rockie Ile in Aber Barrie (a riueret that falleth into the Sauerne ſea) called Barrie, which hath a rift or cliſt next the firſt ſhore; whereunto if a man doo laie his eare, he ſhall heare ſuch noiſes as are commonlie made in ſmiths forges, to wit, clinking of iron barres, beating with hammers, blowing of bellowſes, and ſuch like: whereof the ſuperſtitious ſort doo gather manie toies, as the gentiles did in old time of their lame god Vulcans pot. The riuer that runneth by Cheſter changeth hir chanell euerie moneth: the cauſe whereof as yet I can not learne; neither doth it ſwell by force of anie land-ſloud, but by ſome vehement wind it oft ouer-runneth hir banks. In Snowdonie are two lakes, whereof one beareth a moouable Iland, which is carried to and fro as the wind bloweth. The other hath three kinds of fiſhes in it, as eéles, trowts, and perches: but herein reſteth the wonder, that all thoſe haue but one eie a péece onelie, and the ſame ſituate in the right ſide of their heads. And this I find to be confirmed alſo by authors: There is a well in the forreſt of Gnareſborow, whereof the ſaid forreſt doth take the name; which water, beſide that it is cold as Stix, in a certeine period of time knowne, conuerteth wood, fleſh, leaues of trées, and moſſe into hard ſtone, without alteration or changing of ſhape. The like alſo is ſeene there in frogs, wormes, and ſuch like liuing creatures as fall into the ſame, and find no readie iſſue. Of this ſpring alſo Leland writeth thus; A little aboue March (but at the further banke of Nide riuer as I came) I ſaw a well of wonderfull nature called Dropping well, becauſe the water thereof diſtilleth out of great rockes hard by into it continuallie, which is ſo cold, and thereto of ſuch nature, that what thing ſoeuer falleth out of thoſe rocks into this pit, or groweth nére thereto, or be caſt into it by mans hand, hand, it turneth into ſtone. It may be (ſaith he) that ſome ſand or other fine ground iſſueth out with this water from theſe hard rocks, which cleauing vnto thoſe things, giueth them in time the forme of ſtones &c. Neere vnto the place where Winburne monaſterie ſometimes ſtood, alſo not farre from Bath there is a faire wood, whereof if you take anie peece, and pitch it into the ground thereabouts, or throw it into the water, within twelue moneths it will turne into hard ſtone. In part of the hilles eaſt ſoutheaſt of Aderleie, a mile from Kingſwood, are ſtones dailie found, perfectlie faſhioned like cockles and mightie oiſters, which ſome dreame haue lien there euer ſince the floud. In the cliffs betweene the Blacke head and Trewardeth baie in Cornwall, is a certeine caue, where things appeare like images guilded, on the ſides of the ſame, which I take to be nothing but the ſhining of the bright ore of coppar and other mettals readie at hand to be found there, if anie diligence were vſed. Howbeit, becauſe it is much marueiled at as a rare thing, I dw not thinke it to be vnmeet to be placed amongſt our wonders. Maiſter Guiſe had of late, and ſtill hath (for aught that I know) a manor in Gloceſterſhire, where certeine okes dw grow, whoſe rotes are verie hard ſtone. And beſide this, the ground is ſo fertile there (as they ſaie) that if a man hew a ſtake of anie wood, and pitch it into the earth, it will grow and take rooting beyond all expectation. Siluceſter towne alſo is ſaid to conteine foureſcore acres of land within the walles, whereof ſome is corne-ground (as Leland ſaith) and the graine which is growing therein doth come to verie good perfection till it be readie to be cut downe: but euen then, or about that time it vaniſheth away & becommeth altogither vnprofitable. Is it any wonder (thinke you) to tell of ſundrie caues neere to Browham, on the weſt ſide of the riuer Almote, wherein are halles, chambers, and all offices of houſhold cut out of the hard rocke? If it be, then may we increaſe the number of marueis verie much by a rehearſall of other alſo. For we haue manie of the like, as one neere ſaint Aſſaphs vpon the banke of Elwie, and about the head of Vendrath Vchan in Wales, whereinto men haue often entred and walked, and yet found nothing but large roomes, and ſandie ground vnder their feet, and other elſe-where. But ſith theſe things are not ſtrange, I let them alone, and go forward with the reſt.

In the pariſh of Landſarnam in Wales, and in the ſide of a ſtonie hill, is a place wherein are foure and twentie ſeats hewen out of the hard rockes; but who did cut them, and to what end, as yet it is not learned. As for the huge ſtone that lieth at Pember in Guitherie pariſh, and of the notable carcaſſe that is affirmed to lie vnder the ſame, there is no cauſe to touch it here: yet were it well done to haue it remoued, though it were but onlie to ſee what it is, which the people haue in ſo great eſtimation & reuerence. There is alſo a pole in Logh Taw, among the blacke mounteins in Brecknockſhire, where (as is ſaid) is the head of Taw that commeth to Swanſeie, which hath ſuch a propertie, that it will breed no fiſh at all, & if anie be caſt into it, they die without recouerie: but this peraduenture may grow through the accidentall corruption of the water, rather than the naturall force of the element it ſelfe. There is alſo a lin in Wales, which in the one ſide beareth trowts ſo red as ſamons, and in the other, which is the weſterlie ſide, verie white and delicate. I heare alſo of two welles not far from Landien, which ſtand verie neere together, and yet are of ſuch diuerſitie of nature, that the one beareth ſope, and is a marueilous fine water; the other altogither of contrarie qualities. Which is not a little to be muſed at, conſidering (I ſaie) that they participate of one ſoile, and riſe ſo nigh one to another. I haue notice giuen me moreouer of a ſtone not farre from ſaint Dauids, which is verie great, as a bed, or ſuch like thing: and being raiſed vp, a man may ſtirre it with his thumbe; but not with his ſhoulder or force of his whole bodie.

There is a well not farre from ſtonie Stratford, which conuerteth manie things into ſtone; and an other in Wales, which is ſaid to double or triple the force of anie edge tole that is quenched in the ſame. In Tegenia, a parcell of Wales, there is a noble well (I meane in the pariſh of Kilken) which is of marueilous nature, and much like to another well at Seuill in Spaine: for although it be ſix miles from the ſea, it ebbeth and floweth twiſe in one daie; alwaies ebbing when the ſea doth vſe to flow, and in flowing likewiſe when the ſea doth vſe to ebbe; whereof ſome dw fable, that this well is ladie and miſtreſſe of the ocean. Not farre from thence alſo is a medicinable ſpring called Schinant of old time, but now Wenefrides well, in the edges whereof doth breed a verie odoriferous and delectable moſſe, wherewith the head of the ſmeller is marueilouſlie refreſhed. Other welles and water-courſes we haue likewiſe, which at ſome times burſt out into huge ſtreames, though at other ſeaſons they run but verie ſoftlie, whereby the people gather ſome alteration of eſtate to be at hand. And ſuch a one there is at Henleie, & an other at Croidon; & ſuch a one alſo in the golden dale beſide Anderne in Picardie, whereof the common ſort imagine manie things. Some of the greater ſort alſo giue ouer to run at all in ſuch times, wherof they conceiue the like opinion. And of the ſame nature, though of no great quantitie, is a pit or well at Langleie parke in Kent, whereof (by good hap) it was my lucke to read a notable hiſtorie in an ancient chronicle that I ſaw of late. What the fooliſh people dreame of the hell Kettles, it is not worthie the rehearſall; yet to the end the lewd opinion conceiued of them may grow into contempt, I will ſaie thus much alſo of thoſe pits. There are certeine pits, or rather three little poles, a mile from Darlington, and a quarter of a mile diſtant from the Theſe banks which the people call the Kettles of hell, or the diuels Kettles, as if he ſhould ſeeth ſoules of ſinfull men and women in them. They adde alſo, that the ſpirits haue oft beene heard to crie and yell about them, with other like talke ſauoring altogether of pagan infidelitie. The truth is, and of this opinion alſo was Cutbert Tunſtall late biſhop of Durham, a man (notwithſtanding the baſeneſſe of his birth, being begotten by one Tunſtall vpon a daughter of the houſe of the Commers, as Leland ſaith) of great learning and iudgement, that the cole-mines in thoſe places are kindled, or if there be no coles, there may a mine of ſome other vnctuous matter be ſet on fire, which being here and there conſumed, the earth falleth in, and ſo doth leaue a pit. Indeed the water is now and then warme (as they ſaie) and beſide that it is not cleere: the people ſuppoſe them to be an hundred fadam deepe. The biggeſt of them alſo hath an iſſue into the Theſe, as experience hath confirmed. For doctor Bellowes alias Belzis made report, how a ducke marked after the faſhion of the duckes of the biſhoprike of Durham, was put into the ſame betwixt Darlington and Theſe banke, and afterward ſeene at a bridge not farre from maſter Clereuax houſe. If it were worth the noting, I would alſo make relation of manie wooden croſſes found verie often about Halidon, whereof the old inhabitants conceiued an opinion that they were fallen from heauen; whereas in truth, they were made and borne by king Oſwald and his men in the battell wherein they preuailed ſometimes againſt the Britiſh infidels, vpon a ſuperſtitious imagination, that thoſe croſſes ſhould be their defenſe and ſhield againſt their aduerſaries. Beda calleth the place where the ſaid field was fought, Heauen field; it lieth not far from the Pictiſh wall, and the famous monaſterie of Hagulſtad. But more of this elſewhere. Neither will I ſpeake of the little hillets ſeene in manie places of our Ile, whereof though the vnſkilfull people babble manie things: yet are they nothing elſe but Tumuli or graues of former times, as appeareth by ſuch toms & carcaſſes as be daily found in the ſame, when they be digged downe. The like fond imagination haue they of a kind of lunarie, which is to be found in manie places, although not ſo well knowen by the forme vnto them, as by the effect thereof, becauſe it now and then openeth the lockes hanging on the horſes feet as hit vpon it where it groweth in their feeding. Roger Bacon our countrieman noteth it to grow plentifullie in Tuthill fields about London. I haue heard of it to be within compaſſe of the parith where I dwell, and do take it for none other than the Sfera Cauallo, whereof Mathiolus and the herbariſts do write, albeit that it hath not beene my lucke at anie time to behold it. Plinie calleth it Aethiopis: and Aelianus, Oppianus, Kyramis, and Trebius haue written manie ſuperſtitious things thereof, but eſpeciallie our Chymiſts, who make it of farre more vertue than our ſmiths do their ferne ſeed, whereof they babble manie wonders, and prate of ſuch effects as may well be performed indeed when the ferne beareth ſeed, which is commonly Ad calendas Græcas, for before it will not be found. But to proceed. There is a well in Darbieſhire called Tideſwell (ſo named of the word tide, or to ebbe and flow) whoſe water often ſeemeth to riſe and fall, as the ſea which is fortie miles from it doth vſuallie accuſtome to ebbe and flow. And hereof an opinion is growen that it keepeth an ordinarie courſe as the ſea doth. Howbeit, ſith diuerſe are knowne to haue watched the ſame, it may be that at ſometimes it riſeth, but not continuallie; and that it ſo doth I am fullie perſuaded to beleeue. But euen inough of the wonders of our countrie, leaſt I doo ſeeme by talking longer of them, wonderouſlie to ouerſhot my ſelfe, and forget how much doth reſt behind of the deſcription of my countrie. As for thoſe that are to be touched of Scotland, the deſcription of that part ſhall in ſome part remember them.

Chap. I.

THere are now two prouinces onelie in England, of which the firſt and greateſt is ſubiect to the ſee of Canturburie, comprehending a parte of Lhoegres, whole Cambria, & alſo Ireland, which in time paſt were ſeuerall, & brought into one by the archbiſhop of the ſaid ſee & aſſiſtance of the pope; who in reſpect of meed, did yeeld vnto the ambitious deſires of ſundrie archbiſhops of Canturburie, as I haue elſewhere declared. The ſecond prouince is vnder the ſee of Yorke, and of theſe; either hath hir archbiſhop reſident commonlie within hir owne limits, who hath not onelie the cheefe dealing in matters apperteining to the hierarchie and iuriſdiction of the church; but alſo great authoritie in ciuill affaires touching the gouernement of the common wealth: ſo far forth as their commiſſions and ſeuerall circuits do extend.

In old time there were three archbiſhops, and ſo manie prouinces in this Ile; of which one kept at London, another at Yorke, and the third at Caerleon vpon Uſke. But as that of London was tranſlated to Canturburie by Auguſtine, and that of Yorke remaineth (notwithſtanding that the greateſt part of his iuriſdiction is now bereft him and giuen to the Scotiſh archbiſhop) ſo that of Caerleon is vtterlie extinguiſhed, and the gouernement of the countrie vnited to that of Canturburie in ſpirituall cauſes: after it was once before remoued to S. Da-uids in Wales by Dauid ſucceſſor to Dubritius, and vncle to king Arthur, in the 519 of Grace, to the end that he and his clearkes might be further off from the crueltie of the Saxons, where it remained till the time of the Baſtard, and for a ſeaſon after, before it was annexed vnto the ſée of Canturburie.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie is commonlie called primat of all England; and in the coronations of the kings of this land, and all other times, wherein it ſhall pleaſe the prince to weare and put on his crowne, his office is to ſet it vpon their heads. They beare alſo the name of their high chapleins continuallie, although not a few of them haue preſumed (in time paſt) to be their equals, and void of ſubiection vnto them. What this is true, it may eaſilie appéere by their owne acts yet kept in record; beſide their epiſtles & anſwers written or in print; wherein they haue ſought not onelie to match but alſo to mate them with great rigor and more than open tyrannie. Our aduerſaries will peraduenture denie this abſolutelie, as they do manie other things apparant, though not without ſhameleſſe impudencie, or at the leaſt wiſe defend it as iuſt and not ſwaruing from common equitie; bicauſe they imagine euerie archbiſhop to be the kings equall in his owne prouince. But how well their doing herein agréeth with the ſaieng of Peter, & examples of the primitiue church, it may eaſilie appéere. Some examples alſo of their demeanor (I meane in the time of poperie) I will not let to remember, leaſt they ſhould ſaie I ſpeake of malice, and without all ground of likelihood.

Of their practiſes with meane perſons I ſpeake not, neither will I begin at Dunſtane the author of all their pride and preſumption here in England. But for ſomuch as the dealing of Robert the Norman againſt earle Godwine is a rare hiſtorie, and deſerueth to be remembred, I will touch it in this place; proteſting to deale withall in more faithfull maner than it hath heretofore béene deliuered vnto vs by the Norman writers, or French Engliſh, who (of ſet purpoſe) haue ſo defaced earle Godwine, that were it not for the teſtimonie of one or two méere Engliſhmen liuing in thoſe daies, it ſhould be impoſſible for me (or anie other) at this preſent to declare the truth of that matter according to hir circumſtances. Marke therefore what I ſaie. For the truth is, that ſuch Normans as came in with Emma in the time of Ethelred, and Canutus, and the Confeſſor, did fall by ſundrie means into ſuch fauor with thoſe princes, that the gentlemen did grow to beare great rule in the court, and their clearkes to be poſſeſſors of the beſt benefices in the land. Herevpon therefore one Robert, a ſolie ambitious préeſt, gat firſt to be biſhop of London, and after the death of Eadſius, to be archbiſhop of Canturburie by the gift of king Edward; leauing his former ſée to William his countrieman. Alſo alſo a Norman was preferred to Lincolne, and other to other places, as the king did thinke conuenient.

Theſe Norman clerkes, and their frends, being thus exalted, it was not long yer they began to mocke, abuſe, and deſpiſe the Engliſh: and ſo much the more, as they dailie ſaw themſelues to increaſe in fauour with king Edward, who alſo called diuerſe of them to be of his ſecret councell, which did not a litle incenſe the harts of the Engliſh againſt them. A traie alſo was made at Douer, betwéene the ſeruants of earle Godwine and the French, whoſe maiſters came ouer to ſée and ſalute the king: whereof I haue ſpoken in my Chronologie, which ſo inflamed the minds of the French clergie and courtiers againſt the Engliſh nobilitie, that each part ſought for opportunitie of reuenge, which yer long toke hold betwéene them. For the ſaid Robert, being called to be archbiſhop of Canturburie, was no ſoner in poſſeſſion of his ſée, than he began to quarrell with earle Godwine (the kings father in law by the mariage of his daughter) who alſo was readie to acquit his demeanor with like malice; and ſo the miſchiefe begun. Herevpon therefore the archbiſhop charged the earle with the murther of Alfred the kings brother, whom not he but Harald the ſonne of Canutus and the Danes had cruellie made awaie. For Alfred and his brother comming into the land with fiue and twentie ſaile, vpon the death of Canutus, and being landed; the Normans that arriued with them giuing out how they came to recouer their right, to wit, the crowne of England; & therevnto the vnſkilfull yong gentlemen, ſhewing themſelues to like of the rumour that was ſpred in this behalfe, the report of their demeanor was quicklie brought to Harald, who cauſed a companie forthwith of Danes priuilie to laie wait for them, as they roade toward Gilford, where Alfred was ſlaine, and thence Edward with much difficultie eſcaped to his ſhips, and ſo returned into Normandie.

But to proceed. This affirmation of the archbiſhop being greatlie ſwthed out with his craftie vtterance (for he was lerned) confirmed by his French frends, (for they had all conſpired againſt the erle) and therevnto the king being deſirous to reuenge the death of his brother, bred ſuch a grudge in his mind againſt Godwine, that he baniſhed him and his ſons cleane out of the land. He ſent alſo his wife the erles daughter priſoner to Wilton, with one onelie maiden attending vpon hir, where ſhe laie almoſt a yeare before ſhe was releaſed. In the meane ſeaſon, the reſt of the péeres, as Siward earle of Northumberland ſurnamed Digara or Fortis, Leofrike earle of Cheſter, and other went to the king, before the departure of Godwine, indeuouring to perſuade him vnto the reuocation of his ſentence; and deſiring that his cauſe might be heard and diſcuſſed by order of law. But the king incenſed by the archbiſhop and his Normans would not heare on that ſide, ſaieng plainelie, and ſwearing by ſaint John the euangeliſt (for that was his common oth) that earle Godwine ſhould not haue his peace till he reſtored his brother Alfred aliue againe vnto his preſence. With which anſwer the péeres departed in choler from the court, and Godwine toward the coaſt.

Comming alſo vnto the ſhore and readie to take ſhipping, he knéeled downe in preſence of his conduct (to wit at Boſenham in the moneth of September, from whence he intended to ſaile into Flanders vnto Baldwine the earle) and there praied openlie before them all, that if euer he attempted anie thing againſt the kings perſon of England, or his roiall eſtate, that he might neuer come ſafe vnto his couſine, nor ſée his countrie any more, but periſh in this voiage. And herewith he went aboord the ſhip that was prouided for him, and ſo from the coaſt into the open ſea. But ſée what followed. He was not yet gone a mile waie from the land, before he ſaw the ſhore full of armed ſouldiers, ſent after by the archbiſhop and his frends to kill him yer he ſhould depart and go out of the countrie: which yet more incenſed the harts of the Engliſh againſt them.

Being come alſo to Flanders, he cauſed the earle, the French king, and other of his frends, among whome alſo the emperour was one, to write vnto the king in his behalfe; but all in vaine: for nothing could be obteined from him, of which the Normans had no liking, wherevpon the earle and his ſonnes changed their minds, obteined aid, and inuaded the land in ſundrie places. Finallie ioining their powers they came by the Thames into Southwarke néere London where they lodged, and looked for the king to incounter with them in the field. The king ſéeing what was done, commanded the Londoners not to aid nor bittell them. But the citizens made anſwer, how the quarrell of Godwine was the cauſe of the whole realme, which he had in maner giuen ouer vnto the ſpoile of the French: and there vpon they not onelie vittelled them aboundantlie, but alſo receiued the earle and his chiefe frends into the citie, where they lodged them at their eaſe, till the kings power was readie to ioine with them in battell.

Great reſort alſo was made vnto them from all places of the realme, ſo that the earles armie was wonderfullie increaſed, and the date and place choſen wherein the battell ſhould be fought. But when the armies met, the kings ſide began ſome to flée to the earle, other to laie downe their weapons, and not a few to run awaie out right; the reſt telling him plainelie that they would neuer fight againſt their owne countriemen, to mainteine Frenchmens quarrels. The Normans alſo ſeing the ſequele, fled awaie ſo faſt as they might gallop, leauing the king in the field to ſhift for himſelfe (as he beſt might) whileſt they did ſaue themſelues elſewhere.

In the meanie ſeaſon the earles power would haue ſet vpon the king, either to his ſlaughter, or apprehenſion; but he ſtaied them, ſaieng after this maner: The king is my ſonne (as you all know) and it is not for a father to deale ſo hardlie with his child, neither a ſubiect with his ſouereigne; it is not he that hath hurt or done me this iniurie, but the proud Normans that are about him: wherfore to gaine a kingdome, I will do him no violence. And therewithall caſting aſide his battell ax he ran to the king, that ſtood altogither amazed, and falling at his fét he craued his peace, accuſed the archbiſhop, required that his cauſe might be heard in open aſſemblie of his péres; and finallie determined as truth and equitie ſhould deſerue.

The king (after he had pauſed a prettie while) ſéeing his old father in law to lie groueling at his fét, and conceiuing with himſelfe that his ſute was not vnreaſonable; ſéeing alſo his children, and the reſt of the greateſt barons of the land to knéele before him, and make the like requeſt: he lifted vp the earle by the hand, bad him be of good comfort, pardoned all that was paſt, and frendlie hauing killed him and his ſonnes vpon the chéekes, he lead them to his palace, called home the quéene, and ſummoned all his lords vnto a councell.

Wherein it is much to read, how manie billes were preſented againſt the biſhop & his Normans; ſome conteining matter of rape, other of robberie, extortion, murder, manſlaughter, high treaſon, adulterie; and not a few of batterie. Wherwith the king (as a man now awaked out of ſléepe) was ſo offended, that vpon conſultation had of theſe things, he baniſhed all the Normans out of the land, onelie three or foure excepted, whome he reteined for ſundrie neceſſarie cauſes, albeit they came neuer more ſo néere him afterward as to be of his priuie councell.

After this alſo the earle liued almoſt two yeares, and then falling into an apoplexie, as he ſat with the king at the table, he was taken vp and carried into the kings bedchamber, where (after a few daies) he made an end of his life. And thus much of our firſt broile raiſed by the cleargie, and practiſe of the archbiſhop. I would intreat of all the like examples of tyrannie, practiſed by the prelats of this ſée, againſt their lords and ſouereignes: but then I ſhould rather write an hiſtorie than a deſcription of this Iland.

Wherefore I refer you to thoſe reports of Anſelme and Becket, ſufficientlie penned by other, the which Anſelme alſo making a ſhew, as if he had binerie vnwilling to be placed in the ſée of Canturburie, gaue this anſwer to the letters of ſuch his frends, as did make requeſt vnto him to take the charge vpon him. Secularia negotia neſcio, quia ſine nolo, eorum námque occupationes horreo, liberum affectans animum. Voluntati ſacrarum intendo ſcripturarum, vos diſſonantiam facitis, verendúmque eſt nè aratrum ſanctæ eccleſiæ, quod in Anglia duo boues validi & pari fortitudine, ad bonum certantes, id eſt rex & archiepiſcopus, debeant trahere, nunc oue vetula cum tauro indomito iugata, diſtorqueatur à recto. Ego ouis vetula, qui ſi quietus eſſem, verbi Dei lacte, & operimento lanæ, aliquibus poſſem fortaſſis non ingratus eſſe, ſed ſi me cum hoc tauro coniungitis, videbitis pro diſparilitate trahentium, aratrum non rectè procedere, &c. Which is in Engliſh thus: Of ſecular affaires I haue no ſkill, becauſe I will not know them, for I euen abhor the troubles that riſe about them, as one that deſireth to haue his mind at libertie. I applie my whole indeuor to the rule of the ſcriptures, you lead me to the contrarie. And it is to be feared leaſt the plough of holie church, which two ſtrong oxen of equall force, and both like earneſt to contend vnto that which is good (that is the king and the archbiſhop) ought to draw, ſhould thereby now ſwarue from the right forrow, by matching of an old ſhéepe with a wild vntamed bull. I am that old ſhéepe, who if I might be quiet, could peraduenture ſhew my ſelfe not altogither vngratfull to ſome, by féeding them with the milke of the word of God, and couering them with woll: but if you match me with this bull, you ſhall ſée that thorough want of equalitie in draught the plough will not go to right, &c: as followeth in the proceſſe of his letters. The ſaid Thomas Becket was ſo proud, that he wrote to king Henrie the ſecond, as to his lord, to his king, and to his ſonne, offering him his counſell, his reuerence, and due correction, &c. Others in like ſort haue proteſted, that they owght nothing to the kings of this land, but their counſell onelie, reſeruing all obedience vnto the ſée of Rome. Thomas Becket.

And as the old cocke of Canturburie did crow in this behalfe, ſo the yong cockerels of other ſées did imitate his demeanor, as may be ſéene by this one example alſo in king Stephans time, worthie to be remembred; vnto whome the biſhop of London would not ſo much as ſweare to be true ſubiect: wherein alſo he was mainteined by the pope, as appeareth by theſe letters.

Eugenius epiſcopus ſeruus ſeruorum Dei, dilecto in Chriſto filio Stephano illuſtri regi Anglorũ ſalutẽ, & apoſtolicã benedictionẽ. Adhæc ſuperna prouidẽtia in eccleſia pontifices ordinauit, vt Chriſtianus populus ab eis paſcua vitæ reciperet, & tam principes ſeculares, quàm inferioris conditionis homines, ipſis pontificibus tanquam Chriſti vicarijs reuerentiam exhiberent. Venerabilis ſiquidem frater noſter Robertus London epiſcopus, tanquam vir ſapiens & honeſtus, & relligionis amator, à nobilitate tua benignè tractandus eſt, & pro collata à Deo prudentia propenſiùs honorandus. Quia ergò, ſicut in veritate comperimus cum animæ ſuæ ſalute, ac ſuæ ordinis periculo, fidelitate quæ ab eo requiritur aſtringi non poteſt: volumus, & ex paterno tibi affectu conſulimus, quatenus prædictum fratrem noſtrum ſuper hoc nullatenus inquietes, immò pro beati Petri & noſtra reuerentia, eum in amorem & gratiam tuam recipias. Cùm autem illud iuramentum præſtare non poſſit, ſufficiat diſcretioni tuæ, vt ſimplici & veraci verbo promittat, quòd læſionem tibi vel terræ tuæ non inferat: Vale. Dat. Meldis 6. cal. Iulij.

Thus we ſée, that kings were to rule no further than it pleaſed the pope to like of; neither to challenge more obedience of their ſubiects than ſtood ac-

ſo

so with their good will and pleasure. He wrote in like sort vnto quéene Mawd about the same matter, making hir Samsons calfe (the better to bring his purpose to passe) as appeareth by the same letter here insuing.

Solomone attestante, didicimus quòd mulier sapiens ædificat domum; insipiens autem constructam destruet manibus. Gaudemus pro te, & deuotionis studium in Domino collaudamus; quoniam sicut religiosorum relatione accepimus, timorem Dei præ oculis habens, operibus pietatis intẽdis, & personas ecclesiasticas & diligis & honoras. Vt ergo de bono in melius (inspirante Domino) proficere valeas, nobilitatẽ tuam in Domino rogamus, & rogando monemus, & exhortamur in Domino, quatenus bonis initijs exitus meliores iniungas, & venerabilem fratrem nostrum Robertum London episcopũ, pro illius reuerentia, qui cùm olim dives esset, pro nobis pauper fieri voluit, attentiùs diligas, & honores. Apud virum tuum & dilectum filium nostrum Stephanum, insignem regem Anglorum efficere studeas, vt monitis, hortatu, & cõsilio tuo, ipsum in benignitatem & dilectionem suam suscipiat, & pro beati Petri, & nostra reuerentia propensiùs habeat commendatum. Et quia sicut (veritate teste) attendimus cum sine salute, & sui ordinis periculo, præfato filio nostro astringi non posse; volumus, & paterno sibi & tibi affectu consulimus, vt vobis sufficiat, veraci & simplici verbo promissionẽ ab eo suscipere, quòd læsionem vel detrimentum ei, vel terræ suæ nõ inferat. Dat. vt supra.

Is it not strange, that a prouish order of religion (deuised by man) should breake the expresse law of God, who commandeth all men to honour and obeie their kings and princes, in whome some part of the power of God is manifest and laid open vnto vs? And euen vnto this end the cardinall of Hostia also wrote to the canons of Paules, after this maner; couertlie incouraging them to stand to their election of the said Robert, who was no more willing to giue ouer his new bishoprike, than they carefull to offend the king; but rather imagined which waie to keepe it still maugre his displeasure: & yet not to sweare obedience vnto him, for all that he should be able to do or performe vnto the contrarie.

Humilis Dei gratia Hostiensis episcopus, Londinensis ecclesiæ canonicis spiritũ consilij in Domino. Sicut rationi contraria prorsus est abijcienda petitio, ita in hijs, quæ iustè desyderantur, effectum negare omninò non conuenit. Sanè nuper accepimus, quòd Londinensis ecclesia, diu proprio destituta pastore, communi voto, & pari assensu cleri & populi, venerabilem filium nostrum Robertum, eiusdem ecclesiæ archidiaconum, in pastorem & episcopum animarum suarum susceperit & elegerit. Nouimus quidem eum esse personam, quam sapientia desuper ei attributa, & honestas conuersationis, & morum reuerentia plurimùm commẽdabilem reddidit. Inde est quòd fraternitati vestræ mandando consulimus, vt proposito vestro bono (quod vt credimus ex Deo est) & vt ex literis domini papæ cognoscetis, non tepidè, non lentè debitum finem imponatis: ne tam nobilis ecclesia, sub occasione huiusmodi, spiritualium, quod absit, & temporalium detrimentum patiatur. Ipsius námque industria credimus, quòd antiqua religio, & forma disciplinæ, & grauitas habitus, in ecclesia vestra reparari: & si quæ fuerint ipsius contentiones, ex pastoris absentia, Dei gratia cooperante, & eodem præsente, poterint reformari. Dat. &c.

Hereby you see how king Stephan was dealt withall. And albeit the archbishop of Canturburie is not openlie to be touched herewith, yet it is not to be doubted, but he was a doer in it, so far as might tend to the maintenance of the right and prerogatiue of holie church. And euen no lesse vnquietnesse had another of our princes with Iohn of Arundell, who fled to Rome for feare of his head, and caused the pope to write an ambitious and contumelious letter vnto his souereigne about his restitution. But when (by the kings letters yet extant) & beginning thus; Thomas proditionis non expers nostræ regiæ maiestati insidias fabricauit, the pope vnderstood the botome of the matter, he was contented that Thomas should be depriued, and another archbishop chosen in his sted.

Neither did this pride staie at archbishops and bishops, but descended lower, euen to the rake-helles of the clergie and puddels of all vngodlinesse. For beside the iniurie receiued of their superiors, how was K. Iohn dealt withall by the vile Cisiertians at Lincolne in the second of his reigne? Certes, when he had (vpon iust occasion) conceiued some grudge against them for their ambitious demeanor; and vpon deniall to paie such summes of monie as were allotted vnto them, he had caused seizure to be made of such horsses, swine, neate, and other things of theirs, as were mainteined in his forrests. They denounced him as fast amongst themselues with bell, booke and candle, to be accursed and excommunicated. Wherevnto they so handled the matter with the pope and their friends, that the king was faine to yéeld to their good graces: insomuch that a meeting for pacification was appointed betweéne them at Lincolne, by meanes of the present archbishop of Canturburie, who went oft betweene him and the Cisiertian commissioners before the matter could be finished. In the end, the king himselfe came also vnto the said commissioners as they sat in their chapiter house, and there with teares fell downe at their feet, crauing pardon for his trespasses against them, and heartilie requiring that they would (from thencefoorth) commend him and his realme in their praiers vnto the protection of the almightie, and receiue him into their fraternitie: promising moreouer full satisfaction of their damages susteined; and to build an house of their order in whatsoeuer place of England it should please them to assigne. And this he confirmed by charter, bearing date the seauen and twentith of Nouember, after the Scotish king was returned into Scotland, & departed from the king. Whereby (and by other the like, as betweene Iohn Stratford and Edward the third, &c:) a man may easilie conceiue how prond the cleargie-men haue beene in former times, as wholie presuming vpon the primasie of their pope. More matter could I alledge of these and the like brotles, not to be found among our common historiographers: howbeit reseruing the same vnto places more conuenient, I will cease to speake of them at this time, and go forward with such other things as my purpose is to speake of. At the first therefore there was like and equall authoritie in both our archbishops: but as he of Canturburie hath long since obteined the prerogatiue aboue Yorke (although I saie not without great trouble, sute, some bloudshed & contention) so the archbishop of Yorke is neuertheless written primate of England, as one contenting himselfe with a péece of a title at the least, when (all) could not be gotten. And as he of Canturburie crowneth the king, so this of Yorke doth the like to the quéene, whose perpetuall chapleine he is, & hath beene from time to time, since the determination of this controuersie, as writers do report. The first also hath vnder his iurisdiction to the number of one and twentie inferiour biſhops, the other hath onlie foure, by reaſon that the churches of Scotland are now remoued from his obedience vnto an archbiſhop of their owne, whereby the greatneſſe and circuit of the iuriſdiction of Yorke is not a little diminiſhed. In like ſort each of theſe ſeauen and twentie ſées haue their cathedrall churches, wherein the deanes (a calling not knowne in England before the conqueſt) do beare the cheefe rule, being men eſpeciallie choſen to that vocation, both for their learning and godlineſſe ſo neere as can be poſſible. Theſe cathedrall churches haue in like maner other dignities and canonries ſtill remaining vnto them, as heeretofore vnder the popiſh regiment. Howbeit thoſe that are choſen to the ſame are no idle and vnprofitable perſons (as in times paſt they haue beene when moſt of theſe liuings were either furniſhed with ſtrangers, eſpeciallie out of Italie, boies, or ſuch idiots as had leaſt ſkill of all in diſcharging of thoſe functions, whereunto they were called by vertue of theſe ſtipends) but ſuch as by preaching and teaching can and do learnedlie ſet forth the glorie of God, and further the ouerthrow of antichriſt to the vttermoſt of their powers.

Deanes.

Canonries.

These churches are called cathedrall, becauſe the biſhops dwell or lie neere vnto the ſame, as bound to keepe continuall reſidence within their iuriſdictions, for the better ouerſight and gouernance of the ſame: the word being deriued A cathedra, that is to ſaie a chaire or ſeat where he reſteth, and for the moſt part abideth. At the firſt there was but one church in euerie iuriſdiction, wherinto no man entred to praie, but with ſome oblation or other toward the maintenance of the paſtor. For as it was reputed an infamie to paſſe by anie of them without viſitation: ſo it was a no leſſe reproch to appeare emptie before the Lord. And for this occaſion alſo they were builded verie huge and great, for otherwiſe they were not capable of ſuch multitudes as came dailie vnto them, to heare the word, and receiue the ſacraments.

But as the number of chriſtians increaſed, ſo firſt monaſteries, then finallie pariſh churches were builded in euerie iuriſdiction: from whence I take our deanerie churches to haue their originall, now called mother churches, and their incumbents archpreeſts; the reſt being added ſince the conqueſt, either by the lords of euerie towne, or zealous men, loth to trauell farre, and willing to haue ſome eaſe by building them neere hand. Vnto theſe deanerie churches alſo the cleargie in old time of the ſame deanrie were appointed to repaire at ſundrie ſeaſons, there to receiue wholeſome ordinances, and to conſult vpon the neceſſarie affaires of the whole iuriſdiction; if neceſſitie ſo required: and ſome image hereof is yet to be ſeene in the north parts. But as the number of churches increaſed, ſo the repaire of the faithfull vnto the cathedrals did diminiſh: whereby they now become eſpeciallie in their nether parts rather markets and ſhops for merchandize, than ſolemn places of praier, whereunto they were firſt erected. Moreouer in the ſaid cathedrall churches vpon ſundaies and feſtiuall daies, the canons do make certeine ordinarie ſermons by courſe, whereunto great numbers of all eſtates do orderlie reſort: and vpon the working daies thoſe in the weeke, one of the ſaid canons, or ſome other in his ſtéed, doth read and expound ſome peece of holie ſcripture, whereunto the people do verie reuerentlie repaire. The biſhops themſelues in like ſort are not idle in their callings, for being now exempt from court and councell, which is one (and a no ſmall) peece of their felicitie (although Richard archbiſhop of Canturburie thought otherwiſe, as yet appeareth by his letters to pope Alexander; Epiſtola 44. Petri Bleſenſis, where he ſaith; Becauſe the cleargie of his time were ſomewhat narrowlie looked vnto, Supra dorſum eccleſiæ fabricant peccatores, &c:) they ſo aplie their minds to the ſetting forth of the word, that there are verie few of them, which do not euerie ſundaie or oftener reſort to ſome place or other, within their iuriſdictions, where they expound the ſcriptures with much grauitie and ſkill; and yet not without the great miſliking and contempt of ſuch as hate the word. Of their manifold tranſlations from one ſée to another I will ſaie nothing, which is not now done for the benefit of the flocke, as the preferment of the partie fauoured, and aduantage vnto the prince, a matter in time paſt much doubted of, to wit, whether a biſhop or paſtor might be tranſlated from one ſée to another; & left vndecided, till preſcription by coſtall authoritie made it good. For among princes a thing once done, is well done, and to be done oftentimes, though no warrant be to be found therefore.

The biſhops preach diligentlie, whoſe predeceſſors heretofore haue beene occupied in temporall affairs.

They haue vnder them alſo their archdeacons, ſome one, diuerſe two, and manie foure or mo, as their circuits are in quantitie, which archdeacons are termed in law the biſhops eies: and theſe (beſide their ordinarie courts, which are holden within ſo manie or more of their ſeuerall deanries by themſelues or their officials once in a moneth at the leaſt) do keepe yearelie two viſitations or ſynods (as the biſhop doth in euerie third yeare, wherein he confirmeth ſome children, though moſt care but a litle for that ceremonie) in which they make diligent inquiſition and ſearch, as well for the doctrine and behauiour of the miniſters, as the orderlie dealing of the pariſhioners in reſorting to their pariſh churches and conformitie vnto religion. They puniſh alſo with great ſeueritie all ſuch treſpaſſers, either in perſon or by the purſſe (where permutation of penance is thought more grieuous to the offendor) as are preſented vnto them: or if the cauſe be of the more weight, as in caſes of hereſie, pertinacie, contempt, and ſuch like, they referre them either to the biſhop of the dioceſſe, or his chancellor, or elſe to ſundrie graue perſons ſet in authoritie, by vertue of an high commiſſion directed vnto them from the prince to that end, who in verie courteous maner do ſée the offendors gentlie reformed, or elſe ſeuerlie puniſhed, if neceſſitie ſo inforce.

Archdeacons.

High commiſſioners.

Beſide this, in manie of our archdeaconries we haue an exerciſe latelie begun, which for the moſt part is called a prophecie or conference, and erected onelie for the examination or triall of the diligence of the cleargie in their ſtudie of holie ſcriptures. Howbeit, ſuch is the thirſtie deſire of the people in theſe daies to heare the word of God, that they alſo haue as it were with zealous violence intruded themſelues among them (but as hearers onelie) to come by more knowledge through their preſence at the ſame. Herein alſo (for the moſt part) two of the yonger ſort of miniſters do expound each after other ſome peece of the ſcriptures ordinarilie appointed vnto them in their courſes (wherein they orderlie go through with ſome one of the euangeliſts, or of the epiſtles, as it pleaſeth the whole aſſemblie to chooſe at the firſt in euerie of theſe conferences) and when they haue ſpent an houre or a little more betweene them, then commeth one of the better learned ſort, who being a graduat for the moſt part, or knowne to be a preacher ſufficientlie authoriſed, & of a ſound iudgement, ſupplieth the rome of a moderator, making firſt a breefe rehearſall of their diſcourſes, and then adding what him thinketh good of his owne knowledge, wherby two houres are thus commonlie ſpent at this moſt profitable meeting. When all is done, if the firſt ſpeakers haue ſhewed anie peece of diligence, they are commended for their trauell, and incouraged to go forward. If they haue béene found to be ſlacke, or not ſound in deliuerie of their doctrine, their negligence and error is openlie reproued before all their brethren, who go aſide of purpoſe from the laitie, after the exerciſe ended, to iudge of theſe matters, and conſult of the next ſpeakers and quantitie of the text to be handled in that place. The laitie neuer ſpeake of courſe (except ſome baine and buſie head will now and then intrude themſelues with offenſe) but are onelie hearers; and as it is vſed in ſome places weekelie, in other once in foureténe daies, in diuerſe monethlie, and elſewhere twiſe in a yeare, ſo is it a notable ſpurre vnto all the miniſters, thereby to applie their bookes, which otherwiſe (as in times paſt) would giue themſelues to hawking, hunting, tables, cards, dice, tipling at the alehouſe, shooting of matches, and other like vanities, nothing commendable in ſuch as ſhould be godlie and zealous ſtewards of the good gifts of God, faithfull diſtributors of his word vnto the people, and diligent paſtors according to their calling.

But alas! as ſathan the author of all miſchéefe hath in ſundrie manners heretofore hindered the erection and maintenance of manie good things: ſo in this he hath ſtirred vp aduerſaries of late vnto this moſt profitable exerciſe, who not regarding the commoditie that riſeth thereby ſo well to the hearers as ſpekers; but either ſtumbling (I cannot tell how) at words and termes, or at the leaſt wiſe not liking to here of the reprehenſion of vice, or peraduenture taking a miſliking at the ſlender demeanours of ſuch negligent miniſters, as now and then in their courſes do occupie the romes: haue either by their owne practiſe, their ſiniſter information, or ſuggeſtions made vpon ſurmiſes vnto other procured the ſuppreſſion of theſe conferences, condemning them as hurtfull, pernicious, and dailie breéders of no ſmall hurt & inconuenience. But hereof let God be iudge, vnto whome the cauſe belongeth.

Our elders or miniſters and deacons (for ſubdeacons and the other inferiour orders, ſometime vſed in popiſh church we haue not) are made according to a certeine forme of conſecration concluded vpon in the time of king Edward the firſt, by the clergie of England, and ſone after confirmed by the three eſtates of the realme, in the high court of parlement. And out of the firſt ſort, that is to ſaie, of ſuch as are called to the miniſterie (without reſpect whether they be married or not) are biſhops, deanes, archdeacons, & ſuch as haue the higher places in the hierarchie of the church elected; and theſe alſo as all the reſt, at the firſt comming vnto anie ſpirituall promotion, do yéeld vnto the prince the entire tare of that their liuing for one whole yeare, if it amount in value vnto ten pounds and vpwards, and this vnder the name and title of firſt fruits.

Faculties.

With vs alſo it is permitted, that a ſufficient man may (by diſpenſation from the prince) hold two liuings, not diſtant either from other aboue thirtie miles; whereby it commeth to paſſe, that as hir maieſtie doth reape ſome commoditie by the facultie, ſo the vnition of two in one man doth bring oftentimes more benefit to one of them in a moneth (I meane for doctrine) than they haue had before peraduenture in manie yeares.

Manie exclame againſt ſuch faculties, as if there were no good preachers that want maintenance, than liuings to maintaine them. In déed when a liuing is void, there are ſo manie ſuitors for it, that a man would thinke the report to be true, and moſt certeine: but when it commeth to the triall, who are ſufficient, and who not, who are ſtaied men in conuerſation, iudgement, and learning; of that great number you ſhall hardlie find one or two, ſuch as they ought to be: and yet none more earneſt to make ſute, to promiſe largelie, beare a better ſhew, or find fault with the ſtate of things than they. Neuertheleſſe, I do not thinke that their exclamations if they were wiſelie handled, are altogither grounded vpon rumors or ambitious minds, if you reſpect the ſtate of the thing it ſelfe, and not the neceſſitie growing through want of able men, to furniſh out all the cures in England, which both our vniuerſities are neuer able to performe. For if you obſerue what numbers of preachers Cambridge and Oxford do yearelie ſend forth; and how manie new compoſitions are made in the court of firſt fruits, by the deaths of the laſt incumbents: you ſhall ſone ſée a difference. Wherefore, if in countrie townes & cities, yea euen in London it ſelfe, foure or fiue of the litle churches were brought into one, the inconuenience would in great part be redreſſed and amended.

And to ſaie truth, one moſt commonlie of theſe ſmall liuings is of ſo little value, that it is not able to maintaine a meane ſcholar; much leſſe a learned man, as not being aboue ten, twelue, ſixtéene, ſeuentéene, twentie, or thirtie pounds at the moſt, toward their charges, which now (more than before time) do go out of the ſame. I ſaie more than before, becauſe euerie ſmall trifle, noble mans requeſt, or courteſie craued by the biſhop, doth impoſe and command a twentith part, a three ſcore part, or two pence in the pound, &c: out of our liuings, which hither to hath not béene vſuallie granted, but by conſent of a ſynod, wherein things were decided according to equitie, and the power ſort conſidered of, which now are equallie burdened.

Tenths.

We paie alſo the tenths of our liuings to the prince yearelie, according to ſuch valuation of ech of them, as hath béene latelie made: which neuertheleſſe in time paſt were not annuall but voluntarie, & paid at requeſt of king or pope. Herevpon alſo hangeth a pleaſant ſtorie though done of late yeares, to wit 1452, at which time the cleargie ſéeing the continuall loſſes that the king of England ſuſteined in France, vpon ſome motion of releéſe made, granted in an open conuocation to giue him two tenths toward the recouerie of Burdeaux, which his grace verie thankefullie receiued. It fortuned alſo at the ſame time that Vincentius Clemens the popes factor was here in England, who hearing what the clergie had done, came into the conuocation houſe alſo in great haſt and leſſe ſpéed, where, in a ſolemne oration he earneſtlie required them to be no leſſe fauourable to their ſpirituall father the pope, and mother the ſée of Rome, than they had ſhewed themſelues vnto his vaſſall and inferiour, meaning their ſouereigne lord in temporall iuriſdiction, &c. In deliuering alſo the cauſe of his ſuite, he ſhewed how greeuouſlie the pope was diſturbed by cutthroates, harlots, and harlots, which do now ſo abound in Rome, that his holineſſe is in dailie danger to be made a waie amongſt them. To be ſhort when this fine tale was told, one of the companie ſtood vp and ſaid vnto him; My lord we haue heard your requeſt, and as we thinke it deſerueth litle conſideration and leſſe care, for how would you haue vs to contribute to his aid in ſuppreſſion of ſuch, as he and ſuch as you are do continuall vphold, it is not vnknowen in this houſe what rule is kept in Rome.

I grant (quoth Vincent) that there wanteth iuſt reformation of manie things in that citie, which would haue béene made ſoner, but now it is too late: neuertheleſſe I beſéech you to write vnto his holineſſe, with requeſt that he would leaue and abandon that Babylon, which is but a ſinke of miſchiefe, and kéepe his court elſewhere in place of better fame. And this he ſhall be the better able alſo to performe, if by your liberalitie liberalitie extended towards him, vnto whome you are moſt bound, he be incouraged thereto. Manie other words paſſed to and fro amongſt them, howbeit in the end Vincent ouercame not, but was diſmiſſed without anie penie obteined. But to returne to our tenths, a paiement firſt as deuiſed by the pope, and afterward taken vp as by the preſcription of the king, wherevnto we may ioine alſo our firſt fruits, which is one whole yeares commoditie of our liuing, due at our entrance into the ſame, the tenths abated vnto the princes cofers, and paid commonlie in two yeares. For the receipt alſo of theſe two paiments, an eſpeciall office or court is erected, which beareth name of firſt fruits and tenths, wherevnto if the partie to be preferred, doo not make his dutifull repaire by an appointed time after poſſeſſion taken, there to compound for the paiment of his ſaid fruits, he incurreth the danger of a great penaltie, limited by a certeine ſtatute prouided in that behalfe, againſt ſuch as doo intrude into the eccleſiaſticall function, and refuſe to paie the accuſtomed duties belonging to the ſame.

They paie likewiſe ſubſidies with the temporaltie, but in ſuch ſort, that if theſe paie after foure ſhillings for land, the cleargie contribute commonlie after ſix ſhillings of the pound, ſo that of a benefice of twentie pounds by the yeare, the incumbent thinketh himſelfe well acquited, if all ordinarie paiments being diſcharged he may reſerue thirteene pounds ſix ſhillings eight pence towards his owne ſuſtentation, and maintenance of his familie. Seldome alſo are they without the compaſſe of a ſubſidie, for if they be one yeare cleare from this paiement, a thing not often ſeene of late yeares, they are like in the next to heare of another grant: ſo that I ſaie againe they are ſeldome without the limit of a ſubſidie. Herein alſo they ſomewhat find themſelues grieued, that the laitie may at euerie taxation helpe themſelues, and ſo they doo through conſideration had of their decaie and hinderance, and yet their impoueriſhment cannot but touch alſo the parſon or vicar, vnto whom ſuch libertie is denied, as is dailie to be ſeene in their accompts and tithings.

Some of them alſo, after the mariages of their children, will haue their proportions qualified, or by friendſhip get themſelues quite out of the booke. But what ſtand I vpon theſe things, who haue rather to complaine of the iniurie offered by ſome of our neighbors of the laitie, which dailie indeuor to bring vs alſo within the compaſſe of their fifteens or tares for their owne eaſe, whereas the tare of the whole realme, which is commonlie greater in the champeigne than woodland ſoile, amounteth onelie to 37930 pounds nine pence halfepenie, is a burden eaſie inough to be borne vpon ſo manie ſhoulders, without the helpe of the cleargie, whoſe tenths and ſubſidies make vp commonlie a double, if not troubleſome vnto their aforeſaid paiments. Sometimes alſo we are threatned with a Meliùs inquirendum, as if our liuings were not racked high inough alreadie. But if a man ſhould ſeeke out where all thoſe church lands, which in time paſt did contribute vnto the old ſumme required or to be made vp, no doubt no ſmall number of the laitie of all ſtates ſhould be contributors alſo with vs, the prince not defrauded of hir expectation and right. We are alſo charged with armor & munitions from thirtie pounds vpwards, a thing more needfull than diuerſe other charges impoſed vpon vs are conuenient, by which & other burdens our caſe groweth to be more heauie by a great deale (notwithſtanding our immunitie from temporall ſeruices) than that of the laitie, and for ought that I ſee not likelie to be diminiſhed, as if the church were now become the aſſe whereon euerie market man is to ride and caſt his wallet.

The other paiments doo vnto the archbiſhop and biſhop at their ſeuerall viſitations (of which the firſt is double to the latter) and ſuch alſo as the archdeacon receiueth at his ſynods, &c: remaine ſtill as they did without anie alteration, onelie this I thinke be added within memorie of man, that at the comming of euerie prince, his appointed officers doo commonlie viſit the whole realme vnder the forme of an eccleſiaſticall inquiſition, in which the clergie doo vſuallie paie double fees, as vnto the archbiſhop. Hereby then, and by thoſe alreadie remembred, it is found that the church of England, is no leſſe commodious to the princes coffers than the ſtate of the laitie, if it doo not farre exceed the ſame, ſince their paiments are certeine, continuall, and ſeldome abated, howſoeuer they gather vp their owne duties with grudging, murmuring, ſute, and ſlanderous ſpeeches of the paiers, or haue their liuings otherwiſe hardlie valued vnto the vttermoſt farding, or ſhrewdlie cancelled by the couetouſneſſe of the patrones, of whome ſome doo beſtow aduouſons of benefices vpon their bakers, butlers, cookes, good archers, falconers, and horſekéepers, in ſtéed of other recompenſe, for their long and faithfull ſeruice, which they imploie afterward vnto their moſt aduantage.

Certes here they reſemble the pope verie much, for as he ſendeth out his idols, ſo doo they their paraſites, pages, chamberleins, ſtewards, grooms, & lackies; and yet theſe be the men that firſt exclame of the inſufficiencie of the miniſters, as hoping thereby in due time to get alſo their glebes and grounds into their hands. In times paſt biſhoprikes went almoſt after the ſame maner vnder the laie princes, and then vnder the pope, ſo that he which helped a clerke vnto a ſee, was ſure to haue a preſent or purſe fine, if not an annuall penſion, beſides that which went to the popes coffers, and was thought to be verie good merchandize. Hereof one example may be touched, as of a thing done in my yonger dates, whileſt quéene Marie bare the ſwaie and gouerned in this land. After the death of Stephan Gardiner, the ſée of Wincheſter was void for a ſeaſon, during which time cardinall Pole made ſeizure vpon the reuenues and commodities of the ſame, pretending authoritie therevnto Sede vacante, by vertue of his place. With this act of his the biſhop of Lincolne called White tooke ſuch diſpleaſure, that he ſtepped in like a mate, with full purpoſe (as he ſaid) to kéepe that ſée from ruine. He wrote alſo to Paulus the fourth pope, requiring that he might be preferred therevnto, promiſing ſo as he might be Compos voti, to paie to the popes coffers 1600 pounds yearlie during his naturall life, and for one yeare after. But the pope nothing liking of his motion, and yet deſirous to reape a further benefit, firſt ſhewed himſelfe to ſtomach his ſimoniacall practiſe verie grieuouſlie, conſidering the dangerouſneſſe of the time and preſent eſtate of the church of England, which hong as yet in balance readie to yéeld anie waie, ſauing forth right, as he alledged in his letters. By which replie he ſo terrified the poore biſhop, that he was driuen vnto another iſſue, I meane to recouer the popes good will, with a further ſumme than ſtood with his eaſe to part withall. In the end when the pope had gotten this fléece, a new deuiſe was found, and meanes made to and by the prince, that White might be biſhop of Wincheſter, which at the laſt he obteined, but in ſuch wiſe as that the pope and his néereſt friends did loſe but a little by it. I could if néed were ſet downe a report of diuerſe other the like practiſes, but this ſhall ſuffice in ſtéed of all the reſt, leaſt in reprehending of vice I might ſhew my ſelfe to be a teacher of vngodlineſſe, or to ſcatter more vngratious ſéed in lewd ground already choked with wickednesse.

To proceed therefore with the rest, I thinke it good also to remember, that the names vsuallie giuen vnto such as feed the flocke remaine in like sort as in times past, so that these words, parson, vicar, curat, and such are not yet abolished more than the canon law it selfe, which is dailie pleaded, as I haue said elsewhere; although the statutes of the realme haue greatlie infringed the large scope, and brought the exercise of the same into some narrower limits. There is nothing read in our churches but the canonicall scriptures, whereby it commeth to passe that the psalter is said ouer once in thirtie daies, the new testament foure times, and the old testament once in the yeare. And herevnto if the curat be aduinged by the bishop or his deputies, sufficientlie instructed in the holie scriptures, and therewithall able to teach, he permitteth him to make some exposition or exhortation in his parish, vnto amendment of life. And for so much as our churches and vniuersities haue béene so spoiled in time of errour, as there cannot yet be had such number of able pastours as may suffice for euerie parish to haue one: there are (beside foure sermons appointed by publike order in the yeate) certeine sermons or homilies deuised by sundrie learned men, confirmed for sound doctrine by consent of the diuines, and publike authoritie of the prince) and those appointed to be read by the curats of meane vnderstanding (which homilies do comprehend the principall parts of christian doctrine, as of originall sinne, of iustification by faith, of charitie, and such like) vpon the sabbaoth daies, vnto the congregation. And after a certeine number of psalmes read, which are limited according to the daies of the month, for morning and euening praier, we haue two lessons, whereof the first is taken out of the old testament, the second out of the new, and of these latter that in the morning is out of the gospels, the other in the after none out of some one of the epistles. After morning praier also we haue the letanie and suffrages, an inuocation in mine opinion not deuised without the great assistance of the spirit of God, although manie curious mindsticke persons vtterlie condemne it as superstitious and sauoring of coniuration and sorcerie.

This being done, we proceed vnto the communion, if anie communicants be to receiue the eucharist, if not we read the decalog, epistle and gospell with the Nicene creed (of some in derision called the drie communion) and then proceed vnto an homilie or sermon, which hath a psalme before and after it, and finallie vnto the baptisme of such infants as on euerie sabaoth daie (if occasion so require) are brought vnto the churches: and thus is the forenoone bestowed. In the after none likewise we meet againe, and after the psalmes and lessons ended we haue commonlie a sermon, or at the least wise our youth catechised by the space of an houre. And thus do we spend the sabaoth daie in good and godlie exercises, all done in our vulgar tong, that each one present may heare and vnderstand the same, which also in cathedrall and collegiat churches is so ordered, that the psalmes onelie are song by note, the rest being read (as in common parish churches) by the minister with a lowd voice, sauing that in the administration of the communion the quier singeth the answers, the creed, and sundrie other things appointed, but in so plaine, I saie, and distinct maner, that each one present may vnderstand what they sing, euerie word hauing but one note, though the whole harmonie consist of manie parts, and those verie cunninglie set by the skilfull in that science.

Certes this translation of the seruice of the church into the vulgar tong, hath not a little offended the pope almost in euerie age, as a thing verie often attempted by diuers princes, but neuer generallie obteined, for feare least the consenting thervnto might breed the ouerthrow (as it would in deed) of all his religion and hierarchie: neuertheless in some places where the kings and princes dwelled not vnder his nose, it was performed maugre his resistance. Vratislaus duke of Bohemia, would long since haue done the like also in his kingdome, but not daring to venter so farre without the consent of the pope, he wrote vnto him thereof, and receiued his answer inhibitorie vnto all his proceeding in the same.

Gregorius septimus Vratislao Bohemorum duci, &c. Quia nobilitas tua postulat, quòd secundũ Sclauonicã linguã apud vos diuinum celebrari annueremus officium, scias nos huic petitioni tuæ nequaquàm posse fauere, ex hoc nempe se voluentibus liquet, non immeritò sacram scripturam optimo Deo placuisse quibusdam locis esse occultam; ne si ad liquidum cunctis pateret, fortè vilesceret, & subiaceret despectui, aut praue intellecta à mediocribus in errorem induceret. Neque enim ad excusationem iuuat, quòd quidam viri hoc, quod simplex populus quærit patienter tulerunt, seu incorrectum dimiserunt: cum primitiua ecclesia multa dissimulauerit, quæ à sanctis patribus postmodum, firmata christianitate & religione crescente, subtili examinatione correcta sunt: vnde id ne fiat, quod à vestris imprudenter exposcitur, authoritate beati Petri inhibemus; teque ad honorem optimi Dei huic vanæ temeritati viribus totis resistere præcipimus, &c. Datum Romæ, &c.

I would set downe two or three more of the like instruments passed from that see vnto the like end, but this shall suffice, being lesse common than the other, which are to be had more plentifullie.

As for our churches themselues, belles, and times of morning and euening praier, remaine as in times past, sauing that all images, shrines, tabernacles, rodlofts, and monuments of idolatrie are remoued, taken downe, and defaced; onelie the frontes in glasse windowes excepted, which for want of sufficient store of new stuffe, and by reason of extreame charge that should grow by the alteration of the same into white panes throughout the realme, are not altogither abolished in most places at once, but by little and little suffered to decaie, that white glasse may be prouided and set vp in their roomes. Finallie, whereas there was wont to be a great partition betweene the quire and the bodie of the church; now it is either verie small or none at all: and to saie the truth altogither needlesse, sith the minister saith his seruice commonlie in the bodie of the church, with his face toward the people, in a little tabernacle of wainscot prouided for the purpose: by which means the ignorant do not onelie learne diuerse of the psalmes and vsuall praiers by heart, but also such as can read, do praie togither with him: so that the whole congregation at one instant powre out their petitions vnto the liuing God, for the whole estate of his church in most earnest and feruent manner. Our holie and festiuall daies are verie well reduced also vnto a lesse number; for whereas (not long since) we had vnder the pope foure score and fifteene, called festiuall, and thirtie Professi, beside the sundaies, they are all brought vnto seauen and twentie: and with them the superfluous numbers of idle waks, guilds, fraternities, church-ales, helpe-ales, and soule-ales, called also dirge-ales, with the heathnish rioting at bride-ales, are well diminished and laid aside. And no great matter were it if the feasts of all our apostles, euangelists, and martyrs, with that of all saints, were brought to the holie daies that follow vpon Christmasse, Easter, and Whitsuntide; and those of the virgine Marie, with the rest vtterlie remoued from the calendars, as neither necessarie nor commendable in a reformed church.

The Apparell.

The apparell in like ſort of our clergie men is comlie, & in truth, more decent than euer it was in the popiſh church: before the vniuerſities bound their graduats vnto a ſtable attire, afterward vſurped also euen by the blind ſir Johns. For if you peruſe well my chronologie inſuing, you ſhall find, that they went either in diuerſe colors like plaiers, or in garments of light hew, as yellow, red, greene, &c: with their ſhoes piked, their haire criſped, their girdles armed with ſiluer; their ſhoes, ſpurres, bridles, &c: buckled with like mettall: their apparell (for the moſt part) of ſilke, and richlie furred; their cappes laced and butned with gold; ſo that to meet a prieſt in thoſe daies, was to behold a peacocke that ſpreadeth his taile when he danſeth before the henne: which Hoſpitalitie.

now (I ſaie) is well reformed. Touching hoſpitalitie, there was neuer anie greater vſed in England, ſith by reaſon that mariage is permitted to him that will chooſe that kind of life, their meat and drinke is more orderlie and frugallie dreſſed; their furniture of houſhold more conuenient, and better looked vnto; and the poore oftener fed generallie than heretofore they haue beene, when onlie a few biſhops, and double or treble beneficed men did make good cheere at Chriſtmaſſe onelie, or otherwiſe kept great houſes for the interteinment of the rich, which did often reſe and viſit them. It is thought much peraduenture, that ſome biſhops, &c: in our time do come ſhort of the ancient gluttonie and prodigalitie of their predeceſſors: but to ſuch as do conſider of the curtailing of their liuings, or exceſſiue prices whervnto things are growen, and how their courſe is limited by law, and eſtate looked into on euerie ſide, the cauſe of their ſo doing is well inough perceiued. This alſo offendeth manie, that they ſhould after their deaths leaue their ſubſtances to their wiues and children: whereas they conſider not, that in old time ſuch as had no lemans nor baſtards (verie few were there God wot of this ſort) did leaue their goods and poſſeſſions to their brethren and kinſfolks, whereby (as I can ſhew by good record) manie houſes of gentilitie haue growen and beene erected. If in anie age ſome one of them did found a college, almeſhouſe, or ſchoole, if you looke vnto theſe our times, you ſhall ſee no fewer deeds of charitie done, nor better grounded vpon the right ſtub of pietie than before. If you ſaie that their wiues be fond, after the deceaſſe of their huſbands, and beſtow themſelues not ſo aduiſedlie as their calling requireth, which God knoweth theſe curious ſurueiors make ſmall accompt of in truth, further than thereby to gather matter of reprehenſion: I beſeech you then to looke into all ſtates of the laitie, & tell me whether ſome ducheſſes, counteſſes, barons, or knights wiues, do not fullie ſo often offend in the like as they: for Eue will be Eue though Thred-bare gowns from whence they come.

Adam would ſaie naie. Not a few alſo find fault with our thred-bare gowns, as if not our patrones but our wiues were cauſes of our woo. But if it were knowne to all, that I know to haue beene performed of late in Eſſex, where a miniſter taking a benefice (of leſſe than twentie pounds in the Queenes bookes ſo farre as I remember) was inforced to paie to his patrone, twentie quarters of otes, ten quarters of wheat, and ſixteene yeerelie of barleie, which he called hawkes meat; and another left the like in farme to his patrone for ten pounds by the yeere, which is well worth fortie at the leaſt, the cauſe of our thred-bare gownes would eaſilie appeere, for ſuch patrons do ſcrape the woll from our cloakes. Wherfore I may well ſaie, that ſuch a thred-bare miniſter is either an ill man, or hath an ill patrone, or both: and when ſuch cookes & cobling ſhifters ſhall be removed and weeded out of the miniſterie, I doubt not but our patrons will prooue better men, and be reformed whether they will or not, or elſe the ſingle minded biſhops ſhall ſee the liuing beſtowed vpon ſuch as do deſerue it. When the Pragmatike ſanction tooke place firſt in France, it was ſuppoſed that theſe enormities ſhould vtterlie haue ceaſed: but when the elections of biſhops came once into the hands of the canons and ſpirituall men, it grew to be farre worſe. For they alſo within a while waxing couetous, by their owne experience learned aforehand, raiſed the markets, and ſought after new gaines by the gifts of the greateſt liuings in that countrie, wherein (as Machiauell writeth) are eightéene archbiſhoprikes, one hundred fortie and ſixe biſhoprikes, 740 abbies, eleuen vniuerſities, 1000700 ſteeples (if his report be ſound.) Some are of the opinion, that if ſufficient men in euerie towne might be ſent for from the vniuerſities, this miſchiefe would ſoone be remedied; but I am cleane of another mind. For when I conſider whereunto the gifts of felowſhips in ſome places are growen: the profit that ariſeth at ſundrie elections of ſcholars out of grammar ſchooles, to the poſers, ſchoolemaſters, and preferrers of them to our vniuerſities, the gifts of a great number of almeſhouſes builded for the maimed and impotent ſouldiors, by princes and good men heretofore moued with a pittifull conſideration of the poore diſtreſſed: how rewards, penſions, and annuities alſo do reigne in other caſes, whereby the giuer is brought ſomtimes into extreame miſerie, & that not ſo much as the rome of a common ſouldior is not obteined oftentimes, without a What will you giue me? I am brought into ſuch a miſtruſt of the ſequele of this deuiſe, that I dare pronounce (almoſt for certeine) that if Homer were now aliue, it ſhould be ſaid to him:

Number of churches in France.

Pretie packing.

Túque licèt venias muſis comitatus Homere,
Si nihil attuleris ibis Homere foras.

More I could ſaie, and more I would ſaie of theſe and other things, were it not that in mine owne iudgement I haue ſaid inough alreadie for the aduertiſement of ſuch as be wiſe. Neuertheleſſe, before I finiſh this chapter, I will adde a word or two (ſo briefle as I can) of the old eſtate of cathedrall churches, which I haue collected togither here and there among the writers, and whereby it ſhall eaſilie be ſeene what they were, and how neere the gouernment of ours do in theſe daies approch vnto them, for that there is an irreconciliable ods betweene them and thoſe of the papiſts. I hope there is no learned man indeed, but will acknowlege and yeeld vnto it.

Old eſtate of cathedrall churches.

We find therefore in the time of the primitiue church, that there was in euerie ſee or iuriſdiction one ſchole at the leaſt, whereinto ſuch as were catechiſes in chriſtian religion did reſort. And hereof as we may find great teſtimonie for Alexandria, Antioch, Rome, and Hieruſalem; ſo no ſmall notice is left of the like in the inferior ſort, if the names of ſuch as taught in them be called to mind, & the hiſtories well read which make report of the ſame. Theſe ſchooles were vnder the iuriſdiction of the biſhops, and from thence did they & the reſt of the elders chooſe out ſuch as were the ripeſt ſcholars, and willing to ſerue in the miniſterie, whome they placed alſo in their cathedrall churches, there not onelie to be further inſtructed in the knowledge of the word, but alſo to inure them to the deliuerie of the ſame vnto the people in ſound maner, to miniſter the ſacraments, to viſit the ſicke and brethren impriſoned, and to performe ſuch other duties as then belonged to their charges. The biſhop himſelfe and elders of the church were alſo hearers and examiners of their doctrine, and being in proceſſe of time found meet workmen for the lords harueſt, they were forthwith ſent abroads (after impoſition of hands, and praier generallie made for their good proceeding) to ſome place or other then deſtitute of hir paſtor, and other taken from the ſchole alſo placed in their roomes. What number of ſuch clerks belonged now and then to ſome one ſée, the chronologie following ſhall eaſilie declare: and in like ſort what officers, widowes, and other perſons were dailie maintained in thoſe ſeaſons by the offerings and oblations of the faithfull, it is incredible to be reported, if we compare the ſame with the decaies and ablations ſéene and practiſed at this preſent. But what is that in all the world which auarice and negligence will not corrupt and impaire? And as this is a paterne of the eſtate of the cathedrall churches in thoſe times, ſo I wiſh that the like order of gouernment might once againe be reſtored vnto the ſame, which may be done with eaſe, ſith the ſcholes are alreadie builded in euerie dioceſſe, the vniuerſities, places of their preferment vnto further knowledge, and the cathedrall churches great inough to receiue ſo manie as ſhall come from thence to be inſtructed vnto doctrine. But one hinderance of this is alreadie and more & more to be loked for (beſide the plucking and ſnatching commonlie ſéene from ſuch houſes and the church) and that is, the generall contempt of the miniſterie, and ſmall conſideration of their former paines taken, whereby leſſe and leſſe hope of competent maintenance by preaching the word is likelie to inſue. Wherefore the greateſt part of the more excellent wits chooſe rather to imploy their ſtudies vnto phyſike and the lawes, vtterlie giuing ouer the ſtudie of the ſcriptures, for feare leaſt they ſhould in time not get their bread by the ſame. By this meanes alſo the ſtalles in their quéeres would be better filled, which now (for the moſt part) are emptie, and prebends ſhould be prebends indéed, there to liue till they were preferred to ſome eccleſiaſticall function, and then other men choſen to ſucceed them in their roomes, whereas now prebends are but ſuperfluous additaments vnto former excelles, & perpetuall commodities vnto the owners, which before time were but temporall (as I haue ſaid before.) But as I haue good leiſure to wiſh for theſe things: ſo it ſhall be a longer time before it will be brought to paſſe. Neuertheleſſe, as I will praie for a reformation in this behalfe, ſo will I here conclude this my diſcourſe of the eſtate of our churches, and go in hand with the limits and bounds of our ſeuerall ſées, in ſuch order as they ſhall come vnto my preſent remembrance.

Of the number of biſhoprikes and their ſeuerall circuits.

Chap. 2.

HAuing alreadie ſpoken generally of the ſtate of our church, now will I touch the ſées ſeuerallie, ſaieng ſo much of ech of them as ſhall be conuenient for the time, and not onelie out of the ancient, but alſo the later writers, and ſomewhat of mine owne experience, beginning firſt with the ſée of Canturburie, as the moſt notable, whoſe archbiſhop is the primat of all this land for eccleſiaſticall iuriſdiction, and moſt accompted of commonlie, becauſe he is nérer to the prince, and readie at euerie call.

Canturburie. The iuriſdiction of Canturburie therefore, erected firſt by Auguſtine the monke, in the time of Ethelbert king of Kent, if you haue reſpect to hir prouinciall regiment, extendeth it ſelfe ouer all the ſouth and weſt parts of this Iland, and Ireland, as I haue noted in the chapter precedent, and few ſhires there are wherein the archbiſhop hath not ſome peculiars. But if you regard the ſame onelie that was and is proper vnto his ſée, from the beginning, it reacheth but ouer one parcell of Kent, which Rudburne calleth Cantwarland, the iuriſdiction of Rocheſter including the reſt: ſo that in this one countie the greateſt archbiſhoprike and the leaſt biſhoprike of all are linked in togither. That of Canturburie hath vnder it one archdeaconrie, who hath iuriſdiction ouer eleauen deanries or a hundred ſirtie one pariſh churches; & in the popiſh time in ſtéd of the 3093 pounds, eightéene ſhillings, halfepenie, farthing, which it now paieth vnto hir maieſtie, vnder the name of firſt frutes, there went out of this ſée to Rome, at euerie alienation 10000 ducates or florens, beſide 5000 that the new elect did vſuallie paie for his pall, each ducat being then worth an Engliſh crowne or thereabout, as I haue béene informed.

Rocheſter. The ſée of Rocheſter is alſo included within the limits of Kent, being erected by Auguſtine in the 604 of Grace, and reigne of Ceolrik ouer the weſt-Saxons. The biſhop of this ſée hath one archdeacon, vnder whoſe gouernment in cauſes eccleſiaſticall are three deanries, or 132 pariſh churches: ſo that hereby it is to be gathered, that there are 393 pariſh churches in Kent, ouer which the ſaid two archdeacons haue eſpeciall cure & charge. He was wont to paie alſo vnto the court of Rome at his admiſſion to that ſée 1300 ducats or florens, as I read, which was an hard valuation, conſidering the ſmalneſſe of circuit belonging to his ſée. Howbeit, in my time it is ſo farre from eaſe by diminution, that it is raiſed to 1432 crownes, &c: or as we reſolue them into our pounds, 358 pounds, three ſhillings, ſix pence, halfepennie, farthing, a reckoning a great deale more preciſelie made than anie biſhop of that ſée doth take any great delight in. He was croſſe-bearer in times paſt vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie. And there are and haue béene few ſées in England, which at one time or other haue not fetched their biſhops for the moſt part from this ſée: for as it is of it ſelfe but a ſmall thing in déed, ſo it is commonlie a preparatiue to an higher place. But of all that euer poſſeſſed it, Thomas Kempe had the beſt lucke, who being but a poore mans ſonne of Wie (vnto which towne he was a great benefactor) grew firſt to be doctor of both lawes, then of diuinitie; and afterward being promoted to this ſée, he was tranſlated from thence to Chicheſter, thirdlie to London, next of all to Yorke, and finallie after ſeauen and twentie yeares to Canturburie, where he became alſo cardinall, deacon, and then preſt in the court of Rome, according to this verſe, Bis primas, ter præſes, bis cardine functus. Certes I note this man, becauſe he bare ſome fauour to the furtherance of the goſpell, and to that end he either builded or repared the pulpit in Paules churchyard, and toke order for the continuall maintenance of a ſermon there vpon the ſabaoth, which doth continue vnto my time, as a place from whence the ſoundeſt doctrine is alwaies to be loked for, and for ſuch ſtrangers to reſort vnto as haue no habitation in anie pariſh within the citie where it ſtandeth.

Chicheſter.

London. The ſée of London was erected at the firſt by Lucius, who made it of an archeflamine and temple of Iupiter an archbiſhops ſée, and temple vnto the liuing God, and ſo it continued, vntill Auguſtine tranſlated the title thereof to Canturburie. The names of the archbiſhops of London are theſe; Theon, Eluan, Cadoc, Owen, Conan, Palladius, Stephan, Iltutus reſtitutus, anno 350, Theodromus, Theodredus, Hilarius, Faſtidius, anno 420, Guittelinus, Vodinus ſlaine by the Saxons, and Theonus Iunior. But for their iuſt order of ſucceſſion as yet I am not reſolued, neuertheleſſe the firſt biſhop there was ordeined by Auguſtine the monke, in the yeare of Chriſt 604, in the time of Ceolrye, after he had remoued his ſee further off into Kent: I wote not vpon what ſecret occaſion, if not the ſpeedie hearing of newes from Rome, and readineſſe to flee out of the land, if any trouble ſhould betide him. For iuriſdiction it includeth Eſſex, Middleſex, and part of Herefordſhire, which is neither more nor leſſe in quantitie than the ancient kingdome of the eaſt Angles, before it was vnited to the weſt Saxons. The cathedrall church belonging to this ſee, was firſt begun by Ethelbert of Kent, Indic. 1. 598 of Inuber as I find, whileſt he held that part of the ſaid kingdome vnder his gouernement. Afterward when the Danes had ſundrie times defaced it, it was repared and made vp with hard ſtone, but in the end it was taken downe, and wholie reedified by Mawrice biſhop of that ſee, and ſometimes chapleine to the baſtard Henrie the firſt, allowing him ſtone and ſtuffe from Bainards caſtell neere vnto Ludgate, then ruinous for the furtherance of his works. Howbeit the mould of the quire was not ſtatelie inough in the eies of ſome of his ſucceſſors; wherefore in the yeare of Grace 1256, it was taken downe and brought into another forme, and called the new worke, at which time alſo the bodies of diuerſe kings and biſhops were taken vp and beſtowed in the walles, to the end their memories ſhould be of longer continuance. The iuriſdiction of this ſee alſo vnder the biſhop, is committed to foure archdeacons, to wit, of London, Eſſex, Middleſex, and Colcheſter, who haue amongſt them to the number of 363 pariſh churches, or thereabouts, beſide the peculiars belonging to the archbiſhop and chapiter of that houſe, and at euerie alienation the biſhop paieth for his owne part 1119 pounds, eight ſhillings and foure pence (but in old time 3000 florens) which diuerſe ſuppoſe to be more, than (as it now ſtandeth) the biſhop is able to make of it. Of the archdeconrie, of S. Albons added therevnto by king Henrie the eight (whereby the biſhop hath fiue eies) I ſpeake not, for although it be vnder the biſhop of London for viſitations and ſynods, yet is it otherwiſe reputed as member of the ſee of Lincolne, and therefore worthilie called an exempt, it hath alſo fiue and twentie pariſhes, of which foure are in Buckingham, the reſt in Herefordſhire.

Chicheſter. The firſt beginning of the ſee of Chicheſter was in the Ile of Seales or Seolſeie, and from thence tranſlated to Chicheſter, in the time of William the baſtard, and generall remouing of ſees from ſmall villages vnto the greater townes. It conteineth Suſſex onelie vnder hir iuriſdiction, wherein are fiftéene deanries, and 551 pariſh churches, it paid at euerie alienation to the ſee of Rome 333 ducats: and after Edbert the firſt biſhop, one Cella ſucceeded, after whome the pontificall chaire (not then worth 677 pounds by the yéere as now it is) was void by many yeares. It was erected in Seoleſeie alſo 711, by the decree of a ſynod holden in Suſſex, which borowed it from the iuriſdiction of Wincheſter, whereof before it was reputed a parcell. Of all the biſhops that haue béene in this ſee, Thomas Kempe alwaies excepted, I read not of anie one that hath béene of more eſtimation than William Read, ſometime fellow of Merteine college in Oxford, doctor of diuinitie, and the moſt profound aſtronomer that liued in his time, as appeareth by his collection which ſometime I did poſſeſſe; his image is yet in the libzarie there, and manie inſtruments of aſtronomie reſerued in that houſe (a college erected ſometime by Walter Merton biſhop of Rocheſter, and lord chancellor of England) he builded alſo the caſtell of Amberleie from the verie foundation, as Edward Stozie or Stozie his ſucceſſor did the new croſſe in the market place of Chicheſter.

The biſhop of Wincheſter was ſometime called biſhop of the weſt Saxons, and of Dorcheſter, which towne was giuen to Birinus and his ſucceſſors, by Kinigils and Oſwald of the Northumbers, in whoſe time it was erected by Birinus and his fellowes. In my time it hath iuriſdiction onelie ouer Hamſhire, Surrie, Jardeſeie, Gardeſeie, and the Wight, conteining eight deaneries, two hundred ſeuentie and ſix pariſh churches, and beſide all this he is perpetuall prelate to the honorable order of the Garter, deuiſed by Edward the third: he paid in old time to Rome 12000 ducates or florens, but now his firſt fruits are 2491 pounds nine ſhillings eight pence halfe penie. Canturburie was ſaid to be the higher racke, but Wincheſter hath borne the name to be the better mangier. There are alſo which make Lucius to be the firſt founder of an houſe of prater in Wincheſter, as Kinigils did build the ſecond, and Kinwaldus his ſonne the third; but you ſhall ſée the truth hereof in the chronologie inſuing. And herevnto if the old catalog of the biſhops of this ſée be well conſidered of, and the acts of the greateſt part of them indifferentlie weighed, as they are to be read in our hiſtories, you ſhall find the moſt egregious hypocrites, the ſtouteſt warriours, the cruelleſt tyrants, the richeſt monimongers, and politike counſellors in temporall affaires to haue, I wote not by what ſecret working of the diuine prouidence, bene placed here in Wincheſter, ſince the foundation of that ſée, which was erected by Birinus 639 (whome pope Honorius ſent hither out of Italie) and firſt planted at Dorcheſter, in the time of Kinigils, then tranſlated to Wincheſter, where it doth yet continue. Wincheſter.

Saliſburie was made the chéefe ſée of Shirburne by biſhop Harman (predeceſſor to Oſmond) who brought it from Shirburne to that citie; it hath now Barkeſhire, Wilſhire, and Dorſetſhire vnder hir iuriſdiction. For after the death of Hedda, which was 704, Wincheſter was diuided in two, ſo that onelie Hamſhire and Surrie were left vnto it, and Wilton, Dorſet, Barkeſhire, Summerſet, Deuon & Cornewill aſſigned vnto Shirburne till other order was taken. Biſhop Adelme did firſt ſit in that biſhoprike (704 as I ſaid) and placed his chaire at Shirburne vpon the ſaid diuiſion. And as manie lerned biſhops did ſucceed him in that rome, before and after it was remoued to Sarum; ſo there was neuer a more noble ornament to that ſée than biſhop Juell, of whoſe great learning and iudgement the world it ſelfe beareth witneſſe, notwithſtanding that the papiſts prefer S. Oſmond (as they call him) becauſe he builded the minſter there, and made the portheſſe called Ordinale eccleſiaſtici officij, which old préeſts were wont to vſe. The biſhops alſo of this ſée were ſometimes called biſhops of Sunning, of their old manſion houſe neere vnto Reading (as it ſhould ſeeme) and among thoſe that liued before the ſaid Juell, one Roger builded the caſtell of the Vies in the time of Henrie the firſt, taken in thoſe daies for the ſtrongeſt hold in England, as vnto whoſe gate there were regals and gripes for ſir or ſeuen port colliſes. Finallie this ſée paid vnto Rome 4000 florens, but vnto hir maieſtie in my time 1367 pounds twelue ſhillings eight pence, as I did find of late. Saliſburie.

Exceſter hath Deuonſhire and Cornewall, ſometime two ſeuerall biſhoprikes, but in the end brought into one of Cornewall, and from thence to Exceſter in the time of the Baſtard or ſone after. It began vpon this occaſion, Anno Gratiæ 905, in a prouinciall councell holden by the elder Edward Plegimond archbiſhop of Canturburie, among the Gewiſes, Exceſter.

wherein it was found, that the see of Winchester had not onelie béene without hir pastor by the space of seuen yéeres, but also that hir iurisdiction was farre greater than two men were able well to gouerne; therefore from the former two, to wit, Winchester and Shirburne, three other were taken, whereby that see was now diuided into fiue parts; the latter three being Welles, Kirton, and Cornwall: this of Cornwall hauing hir see then at saint Patroks, not farre from north-Wales vpon the riuer Helmouth: he of Deuon holding his iurisdiction in Deuonshire, Kirton, or Cridioc: and the bishop of Welles being allowed Dorset and Barkshires for his part, to gouerne and loke vnto according to his charge. Finallie, these two of Deuon and Cornwall being vnited, the valuation thereof was tared by the see of Rome at six thousand ducats or florens, which were trulie paid at euerie alienation; but verie hardlie (as I gesse) sith that in my time, wherein all things are racked to the verie vttermost, I find that it is little worth aboue fiue hundred pounds by the yéere, because hir tenths are but fiftie.

Bath. Bath, whose see was sometime at Welles, before Iohn the bishop there annexed the church of Bath vnto it, which was 1094, hath Summersetshire onlie, and the valuation thereof in the court of Rome was foure hundred & thirtie florens: but in hir maiesties books I find it fiue hundred thirtie and three pounds, and about one od shilling: which declareth a precise examination of the estate of that see. Of the erection of this bishoprike, mentioned in the discourse of Excester, I find the former assertion confirmed by another author, and in somewhat more large manner, which I will also remember, onelie because it pleaseth me somewhat better than the words before alleged out of the former writer. This bishoprike (saith he) was erected 905, in a councell holden among the Gewisses, whereat king Edward of the west-Saxons, and Plegmond archbishop of Canturburie were present. For that part of the countrie had béene seuen yéeres without anie pastorall cure. And therfore in this councell it was agréed, that for the two bishoprikes (whereof one was at Winchester, another at Shireburne) there should be fiue ordeined, whereby the people there might be the better instructed. By this meanes Frithstan was placed at Winchester, and Ethelme at Shireburne, both of them being then void. Shireburne also suffered the subdiuision; so that Werstane was made bishop of Cridioc or Deuonshire (whose see was at Kirton) Herstan of Cornwall, and Eadulfe of Welles, vnto whome Barkshire and Dorsetshire were appointed. But now you see what alteration is made, by consideration of the limits of their present iurisdictions.

The bishoprike of Shirburne diuided into three.

Worcester. Worcester sometime called Episcopatus Wicciorum (that is, the bishoprike of the Wiccies or Huiccies) hath Worcester, & part of Warwikeshires. And before the bishoprike of Gloucester was taken out of the same, it paid to the pope two thousand ducats of gold at euerie change of prelat: but now the valuation thereof is one thousand fortie nine pounds, seauen pence halfe penie farthing (except my remembrance dw deceiue me.) This see was begunne either in, or not long before the time of Offa king of the east-Angles, and Boselus was the first bishop there; after whome succéeded Osfort, then Egwine who went in pilgrimage to Rome, with Kinredus of Mercia and the said Offa, and there gat a monasterie (which he builded in Worcester) confirmed by Constantine the pope. In this see was one of your lordships ancestors sometime bishop, whose name was Cobham, and doctor both of diuinitie and of the canon law, who, during the time of his pontificalitie there, builded the vault of the north side of the bodie of the church, and there lieth buried in the same (as I haue béene informed.) Certes this man was once elected, and should haue béene archbishop of Canturburie in the rome of Reginald that died 1313 vnder Edward the second: but the pope frustrated his election, fearing least he would haue shewed himselfe more affectionate towards his prince than to his court of Rome; wherefore he gaue Canturburie to the bishop of Worcester then being. And furthermore, least he should seeme altogither to reiect the said Thomas and displease the king, he gaue him in the end the bishoprike of Worcester, whereinto he entred 1317, Marty 31, being thursdaie (as appeareth by the register of that house) after long plée holden for the aforesaid see of Canturburie in the court of Rome, wherein moch monie did offentest preuaile. This is also notable of that see, that fiue Italians succéeded ech other in the same, by the popes prouision; as Egidius, Sylvester, Egidius his nephue (for nephues might say in those daies; Father shall I call you vncle? And vncles also; Son I must call thée nephue) Iulius de Medices, afterward pope Clement, and Hieronymus de Nugutijs, men verie likelie, no doubt, to benefit the common people by their doctrine. Some of these being at the first but poore men in Rome, and yet able by selling all they had to make a round summe against a rainie daie, came first into fauor with the pope, then into familiartie, finallie into orders; and from thence into the best liuings of the church, farre off where their parentage could not easilie be heard of, nor made knowne vnto their neighbours.

Gloucester. Gloucester hath Glocestershire onelie, wherein are nine deanries, and to the number of 294 parish churches, as I find by good record. But it neuer paid anie thing to Rome, because it was erected by king Henrie the eight, after he had abolished the vsurped authoritie of the pope, except in quéene Maries, if anie such thing were demanded, as I doubt not but it was: yet is it worth yeerlie 315 pounds, seauen shillings three pence, as the booke of first fruits declareth.

Hereford. Hereford hath Herefordshire and part of Shropshire, and it paid to Rome at euerie alienation 1800 ducats at the least, but in my time it paieth vnto hir maiesties cofers 768 pounds, ten shillings, ten pence, halfe penie, farthing. In this see there was a bishop sometime called John Buteu, vpon whome the king then reigning, by likelihod for want of competent maintenance, bestowed the keeping of his wardrobe, which he held long time with great honour, as his register saith. A wonderfull preferment that bishops should be preferred from the pulpit, to the custodie of wardrobes: but such was the time. Neuertheless his honorable custodie of that charge is more solemnlie remembred, than anie good sermon that euer he made, which function peraduenture he committed to his suffragane, sith bishops in those daies had so much businesse in the court, that they could not attend to doctrine and exhortation.

Elie.

Lichfield. Lichefield, whereunto Couentrie was added, in the time of Henrie the first, at the earnest sute of Robert bishop of that see, hath Staffordshire, Darbishire, part of Shropshire, and the rest of Warwikeshire, that is void of subiection to the see of Worcestershire. It was erected in the time of Peada king of the south Mercians, which late on this side the Trent, and therein one Dinas was installed, about the yeare of Grace 656, after whom Kellac first, then Tunher an Englishman succéeded, this later being well learned, and consecrated by the Scots. In the time of the bastard, I wot not vpon what occasion, one Peter bishop of this see translated his chaire

to Cheſter, and there held it for a ſeaſon, whereby it came to paſſe that the biſhops of Lichfield were for a while called biſhops of Cheſter. But Robert his ſucceſſor not liking of this preſident, remoued his chaire from Cheſter to Couentrie, and there held it whileſt he liued, whereby the originall diuiſion of the biſhoprike of Lichfield into Lichefield, Cheſter, and Couentrie, doth eaſilie appeare, although in my time Lichfield and Couentrie be vnited, and Cheſter remaineth a biſhoprike by it ſelfe. It paid the pope at euerie alienation 1733 florens, or (as ſome old bookes haue) 3000, a good round ſumme, but not without a iuſt puniſhment, as one ſaith, ſith that anno 765, Eadulfe biſhop there vnder Offa king of Mercia, would by his helpe haue bereaued the archbiſhop of Canturburie of his pall, & ſo did in deed vnder pope Hadrian, holding the ſame vntill things were reduced vnto their ancient forme. Before the time alſo of biſhop Langton, the prebends of this ſee laie here and there abroad in the citie, where the vicars alſo had an houſe, of which this honeſt biſhop miſliked not a little for ſundrie cauſes; wherefore he began their cloſe, and beſtowed ſo much in building the ſame, and pauing the ſtreets, that his hungrie kinſmen did not a little grudge at his expenſes, thinking that his emptie cofers would neuer make them gentlemen, for which preferment the friends of moſt biſhops gaped earneſtlie in thoſe daies. King John was the greateſt benefactor vnto this ſee, next vnto Offa; and it is called Lichfield, Quaſi mortuorum campus, bicauſe of the great ſlaughter of chriſtians made there (as ſome write) vnder Diocleſian. Howbeit in my time the valuation thereof is 703 pounds, fiue ſhillings two pence, halfepenie, farthing, a ſumme verie narrowlie caſt by that auditor which toke it firſt in hand.

Orford hath Orfordſhire onelie, a verie yong iuriſdiction, erected by king Henrie the eight, & where in the time of quéene Marie, one Goldwell was biſhop, who (as I remember) was a Ieſuit, dwelling in Rome, and more conuerſant (as the conſtant fame went) in the blacke art, than ſkilfull in the ſcriptures, and yet he was of great countenance amongſt the Romane monarchs. It is ſaid that obſeruing the canons of his order, he regarded not the temporalities of that ſée: but I haue heard ſince that he wiſt well inough what became of thoſe commodities, for by one meane and other he found the ſweetneſſe of 354 pounds ſirtéene ſhillings three pence halfe penie, yearelie growing to him, which was euen inough (if not too much) for the maintenance of a frier toward the drawing out of circles, characters, & lineaments of imagerie, wherein he was paſſing ſkilfull, as the fame then went in Rome, and not vnheard of in Orford.

Elie. Elie hath Cambridgſhire, and the Ile of Elie. It was erected 1109 by Henrie the firſt, being before a rich and wealthie abbeie. One Herate alſo was made biſhop there, as I haue found in a regiſter, belonging ſometime to that houſe being tranſlated from Bangor. Finallie it paid to the pope at euerie alienation 7000 ducats, as the regiſters there do teſtifie at large. Albeit that in my time I find a note of 2134 pounds ſitteene ſhillings three pence halfe penie farthing, whoſe ſumme ioined to thoſe of all the biſhoprikes in England, do yéeld yearelie to hir maieſties cofers 23370 pounds ſirtéene ſhillings three pence halfe penie farthing: whereby alſo the huge ſums of monie going out of this land to the court of Rome doth in ſome meaſure appéere. Ethelwold afterward biſhop of Winchéeſter builded the firſt monaſterie of Elie vpon the ruines of a nunrie then in the kings hands, howbeit the ſame houſe, whereof he himſelfe was abbat, was yer long deſtroied by enimies, and he in lieu of his old preferment rewarded by king Edgar, with the aforeſaid biſhoprike, from whence with more than lionlike boldneſſe he expelled the ſecular prieſts, and ſtored with monkes prouided from Abandune néere Orford, by the helpe of Edgar and Dunſtane then metropolitane of England. There was ſometime a grœnous contention betwéene Thomas Lild biſhop of this ſée, and the king of England, about the yeare of Grace 1355, which I will here deliuer out of an old record, becauſe the matter is ſo parcellie penned by ſome of the brethren of that houſe, in fauour of the biſhop; & for that I was alſo abuſed with the ſame in the entrance thereof at the firſt into my chronologie. The blacke prince fauoring one Robert Stretton his chapleine, a man vnlearned and not worthie the name of a clearke, the matter went on ſo farre, that what for loue, and ſomewhat elſe, of a canon of Lichfield he was choſen biſhop of that ſée. Herevpon the pope vnderſtanding what he was by his Nuncio here in England, ſtaied his conſecration by his letters for a time, and in the meane ſeaſon committed his examination to the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the biſhop of Rocheſter, who felt and dealt ſo fauourablie with him in golden reaſoning, that his worthineſſe was commended to the popes holineſſe, & to Rome he goeth. Being come to Rome the pope himſelfe apposed him, and after ſecret conference vtterlie diſableth his election, till he had prooued by ſubſtantiall argument and of great weight before him alſo, that he was not ſo lightlie to be reiected. Which kind of reaſoning ſo well pleaſed his holineſſe, that Ex mera plenitudine poteſtatis, he was made capable of the benefice and ſo returneth into England; when he came home, this biſhop being in the kings preſence told him how he had done he will not what in preferring ſo vnmét a man vnto ſo high a calling. With which ſpeach the king was ſo offended, that he commanded him out of hand to auoid out of his preſence. In like ſort the ladie Wake then ducheſſe of Lancaſter, ſtanding by, and hearing the king hir couſine to gather vp the biſhop ſo roundlie, and thereto an old grudge againſt him for ſome other matter, doth preſentlie picke a quarrell againſt him about certeine lands then in his poſſeſſion, which he defended & in the end obteined againſt hir by plée and courſe of law yer long alſo afore hapned in a part of hir houſe, for which ſhe accuſed the biſhop, and in the end by verdict of twelue men found that he was priuie vnto the fact of his men in the ſaid fact, wherfore he was condemned in nine hundred pounds damages, which he paid euerie penie.

Neuertheleſſe, being ſore grieued, that ſhe had (as he ſaid) wreſted out ſuch a verdict againſt him, and therein packed vp a queſt at hir owne choiſe: he taketh his horſſe, goeth to the court, and there complaineth to the king of his great iniurie receiued at hir hands. But in the deliuerie of his tale, his ſpeech was ſo blockiſh, & termes ſo euill fauoredlie (though maliciouſlie) placed, that the king toke yet more offenſe with him than before; inſomuch that he led him with him into the parlement houſe, for then was that court holden, and there before the lords accuſed him of no ſmall miſdemeanor toward his perſon by his rude and threatening ſpeeches. But the biſhop egerlie denieth the kings obiections, which he ſtill auoucheth vpon his honor; and in the end confirmeth his allegations by witneſſe: wherevpon he is baniſhed from the kings preſence during his naturall life by verdict of that houſe. In the meane time the ducheſſe hearing what was done, ſhe beginneth a new to be dealing with him: and in a brabling fraie betwéene their ſeruants one of hir men was ſlaine: for which he was called before the magiſtrat, as chiefe acceſſarie vnto the fact. But he fearing the ſequele of his third cauſe by his ſucceſſe had in the two firſt, hideth himſelfe after he had ſold all his mouables, and committed the monie vnto his truſtie friends. And being found giltie by the inqueſt, the king ſeizeth vpon his poſſeſſions, and calleth vp the biſhop to anſwer vnto the treſpaſſe. To be ſhort, vpon ſafe conduct the biſhop commeth to the kings preſence, where he denieth that he was acceſſarie to the fact, either before, at, or after the deed committed, and thereupon craueth to be tried by his peeres. But this petition was in vaine: for ſentence paſſeth againſt him alſo by the kings owne mouth. Whereupon he craueth helpe of the archbiſhop of Canturburie and priuileges of the church, hoping by ſuch meanes to be ſolemnlie reſcued. But they fearing the kings diſpleaſure, who bare ſmall fauour to the clergie of his time, gaue ouer to vſe anie ſuch meanes; but rather willed him to ſubmit himſelfe vnto the kings mercie, which he refuſed, ſtanding vpon his innocencie from the firſt vnto the laſt. Finallie, growing into choler, that the malice of a woman ſhould ſo preuaile againſt him, he writeth to Rome, requiring that his caſe might be heard there, as a place wherein greater iuſtice (ſaith he) is to be looked for than to be found in England. Vpon the peruſall of theſe his letters alſo, his accuſers were called thither. But for ſo much as they appeered not at their peremptorie times, they were excommunicated. Such of them alſo as died before their reconciliations were taken out of the churchyards, and buried in the fields and dung-hilles, Vnde timor & turba (ſaith my note) in Anglia. For the king inhibited the bringing in and receipt of all proceſſes, billes, and what ſoeuer inſtruments ſhould come from Rome: ſuch alſo as aduentured contrarie to this prohibition to bring them in, were either diſmembred of ſome ioint, or hanged by the necks. Which rage ſo incenſed the pope, that he wrote in verie vehement maner to the king of England, threatening far greater curſſes, except he did the ſooner ſtaie the furie of the lady, reconcile himſelf vnto the biſhop, and finallie, making him amends for all his loſſes ſuſteined in theſe broiles. Long it was yer the king would be brought to peace. Neuertheleſſe, in the end he wrote to Rome about a reconciliation to be had betweene them: but yer all things were concluded, God himſelfe did end the quarrell, by taking awaie the biſhop. And thus much out of an old pamphlet in effect word for word: but I haue ſomewhat framed the forme of the report after the order that Stephan Birchington doth deliuer it, who alſo hath the ſame in manner as I deliuer it.

Norwich. The ſee of Norwich called in old time Epiſcopatus Donnicenſis, Dononiæ, or Eaſtanglorum, was erected at Felſtow or Felixſtow, where Felix of Burgundie (ſometime ſchoolemaſter to Sigebert of the eaſt-Angles, by whoſe perſuaſion alſo the ſaid Sigebert erected the vniuerſitie at Cambridge) being made biſhop of the eaſt-Angles firſt placed his ſee, afterward it was remoued from thence to Donwich, & thence to Helmham, Anno 870, about the death of Celnothus of Canturburie; thirdlie, to Theodford, or Thetford; & finallie, after the time of the Baſtard, to Norwich. For iuriſdiction it conteineth in our daies Norffolke and Suffolke onelie, whereas at the firſt it included Cambridgeſhire alſo, and ſo much as laie within the kingdome of the eaſt-Angles. It began about the yeere 632, vnder Cerpenwald king of the eaſt-Sarons, who beſtowed it vpon Felix, whome pope Honorius alſo confirmed, and after which he held it by the ſpace of ſeauenteene yeeres. It paid ſometimes at euerie alienation 5000 ducats to Rome. But in my time his maieſtie hath 899 pounds, 8 ſhillings 7 pence farthing, as I haue been informed. In the ſame iuriſdiction alſo there were once 1563 pariſh churches, and 88 religious houſes: but in our daies I can not heare of more churches than 1200: and yet of theſe I know one conuerted into a barne, whileſt the people heare ſeruice further off vpon a greene: their bell alſo when I heard a ſermon there preached in the greene, hanged in an oke for want of a ſteeple. But now I vnderſtand that the oke likewiſe is gone. There is neuertheleſſe a litle chappellet hard by on that common, but nothing capable of the multitude of Aſhlie towne that ſhould come to the ſame in ſuch wiſe, if they did repaire thither as they ought. Landaff Peterborow, ſometimes a notable monaſterie, hath Northampton and Rutland ſhires vnder hir iuriſdiction, a dioceſſe erected alſo by king Henrie the eight. It neuer paid firſt fruits to the pope before queene Maries daies (if it were then deliuered) whereof I doubt, becauſe it was not recorded in his ancient regiſter of tenths and fruits, although peraduenture the collectors left it not vngathered, I wot not for what purpoſe; it yeeldeth now foure hundred and fiftie pounds, one penie abated. I haue ſeene and had an ancient farre of the lands of this monaſterie, which agreeth verie well with the hiſtorie of Hugo le Blanc monke of that houſe. In the charter alſo of donation annered to the ſame, I ſaw one of Wulfhere king of Mercia, ſigned with his owne, & the marks of Sigher king of Suſſer, Sebbie of Eſſer, with the additions of their names: the reſt of the witneſſes alſo inſued in this order: Peterborow. S. Dau

Ethelred brother to Wulfehere,
Kindburg and Kindſwith ſiſters to Wulfhere,
Deuſdedit archbiſhop,
Ithamar biſhop of Rocheſter,
Wina biſhop of London,
Iarnman biſhop of Peare,
Wilfride and Eoppa prieſts,
Saxulfe the abbat.

When all the earles and eldermen of England in order; and after all theſe, the name of pope Agatho, who confirmed the inſtrument at the ſute of Wilfride archbiſhop of Yorke, in a councell holden at Rome 680, of a hundred & fiue and twentie biſhops, wherein alſo theſe churches were appropriated to the ſaid monaſterie, to wit, Breding, Reping, Cedenac, Swinesheued, Luſgerd, Edelminglond, and Barchaing: whereby we haue in part an euident teſtimonie how long the practiſe of appropriation of benefices hath beene vſed to the hinderance of the goſpell, and maintenance of idle monks, an humane inuention grounded vpon hypocriſie. Wange S. Al

Wiſſow. Wiſſow hath Dorſetſhire ſometime belonging to Saliſburie, a ſee alſo latelie erected by king Henrie the eight, who toke no ſmall care for the church of Chriſt, and therefore eaſed a number of ancient ſees of ſome part of their huge and ouer-large circuits, and beſtowed thoſe portions deduced, vpon ſuch other erections as he had appointed for the better regiment and feeding of the flocke: the value thereof is three hundred foure ſcore and three pounds, eight ſhillings, and foure pence (as I haue beene informed.)

Lincolne. Lincolne of all other of late times was the greateſt; and albeit that out of it were taken the ſees of Oxford and Peterborow, yet it ſtill reteineth Lincolne, Leiceſter, Huntingdon, Bedford, Buckingham ſhires, and the reſt of Hertford; ſo that it extendeth from the Thames vnto the Humber, and paid vnto the pope fiue thouſand ducats (as appeareth by his note) at euerie alienation. In my time, and by reaſon of his diminution it yeeldeth a tribute to whom tribute belongeth, of the valuation of eight hundred ninetie and nine pounds, eight ſhillings, ſeauen pence farthing. It began ſince the conqueſt, about about the beginning of William Rufus, by one Remigius, who remoued his ſée from Dorcheſter to Lincolne (not without licence well paid for) vnto the king.) And thus much of the biſhoprikes which lie within Lhoegres or England, as it was left vnto Locrinus. Now it followeth that I proceed with Wales.

Landaffe. Landaffe, or the church of Taw hath eccleſiaſticall iuriſdiction in Glamorgan, Monmouth, Brechnoch, and Radnor ſhires. And although it paid ſeuen hundred ducats at euerie exchange of prelat; yet is it ſcarſelie worth one hundred fiftie and fiue pounds by the yeare (as I haue heard reported.) Certes it is a poore biſhoprike, & (as I haue heard) the late incumbent thereof being called for not long ſince by the lord preſident in open court made anſwer. The daffe is here, but the land is gone. What he meant by it I can not well tell; but I hope, that in the ſéed time and the frée planting of the goſpell, the meate of the labourer ſhall not be diminiſhed and withdrawen.

S. Dauids. S. Dauids hath Penbroke and Caermardine ſhires, whoſe liuerie or firſt fruits to the ſée of Rome was one thouſand and fiue hundred ducats, at the hardeſt (as I thinke.) For if record be of anie ſufficient credit, it is little aboue the value of foure hundred fiftie and ſeauen pounds, one ſhilling, and ten pence farthing, in our time, and ſo it paieth vnto hir maieſties coffers; but in time paſt I thinke it was farre better. The preſent biſhop miſliketh verie much of the cold ſituation of his cathedrall church; and therfore he would gladlie pull it downe, and ſet it in a warmer place: but it would firſt be learned what ſuertie he would put in to ſée it well perfourmed: of the reſt I ſpeake not.

Bangor. Bangor is in north-Wales, and hath Caernaruon, Angleſeie, and Merioneth ſhires vnder hir iuriſdiction. It paid to Rome 126 ducats, which is verie much. For of all the biſhoprikes in England it is now the leaſt for reuenues, and not worth aboue one hundred and one and thirtie pounds, and ſirteene pence to hir maieſties coffers at euerie alienation (as appéereth by the tenths, which amount to much leſſe than thoſe of ſome good benefice) for it yeeldeth not yéerelie aboue thirteene pounds, three ſhillings, and ſeauen pence halfe penie, as by that court is manifeſt.

S. Aſaphes. S. Aſaphes hath Preſtholme and part of Denbigh and Flintſhires vnder hir iuriſdiction in cauſes eccleſiaſticall, which being laid togither doo amount to little more than one good countie, and therefore in reſpect of circuit the leaſt that is to be found in Wales, neuertheleſſe it paid to Rome 470 ducates at euerie alienation. In my time the firſt fruits of this biſhoprike came vnto 187 pounds eleuen ſhillings ſix pence, wherby it ſéemeth to be ſomewhat better than Landaffe or Bangor laſt remembred. There is one Howell a gentleman of Flintſhire in the compaſſe of this iuriſdiction, who is bound to giue an harpe of ſiluer yearelie to the beſt harper in Wales, but did anie biſhop thinke you deſerue that in the popiſh time? Howell or Aphoweil in Engliſh is all one (as I haue heard) and ſignifie ſo much as Hugo or Hugh. Hitherto of the prouince of Canturburie, for ſo much therof as now lieth within the compaſſe of this Iland. Now it reſteth that I proceed with the curtailed archbiſhoprike of Yorke, I ſaie curtailed becauſe all Scotland is cut from his iuriſdiction and obedience.

Yorke. The ſée of Yorke was reſtored about the yeare of Grace 625, which after the comming of the Saxons laie deſolate and neglected, howbeit at the ſaid time Iuſtus archbiſhop of Canturburie ordeined Paulinus to be firſt biſhop there, in the time of Eadwin king of Northumberland. This Paulinus ſate ſix yeares yer he was driuen from thence, & after whoſe expulſion that ſeat was void long time, wherby Lindeffarne grew into credit, and ſo remained vntill the daies of Oſwie of Northumberland, who ſent Wilfred the prieſt ouer into France, there to be conſecrated archbiſhop of Yorke: but whileſt he taried ouer long in thoſe parts, Oſwie impatient of delaie preferred Ceadda or Chad to that rowme, who held it three yeares, which being expired Wilfred recouered his rowme, and held it as he might, vntill it was ſeuered in two, to wit, Yorke, Hagulſtade, or Lindeffarne, where Eata was placed, at which time alſo Egfride was made biſhop of Lincolne or Lindſie in that part of Mercia which he had goten from Wolfhere. Of it ſelfe it hath now iuriſdiction ouer Yorkeſhire, Nottinghamſhire (whoſe ſhire towne I meane the new part thereof with the bridge was builded by king Edward the firſt ſurnamed the elder before the conqueſt) and the reſt of Lancaſterſhire onelie not ſubiect to the ſée of Cheſter; and when the pope bare authoritie in this realme, it paid vnto his ſée 1000 ducates, beſide 5000 for the pall of the new elect, which was more than he could well ſpare of late, conſidering the curtailing & diminution of his ſée, thorough the erection of a new metropolitane in Scotland, but in my time it yéeldeth 1609 pounds nineteene ſhillings two pence to hir maieſtie, whom God long preſerue vnto vs to his glorie, hir comfort, and our welfares.

Cheſter. Cheſter vpon Dee, otherwiſe called Weſtcheſter, hath vnder hir iuriſdiction in cauſes eccleſiaſticall, Cheſterſhire, Darbiſhire, the moſt part of Lancaſterſhire (to wit vnto the Ribell) Richmond and a part of Flint & Denbigh ſhires in Wales. It was made a biſhoprike by king H. 8. anno regni 33. Iulij 16, and ſo hath continued ſince that time, being valued 420 pounds by the yeare beſide od twentie pence (a ſtreit reckoning) as the record declareth.

Durham. Durham hath the countie of Durham and Northumberland with the Dales onelie vnder hir iuriſdiction, and hereof the biſhops haue ſometimes béene earles palantines & ruled the roſt vnder the name of the biſhoprike and ſucceſſion of S. Cuthbert. It was a ſée (in mine opinion) more profitable of late vnto hir maieſties coffers by 221 pounds eightéene ſhillings ten pence farthing, and yet of leſſe countenance than hir prouinciall, neuertheles the ſunneſhine thereof (as I heare) is now ſomewhat eclipſed and not likelie to recouer the light, for this is not a time wherein the church may looke to increaſe in hir eſtate. I heare alſo that ſome other flitches haue forgone the like collops, but let ſuch maters be ſcanned by men of more diſcretion. Capgraue ſaith how that the firſt biſhop of this ſée was called biſhop of Lindſeie (or Lincolne) & that Ceadda laie in Liechfield of the Mercians in a manſion houſe néere the church. But this is more worthie to be remembred, that Cuthred of the Northumbers, and Alfred of the Weſtſaxons beſtowed all the land betweene the Theſe & the Tine now called the biſhoprike vpon S. Cuthbert, beſide whatſoeuer belonged to the ſée of Hagulſtade. Edgar of Scotland alſo in the time of the Baſtard gaue Coldingham and Berwike withall their appurtenances to that houſe; but whether theſe donations be extant or no as yet I cannot tell. Yet I thinke not but that Leland had a ſight of them, from whome I had this ground. But whatſoeuer this biſhoprike be now, in externall & outward apparance, ſure it is that it paid in old time 9000 ducates at euerie alienation to Rome, as the record expreſſeth. Aidan a Scot or Iriſhman was the firſt biſhop of this ſée, who held himſelfe (as did manie of his ſucceſſors) at Colcheſter and in Lindeffarne Ile, till one came that remoued it to Durham. And now iudge

you whether the allegation of Capgraue be of anie accompt or not.

Caerleill. Caerleill was erected 1132 by Henrie the first, and hereof one Ethelwolfe confessor to Osmond bishop of Sarum was made the first bishop, hauing Cumberland & Westmerland assigned to his share; of the deaneries and number of parish churches conteined in the same as yet I haue no knowledge, more than of manie other. Howbeit hereof I am sure, that notwithstanding the present valuation be risen to 531 pounds fourescore shillings eleuen pence halfe penie, the pope receiued out of it but 1000 florens, and might haue spared much more, as an aduersarie thereto confessed sometime euen before the pope himselfe, supposing no lesse than to haue gained by his tale, and so peraduenture should haue done, if his platforme had taken place. But as wise men oft espie the practises of flatteries, so the pope saw to what end this profitable speach was uttered. As touching Caerleill it selfe it was sometime sacked by the Danes, and eftsones repared by William Rufus, & planted with a colonie of southerne men. I suppose that in old time it was called Cairdoill. For in an ancient booke which I haue seene, and yet haue, intituled, Liber formularum literarum curiæ Romanæ, octo capitulorum, episcopatus Cardocensis. And thus much generallie of the names and numbers of our bishoprikes of England, whose tenths in old time yearelie amounting vnto 21111 pounds, twelue shillings one penie halfe penie farthing, of currant monie in those daies, doo euidentlie declare, what store of coine was transported out of the land vnto the papall vses, in that behalfe onelie.

Certes I take this not to be one quarter of his gaines gotten by England in those daies, for such commodities were raised by his courts holden here, so plentifullie gat he by his perquisits, as elections, procurations, appeales, preuentions, pluralities, tot quots, trialities, tollerations, legitimations, bulles, scales, pálls, concubines, eating of flesh and white meats, dispensations for mariages, & times of celebration, Peter pence, and such like faculties, that not so little as 1200000 pounds went yearelie from hence to Rome. And therefore no maruell though he séeke much in these daies to reduce vs to his obedience. But what are the tenths of England (you will saie) in comparison of all those of Europe. For notwithstanding that manie good bishoprikes latelie erected be left out of his old bookes of record, which I also haue séene, yet I find neuertheles that the whole sum of them amounted to not aboue 61521 pounds as monie went 200 yeares before my time, of which portion pore saint Peter did neuer heare, of so much as one graie grote. Marke therfore I praie you whether England were not fullie answerable to a third part of the rest of his tenths ouer all Europe, and therevpon tell me whether our Iland was one of the best paire of bellowes or not, that blue the fire in his kitchen, wherewith to make his potsœth, beside all other commodities.

Man. Beside all these, we haue another bishoprike yet in England almost slipped out of my remembrance, because it is verie obscure, for that the bishop thereof hath not wherewith to mainteine his countenance sufficientlie, and that is the see of Mona or Man, sometime named Episcopatus Sodorensis, whereof one Wimundus was ordeined the first bishop, and John the second, in the troublesome time of king Stephan. The gift of this prelacie resteth in the earles of Darbie, who nominate such a one from time to time thereto as to them doth séeme conuenient. Howbeit if that sée did know and might reape hir owne commodities, and discerne them from other mens possessions (for it is supposed that the mother hath deuoured the daughter) I doubt not but the state of hir bishop would quicklie be amended. Hauing therefore called this later sée after this maner vnto mind, I suppose that I haue sufficientlie discharged my dutie concerning the state of our bishoprike, and maner how the ecclesiasticall iurisdiction of the church of England is diuided among the shires and counties of this realme. Whose bishops as they haue béene heretofore of lesse learning, and yet of greater port & dooings in the common-wealth, than at this present, so are they now for the most part the best learned that are to be found in anie countrie of Europe, sith neither high parentage, nor great riches (as in other countries) but onelie learning and vertue, commended somewhat by frendship, doo bring them to this honour.

I might here haue spoken more at large of diuerse other bishoprikes, sometime in this part of the Iland, as of that of Caerlheon tofore ouerthrowen by Edelfred in the behalfe of Augustine the monke (as Malmesburie saith) where Dubritius gouerned, which was afterward translated to S. Davids, and taken for an archbishoprike: secondlie of the bishoprike of Leircester called Legerensis, whose fourth bishop (Unwon) went to Rome with Offa king of Mercia: thirdlie of Ramsbirie or Wiltun, and of Glocester (of which you shall read in Matth. Westm. 489) where the bishop was called Eldad: also of Hagulstade, one of the members whereinto the see of Yorke was diuided after the expulsion of Wilfrid. For (as I read) when Egfrid the king had driuen him awaie, he diuided his see into two parts, making Bosa ouer the Deirancs that held his sée at Hagulstade or Lindfarne: and Eatta ouer the Bernicians, who sate at Yorke: and thereto placing Edhedus ouer Lindseie (as is afore noted) whose successors were Ethelwine, Edgar, and Kinibert, notwithstanding that one Serulfus was ouer Lindseie before Edhedus, who was bishop of the Merelans and middle England, till he was banished from Lindseie, and came into those quarters to séeke his refuge and succour. Glocester & verie ancient bishoprike.

I could likewise intreat of the bishops of Whiteherne, or Ad Candidam Casam, an house with the countrie wherein it stood belonging to the prouince of Northumberland, but now a parcell of Scotland; also of the erection of the late sée at Westminster by Henrie the eight. But as the one so the other is ceased, and the lands of this later either so diuided or exchanged for worse tenures, that except a man should sée it with his eies, & point out with his finger where euerie parcell of them is bestowed, but a few men would beléeue what is become of the same. I might likewise and with like ease also haue added the successors of the bishops of euerie sée to this discourse of their cathedrall churches and places of abode, but it would haue extended this treatise to an vnprofitable length. Neuertheless I will remember the fame of London my native citie, after I haue added one word more of the house called Ad Candidam Casam, in English Whiteherne, which taketh denomination of the white stone wherwith it was builded, and was séene far off as standing vpon an hill to such as did behold it.

And thus much of the archbishops, bishops, and deanes of that honorable see. I call it honorable, because it hath had a succession for the most part of learned and wise men, albeit that otherwise it be the most troublesome seat in England, not onelie for that it is neere vnto checke, but also the prelats thereof are much troubled with suitors, and no lesse subiect to the reproches of the common sort, whose mouthes are alwaies wide open vnto reprehension, and eies readie to espie anie thing that they may reproue and carpe at. I would haue done so much for euerie see in England, if I had not had consideration of the greatnesse of the volume, and small benefit arising by the same, vnto the commoditie of the readers: neuertheless I haue reserued them vnto the publication of my great chronologie, if (while I liue) it happen to come abroade.

Of Vniuersities.

Chap. 3.

Many vniuersities sometime in England.

THere haue beene heretofore, and at sundrie times, diuerse famous vniuersities in this Iland, and those euen in my daies not altogither forgotten, as one at Bangor, erected by Lucius, and afterward conuerted into a monasterie, not by Congellus (as some write) but by Pelagius the monke. The second at Carlheon vpon Vske, neere to the place where the riuer doth fall into the Seuerne, founded by king Arthur. The third at Theodford, wherein were 600 students, in the time of one Rond sometime king of that region. The fourth at Stanford, suppressed by Augustine the monke, and likewise other in other places, as Salisburie, Eridon or Cricklade, Lachlade, Reading, and Northampton; albeit that the two last rehearsed were not authorised, but onelie arose to that name by the departure of the students from Oxford in time of ciuill dissention vnto the said townes, where also they continued but for a little season. When that of Salisburie began, I can not tell; but that it flourished most vnder Henrie the third, and Edward the first, I find good testimonie by the writers, as also by the discord which fell 1278, betweene the chancellor for the scholers there on the one part, and William the archdeacon on the other, whereof you shall see more in the chronologie here following. In my time there are three noble vniuersities in England, to wit, one at Oxford, the second at Cambridge, and the third in London; of which, the first two are the most famous, I meane Cambridge and Oxford, for that in them the vse of the tongs, philosophie, and the liberall sciences, besides the profound studies of the ciuill law, physicke, and theologie, are dailie taught and had: whereas in the later, the laws of the realme are onlie read and learned, by such as giue their minds vnto the knowledge of the same. In the first there are not onelie diuerse goodlie houses builded foure square for the most part of hard freestone or bricke, with great numbers of lodgings and chambers in the same for students, after a sumptuous sort, through the exceeding liberalitie of kings, queenes, bishops, noblemen and ladies of the land: but also large reuenues bestowed vpon them (the like whereof is not to be seene in ante other region, as Peter Martyr did oft affirme) to the maintenance onelie of such conuenient numbers of poore mens sonnes as the seuerall stipends bestowed vpon the said houses are able to support.

Three vniuersities in England.

When the vniuersities were builded vncerteine.

When these two scholes should be first builded, & who were their originall founders, as yet it is vncerteine: neuertheless, as there is great likelihood that Cambridge was begun by one Cantaber a Spaniard (as I haue noted in my chronologie) so Alfred is said to be the first beginner of the vniuersitie at Oxford, albeit that I cannot warrant the same to be so yong, sith I find by good authoritie, that John of Beuerleie studied in the vniuersitie hall at Oxford, which was long before Alfred was either borne or gotten. Some are of the opinion that Cantabrigia was not so called of Cantaber, but Cair Grant of the finisher of the worke, or at the least wise of the riuer that runneth by the same, and afterward by the Saxons Grantcester. An other sort affirme that the riuer is better written Canta than Granta, &c: but whie then is not the towne called Canta, Cantium, or Cantodunum, according to the same? All this is said onlie (as I thinke) to deface the memorie of Cantaber, who comming from the Brigants, or out of Biscaie, called the said towne after his owne and the name of the region from whence he came. Neither hath it beene a rare thing for the Spaniards heretofore to come first into Ireland, and from thense ouer into England, sith the chronologie shall declare that it hath beene often seene, and that out of Britaine, they haue gotten ouer also into Scithia, and contrariwise: coasting still through Northelhire, which of them also was called Brigantium, as by good testimonie appeareth.

Of these two, that of Oxford (which lieth west and by north from London) standeth most pleasantlie, being inuironed in maner round about with woods on the hilles aloft, and goodlie riuers in the bottoms and vallies beneath, whose courses would breed no small commoditie to that citie and countrie about, if such impediments were remoued as greatlie annoie the same, and hinder the cariage which might be made thither also from London. That of Cambridge is distant from London about fortie and six miles north and by east, and standeth verie well, sauing that it is somewhat neere vnto the fens, whereby the wholesomenesse of the aire there is not a little corrupted. It is excellentlie well serued with all kinds of prouision, but especiallie of freshwater fish and wildfoule, by reason of the riuer that passeth thereby; and thereto the Ile of Elie, which is so neere at hand. Onlie wood is the cheefe want to such as studie there, wherefore this kind of prouision is brought them either from Essex, and other places thereabouts, as is also their cole; or otherwise the necessitie thereof is supplied with gall (a bastard kind of Mirtus as I take it) and seacole, whereof they haue great plentie led thither by the Grant. Moreouer it hath not such store of medow ground as may suffice for the ordinarie expenses of the towne and vniuersitie, wherefore the inhabitants are inforced in like sort to prouide their haie from other villages about, which minister the same vnto them in verie great aboundance.

Cambridge six and fortie miles from London.

Oxford is supposed to conteine in longitude eighteene degrees and eight and twentie minuts, and in latitude one and fiftie degrees and fiftie minuts; whereas that of Cambridge standing more northerlie, hath twentie degrees and twentie minuts in longitude, and thereunto fiftie and two degrees and fiftéene minuts in latitude, as by exact supputation is easie to be found.

Longitudes latitudes of both.

The colleges of Oxford, for curious workemanship and priuat commodities, are much more stateli, magnificent, & commodious than those of Cambridge: and thereunto the streets of the towne for the most part more large and comelie. But for vniformitie of building, orderlie compaction, and politike regiment, the towne of Cambridge, as the newer workmanship, exceedeth that of Oxford (which otherwise is and hath beene the greater of the two) by manie a fold (as I gesse) although I know diuerse that are of the contrarie opinion. This also is certeine, that whatsoeuer the difference be in building of the towne streets, the townesmen of both are glad when they may match and annoie the students, by incroching vpon their liberties, and keepe them bare by extreame sale of their wares, whereby manie of them become rich for a time, but afterward fall againe into pouertie, bicause that goods euill gotten do seldome long indure.

Cambridge burned not long since.

Castels also they haue both, and in my iudgement is hard to be said, whether of them would be the stronger, if ech were accordinglie repared: howbeit that of Cambridge is the higher, both for maner of building and situation of ground, sith Oxford castell

standeth low and is not so apparant to our sight. That of Cambridge was builded (as they saie) by Gurguintus, sometime king of Britaine, but the other by the lord Robert de Oilie, a noble man which came in with the conqueror, whose wife Editha, a woman giuen to no lesse superstition than credulitie, began also the abbeie of Oseneie neere vnto the same, vpon a fond (but yet a rare) occasion, which we will heere remember, though it be beside my purpose, to the end that the reader may see how readie the simple people of that time were to be abused by the practise of the clergie. It happened on a time as this ladie walked about the fields, neere vnto the aforesaid castell, to recreate hir selfe with certeine of hir maidens, that a number of pies sat chattering vpon the elmes, which had beene planted in the hedgerowes, and in fine so troubled hir with their noise, that she wished them all further off, or else hir selfe at home againe, and this happened diuerse times. In the end being wearie of hir walke, she demanded of hir chapleine the cause wherfore these pies did so molest & vexe hir. Oh madam (saith he) the wilest pie of all, these are no pies but soules in purgatorie that craue releefe. And is it so in deed quoth she? Now De pardieux, if old Robert will giue me leaue, I will doo what I can to bring these soules to rest. Herevpon she consulted, craued, wept, and became so importunate with hir husband, that he ioined with hir, and they both began that synagog 1130, which afterward proued to be a notable den. In that church also lieth this ladie buried with hir image, hauing an heart in hir hand couched vpon the same, in the habit of a vowesse, and yet to be seene, except the weather haue worne out the memorials. But to proceed with my purpose.

In each of these vniuersities also is likewise a church dedicated to the virgin Marie, wherein once in the yeare, to wit, in Iulie, the scholers are holden, and in which such as haue beene called to anie degree in the yeare precedent, doo there receiue the accomplishment of the same, in solemne and sumptuous maner. In Oxford this solemnitie is called an Act, but in Cambridge they vse the French word Commencement; and such resort is made yearelie vnto the same from all parts of the land, by the friends of those which doo proceed, that all the towne is hardlie able to receiue and lodge those gests. When and by whome the churches aforesaid were builded, I haue elsewhere made relation. That of Oxford also was repared in the time of Edward the fourth, and Henrie the seuenth, when doctor Fitz James a great helper in that worke was warden of Merton college, but yet long after it was finished, one tempest in a night so defaced the same, that it left few pinacles standing about the church and steeple, which since that time haue neuer beene repared. There were sometime foure and twentie parish churches in the towne and suburbes, but now there are scarselie sixteene. There haue beene also 1200 burgesses, of which 400 dwelled in the suburbes, and so manie students were there in the time of Henrie the third, that he allowed them twentie miles compasse about the towne, for their prouision of victels.

The common schooles of Cambridge also are farre more beautifull than those of Oxford, onelie the diuinitie schole at Oxford excepted, which for fine and excellent workemanship, commeth next the mould of the kings chappell in Cambridge, than the which two with the chappell that king Henrie the seuenth did build at Westminster, there are not (in mine opinion) made of lime & stone three more notable piles within the compasse of Europe.

In all other things there is so great equalitie betweene these two vniuersities, as no man can imagin how to set downe any greater; so that they seeme to be the bodie of one well ordered common wealth, onlie diuided by distance of place, and not in friendlie consent and orders. In speaking therefore of the one, I can not but describe the other; and in commendation of the first, I can not but extoll the latter; and so much the rather, for that they are both so deere vnto me, as that I can not readilie tell vnto whether of them I owe the most good will. Would to God my knowledge were such, as that neither of them might haue cause to be ashamed of their pupill; or my power so great, that I might worthilie requite them both for those manifold kindnesses that I haue receiued of them. But to leaue these things, and proceed with other more conuenient for my purpose. The manner to liue in these vniuersities, is not as in some other of forren countries we see dailie to happen, where the students are inforced for want of such houses, to dwell in common innes, and tauerns, without all order or discipline. But in these our colleges we liue in such exact order, and vnder so precise rules of gouernement, as that the famous learned man Erasmus of Roterodame being here among vs 50 yeres passed, did not let to compare the trades in liuing of students in these two places, euen with the verie rules and orders of the ancient monks: affirming moreouer in flat words, our orders to be such as not onlie came neere vnto, but rather far exceeded all the monasticall institutions that euer were deuised.

In most of our colleges there are also great numbers of students, of which manie are found by the reuenues of the houses, and other by the purueiances and helpe of their rich friends; whereby in some one college you shall haue two hundred scholers, in others an hundred and fiftie, in diuerse a hundred and fortie, and in the rest lesse numbers; as the capacitie of the said houses is able to receiue: so that at this present, of one sort and other, there are about three thousand students nourished in them both (as by a late surueie it manifestlie appeared.) They were erected by their founders at the first, onelie for poore mens sons, whose parents were not able to bring them vp vnto learning: but now they haue the least benefit of them, by reason the rich doo so incroch vpon them. And so farre hath this inconuenience spread it selfe, that it is in my time an hard matter for a poore mans child to come by a felowship (though he be neuer so good a scholer & worthie of that roome.) Such packing also is vsed at elections, that not he which best deserueth, but he that hath most friends, though he be the worst scholer, is alwaies surest to speed; which will turne in the end to the ouerthrow of learning. That some gentlemen also, whose friends haue beene in times past benefactors to certeine of those houses, doo intrude into the disposition of their estates, without all respect of order or statutes deuised by the founders, onelie thereby to place whome they thinke good (and not without some hope of gaine) the case is too too euident: and their attempt would soone take place, if their superiors did not prouide to bridle their indeuors. In some grammar schooles likewise, which send scholers to these vniuersities, it is lamentable to see what briberie is vsed; for yer the scholer can be preferred, such bribage is made, that poore mens children are commonlie shut out, and the richer sort receiued (who in time past thought it dishonor to liue as it were vpon almes) and yet being placed, most of them studie little other than histories, tables, dice, and trifles, as men that make not the liuing by their studie the end of their purposes, which is a lamentable hearing. Beside this, being for the most part either gentlemen, or rich mens sonnes, they set bring the vniuersities into much slander. For standing vpon their reputation and libertie, they ruffle and roist it out, exceeding in apparell, and ban-ting riotous companie (which draweth them from their bookes vnto an other trade.) And for excuse when they are charged with breach of all good order, thinke it sufficient to saie, that they be gentlemen, which greeueth manie not a litle. But to proceed with the rest.

Readers in priuat houses.

Euerie one of these colleges haue in like maner their professors or readers of the tongs and seuerall sciences, as they call them, which dailie trade vp the youth there abiding priuatlie in their halles, to the end they may be able afterward (when their turne commeth about, which is after twelue termes) to shew themselues abroad, by going from thence into the common schooles and publike disputations (as it were In aream) there to trie their skilles, and declare how they haue profited since their comming thither.

Publike readers maintained by the prince.

Moreouer, in the publike schooles of both the vniuersities, there are found at the princes charge (and that verie largelie) fiue professors and readers, that is to saie, of diuinitie, of the ciuill law, physicke, the Hebrue, and the Greeke tongs. And for the other lectures, as of philosophie, logike, rhetorike, and the quadriuials, although the latter (I meane arythmetike, musike, geometrie, and astronomie, and with them all skill in the perspectiues are now smallie regarded in either of them) the vniuersities themselues do allow competent stipends to such as reade the same, whereby they are sufficientlie prouided for, touching the maintenance of their estates, and no lesse incouraged to be diligent in their functions.

Studie of the quadriuials and perspectiues neglected.

These professors in like sort haue all the rule of disputations and other schole exercises, which are dailie vsed in common schooles seuerallie assigned to ech of them, and such of their hearers, as by their skill shewed in the said disputations, are thought to haue atteined to anie conuenient ripenesse of knowleledge, according to the custome of other vniuersities, although not in like order, are permitted solemnlie to take their deserued degrees of schole in the same science and facultie wherein they haue spent their trauell. From that time forward also, they vse such difference in apparell as becommeth their callings, tendeth vnto grauitie, and maketh them knowne to be called to some countenance.

Sophisters.

The first degree, is that of the generall sophisters, from whence when they haue learned more sufficientlie the rules of logike, rhetorike, and obteined thereto competent skill in philosophie, and in the mathematicals, they ascend higher vnto the estate of Batchelers of art.

batchelers of art, after foure yeares of their entrance into their sophistrie. From thence also giuing their minds to more perfect knowledge in some or all the other liberall sciences, & the tongs, they rise at the last (to wit, after other three or foure yeares) to be called maisters of art, ech of them being at that time reputed for a doctor in his facultie, if he profesle but one of the said sciences (beside philosophie) or for his generall skill, if he be exercised in them all. After this they are permitted to chose what other of the higher studies them liketh to follow, whether it be diuinitie, law, or physike; so that being once maisters of art, the next degree if they follow physike, is the doctorship belonging to that profession; and likewise in the studie of the law, if they bend their minds to the knowledge of the same. But if they meane to go forward with diuinitie, this is the order vsed in that profession. First, after they haue necessarilie proceeded maisters of art, they preach one sermon to the people in English, and another to the vniuersitie in Latine. They answer all commers also in their owne persons vnto two seuerall questions of diuinitie in the open schooles, at one time, for the space of two hours; and afterward replie twise against some other man vpon a like number, and on two seuerall daies in the same place: which being done with commendation, he receiueth the fourth degree, that is, batchleler of diuinitie, but not before he hath bene maister of art by the space of seauen yeares, according to their statutes. Batcheler of diuinitie.

The next and last degree of all is the doctorship after other three yeares, for the which he must once againe performe all such exercises and acts as are afore remembred, and then is he reputed able to gouerne and teach others, & likewise taken for a doctor. Doctor.

I haue read that John of Beuerleie was the first doctor that euer was in Oxford, as Beda was in Cambridge. But I suppose herein that the word doctor is not so strictlie to be taken in this report as it is now vsed, sith euerie teacher is in Latine called by that name, as also such in the primitiue church as kept schooles of catechists, wherein they were trained vp in the rudiments and principles of religion, either before they were admitted vnto baptisme, or anie office in the church.

Thus we see, that from our entrance into the vniuersitie vnto the last degree receiued, is commonlie eightene or peraduenture twentie yeares, in which time if a student hath not obteined sufficient learning, thereby to serue his owne turne, and benefit his common wealth, let him neuer looke by tarieng longer to come by anie more. For after this time & yeares of age, the most part of students do commonlie giue ouer their wonted diligence, & liue like drone bees on the fat of colleges, withholding better wits from the possession of their places, & yet doing litle good in their own vocation & calling. I could rehearse a number (if I listed) of this sort, aswell in the one vniuersitie as the other. But this shall suffice insted of a larger report, that long continuance in those places is either a signe of lacke of friends, or of learning, or of good and vpright life, as bishop For sometime noted, who thought it sacrilege for a man to tarrie anie longer at Oxford than he had a desire to profit. This For builded Corpus Christi college in Oxford.

A man may (if he will) begin his studie with the law, or physike (of which this giueth wealth, the other honor) so soone as he commeth to the vniuersitie, if his knowledge in the tongs and ripenesse of iudgement serue therefore: which if he do, then his first degree is bacheler of law, or physicke, and for the same he must performe such acts in his owne science, as the bachelers or doctors of diuinitie, do for their parts, the onelie sermons except, which belong not to his calling. Finallie, this will I saie, that the professors of either of those faculties come to such perfection in both vniuersities, as the best students beyond the sea do in their owne or elsewhere. One thing onlie I mislike in them, and that is their vsuall going into Italie, from whense verie few without speciall grace do returne good men, what soeuer they pretend of conference or practise, chiefelie the physicians who vnder pretense of seeking of forreine simples do oftentimes learne the framing of such compositions as were better vnknowen than practised, as I haue heard oft alledged, and therefore it is most true that doctor Turner said; Italie is not to be seene without a guide, that is, without speciall grace giuen from God, because of the licentious and corrupt behauiour of the people. So much also may be inferred of lawiers.

There is moreouer in euerie house a maister or prouost, who hath vnder him a president, & certeine censors or deanes, appointed to looke to the behauior and maners of the students there, whom they punish verie seuerelie if they make anie default, according to the quantitie and qualitie of their trespasses. And these are the vsuall names of gouernours in Cambridge. Howbeit in Oxford the heads of houses are now and then called preſidents in reſpect of ſuch biſhops as are their viſitors & founders. In each of theſe alſo they haue one or moe threſurers whom they call Burſarios or Burſers beſide other officers, whoſe charge is to ſée vnto the welfare and maintenance of theſe houſes. Ouer each vniuerſitie alſo there is a ſeuerall chancelor, whoſe offices are perpetuall, howbeit their ſubſtitutes, whom we call vicechancelors, are changed euerie yeare, as are alſo the proctors, taſkers, maiſters of the ſtreates and other officers, for the better maintenance of their policie and eſtate.

And thus much at this time of our two vniuerſities in each of which I haue receiued ſuch degrée as they haue vouchſafed rather of their fauour than my deſert to yéeld and beſtow vpon me, and vnto whoſe ſtudents I wiſh one thing, the execution whereof cannot be preiudiciall to anie that meaneth well, as I am reſolutelie perſuaded, and the caſe now ſtandeth in theſe our dáies. When anie benefice therefore becommeth void, it were good that the patrone did ſignifie the vacation therof to the biſhop, and the biſhop the act of the patrone to one of the vniuerſities, with requeſt that the vicechancellor with his aſſiſents might prouide ſome ſuch able man to ſucceed in the place, as ſhould by their iudgement be meet to take the charge vpon him. Certes if this order were taken then ſhould the church be prouided of good paſtors, by whome God ſhould be glorified, the vniuerſities better ſtored, the ſimoniacall practiſes of a number of patrons vtterlie aboliſhed and the people better trained to liue in obedience toward God and their prince, which were an happie eſtate.

London. To theſe two alſo we may in like ſort ad the third, which is at London (ſeruing onelie for ſuch as ſtudie the lawes of the realme) where there are ſundrie famous houſes, of which three are called by the name of Ins of the court, the reſt of the chancerie, and all builded before time for the furtherance and commoditie of ſuch as aplie their minds to our common lawes. Out of theſe alſo come manie ſcholers of great fame, whereof the moſt part haue heretofore béene brought vp in one of the aforeſaid vniuerſities, and prooue ſuch commonlie as in proceſſe of time, riſe vp (onelie through their profound ſkill) to great honor in the common-wealth of England. They haue alſo degrées of learning among themſelues, and rules of diſcipline, vnder which they liue moſt ciuilie in their houſes, albeit that the yonger ſort of them abroad in the ſtreats are ſcarſe able to be bridled by anie good order at all. Certes this errour was wont alſo greatlie to reigne in Cambridge and Oxford, betweene the ſtudents and the burgeſſes: but as it is well left in theſe two places, ſo in forreine counteies it cannot yet be ſuppreſſed. Beſides theſe vniuerſities, alſo there are great number of Grammer ſcholes thorough out the realme, and thoſe verie liberallie indued, for the better reliefe of poore ſcholers, ſo that there are not manie corporat townes now vnder the quéenes dominion, that hain not one Grammar ſchole at the leaſt, with a ſufficient liuing for a maiſter and vſher appointed to the ſame. Grammar ſchooles.

There are in like maner diuerſe collegiat churches as Windſor, Wincheſter, Eaton, Weſtminſter (in which I was ſometime an vnprofitable Grammarian vnder the reuerend father maiſter Nowell now deane of Paules) and in thoſe a great number of poore ſcholers, dailie maintéened by the liberalitie of the founders, with meat, bookes, and apparell, from whence after they haue béene well entered in the knowledge of the Latine and Gréeke tongs, and rules of verſifieng (the triall whereof is made by certeine apoſers yearelie appointed to examine them) they are ſent to certeine eſpeciall houſes in each vniuerſitie, where they are receiued the trained vp, in the points of higher knowledge in their priuat hals, till they be adiudged meet to ſhew their faces in the ſchooles, as I haue ſaid alreadie. And thus much haue I thought good to note of our vniuerſities, and likewiſe of colleges in the ſame, whoſe names I will alſo ſet downe here, with thoſe of their founders, to the end the zeale which they bare vnto learning may appeare, and their remembrance neuer perith from among the wiſe and learned. windſor. wincheſter. There are alſo in Oxford certeine hoſtels or hals, which may right well be called by the names of colleges, if it were not that there is more libertie in them, than is to be ſeen in the other. I mine opinion the liuers in theſe are verie like to thoſe that are of Ins in the chancerie, their names alſo are theſe ſo farre as I now remember.

The ſtudents alſo that remaine in them, are called hoſtelers or halliers. Hereof it came of late to paſſe, that the right reuerend father in God Thomas late archbiſhop of Canturburie being brought vp in ſuch an houſe at Cambridge, was of the ignorant ſort of Londoners called an hoſteler, ſuppoſing that he had ſerued with ſome inholder in the ſtable, and therfore in deſpite diuerſe hanged vp bottles of haie at his gate, when he began to preach the goſpell, whereas in deed he was a gentleman borne of an ancient houſe: in the end a faithfull witneſſe of Ieſus Chriſt, in whoſe quarrell he refuſed not to ſhed his blood and yeld vp his life vnto the furie of his aduerſaries.

Beſides theſe there is mention and record of diuerſe other hals or hoſtels, that haue béene there in times paſt, as Bœfe hall, Putton hall, &c: whoſe ruines yet appéere: ſo that if antiquitie be to be iudged by the ſhew of ancient buildings, which is verie plentifull in Oxford to be ſéene, it ſhould be an eaſie matter to conclude that Oxford is the elder vniverſitie. Therin are alſo manie dwelling houſes of ſtone yet ſtanding, that haue béene hals for ſtudents of verie antike workemanſhip, beſide the old wals of ſundrie other, whoſe plots haue béene conuerted into gardens, ſince colleges were erected.

And thus much in generall of our noble vniverſities, whoſe lands ſome greedie gripers do gape wide for, and of late haue (as I heare) propounded ſundrie reaſons, whereby they ſuppoſed to haue preuailed in their purpoſes. But who are thoſe that haue attempted this ſute, other than ſuch as either hate learning, pietie, and wiſedome; or elſe haue ſpent all their owne, and know not otherwiſe than by incroching vpon other men how to maintaine themſelues? When ſuch a motion was made by ſome vnto king Henrie the eight, he could anſwer them in this maner; Ah ſirha, I perceiue the abbeie lands haue fleſhed you and ſet your téeth on edge, to aſke alſo thoſe colleges. And whereas we had a regard onelie to pull downe ſinne by defacing the monaſteries, you haue a deſire alſo to ouerthrow all godneſſe by ſubuerſion of colleges. I tell you ſirs that I iudge no land in England better beſtowed than that which is giuen to our vniverſities, for by their maintenance our realme ſhall be well gouerned when we be dead and rotten. As you loue your welfares therfore, follow no more this veine, but content your ſelues with that you haue alreadie, or elſe ſeeke honeſt meanes whereby to increaſe your liuelods, for I loue not learning ſo ill, that I will impaire the reuenues of anie one houſe by a penie, whereby it may be vpholden. In king Edwards daies likewiſe the ſame ſute was once againe attempted (as I haue heard) but in vaine, for ſaith the duke of Somerſet among other ſpeeches tending to that end, who alſo made anſwer thereunto in the kings preſence by his aſſignation; If lerning decaie, which of wiſe men maketh ciuill, of blockiſh and raſh perſons wiſe and godlie counſellors, of obſtinat rebels obedient ſubiects, and of euill men good and godlie chriſtians, what ſhall we looke for elſe but barbariſme and tumult? For when the lands of colleges be gone, it ſhall be hard to ſaie, whoſe ſtaffe ſhall ſtand next the doore, for then I doubt not but the ſtate of biſhops, rich farmers, merchants, and the nobilitie ſhall be aſſailed, by ſuch as liue to ſpend all, and thinke that what ſo euer another man hath is more meet for them, and to be at their commandement, than for the proper owner that hath ſweat and laboured for it. For what comfort ſhould it be for anie good man to ſée his countrie brought into the eſtate of the old Gothes & Vandals, who made lawes againſt learning, and would not ſuffer anie ſkilfull man to come into their councell houſe, by meanes whereof thoſe people became ſauage, tyrants, and mercileſſe helhounds, till they reſtored learning againe, and thereby fell to ciuilitie.

Of the partition of England into ſhires and counties.

Chap. 4.

IN reading of ancient writers, as Cæſar, Tacitus, and others, we find mention of ſundrie regions to haue béene ſometime in this Iland, as the Nouantæ, Selgouæ, Dannonij, Gadeni, Oradeni, Epdij, Cerones, Carnonacæ, Careni, Cornabij, Caledonij, Decantæ, Logi, Mertæ, Vacomagi, Venicontes, Texali or Polij, Denani, Elgoui, Brigantes Pariſi, Ordouici alias Ordoluci, Cornauij, Coritaui, Catieuchlani, Simeni, Trinouantes, Demetæ, Cangi, Silures, Dobuni, Atterbatij, Cantij, Regni, Belgæ, Durotriges, Dumnonij, Giruij, Murotriges, Seueriani, Iceni, Tegenes, Caſij, Cænimagni, Segontiaci, Ancalites, Bibroci, and Kentiſhmen, and ſuch like. But ſith the ſeuerall places where moſt of them laie, are not yet verie perfectlie knowne vnto the learned of theſe daies, I doo not meane to pronounce my iudgement vpon ſuch doubtfull caſes, leaſt that in ſo doing I ſhould but increaſe coniectures, and leading peraduenture the reader from the more probable, intangle his mind in the end with ſuch as are of leſſe value, and things nothing ſo likelie to be true, as thoſe which other men haue remembred and ſet downe before me. Neither will I ſpeake oughts of the Romane partitions, & limits of their legions, whoſe number and place of abode, except of the Victorian and Auguſtane, is to me vtterlie vnknowne.

Alfred brought England into ſhires, which the Britons diuided by cantreds, and the firſt Saxons by families.

It ſhall ſuffice therefore to begin with ſuch a ground as from whence ſome better certeintie of things may be deriued, and that is with the eſtate of our Iland in the time of Alfred, who firſt diuided England into ſhires, which before his daies, and ſince the comming of the Saxons, was limited out by families and hidelands, as the Britons did the ſame in their time, by hundreds of townes, which then were called cantreds; as old records doo witneſſe.

Into how manie ſhires the ſaid Alfred did firſt make this partition of the Iland, it is not yet found out; howbeit if my coniecture be anie thing at all, I ſuppoſe that he left not vnder eight and thirtie, ſith we find by no good author, that aboue fiftéene haue béene added by anie of his ſucceſſours, ſince the time of his deceaſe. This prince therefore hauing made the generall partition of his kingdome into ſhires, or ſhares; he diuided againe the ſame into lathes, as lathes into hundreds, and hundreds into tithings, or denaries, as diuers haue written; and maiſter Lambert following their authorities, hath alſo giuen out, ſaieng almoſt after this maner in his deſcription of Kent; The Danes (ſaith he) both before, & in the time of king Alfred, had flocked by the ſea coaſts of this Iland in great numbers, ſometimes walking and ſpoiling with ſword and fire, whereſoeuer they might arriue, and ſomtime taking great booties with them to their ſhips, without doing anie further hurt or damage to the countrie. This inconuenience continuing for manie yéeres togither, cauſed our husbandmen to abandon their tillage, and gaue occaſion and hardineſſe to euill diſpoſed perſons, to fall to the like pillage, as practiſing to follow the Danes in theſe their theefts and robberies. And the better to cloake their miſchéefe withall, they feigned themſelues to be Daniſh pirats, and would ſometime come a land in one port, and ſometime in another, driuing dailie great ſpoiles (as the Danes had done) vnto their ſhips before them. The good king Alfred therefore (who had maruellouſlie trauelled in repelling the barbarous Danes) eſpieng this outrage, and thinking it no leſſe the part of a politike prince, to rot out the noiſome ſubiect, than to hold out the foren aduerſarie: by the aduiſe of his nobilitie, and the example of Moſes (who followed the counſell of Iethro his father in law to the like effect) diuided the whole realme into certeine parts or ſections, which (of the Saxon word Schyran, ſignifieng to cut) he termed ſhires, or as we yet ſpeake, ſhares, or portions, of which ſome one hath fortie miles in length (as Eſſer) and almoſt ſo manie broad, Hereford foure & twentie in length, and twentie in breadth, and Warwike ſix and thirtie in length, &c: and ſome of them alſo conteine ten, twelue, thirtéene, ſixtéene, twentie, or thirtie hundreds, more or leſſe, as ſome hundreds doo ſixtéene, twentie, thirtie, fortie, fiftie or ſixtie townes, out of which the king was alwaies to receiue an hundred able men to ſerue him in the warres, or a hundred men able to be pledges, and ouer each of the portions he appointed either an earle or alderman, or both, to whome he committed the gouernement of the ſame. Earle and alderman. Theſe ſhires alſo he brake into leſſer parts, whereof ſome were called lathes, of the word Gelathian, which is to aſſemble togither; other hundreds, for that they enioied iuriſdiction ouer an hundred pledges; and other tithings, bicauſe there were in each of them to the number of ten perſons, whereof euerie one from time to time was ſuertie for others good abearing. He prouided alſo that euerie man ſhould procure himſelfe to be receiued into ſome tithing, to the end, that if anie were found of ſo ſmall and baſe a credit, that no man would become pledge or ſuertie for him, he ſhould forthwith be committed to priſon, leaſt otherwiſe he might happen to doo more harme abroad. Hitherto maiſter Lambert. By whoſe words we may gather verie much of the ſtate of this Iland in the time of Alfred, whoſe inſtitution continued after a ſort vntill the comming of the Normans, who changed the gouernement of the realme in ſuch wiſe (by bringing in of new officers and offices, after the maner of their countries) that verie little of the old regiment remained more than the bare names of ſome officers (except peraduenture in Kent) ſo that in theſe daies it is hard to ſet downe anie great certeintie of things as they ſtood in Alfreds time, more than is remembred and touched at this preſent.

Engliſhmen noiſome to their owne countrie.

What a lath is

Some as it were roming or rouing at the name Lath, doo ſaie that it is deriued of a barne, which is called in old Engliſh a lath, as they coniecture. From which ſpéech in like ſort ſome deriue the word Laikow, as if it ſhould be truelie written Laith ſtow, a place wherein to laie vp or laie on things, of whatſoeuer condition. But hereof as yet I cannot abſolutelie be ſatiſfied, although peraduenture ſome likelihood in their iudgements may ſéeme to be therein. Other vpon ſome further conſideration affirme that they were certeine circuits in euerie countie or ſhire conteining an appointed number of townes, whoſe inhabitants alwaies aſſembled to know and vnderſtand of matters touching their portions, in to ſome one.

one appointed place or other within their limits, eſpeciallie whileſt the cauſes were ſuch as required not the aid or aſſiſtance of the whole countie. Of theſe lathes alſo (as they ſaie) ſome ſhires had more, ſome leſſe, as they were of greatneſſe. And M. Lambert ſéemeth to be of the opinion, that the léets of our time (wherein theſe pledges be yet called Franci plegij of the word Frœ burgh) do yéeld ſome ſhadow of that politike inſtitution of Alfred. But ſith my ſkill is ſo ſmall in theſe caſes that I dare not iudge anie thing at all as of mine owne knowledge, I will not ſet downe anie thing more than I read, leaſt I ſhould roue at random in our obſcure antiquities, and reading no more of lathes my next talke ſhall be of hundreds.

Léets.

Hundred or wapentake.

The hundred and the wapentake is all one, as I read in ſome, and by this diuiſion not a name appertinent to a ſet number of townes (for then all hundreds ſhould be of equall quantitie) but a limited iuriſdiction, within the compaſſe whereof were an hundred perſons called pledges (as I ſaid) or ten denaries, or tithings of men, of which ech one was bound for others good abering, and laudable behauiour in the common-wealth of the realme. The chiefe man likewiſe of euerie denarie or tithing was in thoſe daies called a tithing man, in Latine Decurio, but now in moſt places a borſholder or burgholder, as in Kent; where euerie tithing is moreouer named a burgh or burrow, although that in the Weſt countrie he be ſtill called a tithing man, and his circuit a tithing, as I haue heard at large. I read furthermore (and it is partlie afore noted) that the ſaid Alfred cauſed ech man of frée condition (for the better maintenance of his peace) to be aſcribed into ſome hundred by placing himſelfe in one denarie or other, where he might alwais haue ſuch as ſhould ſweare or ſaie vpon their certeine knowledge for his honeſt behauior and ciuill conuerſation if it ſhould happen at anie time, that his credit ſhould come in queſtion. In like ſort I gather out of Leland and other, that if anie ſmall matter did fall out worthie to be diſcuſſed, the tithing man or borſholder (now officers, at the commandement of the high conſtable of which euerie hundred hath one at the leaſt) ſhould decide the ſame in their léets, whereas the great cauſes were referred to the hundreds, the greater to the lathes, and the greateſt of all to the ſhire daies, where the earles or aldermen did ſet themſelues, & make finall ends of the ſame, according vnto iuſtice. For this purpoſe likewiſe in euerie hundred were twelue men choſen of good age and diſcretion, and thoſe ſworne to giue their ſentences without reſpect of perſon, and in this manner (as they gather) were things handeled in thoſe daies. Which waie the word wapentake came in vſe, as yet I cannot tell; howbeit the ſignification of the ſame declareth (as I conceiue) that at the chiefe towne the ſoldiers which were to ſerue in that hundred did méet, fetch their weapons, & go togither from thence to the field, or place of ſeruice by an ordinarie cuſtome, then generallie knowen amongſt them. It is ſuppoſed alſo that the word Rape commeth a Rapiendo, as it were of catching and ſnatching, bicauſe the tenants of the hundred or wapentakes met vpon one or ſundrie daies & made quicke diſpatch of their lords haruеſt at once and in great haſt. But whether it be a true imagination or not as yet I am vncerteine, and therefore it lieth not in me to determine anie thing thereof: wherefore it ſhall ſuffice to haue touched them in this maner.

Fortie ſhires in England thirteene in Wales.

In my time there are found to be in England fourtie ſhires, and likewiſe thirteene in Wales, and theſe latter erected of late yeares by king Henrie the eight, who made the Britons or Welſhmen equall in all reſpects vnto the Engliſh, and brought to paſſe that both nations ſhould indifferentlie be gouerned by one law, which in times paſt were ordred by diuerſe, and thoſe far diſcrepant and diſagreeing one from another: as by the ſeuerall view of the ſame is yet eaſie to be diſcerned. The names of the ſhires in England are theſe, whereof the firſt ten lie betweéne the Britiſh ſea and the Thames, as Polydor alſo doth ſet them downe.

Kent.	Wiltſhire.
Suſſex.	Dorſetſhire.

Hampſhire.	Deuon.
Barkeſhire.	Cornewall.

There are moreouer on the northſide of the Thames, and betweéne the ſame and the riuer Trent, which paſſeth through the middeſt of England (as Polydor ſaith) ſixteéne other ſhires, whereof ſix lie toward the eaſt, the reſt toward the weſt, more into the middeſt of the countrie.

Eſſex, ſometime all foreſt ſaue one hundred.	Huntington ſher in are foure hundreds.

So that in the portion ſometime called Lhoegres, there are now fortie ſhires. In Wales furthermore are thirteéne, whereof ſeuen are in Southwales:

Od parcels of ſhires.

This is moreouer to be noted in our diuiſion of ſhires, that they be not alwaies counted or laid togither in one parcell, whereof I haue great marueil. But ſith the occaſion hath growen (as I take it) either by priuilege or ſome like occaſion, it is better héere lie to ſet downe how ſome of theſe parts lie than to ſpend the time in ſéeking a iuſt cauſe of this their od diuiſion, diuiſion. Firſt therefore I note that in the part of Buckinghamſhire betweene Amondeſham, & Beconſfield, there is a peece of Hartfordſhire to be found, inuironed round about with the countie of Buckingham, and yet this patch is not aboue three miles in length and two in breadth at the verie moſt. In Barkeſhire alſo betweene Ruſcombe and Dokingham is a peece of Willhire, one mile in breadth and foure miles in length, whereof one ſide lieth on the Loden riuer. In the borders of Northamptonſhire directlie ouer againſt Luffeld a towne in Buckinghamſhire, I find a parcell of Oxfordſhire not paſſing two miles in compaſſe.

With Oxfordſhire diuerſe do participate, in ſo much that a peece of Glocesterſhire, lieth halfe in Warwikeſhire & halfe in Oxfordſhire, not verie far from Horneton. Such another patch is there, of Glocesterſhire not far from long Compton, but lieng in Oxford countie: & a peece of Worcesterſhire, directlie betweene it & Glocesterſhire. Glocester hath the third peece vpon the north ſide of the Wilrush neere Falbrocke, as Barkeſhire hath one parcell alſo vpon the ſelfe ſide of the ſame water, in the verie edge of Glocesterſhire: likewiſe an other in Oxfordſhire, not verie farre from Burford: and the third ouer againſt Lach lade, which is parted from the main countie of Barkeſhire, by a little ſtrake of Oxfordſhire. Who would thinke that two fragments of Willhire were to be ſeene in Barkeſhire vpon the Loden, and the riuer that falleth into it: whereof and the like ſith there are verie manie, I thinke good to giue this briefe admonition. For although I haue not preſentlie gone thorough with them all, yet theſe may ſuffice to giue notice of this thing, wherof moſt readers (as I perſuade my ſelfe) are ignorant.

Lieutenants. But to proceed with our purpoſe. Euer ech of theſe ſhires in time of neceſſitie is a ſeuerall lieutenant choſen vnder the prince, who being a noble man of calling, hath almoſt regall authoritie ouer the ſame for the time being in manie caſes which do concerne his office: otherwiſe it is gouerned by a ſhiriffe (a word deriued of Schire and Greue, and pronounced as Shire and Reue) whoſe office is to gather vp and bring his accounts vnto the exchequer, of the profits of his countie receiued, whereof he is or may be called Quæſtor comitatus or Prouinciæ. This officer is reſident and dwelling ſomewhere within the ſame countie, and called alſo a vicount, Quaſi vicarius comitis or Procomes, in reſpect of the earle (or as they called him in time paſt the alderman) that beareth his name of the countie, although it be ſeldome ſeene in England, that the earle hath anie great ſtore of poſſeſſions, or oughts to do in the ſhire whereof he taketh his name, more than is allowed to him, through his perſonall reſidence, if he happen to dwell and be reſident in the ſame.

Shiriffes.

In the election alſo of theſe magiſtrates, diuerſe able perſons aſwell for wealth as wiſedome are named by the commons, at a time and place appointed for their choiſe, whoſe names being deliuered to the prince, he forthwith pricketh ſome ſuch one of them, as he pleaſeth to aſſigne vnto that office, to whome he committeth the charge of the countie, and who hereupon is ſhiriffe of that ſhire for one whole yeare, or vntill a new be choſen. The ſhiriffe alſo hath his vnder ſhiriffe that ruleth & holdeth the ſhire courts and law daies vnder him, vpon ſufficient caution vnto the high ſhiriffe for his true execution of iuſtice, preſeruation from impeachment, and yéelding of accompt when he ſhall be thereunto called. There are likewiſe vnder him certeine bailiffes, whoſe office is to ſerue and returne ſuch writs and proceſſes as are directed vnto them from the high ſhiriffe: to make ſeiſure of the goods and cattels, and arreſt the bodies of ſuch as do offend, preſenting either their perſons vnto him, or at the leaſtwiſe taking ſufficient bond, or other aſſurance of them for their dutifull appearance at an appointed time, when the ſhiriffe by order of law ought to preſent them to the iudges according to his charge. In euerie hundred alſo are one or more high conſtables accordíng to the quantitie thereof, who receiuing the writs and iniunctions from the high ſhiriffe vnder his ſeale, or from ante other officers of the prince, either for the prouiſion of victuals or for other cauſes, or priuat puruciance of cates for the maintenance of the roiall familie, do forthwith charge the petie conſtables of euerie towne within their limits, with the execution of the ſame.

They haue alſo an other called the ſhiriffes turne, which they hold twiſe in their times, in euerie hundred, according to the old order appointed by king Edgar (as king Edward reduced the folkmote ordeined by king Arthur to be held yearelis on the firſt of Maie, vntill the firſt of euerie moneth) and in theſe two latter ſuch ſmall matters as oft ariſe amongſt the inferior ſort of people, are heard and well determined. They haue finallie their quarter ſeſſions, wherein they are aſſiſted by the iuſtices and gentlemen of the countrie, twiſe in the yeare gaile deliuerie, at which time the iudges ride about in their circuits, into euerie ſeuerall countie (where the nobilitie and gentlemen with the iuſtices there reſiant aſſociat them) & miniſter the lawes of the realme, with great ſolemnitie & iuſtice. Howbeit in doing of theſe things, they reteine ſtill the old order of the land in vſe before the conqueſt. For they commit the full examination of all cauſes there to be heard, to the conſideration of twelue ſober, graue, and wiſe men, choſen out of the ſame countie; and foure of them of neceſſitie out of the hundred where the action lieth, or the defendant inhabiteth (which number they call an inqueſt) & of theſe inqueſts there are more or leſſe impanneled at euerie aſſiſe, as the number of caſes there to be handled doth craue and require, albeit that ſome one inqueſt hath often diuerſe matters to conſider of. And when they haue (to their vttermoſt power) conſulted and debated of ſuch things as they are charged withall, they returne againe to the place of iuſtice, with their verdict in writing, according whereunto the iudge doth pronounce his ſentence, be it for life or death, or anie other matter what ſoeuer is brought before him. It is alſo verie often ſeene, that ſuch as are nominated to be of theſe inqueſts, do after their charge receiued ſeldome or neuer eat or drinke, vntill they haue agréed vpon their verdict, and yéelded it vp vnto the iudge of whome they receiued the charge; by meanes whereof ſometimes it commeth to paſſe that diuerſe of the inqueſt haue béene welneere famiſhed, or at leaſt taken ſuch a ſickeneſſe thereby, as they haue hardlie auoided. And this commeth by practiſe, when the one ſide feareth the ſequele, and therefore conueieth ſome one or more into the iurie, that will in his behalfe neuer yéeld vnto the reſt, but of ſet purpoſe put them to this trouble.

Certes it is a common practiſe (if the vnder ſhiriffe be not the better man) for the craftier or ſtronger ſide to procure and packe ſuch a queſt, as he himſelfe ſhall like of, whereby he is ſure of the iſſue before the charge be giuen: and beſide this if the matter do iuſtlie procéed againſt him, it is a world to ſée now and then how the honeſt yeomen that haue Bona fide diſcharged their conſciences ſhall be ſued of an atteint, & bound to appéere at the Starre chamber, with what rigor they ſhall be caried from place to place, countie to countie, yea and ſometime in carts, which hath and doth cauſe a great number of them to abſteine from the aſſiſes, & yeeld to paie their iſſues, rather than they would for their good meaning be thus diſturbed & dealt withall. Sometimes alſo they bribe the bailiffes to be kept at home, whervpon poore men, not hauing in their purſſes wherewith to beare their coſtes, are impanelled vpon iuries, who verie often haue neither reaſon nor iudgement to performe the charge they come for. Neither was this kind of ſeruice at anie time halfe ſo painefull as at this preſent: for vntill of late yeares (that the number of lawiers and atturneies hath ſo exceedinglie increaſed, that ſome ſhifts muſt needs be found and matters ſought out, whereby they may be ſet on worke) a man ſhould not haue heard at one aſſiſe of more than two or three Niſi prius, but verie ſeldome of an atteint; whereas now an hundred & more of the firſt and one or two of the later are verie often perceiued, and ſome of them for a cauſe ariſing of ſix pence or twelue pence. Which declareth that men are growen to be farre more contentious than they haue beene in time paſt, and readier to reuenge their quarels of ſmall importance, whereof the lawiers complaine not. But to my purpoſe, from whence I haue now digreſſed.

Beſide theſe officers afore mentioned, there are ſundrie other in euerie countie, as crowners, whoſe dutie is to inquire of ſuch as come to their death by violence, to attach & preſent the plées of the crowne, to make inquirie of treaſure found, &c. There are diuerſe alſo of the beſt learned of the law, beſide ſundrie gentlemen, where the number of lawiers will not ſuffice (and whoſe reuenues do amount to aboue twentie pounds by the yeare) appointed by eſpeciall commiſſion from the prince, to looke vnto the good gouernement of hir ſubiects, in the counties where they dwell. And of theſe the leaſt ſkilfull in the law are of the peace, the other both of the peace and quorum, otherwiſe called of Dier and Determiner, ſo that the firſt haue authoritie onelie to heare, the other to heare and determine ſuch matters as are brought vnto their preſence. Theſe alſo do direct their warrants to the keepers of the gailes within their limitations, for the ſafe keeping of ſuch offendors as they ſhall iudge worthie to commit vnto their cuſtodie there to be kept vnder ward, vntill the great aſſiſes, to the end their cauſes may be further examined before the reſidue of the countie, & theſe officers were firſt deuiſed about the eighteene yeare of Edward the third, as I haue beene informed.

Iuſtices of peax & quorum.

They meeting alſo & togither with the ſhiriffes, do hold their aforeſaid ſeſſions at foure times in the yeare, whereof they are called quarter ſeſſions, and herein they inquire of ſundrie treſpaſſes, and the common annoiances of the kings liege people, and diuerſe other things, determining vpon them as iuſtice doth require. There are alſo a third kind of ſeſſions holden by the high conſtables and bailiffes afore mentioned, called petie ſeſſions, wherein the weights and meaſures are peruſed by the clarke of the market for the countie, who ſitteth with them. At theſe meetings alſo victuellers, and in like ſort ſeruants, labourers, roges, and runnagates are often reformed for their exceſſes, although the burning of vagabounds through their eare be referred to the quarter ſeſſions or higher courts of aſſiſe, where they are iudged either to death, if they be taken the third time, & haue not ſince their ſecond apprehenſion applied themſelues to labour, or elſe to be ſet perpetuallie to worke in an houſe erected in euerie ſhire for that purpoſe, of which puniſhment they ſtand in greateſt feare.

Quarter ſeſſions.

Petie ſeſſions.

I might here deliuer a diſcourſe of ſundrie rare cuſtomes and courts, ſurnamed barons, yet maintained and holden in England: but for ſomuch as ſome of the firſt are beaſtlie, and therefore by the lords of the ſoiles now liuing conuerted into monie, being for the moſt part deuiſed in the beginning either by malicious or licentious women, in meere contempt and ſlaunſh abuſe of their tenants, vnder pretenſe of ſome puniſhment due for their exceſſes, I paſſe ouer to bring them vnto light, as alſo the remembrance of ſundrie courts baron likewiſe holden in ſtrange maner; yet none more abſurd and far from law than are kept yearlie at Kings hill in Rochford, and therefore may well be called a lawleſſe court, as moſt are that were deuiſed vpon ſuch occaſions. This court is kept vpon wedneſdaie inſuing after Michaelmaſſe daie after midnight, ſo that it is begun and ended before the riſing of the ſunne. When the tenants alſo are altogither in an alehouſe, the ſteward ſecretlie ſtealeth from them with a lanterne vnder his cloke, and goeth to the Kings hill, where ſitting on a mole hill he calleth them with a verie ſoft voice, writing their appearance vpon a peece of paper with a cole, hauing none other light than that which is incloſed in the lanterne: ſo ſone as the tenants alſo do miſſe the ſteward, they runne to the hill with all their might, and there anſwer all at once, Here here, whereby they eſcape their amercements: which they ſhould not do if he could haue called ouer his bill of names before they had miſſed him in the alehouſe. And this is the verie forme of the court deuiſed at the firſt (as the voice goeth) vpon a rebellion made by the tenants of the honour of Raibie againſt their lord, in perpetuall memorie of their diſobedience ſhewed. I could beſide this ſpeake alſo of ſome other, but ſith one hath taken vpon him to collect a number of them into a particular treatiſe, I thinke it ſufficient for me to haue ſaid ſo much of both.

And thus much haue I thought good to ſet downe generallie of the ſaid counties and their maner of gouernance, although not in ſo perfect order as the cauſe requireth, becauſe that of all the reſt there is nothing wherewith I am leſſe acquainted than with our tempozall regiment, which (to ſaie truth) ſmallie concerneth my calling. What elſe is to be added after the ſeuerall ſhires of England with their ancient limits (as they agreed with the diuiſion of the land in the time of Ptolomie and the Romans) and commodities yet extant, I reſerue vnto that excellent treatiſe of my freend W. Cambden, who hath trauelled therein verie farre, & whoſe worke written in Latine ſhall in ſhort time (I hope) be publiſhed, to the no ſmall benefit of ſuch as will read and peruſe the ſame.

Of degrees of people in the common-wealth of England.

Chap. 5.

WE in England diuide our people commonlie into foure ſorts, as gentlemen, citizens or burgeſſes, yeomen, which are artificers, or labozers. Of gentlemen the firſt and cheefe (next the king) be the prince, dukes, marqueſſes, earls, viſcounts, and barons: and theſe are called gentlemen of the greater ſort, or (as our common vſage of ſpeech is) lords and noblemen; and next vnto them be knights, eſquiers, and laſt of all they that are ſimplie called gentlemen; ſo that in effect our gentlemen are diuided into their conditions, whereof in this chapter I will make particular rehearſall.

The

Prince. Duke. Marquell Earle. Viſcont. Baron.

Prince. The title of prince doth peculiarlie belong with vs to the kings eldeſt ſonne, who is called prince of Wales, and is the heire apparant to the crowne; as in France the kings eldeſt ſonne hath the title of Dolphine, and is named peculiarlie Monſieur. So that the prince is ſo termed of the Latine word Princeps, ſith he is (as I may call him) the cheefe or principall next the king. The kings yonger ſonnes be but gentlemen by birth (till they haue receiued creation or donation from their father of higher eſtate, as to be either viſconts, earles, or dukes) and called after their names, as lord Henrie, or lord Edward, with the addition of the word Grace, properlie aſſigned to the king and prince, and now alſo by cuſtome conueied to dukes, archbiſhops, and (as ſome ſaie) to marqueſſes and their wiues.

Duke. The title of duke commeth alſo of the Latine word Dux, à ducendo, becauſe of his valor and power ouer the armie: in times paſt a name of office due to the emperour, conſull, or cheefe gouernour of the whole armie in the Romane warres: but now a name of honor, although periſhed in England, whoſe ground will not long beare one duke at once; but if there were manie as in time paſt, or as there be now earles, I do not thinke but that they would florith and proſper well inough.

Marqueſſe. In old time he onelie was called marqueſſe, Qui habuit terram limitaneam, a marching prouince vpon the enimies countries, and thereby bound to keepe and defend the frontiers. But that alſo is changed in common vſe, and reputed for a name of great honor nert vnto the duke, euen ouer counties, and ſometimes ſmall cities, as the prince is pleaſed to beſtow it.

Earle. The name of earle likewiſe was among the Romans a name of office, who had Comites ſacri palatij, comites ærarij, comites ſtabuli, comites patrimonij, largitionum, ſcholarum, commerciorum, and ſuch like. But at the firſt they were called Comites, which were ioined in commiſſion with the proconſull, legate, or iudges for counſell and aids ſake in each of thoſe ſeuerall charges. As Cicero epiſtola ad Quintum fratrem remembreth, where he ſaith; Atque inter hos quos tibi comites, & adiutores negotiorum publicorum dedit ipſa reſpublica duntaxat finibus his præſtabis, quos ante præſcripſi, &c. After this I read alſo that euerie preſident in his charge was called Comes, but our Engliſh Saxons vſed the word Hertoch and earle for Comes, and indifferentlie as I gelle, ſith the name of duke was not in vſe before the conqueſt. Goropius ſaith, that Comes and Viſcont. Graue is all one, to wit the viſcont, called either Procomes, or Vicecomes: and in time paſt gouerned in the countie vnder the earle, but now without anie ſuch ſeruice or office, it is alſo become a name of dignitie next after the earle, and in degree before the baron. His releefe alſo by the great charter is one hundred pounds, as that of a baronie a hundred marks, and of a knight fiue at the moſt for euerie fee.

Baron. The baron, whoſe degree anſwered to the dignitie of a ſenator in Rome, is ſuch a free lord as hath a lordſhip or baronie, whereof he beareth his name, & hath diuerſe knights or freeholders holding of him, who with him did ſerue the king in his wars, and held their tenures in Baronia, that is, for performance of ſuch ſeruice. Theſe Bracton (a learned writer of the lawes of England in king Henrie the thirds time) tearmeth Barones, quaſi robur belli. The word Baro indeed is older than that it may eaſilie be found from whence it came: for euen in the oldeſt hiſtories both of the Germans and Frenchmen, written ſince the conqueſt, we read of barons, and thoſe are at this daie called among the Germans Liberi vel Ingenui, or Freihers in the Germane tong as ſome men do coniecture, or (as one ſaith) the citizens and burgeſſes of good townes and cities were called Barones. Neuertheleſſe by diligent inquiſition it is imagined, if not abſolutelie found, that the word Baro and Filius in the old Scithian or Germane language are all one; ſo that the kings children are properlie called Barones, from whome alſo it was firſt tranſlated to their kindred, and then to the nobilitie and officers of greateſt honour indifferentlie. That Baro and Filius ſignifieth one thing, it yet remaineth to be ſeene, although with ſome corruption: for to this daie, euen the common ſort do call their male children barnes here in England, eſpeciallie in the north countrie, where that word is yet accuſtomablie in vſe. And it is alſo growne into a prouerbe in the ſouth, when anie man ſuſteineth a great hinderance, to ſaie, I am beggered and all my barnes. In the Hebrue tong (as ſome affirme) it ſignifieth Filij ſolis, and what are the nobilitie in euerie kingdome but Filij or ſerui regum? But this is farre fetched, wherefore I conclude, that from henſeforth the originall of the word Baro ſhall not be anie more to ſeeke: and the firſt time that euer I red thereof in anie Engliſh hiſtorie, is in the reigne of Canutus, who called his nobilitie and head officers to a councell holden at Cirnceſter, by that name, 1030, as I haue elſe-where remembred. Howbeit the word Baro doth not alwaies ſignifie or is attributed to a noble man by birth or creation, for now and then it is a title giuen vnto one or other with his office, as the cheefe or high tribune of the exchekir is of cuſtome called lord cheefe baron, who is as it were the great or principall receiuer of accounts nert vnto the lord treaſuror, as they are vnder him are called Tribuni ærarij, & rationales. Herevnto I may adſo much of the word lord, which is an addition going not ſeldome and in like ſort with ſundrie offices, and to continue ſo long as he or they do execute the ſame, and no longer.

Biſhops. Vnto this place I alſo referre our biſhops, who are accounted honourable, called lords, and hold the ſame rome in the parlement houſe with the barons, albeit for honour ſake the right hand of the prince is giuen vnto them, and whoſe countenances in time paſt were much more glorious than at this preſent it is, becauſe thoſe luſtie prelats ſought after earthlie eſtimation and authoritie with farre more diligence than after the loſt ſheepe of Chriſt, of which they had ſmall regard, as men being otherwiſe occupied and void of leiſure to attend vpon the ſame. Howbeit in theſe daies their eſtate remaineth no leſſe reuerend than before, and the more vertuous they are that be of this calling, the better are they eſteemed with high and low. They reteine alſo the ancient name (lord) ſtill, although it be not a little impugned by ſuch as loue either to heare of change of all things, or can abide no ſuperiours. For notwithſtanding it be true, that in reſpect of function, the office of the elderſhip is equallie diſtributed betweene the biſhop and the miniſter, yet for ciuill gouernements ſake, the firſt haue more authoritie giuen vnto them by kings and princes, to the end that the reſt maie thereby be with more eaſe reteined within a limited compaſſe of vniformitie, than otherwiſe they would be, if ech one were ſuffered to walke in his owne course. This alſo is more to be maruelled at, that verie manie call for an alteration of their eſtate, crieng to haue the word lord abolliſhed, their ciuill authoritie taken from them, and the preſent condition of the church in other things reformed; whereas to ſaie trulie, few of them do agree vpon forme of diſcipline and gouernement of the church ſuccedent: wherein they reſemble the Capuans, of whome Liuie doth ſpeake in the ſlaughter of their ſenat. Neither is it poſſible to frame a whole monarchie after the patterne of one towne or citie, or to stirre vp such an exquisite face of the church as we imagine or desire, sith our corruption is such that it will neuer yéeld to so great perfection: for that which is not able to be performed in a priuat house, will much lesse be brought to passe in a common-wealth and kingdome, before such a prince be found as Xenophon describeth, or such an orator as Tullie hath deuised. But whither am I digressed from my discourse of bishops, whose estates dw daily decaie, & suffer some diminution? Herein neuertheles their case is growne to be much better than before, for whereas in times past the cleargie men were feared bicause of their authoritie and seuere gouernment vnder the prince, now are they beloued generallie for their painefull diligence dailie shewed in their functions and callings, except peraduenture of some hungrie wombes, that couet to plucke & snatch at the lose ends of their best commodities; with whom it is (as the report goeth) a common guise, when a man is to be preferred to an ecclesiasticall liuing, what part thereof he will first forgo and part with to their vse. Finallie, how it standeth with the rest of the clergie for their places of estate, I neither can tell nor greatlie care to know. Neuertheless with what degrées of honour and worship they haue béene matched in times past Iohannes Bohemus in his De omnium gentium moribus, and others dw erpresse; and this also found beside their reports, that in time past euerie bishop, abbat, and pelting prior were placed before the earles and barons in most statutes, charters, and records made by the prince, as maie also appeare in the great charter, and sundrie yeares of Henrie the third, wherein no duke was heard of. But as a number of their odious comparisons and ambitious titles are now decaied and worthilie shronke in the wetting, so giuing ouer in these daies to mainteine such pompous vanitie, they dw thinke it sufficient for them to preach the word, & hold their liuings to their sées (so long as they shall be able) from the hands of such as indeuour for their owne preferrement to fléece and diminish the same. This furthermore will I adde generallie in commendation of the cleargie of England, that they are for their knowlege reputed in France, Portingale, Spaine, Germanie and Polonia, to be the most learned diuines, although they like not anie thing at all of their religion: and thereto they are in deed so skilfull in the two principall tongs, that it is accounted a maime in anie one of them, not to be exactlie séene in the Græke and Hebrue, much more then to be vterlie ignorant or nothing conuersant in them. As for the Latine tong it is not wanting in anie of the ministerie, especiallie in such as haue bene made within this twelue or fourtéene yeares, whereas before there was small choise, and manie cures were left vnserued, bicause they had none at all. And to saie truth, our aduersaries were the onelie causers hereof. For whilest they made no further accompt of their priesthod, than to construe, sing, read their seruice and their portesse, it came to passe that vpon examination had, few made in quéene Maries daies, and the later end of king Henrie, were able to to dw anie more, and verie hardlie so much, so void were they of further skill, and so vnapt to seruc at all.

De Asia, cap. 12

No Græke, no grace.

Bene con, bene can, bene le.

Dukes, marquesses, earles, viscounts, and barons, either be created of the prince, or come to that honor by being the eldest sonnes or highest in succession to their parents. For the eldest sonne of a duke during his fathers life is an erle, the eldest sonne of an erle is a baron, or sometimes a viscont, according as the creation is. The creation I call the originall donation and condition of the honour giuen by the prince for good seruice done by the first ancestor, with some aduancement, which with the title of that honour is alwaies giuen to him and his heires males onelie. The rest of the sonnes of the nobilitie by the rigor of the law be but esquiers: yet in common speech all dukes and marquesses sonnes, and earles eldest sonnes be called lords, the which name commonlie doth agrée to none of lower degrée than barons, yet by law and vse these be not estéemed barons.

Duke, marquesse, earle, viscont.

Barons.

The baronie or degrée of lords doth answer to the degrée of senators of Rome (as I said) and the title of nobilitie (as we vse to call it in England) to the Romane Patricij. Also in England no man is commonlie created baron, except he maie dispend of yearelie reuenues a thousand pounds, or so much as maie fullie mainteine & beare out his countenance and port. But viscounts, erles, marquesses, and dukes exceed them according to the proportion of their degrée & honour. But though by chance he or his sonne haue lesse, yet he kéepeth this degrée: but if the decaie be excessiue and not able to mainteine the honour, as Senatores Romani were amoti à senatu: so sometimes they are not admitted to the vpper house in the parlement although they kéepe the name of lord still, which can not be taken from them vpon anie such occasion. The most of these names haue descended from the French inuention, in whose histories we shall read of them eight hundred yeares passed.

Of the second degrée of gentlemen.

This also is worthie the remembrance, that Otto the first emperour of that name, indeuouring to restore the decaied estate of Italie vnto some part of hir pristinate magnificence, did after the French example giue Dignitates & prædia to such knights and souldiers as had serued him in the warres, whom he also adorned with the names of dukes, marquesses, earles, valuasors or capteins, and valuasines.

Prædia.

His Prædia in like maner were tributes, tolles, portage, bankage, stackage, coinage, profits by saltpits, milles, water-courses (and whatsoeuer emoluments grew by them) & such like. But at that present I read not that the word Baro was brought into those parts. And as for the valuasors, it was a denomination applied vnto all degrées of honor vnder the first three (which are properlie named the kings capteins) so that they are called Maiores, minores, & minimi valuasores. This also is to be noted, that the word capteine hath two relations, either as the possessor therof hath it from the prince, or from some duke, marquesse, or earle, for each had capteins vnder them. If from the prince, then are they called Maiores valuasores, if from anie of his three péeres, then were they Minores valuasores: but if anie of these valuasors dw substitute a deputie, those are called Minimi valuasores, and their deputies also valuasini, without regard vnto which degrée the valuasor doth apperteine: but the word valuasor is now growne out of vse, wherefore it sufficeth to haue said thus much of that function.

Valuasores.

Knights be not borne, neither is anie man a knight by succession, no not the king or prince: but they are made either before the battell, to incourage them the more to aduenture & trie their manhod: or after the battell ended, as an aduancement for their courage and prowesse alreadie shewed (& then are they called Milites;) or out of the warres for some great seruice done, or for the singular vertues which dw appeare in them, and then are they named Equites aurati, as common custome intendeth. They are made either by the king himselfe, or by his commission and roiall authoritie giuen for the same purpose: or by his lieutenant in the warres. This order séemeth to answer in part to that which the Romans called Equitum Romanorum. For as Equites Romani were chosen Ex censu, that is, according to their substance and riches; so be knights in England most commonlie according to their yearelie reuenues or aboundance of riches, wherewith to mainteine their estates. Yet all that had Equestrem censum, were not chosen to be knights, and no more be all made knights in England that may spend a knights lands, but they onelie whome the prince will honour. Sometimes diuerse ancient gentlemen, bargesses, and lawiers, are called vnto knighthood by the prince, and neuertheles refuse to take that state vpon them, for which they are of custome punished by a fine, that redoundeth vnto his cofers, and to saie truth, is oftentimes more profitable vnto him than otherwise their seruice should be, if they did yeeld vnto knighthood. And this also is a cause, wherefore there be manie in England able to dispend a knights liuing, which neuer come vnto that countenance, and by their owne consents. The number of the knights in Rome was also vncerteine: and so is it of knights likewise with vs, as at the pleasure of the prince. And whereas the Equites Romani had Equum publicum of custome bestowed vpon them, the knights of England haue not so, but beare their owne charges in that also, as in other kind of furniture, as armorie meet for their defense and seruice. This neuertheles is certeine, that who so may dispend 40 pounds by the yeare of free land, either at the coronation of the king, or mariage of his daughter, or time of his dubbing, may be inforced vnto the taking of that degree, or otherwise paie the reuenues of his land for one yeare, which is onelie fortie pounds by an old proportion, and so for a time be acquited of that title. We name him knight in English that the French call Cheualier, and the Latins Equitem, or Equestris ordinis virum. And when any man is made a knight, he kneeling downe is striken of the king or his substitute with his sword naked vpon the backe or shoulder, the prince crieng, Soyez cheualier au nom de Dieu. And when he riseth vp the king saith Exaudiances bon cheualier. This is the maner of dubbing knights at this present, and the tearme (dubbing) is the old tearme for that purpose among[st] creation, howbeit in our time the word (making) is most in vse among the common sort.

that

Knights of the bath.

At the coronation of a king or queene, there be other knights made with longer and more curious ceremonies, called knights of the bath. But how soeuer one be dubbed or made knight, his wife is by and by called madame or ladie, so well as the barons wife; he himselfe hauing added to his name in common appellation this syllable Sir, which is the title whereby we call our knights in England. His wife also of courtesie so long as the liueth is called my ladie, although she happen to marie with a gentleman or man of meane calling, albeit that by the cõmon law she hath no such prerogatiue. If hir first husband also be of better birth than hir second, though this later likewise be a knight, yet in that she pretendeth a priuilege to vse no honor through courtesie yelded to hir ser, she will be named after the most honorable or worshipfull of both, which is not seene elsewhere.

Knights of the garter.

The other order of knighthood in England, and the most honorable is that of the garter, instituted by king Edward the third, who after he had gained manie notable victories, taken king Iohn of France, and king James of Scotland (and kept them both prisoners in the Tower of London at one time) expelled king Henrie of Castile the bastard out of his realme, and restored Don Petro vnto it (by the helpe of the prince of Wales and duke of Aquitaine his eldest sonne called the Blacke prince) he then inuented this societie of honour, and made a choise out of his owne realme and dominions, and throughout all christendome of the best, most excellent and renowmed persons in all vertues and honour, and adorned them with that title to be knights of his order, giuing them a garter garnished with gold and pretious stones, to weare dailie on the left leg ouer the hose a little, gowne, robe, chaperon, collar, and other solemne and magnificent apparell, both of riche and fashion exquisite: because he meant it should be as to so high and princelie an order appertained. Of this companie also he and his successors kings and queenes of England, be the soueraignes, and the rest by certeine statutes and lawes amongst themselues be taken as brethren and fellowes in that order, to the number of six and twentie, as I find in a certeine treatise written of the same, an example whereof I haue here inserted word for word, as it was deliuered vnto me, beginning after this maner.

Round table.

I might at this present make a long tractation of the round table and estate of the knights thereof, erected sometimes by Arthur the great monarch, of this Iland; and thereunto intreat of the number of his knights, and ceremonies belonging to the order, but I thinke in so doing that I should rather set downe the latter inuentions of other men, than a true description of such ancient actions as were performed in deed. I could furthermore with more facilitie describe the roialtie of Charles the great & his twelue peeres, with their solemne rites and vsages: but vnto this also I haue no great deuotion, considering the truth hereof is now so stained with errours and fables inserted into the same by the leiuy religious sort, that except a man should professe to lie with them for company, there is little sound knowledge to be gathered hereof worthie the remembrance. In like maner diuerse aswell subiects as princes haue attempted to restore againe a round table in this land (as for example Roger lord Mortimer, at Kilingworth) but such were the excessiue charges appertaining thereunto (as they did make allowance) and so great molestation dailie insued there vpon, besides the breeding of sundrie quarels among the knights, and such as resorted hitherto, from forreine countries (as it was first vsed) that in fine they gaue it ouer, and suffered their whole inuentions to perish and decaie, till Edward the third deuised an other order not so much pestered with multitude of knights as the round table, but much more honorable for princelie port and countenance, as shall appeare hereafter.

Roger Mortimer.

The order of the garter therefore was deuised in the time of king Edward the third, and (as some write) vpon this occasion. The queenes maiestie then liuing, being departed from his presence the next waie toward hir lodging, he following some after happened to find hir garter, which slacked by chance and so fell from hir leg, vnespied in the throng by such as attended vpon hir. His grooms & gentlemen also passed by it, disdaining to stoope and take vp such a trifle: but he knowing the owner, commanded one of them to state and reach it vp to him. Why and like your grace (saieth a gentleman) it is but some womans garter that hath fallen from hir as she followed the queenes maiestie. What soeuer it be (quoth the king) take it vp and giue it me. So when he had receiued the garter, he said to such as stood about him; You my maisters do make small account of this blue garter here (and therewith held it out) but if God lend me life for a few moneths, I will make the proudest of you all to reuerence the like. And euen vpon this slender occasion he gaue himselfe to the deuising of this order. Certes I haue not read of anie thing, that hauing had so simple a begining hath growne in the end to so great honour and estimation. But to proceed. After he had studied awhile about the performances of his deuise, and had set downe such orders as he himselfe inuented concerning the same, he proclamed a roiall feast to be holden at Windsore, whither all his nobilitie resorted with their ladies, where he published his institution, and forthwith inuested an appointed number into the afore said fellowship, whose names insue, himselfe being the soueraigne and principall of that companie. Next vnto himselfe also he placed

Edward prince of Wales.	S. Thomas Holland.
Henrie duke of Lancaster.	Sir Iohn Geale.
N. earle of Warw.	Sir Rich. Fitzsimon.
N. Lord de Boudie.	Sir Miles Stapleton.
N. earle of Stafford.	Sir Thomas Wale.
N. earle of Sarum.	Sir Hugh Wrotesley.
N. Lord Mortimer.	Sir Neale Lording.
Sir Iohn Lisle.	Sir Iohn Chandos.
Sir Bartholomew Burwash.	S. Iames Dawdleie.
N. sonne of sir Iohn Beauchamp.	Sir Otho Holland.
Sir N. de Mahun.	Sir Henrie Emc.
S. Hugh Courtneie.	Sir Sanchet Dambricourt.
	Sir Walter Pannell alias Paganell.

Election. What order of election, and what statutes were presented vnto the elected at this first institution, as yet I can not exactlie vnderstand; neither can I learne what euerie prince afterward added thereunto before the fir and thirtith yeare of king Henrie the eight, and third of king Edward the first: wherefore of necessitie I must resort vnto the estate of the said order as it is at this present, which I will set downe briefelie as I may. When anie man therefore is to be elected (vpon a roome found void for his admission) into this fellowship, the king directeth his letters vnto him, notwithstanding that he before hand be nominated to the same, to this effect. Right trustie and welbeloued we greete you well, asserteining you, that in consideration aswell of your approued trustie and fidelitie, as also of your courageous and valiant acts of knighthood, with other your probable merits shewne by experience in sundrie parties and behalfes: we with the companions of the noble order of the Garter, assembled at the election holden this date within our manour of N. haue elected and chosen you amongst other to be one of the companions of the said Order, as your deserts do condigneli require. Wherefore we will that with conuenient diligence vpon the sight herof, you repaire vnto our presence, there to receiue such things as to the said order apperteineth. Dated vnder our signet at our maner of N. &c. These letters are the exemplification of certeine, which (as it should seeme) were written An. 3. Edwardi sexti at Greenewich Aprilis 24, vnto the earle of Huntingdon, & the lord George Cobham your lordships honorable father, at such time as they were called vnto the aforesaid companie. I find also these names subscribed vnto the same.

Edward duke of Somerset vncle to the king.	L. Russell lord priuie seale.
The marq. of Northhampton.	L. S. Iohn lord great master.
Earle of Arundell L. Chamberleine.	Sir Iohn Gage.
Earle of Shrewesburie.	S. Anthonie Wingfield.
	Sir William Paget.

Admission. Being elected, preparation is made for his installing at Windsore (the place appointed alwaies for this purpose) whereat it is required that his banner be set vp, of two yardes and a quarter in length, and three quarters in bredth, besides the fringe. Secondlie his sword of what soeuer length him seemeth good. Thirdlie his helme, which from the charnell vpwards ought to be of three inches at the least. Fourthlie the creast, with mantels to the helme belonging, of such conuenient stuffe and bignesse, as it shall please him to appoint.

Item a plate of armes at the backe of his stall, and creast with mantels and beasts supportant, to be grauen in the metrall.

Item lodging scutcheons of his armes, inuironned with a garter, and painted in paper or cloth of buckram, which when he trauelleth by the waie are to be fixed in the common Inns where he doth lodge, as a testimonie of his presence and estate from time to time as he did trauell.

Item two mantels, one to remaine in the college at Windsore, the other to vse at his pleasure, with the scutcheon of the armes of S. George in the garter with laces, tasselets, and knops of blue silke and gold belonging to the same.

Item a surcote or gowne of red or crimosine veluet, with a hood of the same, lined with white sarcenet or damaske.

Item a collar of the garter of thirtie ounces of gold Troie weight.

Item a tablet of S. George, richlie garnished with precious stones or otherwise.

Item a garter for his (left) leg, hauing the buckle and pendant garnished with gold.

Item a booke of the statutes of the said order.

Item a scutcheon of the armes of S. George in the garter to set vpon the mantell. And this furniture is to be prouided against his installation.

When anie knight is to be installed, he hath with his former letters, a garter sent vnto him, and when he commeth to be installed, he is brought into the chapter house, where incontinentlie his commission is read before the soueraigne, or his deputie, and the assemblie present: from hence he is lead by two knights of the said order, accompanied with the other of the nobilitie, and officers toward the chappell, hauing his mantell borne before him, either by a knight of the order, or else the king at armes, to whome it secondarilie apperteineth to beare it. This mantell shall be deliuered vnto him for his habit, after his oth taken before his stall, and not before: which done, he shall returne vnto the chapter house, where the soueraigne, or his deputie, shall deliuer him his collar, and so he shall haue the full possession of his habit. As for his stall, it is not giuen according vnto the calling and countenance of the receiuer, but as the place is that happeneth to be void, so that each one called vnto this knighthood (the soueraigne, and emperours, and kings, and princes alwaies excepted) shall haue the same seat, which became void by the death of his predecessor, howsoeuer it fall out: whereby a knight onlie oftentimes doth sit before a duke, without anie murmuring or grudging at his roome, except it please the soueraigne, once in his life onelie to make a generall alteration of those seats, and to set each one according to his degree.

Stall.

Now as touching the apparell of these knights, it remaineth such as king Edward, the first deuiser of this order left it, that is to saie, euerie yeare one of the colours, that is to say, scarlet, sanguine in grain, blue and white. In like sort the kings grace hath at his pleasure the content of cloth for his gowne and hood, lined with white satine or damaske, and multitude of garters with letters of gold.

The prince hath fiue yardes of cloth for his gowne and hood, and garters with letters of gold at his pleasure, beside fiue timber of the finest mineuer.

A timber containeth fortie skins, pelts, or felles.

A duke hath fiue yardes of woollen cloth, fiue timber of mineuer, 120 garters with title of gold.

A marques hath fiue yards of woollen cloth, fiue timber of mineuer, 110 garters of silke.

An earle fiue yardes of woollen cloth, fiue timber of mineuer, and 100 garters of silke.

A viscount fiue yardes of woollen cloth, fiue timber ber of mineuer, 90 garters of silke.

A baron siue yardes of woollen cloth, three timber of mineuer gresle, 80 garters of silke.

A banneret siue yards of woollen cloth, three timber of mineuer, 70 garters of silke.

A knight siue yards of woollen cloth, three timber of mineuer, 60 garters of silke.

The bishop of Winchester chapleine of the garter, hath eight and twentie timber of mineuer pure, ninetéene timber gresle, three timber and a halfe of the best, and foure & twentie yards of woollen cloth.

The chancellor of the order siue yards of woollen cloth, three timber of mineuer pure.

The register of the order siue yardes of woollen cloth, three timber of mineuer pure. And this order to be holden generallie among the knights of this companie, which are six and twentie in number, and whose patrone in time of superstition was supposed to be S. George, of whome they were also called S. Georges knights as I haue heard reported. Would to God they might be called knights of honor, or by some other name, for the title of saint George argueth a wrong patrone.

Installation. Furthermore at his installation he is solemnelie sworne, the manor whereof I haue thought good also to anner, in this maner. You being chosen to be one of the honorable companie of the order of the Garter, shall promise and sweare vpon the holie euangelies by you bodilie touched, to be faithfull and true to the kings maiestie, and to obserue and keepe all the points of the statutes of the said order, and euerie article in them conteined, the same being agréeable and not repugnant to the kings highnesse other godlie procédings, so far as to you belongeth & apperteineth, as God you helpe, &c. And thus much haue I thought good to note touching the premisses.

Estatutes. As touching the estatutes belonging to this order they are manie, and therefore not to be touched here. Howbeit if anie doubt doo arise aboue the interpretation of them, the king who is the perpetuall souereigne of that order hath to determine and resolue the same. Neither are anie chosen thereunto vnder the degrée of a knight, and that is not a gentelman of bloud and of sound estimation.

Mantell.

Stall.

Gentleman of bloud. And for the better vnderstanding what is meant by a gentleman of bloud, he is defined to descend of three descents of noblenesse, that is to saie, of name and of armes both by father and mother.

Degrées of reproch. There are also foure degrées of reproch, which may inhibit from the entrance into this order: of which the first is heresie lawfullie proued, the second high treason, the third is flight from the battell, the fourth riot and prodigall excesse of expenses, whereby he is not likelie to hold out, and mainteine the port of knight of this order, according to the dignitie thereof.

Apparell. Moreouer touching the wearing of their aforesaid apparell, it is their custome to weare the same, when they enter into the chappell of S. George or be in the chapter house of their order, or finallie doo go about anie thing apperteining to that companie. In like sort they weare also their mantels vpon the euen of S. George, and go with the souereigne, or his deputie in the same in maner of procession from the kings great chamber vnto the chappell, or vnto the college, and likewise backe againe vnto the aforesaid place, not putting it from them, vntill supper be ended, and the auoid done. The next daie they resort vnto the chappell also in the like order, & from thence vnto diner, wearing afterward their said apparell vnto euening praier, and likewise all the super time, vntill the auoid be finished. In the solemnitie likewise of these feasts, the thirteene chanons there, and six and twentie poore knights haue mantels of the order, whereof those for the chanons are of Purrcie with a roundell of the armes of S. George, the other of red, with a scutcheon onelie of the said armes.

A timber containeth fortie skins, pelts, or feiles.

Sicke or absent. If anie knight of this order be absent from this solemnitie vpon the euen and daie of S. George, and be inforced not to be present either through bodilie sickenesse, or his absence out of the land: he doth in the church, chappell, or chamber where he is remaining, prouide an honorable stall for the kings maiestie in the right hand of the place with a cloth of estat, and cushions, and scutchon of the garter, and therein the armes of the order. Also his owne stall of which side soeuer it be distant from the kings or the emperours in his owne place, appointed so nigh as he can, after the maner and situation of his stall at Windsore, there to remaine, the first euening praier on the euen of S. George, or three of the clocke, and likewise the next daie during the time of the diuine seruice, vntill the morning praier, and the rest of the seruice be ended: and to weare in the meane time his mantell onelie, with the George and the lace, without either whod, collar or surcote. Or if he be so sicke that he doo keepe his bed, he doth vse to haue that habit laid vpon him during the times of diuine seruice aforesaid.

Offering. At the seruice time also vpon the morrow after S. George, two of the chiefe knights (sauing the deputie of the souereigne if he himselfe be absent) shall offer the kings banner of armes, then other two the sword with the hilts forwards, which being done the first two shall returne againe, and offer the helme and crest, hauing at each time two heralds of armes going before, according to the statutes. The lord deputie or lieutenant vnto the kings grace, for the time being, alone and assisted with one of the chiefe lords, doth deliuer at his offering a péece of gold, and hauing all the king of armes and heralds going before him, he so procéedeth to the offering. When he hath thus offered for the prince, he returneth with like solemnitie vnto his stall, and next of all goeth againe with one herald to offer for himselfe, whose oblation being made, euerie knight according to their stals, with an herald before him procéedeth to the offering.

Buriall. What solemnitie is vsed at the burial of anie knight of the Garter, it is but in vaine to declare: wherefore I will shew generallie what is done at the disgrading of one of these knights, if through anie grieuous offense he be separated from this companie. Whereas otherwise the signe of the order is neuer taken from him vntill death doo end & finish vp his daies. Therefore when anie such thing is done, promulgation is made therof after this maner insuing.

Disgrading. Be it knowne vnto all men that N. N. knight of the most noble order of the Garter, is found giltie of the abhominable and detestable crime of high treason, for he hath most traitorouslie conspired against our most high and mightie prince souereigne of the said order, contrarie to all right, his dutie, and the faithfull oth, which he hath sworne and taken. For which causes therefore he hath deserued to be deposed from this noble order, and fellowship of the Garter. For it may not be suffered that such a traitor and disloiall member remaine among the faithfull knights of renowmed stomach & bountifull prowes, or that his armes should be mingled with those of noble chiualrie. Wherefore our most excellent prince and supreme of this most honorable order, by the aduise and counsell of his collegues, willeth and commandeth that his armes which he before time hath deserued shall be from henceforth be taken awaie and throwne downe: and he himselfe cleane cut off from the societie of this renowmed order, and neuer from this daie reputed anie more for a member of the same, that all other by his example may hereafter beware how they commit the like trespasse, or fall into ſuch notorious infamie and rebuke. This notice being giuen, there reſorteth vnto the partie to be diſgraded certeine officers with diuerſe of his late fellowes appointed, which take from him his George, and other inueſtiture, after a ſolemne maner.

And hitherto of this moſt honorable order, hoping that no man will be offended with me, in vttering thus much. For ſith the noble order of the Toiſon Dor or golden fléece, with the ceremonies apperteining vnto the creation and inueſtiture of the ſir and thirtie knights thereof: and likewiſe that of ſaint Michaell and his one and thirtie knights, are diſcourſed vpon at large by the hiſtoriographers of their owne countries, without reprehenſion or checke, eſpecially by Vincentius Lupan lib. 1. de Mag. Franc. cap. de equitibus ordinis, where he calleth them Cheualliers ſans reproche, and thereto addeth that their chaine is commonlie of two hundred crownes at the leaſt, and honour thereof ſo great, that it is not lawfull for them to ſell, giue, or laie the ſame to morgage (would to God they might once breake their name, Sans reproche, but their generall deling in our time with all men, will not ſuffer ſome of the beſt of their owne countries to haue that opinion of them) I truſt I haue not giuen anie cauſe of diſpleaſure, briefelie to ſet forth thoſe things that apperteine vnto our renowmed order of the Garter, in whoſe compaſſe is written commonlie, Honi ſoit qui mal y penſe, which is ſo much to ſaie, as, Euill come to him that euill thinketh: a verie ſharpe imprecation, and yet ſuch as is not contrarie to the word, which promiſeth like meaſure to the meter, as he doth mete to others.

*Some think that this was the anſwer of the queene, when the king aſked what men would thinke of hir, in loſing the garter after ſuch a maner.

There is yet an other order of knights in England called knights Bannerets, who are made in the field with the ceremonie of cutting awaie the point of his penant of armes, and making it as it were a banner, ſo that being before but a bacheler knight, he is now of an higher degree, and allowed to diſplaie his armes in a banner as barrons do. Howbeit theſe knights are neuer made but in the warres, the kings ſtandard being vnfolded.

Bannerets.

Eſquire (which we call commonlie ſquire) is a French word, and ſo much in Latine as Scutiger vel armiger, and ſuch are all thoſe which beare armes, or armoires, teſtimonies of their race from whence they be deſcended. They were at the firſt cofferels or bearers of the armes of barons, or knights, & thereby being inſtructed in martiall knowledge, had that name for a dignitie giuen to diſtinguiſh them from common ſouldiers called Gregarij milites when they were togither in the field.

Eſquire.

Gentlemen be thoſe whome their race and blood, or at the leaſt their vertues do make noble and knowne. The Latines call them Nobiles & generoſos, as the French do Nobles or Gentlehommes. The etymologie of the name expoundeth the efficacie of the word: for as Gens in Latine betokeneth the race and ſurname: ſo the Romans had Cornelios, Sergios, Appios, Curios, Papyrios, Scipiones, Fabios, Æmilios, Iulios, Brutos, &c: of which, who were Agnati, and therefore kept the name, were alſo called Gentiles, gentlemen of that or that houſe and race.

Gentlemen.

Moreouer as the king doth dubbe knights, and createth the barons and higher degrees, ſo gentlemen whoſe anceſtors are not knowen to come in with William duke of Normandie (for of the Saxon races yet remaining we now make none accompt, much leſſe of the Britiſh iſſue) do take their beginning in England, after this maner in our times. Whoſoeuer ſtudieth the lawes of the realme, who ſo abideth in the vniuerſitie giuing his mind to his booke, or profeſſeth phyſicke and the liberall ſciences, or beſide his ſeruice in the roome of a capteine in the warres, or good counſell giuen at home, whereby his common-wealth is benefited, can liue without manuell labour, and thereto is able and will beare the port, charge, and countenance of a gentleman, he ſhall for monie haue a cote and armes beſtowed vpon him by heralds (who in the charter of the ſame do of cuſtome pretend antiquitie and ſeruice, and manie gaie things) and thereunto being made ſo good cheape be called maſter, which is the title that men giue to eſquiers and gentlemen, and reputed for a gentleman euer after. Which is ſo much the leſſe to be diſalowed of, for that the prince doth loſe nothing by it, the gentleman being ſo much ſubiect to tares and publike paiments as is the yeoman or huſbandman, which he likewiſe doth beare the gladlier for the ſauing of his reputation. Being called alſo to the warres (for with the gouernment of the common-wealth he medleth litle) what ſoeuer it coſt him, he will both arraie & arme himſelfe accordinglie, and ſhew the more manly courage, and all the tokens of the perſon which he repreſenteth. No man hath hurt by it but himſelfe, who peraduenture will go in wider buſkens than his legs will beare, or as our prouerbe ſaith, now and then beare a bigger ſaile than his boat is able to ſuſteine.

Lawiers ſtudents in vniuerſities. Phyſicians. Capteins.

Certes the making of new gentlemen bred great ſtrife ſometimes amongſt the Romans, I meane when thoſe which were Noui homines, were more allowed of for their vertues newlie ſéene and ſhewed, than the old ſmell of ancient race, latelie defaced by the cowardiſe & euill life of their nephues & defendants could make the other to be. But as enuie hath no affinitie with iuſtice and equitie, ſo it forceth not what language the malicious do giue out, againſt ſuch as are exalted for their wiſdomes. This neuertheleſſe is generallie to be reprehended in all eſtates of gentilitie, and which in ſhort time will turne to the great ruine of our countrie, and that is the vſuall ſending of noblemens & meane gentlemens ſonnes into Italie, from whence they bring home nothing but méere atheiſme, infidelitie, vicious converſation, & ambitious and proud behauiour, wherby it commeth to paſſe that they returne far worſſe men than they went out. A gentleman at this preſent is newlie come out of Italie, who went thither an earneſt proteſtant, but comming home he could ſaie after this maner: Faith & truth is to be kept, where no loſſe or hindrance of a further purpoſe is ſuſteined by holding of the ſame; and forgiueneſſe onelie to be ſhewed when full reuenge is made. Another no leſſe forward than he, at his returne from thence could ad thus much; He is a fole that maketh accompt of anie religion, but more fole that will loſe ante part of his wealth, or will come in trouble for conſtant leaning to ante: but if he yéeld to loſe his life for his poſſeſſion, he is ſtark mad, and worthie to be taken for moſt fole of all the reſt. This gaie bootie gate theſe gentlemen by going into Italie, and hereby a man may ſée what fruit is afterward to be loked for, where ſuch bloſſoms do appéere. I care not (ſaith a third) what you talke to me of God, ſo as I may haue the prince & the lawes of the realme on my ſide. Such men as this laſt, are eaſilie knowen; for they haue learned in Italie, to go vp and downe alſo in England, with pages at their héeles finelie apparelled, whoſe face and countenance ſhall be ſuch as ſheweth the maſter not to be blind in his choiſe. But leaſt I ſhould offend too much, I paſſe ouer to ſaie ante more of theſe Italionates and their demeanor, which alas is too open and manifeſt to the world, and yet not called into queſtion.

Citizens and burgeſſes haue next place to gentlemen, who be thoſe that are free within the cities, and are of ſome likelie ſubſtance to beare office in the ſame. But theſe citizens or burgeſſes are to ſerue

the commonwealth in their cities and boroughs, or in corporat townes where they dwell. And in the common aſſemblie of the realme wherein our lawes are made, for in the counties they beare but little ſwaie (which aſſemblie is called the high court of parlement) the ancient cities appoint foure, and the boroughs two burgeſſes to haue voices in it, and giue their conſent or diſſent vnto ſuch things as paſſe or ſtaie there in the name of the citie or borow, for which they are appointed.

Merchants. In this place alſo are our merchants to be inſtalled, as amongſt the citizens (although they often change eſtate with gentlemen, as gentlemen do with them, by a mutuall conuerſion of the one into the other) whole number is ſo increaſed in theſe our daies, that their onelie maintenance is the cauſe of the exceeding prices of forreine wares, which otherwiſe when euerie nation was permitted to bring in hir owne commodities, were farre better cheape and more plentifullie to be had. Of the want of our commodities here at home, by their great tranſportation of them into other countries, I ſpeake not, ſith the matter will eaſilie bewraie it ſelfe. Certes among the Lacedemonians it was found out, that great numbers of merchants were nothing to the furtherance of the ſtate of the commonwealth: wherefore it is to be wiſhed that the huge heape of them were ſomewhat reſtreined, as alſo of our lawiers, ſo ſhould the reſt liue more eaſilie vpon their owne, and few honeſt chapmen be brought to decaie, by breaking of the bankerupt. I do not denie but that the nauie of the land is in part mainteined by their traffike, and ſo are the high prices of wares kept vp now they haue gotten the onelie ſale of things, vpon pretenſe of better furtherance of the common-wealth into their owne hands: whereas in times paſt when the ſtrange bottoms were ſuffered to come in, we had ſugar for foure pence the pound, that now at the writing of this treatiſe is well worth halfe a crowne, raiſons or corints for a penie that now are holden at ſix pence, and ſometime at eight pence and ten pence the pound: nutmegs at two pence halfe penie the ounce: ginger at a penie an ounce, prunes at halfe penie farding: great raiſons three pound for a penie, cinamon at foure pence the ounce, cloues at two pence, and pepper at twelue, and ſixteene pence the pound. Whereby we may ſée the ſequele of things not alwaies but verie ſeldome to be ſuch as is pretended in the beginning. The wares that they carrie out of the realme, are for the moſt part broade clothes and carſies of all colours, likewiſe cottons, freeſes, rugs, tin, woll, our beſt beere, baies, buſſian, mockadoes tufted and plaine, raſh, lead, fells, &c: which being ſhipped at ſundrie ports of our coaſts, are borne from thence into all quarters of the world, and there either exchanged for other wares or readie monie: to the great gaine and commoditie of our merchants. And whereas in times paſt their cheeſe trade was into Spaine, Portingall, France, Flanders, Danſke, Norwaie, Scotland, and Iſeland onelie: now in theſe daies, as men not contented with theſe iournies, they haue ſought out the eaſt and weſt Indies, and made now and then ſuſpicious voiages not onelie vnto the Canaries, and new Spaine, but likewiſe into Cathaia, Moſcouia, Tartaria, and the regions thereabout, from whence (as they ſaie) they bring home great commodities. But alas I ſée not by all their trauell that the prices of things are anie whit abated. Certes this enormitie (for ſo I do accompt of it) was ſufficientlie prouided for, An. 9 Edward 3. by a noble eſtatute made in that behalfe, but vpon what occaſion the generall execution thereof is ſtaied or not called on, in good ſooth I cannot tell. This onelie I know, that euerie function and ſeuerall vocation ſtriueth with other, which of them ſhould haue all the water of commoditie run into hir owne ceſterne.

Citizens and burgeſſes.

Yeomen. Yeomen are thoſe, which by our law are called Legales homines, free men borne Engliſh, and may diſpend of their owne free land in yearelie reuenue, to the ſumme of fortie ſhillings ſterling, or ſix pounds as monie goeth in our times. Some are of the opinion by Cap. 2. Rich. 2. an. 20. that they are the ſame which the French men call varlets, but as that phraſe is vſed in my time it is farre vnlikelie to be ſo. The truth is that the word is derived from the Saxon terme Zeoman or Geoman, which ſignifieth (as I haue read) a ſettled or ſtaid man, ſuch I meane as being maried and of ſome yeares, betaketh himſelfe to ſtaie in the place of his abode for the better maintenance of himſelfe and his familie, whereof the ſingle ſort haue no regard, but are likelie to be ſtill fleeting now hither now thither, which argueth want of ſtabilitie in determination and reſolution of iudgement, for the execution of things of anie importance. This ſort of people haue a certeine preheminence, and more eſtimation than labourers & the common ſort of artificers, & theſe commonlie liue wealthilie, keepe good houſes, and trauell to get riches. They are alſo for the moſt part farmers to gentlemen (in old time called Pagani, & opponuntur militibus, and therfore Perſius calleth himſelfe Semipaganus) or at the leaſt wiſe artificers, & with graſing, frequenting of markets, and keeping of ſeruants (not idle ſeruants as the gentlemen do, but ſuch as get both their owne and part of their maſters liuing) do come to great welth, in ſomuch that manie of them are able and do buie the lands of vnthriftie gentlemen, and often ſetting their ſonnes to the ſchooles, to the vniuerſities, and to the Ins of the court; or otherwiſe leauing them ſufficient lands whereupon they may liue without labour, do make them by thoſe meanes to become gentlemen: theſe were they that in times paſt made all France afraid. And albeit they be not called maſter as gentlemen are, or ſir as to knights apperteineth, but onelie John and Thomas, &c: yet haue they borne ſound to haue done verie good ſeruice: and the kings of England in foughten battels, were wont to remaine among them (who were their ſotmen) as the French kings did amongſt their horſſemen: the prince thereby ſhewing where his chiefe ſtrength did conſiſt.

Engliſhmen on foot and Frenchmen on horſſebacke beſt.

Capite cenſi or Proletarij. The fourth and laſt ſort of people in England are daie labourers, poore huſbandmen, and ſome retailers (which haue no free land) copie holders, and all artificers, as tailers, ſhomakers, carpenters, brickmakers, maſons, &c. As for ſlaues and bondmen we haue none, naie ſuch is the priuilege of our countrie by the eſpeciall grace of God, and bountie of our princes, that if anie come hither from other realms, ſo ſone as they ſet foot on land they become ſo free of condition as their maſters, whereby all note of ſeruile bondage is vtterlie remoued from them, wherein we reſemble (not the Germans who had ſlaues alſo, though ſuch as in reſpect of the ſlaues of other countries might well be reputed free, but) the old Indians and the Tapzobanes, who ſuppoſed it a great iniurie to nature to make or ſuffer them to be bond, whome ſhe in hir wonted courſe doth produce and bring forth free. This fourth and laſt ſort of people therefore haue neither voice nor authoritie in the common wealth, but are to be ruled, and not to rule other: yet they are not altogither neglected, for in cities and corporat townes, for default of yeomen they are faine to make vp their inqueſts of ſuch maner of people. And in villages they are commonlie made churchwardens, ſidemen, aleconners, now and then conſtables, and manie times inioie the name of hedbozoughes. Unto this ſozt alſo may our great ſwarmes of idle ſeruing men be referred, of whome there runneth a pzouerbe; Yong ſeruing men old beggers, bicauſe ſeruice is none heritage. Theſe men are pzofitable to none, foz if their condition be well peruſed, they are enimies to their maſters, to their frænds, and to themſelues: foz by them oftentimes their maſters are incouraged vnto vnlawfull exactions of their tenants, their frænds bzought vnto pouertie by their rents inhanced, and they themſelues bzought to confuſion by their owne pzodigalitie and errozs, as men that hauing not wherewith of their owne to mainteine their exceſſes, doo ſearch in high waies, budgets, cofers, males, and ſtables, which way to ſupplie their wants. Yow diuerſe of them alſo coueting to beare an high ſaile doo inſinuate themſelues with yong gentlemen and noble men newlie come to their lands, the caſe is too much apparant, whereby the good natures of the parties are not onelie a little impaired, but alſo their liuelihoods and reuenues ſo waſted and conſumed, that if at all yet not in manie yeares they ſhall be able to recouer themſelues. It were verie good therefoze that the ſuperfluous heapes of them were in part diminiſhed. And ſith neceſſitie inforceth to haue ſome, yet let wiſdome moderate their numbers, ſo ſhall their maſters be rid of vnneceſſarie charge, and the common wealth of manie théeues. No nation cheriſheth ſuch ſkoze of them as we doo here in England, in hope of which maintenance manie giue themſelues to idleneſſe, that otherwiſe would be bzought to labour, and liue in ozder like ſubiects. Of their whozedomes I will not ſpeake anie thing at all, moze than of their ſwearing, yet is it found that ſome of them doo make the firſt a chæfe piller of their building, conſuming not onlie the goods but alſo the health & welfare of manie honeſt gentlemen, citizens, wealthie yeomen, &c: by ſuch vnlawfull dealings. But how farre haue I wanded in this point, oz how farre may I ſaile in ſuch a large ſea: I will therefoze now ſtaie to ſpeake anie moze of thoſe kind of men. In returning therefoze to my matter, this furthermoze among other things I haue to ſaie of our huſbandmen and artificers, that they were neuer ſo excellent in their trades as at this preſent. But as the wozkemanſhip of the later ſozt was neuer moze fine and curious to the eie, ſo was it neuer leſſe ſtrong and ſubſtantiall foz continuance and benefit of the buiers. Neither is there anie thing that hurteth the common ſozt of our artificers moze than haſt, and a barbarous oz ſlauiſh deſire to turne the penie, and by ridding their wozke to make ſpédie vtterance of their wares: which inforceth them to bungle vp and diſpatch manie things they care not how ſo they be out of their hands, whereby the buier is often ſoze defrauded, and findeth to his coſt, that haſt maketh waſt, accozding to the pzouerbe.

Oh how manie trades and handicrafts are now in England, whereof the common wealth hath no néed: how manie néedfull commodities haue we which are perfected with great coſt, &c: and yet may with farre moze eaſe and leſſe coſt be pzouided from other countries if we could vſe the meanes. I will not ſpeake of iron, glaſſe, and ſuch like, which ſpoile much wood, and yet are bzought from other countries better chépe than we can make them here at home, I could exemplifie alſo in manie other. But to leaue theſe things and pzocéed with our purpoſe, and herein (as occaſion ſerueth) generallie by waie of concluſion to ſpeake of the common-wealth of England, I find that it is gouerned and mainteined by thzée ſozts of perſons.

1 The pzince, monarch, and head gouernour, which is called the king, oz (if the crowne fall to the woman) the quéene: in whoſe name and by whoſe authoritie all things are adminiſtred.

2 The gentlemen, which be diuided into two ſozts, as the baronie oz eſtate of lozds (which conteineth barons and all aboue that degree) and alſo thoſe that be no lozds, as knights, eſquiers, & ſimple gentlemen, as I haue noted alreadie. Out of theſe alſo are the great deputies and high pzeſidents choſen, of which one ſerueth in Ireland, as another did ſometime in Calis, and the capteine now at Berwike; as one lozd pzeſident doth gouerne in Wales, and the other the nozth parts of this Iland, which later with certeine councellozs and iudges were erected by king Henrie the eight. But foꝛſomuch as I haue touched their conditions elſewhere, it ſhall be inough to haue remembzed them at this time.

3 The third and laſt ſozt is named the yeomanrie, of whom & their ſequele, the labourers and artificers, I haue ſaid ſomewhat euen now. Whereto I ad that they be not called maſters and gentlemen, but godmen, as godman Smith, godman Cot, godman Cozneil, godman Malcall, godman Cockſwet, &c: & in matters of law theſe and the like are called thus, Giles Jewd yeoman, Edward Mountfozd yeoman, James Cocke yeoman, Herrie Butcher yeoman, &c: by which addition they are exempt from the vulgar and common ſozts. Cato calleth them Aratores & optimos ciues rei publicæ, of whom alſo you may read moze in the booke of common wealth which ſir Thomas Smith ſometime penned of this land.

Of gentlemen alſo ſome are by the pzince choſen, and called to great offices in the common wealth, of which ſaid offices diuerſe concerne the whole realme; ſome be moze pziuat and peculiar to the kings houſe. And they haue their places and degrées, pzeſcribed by an act of parlement made An. 31 Henr. octaui, after this maner inſuing.

Theſe foure the lozd Chancellor, the lozd Treaſuroz (who is Supremus aerarij Anglici quæſtor oz Tribunus ærarius maximus) the lozd Pzeſident of the councell, and the lozd Pziuie ſeale, being perſons of the degrée of a baron oz aboue, are in the ſame act appointed to ſit in the parlement and in all aſſemblies oz councell aboue all dukes, not being of the bloud roiall, Videlicet the kings bzother, vncle, oz nephue.

And theſe ſix, the lozd great Chamberleine of England: the lozd high Conſtable of England: the lozd Marſhall of England: the lozd Admirall of England: the lozd great maſter oz Steward of the kings houſe: and the lozd Chamberleine: by that act are to be placed in all aſſemblies of councell, after the lozd pziuie ſeale, accozding to their degrées and eſtats: ſo that if he be a baron, then he is to ſit aboue all barons: oz an earle aboue all earles.

And ſo likewiſe the kings ſecretarie, being a baron of the parlement, hath place aboue all barons, and if he be a man of higher degrée, he ſhall ſit and be placed accozding thereunto.

Of the food and diet of the Engliſh.

Chap. 6.

THe ſituation of our region, lieng nére vnto the north, doth cauſe the heate of our ſtomaches to be of ſomewhat greater force: therefore our bodies do craue a little more ample nouriſhment, than the inhabitants of the hotter regions are accuſtomed withall, whoſe digeſtiue force is not altogither ſo vehement, becauſe their internall heat is not ſo ſtrong as ours, which is kept in by the coldneſſe of the aire, that from time to time (ſpecially in winter) doth enuiron our bodies.

It is no maruell therefore that our tables are oftentimes more plentifullie garniſhed than thoſe of other nations, and this trade hath continued with vs euen ſince the verie beginning. For before the Romans found out and knew the waie vnto our countrie, our predeceſſors fed largelie vpon fleſh and milke, whereof there was great aboundance in this Ile, becauſe they applied their chéefe ſtudies vnto paſturage and féeding. After this maner alſo did our Welſh Britons order themſelues in their diet ſo long as they liued of themſelues, but after they became to be vnited and made equall with the Engliſh they framed their appetites to liue after our maner, ſo that at this daie there is verie little difference betwéene vs in our diets.

In Scotland likewiſe they haue giuen themſelues (of late yeares to ſpeake of) vnto verie ample and large diet, wherein as for ſome reſpect nature doth make them equall with vs: ſo otherwiſe they far exceéd vs in ouer much and diſtemperate gormandize, and ſo ingroſſe their bodies that diuerſe of them do oft become vnapt to anie other purpoſe than to ſpend their times in large tabling and bellie chéere. Againſt this pampering of their carcaſſes doth Hector Boetius in his deſcription of the countrie verie ſharpelie inueigh in the firſt chapter of that treatiſe. Hentie Wardlaw alſo biſhop of S. Andrewes, noting their vehement alteration from competent frugalitie into exceſſiue gluttonie, to be brought out of England with James the firſt (who had béene long time priſoner there vnder the fourth & fift Henries, and at his returne caried diuerſe Engliſh gentlemen into his countrie with him, whome he verie honorablie preferred there) doth vehementlie exclame againſt the ſame in open parlement holden at Perth 1433, before the three eſtats, and ſo bringeth his purpoſe to paſſe in the end by force of his learned perſuaſions, that a law was preſentlie made there for the reſtreint of ſuperfluous diet, amongeſt other things baked meats (diſhes neuer before this mans daies ſeene in Scotland) were generallie ſo prouided for by vertue of this act, that it was not lawfull for anie to eat of the ſame vnder the degree of a gentleman, and thoſe onelie but on high and feſtiuall daies, but alas it was ſone forgotten.

In old time theſe north Britons did giue themſelues vniuerſallie to great abſtinence, and in time of warres their ſouldiers would often feed but once or twiſe at the moſt in two or three daies (eſpecially if they held themſelues in ſecret, or could haue no iſſue out of their bogges and mariſſes, through the preſence of the enimie) and in this diſtreſſe they vſed to eat a certeine kind of confection, whereof ſo much as a beane would qualifie their hunger aboue common expectation. In woods moreouer they liued with hearbes and rotes, or if theſe ſhifts ſerued not thorough want of ſuch proviſion at hand, then vſed they to creepe into the water or ſaid moriſh plots vp vnto the chins, and there remaine a long time, onelie to qualifie the heats of their ſtomachs by violence, which otherwiſe would haue wrought and beene readie to oppreſſe them for hunger and want of ſuſtinance. In thoſe daies likewiſe it was taken for a great offenſe ouer all, to eat either goſe, hare, or henne, bicauſe of a certeine ſuperſtitious opinion which they had conceiued of thoſe three creatures, howbeit after that the Romans (I ſaie) had once found an entrance into this Iland, it was not long yer open ſhipwracke was made of this religious obſeruation, ſo that in proceſſe of time, ſo well the north and ſouth Britons as the Romans, gaue ouer to make ſuch difference in meats, as they had done before.

From thenceforth alſo vnto our daies, and euen in this ſeaſon wherein we liue, there is no reſtreint of anie meat, either for religions ſake or publike order in England, but it is lawfull for euerie man to feed vpon what ſoeuer he is able to purchaſe, except it be vpon thoſe daies whereon eating of fleſh is eſpeciallie forbidden by the lawes of the realme, which order is taken onelie to the end our numbers of cattell may be the better increaſed, & that aboundance of fiſh which the ſea yeldeth, more generallie receiued. Beſide this there is great conſideration had in making of this law for the preſeruation of the nauie, and maintenance of conuenient numbers of ſea faring men, both which would otherwiſe greatlie decaie, if ſome meanes were not found whereby they might be increaſed. But how ſoeuer this caſe ſtandeth, white meats, milke, butter & cheeſe, which were neuer ſo deere as in my time, and wont to be accounted of as one of the chiefe ſtaies throughout the Iland, are now reputed as food appertinent onelie to the inferiour ſort, whileſt ſuch as are more wealthie, do feed vpon the fleſh of all kinds of cattell accuſtomed to be eaten, all ſorts of fiſh taken vpon our coaſts and in our freſh riuers, and ſuch diuerſitie of wild and tame foules as are either bred in our Iland or brought ouer vnto vs from other countries of the maine.

In number of diſhes and change of meat, the nobilitie of England (whoſe cookes are for the moſt part muſicall headed Frenchmen and ſtrangers) do moſt exceed, ſith there is no daie in maner that paſſeth ouer their heads, wherein they haue not onelie beefe, mutton, veale, lambe, kid, porke, conie, capon, pig, or ſo manie of theſe as the ſeaſon yeeldeth: but alſo ſome portion of the red or fallow deere, beſide great varietie of fiſh and wild foule, and thereto ſundrie other delicates wherein the ſweet hand of the ſeafaring Portingale is not wanting: ſo that for a man to dine with one of them, and to taſt of euerie diſh that ſtandeth before him (which few vſe to do, but each one feedeth vpon that meat him beſt liketh for the time, the beginning of euerie diſh notwithſtanding being reſerued vnto the greateſt perſonage that ſitteth at the table, to whome it is drawen vp ſtill by the waiters as order requireth, and from whome it deſcendeth againe euen to the lower end, whereby each one may taſt thereof) is rather to yeeld vnto a conſpiracie with a great deale of meat for the ſpeedie ſuppreſſion of naturall health, then the vſe of a neceſſarie meane to ſatiſfie himſelfe with a competent repaſt, to ſuſteine his bodie withall. But as this large feeding is not ſeene in their geſts, no more is it in their owne perſons, for ſith they haue dailie much reſort vnto their tables (and manie times vnlooked for) and thereto reteine great numbers of ſeruants, it is veris requiſit & expedient for them to be ſomewhat plentifull in this behalfe.

The chiefe part likewiſe of their dailie proviſion is brought in before them (commonlie in ſiluer veſſell if they be of the degree of barons, biſhops and vpwards) and placed on their tables, wherof when they haue taken what it pleaſeth them, the reſt is reſerued, and afterward ſent downe to their ſeruing men and waiters, who feed thereon in like ſort with conuenient moderation, their reuerſion alſo being beſtowed vpon the poore, which lie readie at their gates in great numbers to receiue the ſame. This is ſpoken of the principall tables whereat the nobleman, his ladie and gueſtes are accuſtomed to ſit, beſide which they haue a certeine ordinarie allowance dailie appointed for their hals, where the chiefe officers and houſehold ſeruants (for all are not permitted by cuſtome to wait vpon their maſter) and with them ſuch inferiour gueſtes do feed as are not of calling to aſſociat the noble man himſelfe (ſo that beſides thoſe afore mentioned, which are called to the principall table, there are commonlie fortie or three ſcore perſons fed in thoſe hals, to the great reliefe of ſuch poore ſuitors and ſtrangers alſo as oft be partakers thereof and otherwiſe like to dine hardlie. As for drinke it is vſuallie filled in pots, gobblets, iugs, bols of ſiluer in noble mens houſes, alſo in fine Venice glaſſes of all formes, and for want of theſe elſewhere in pots of earth of ſundrie colours and moulds whereof manie are garniſhed with ſiluer) or at the leaſt wiſe in pewter, all which notwithſtanding are ſeldome ſet on the table, but each one as neceſſitie vrgeth, calleth for a cup of ſuch drinke as him liſteth to haue: ſo that when he hath taſted of it he deliuered the cup againe to ſome one of the ſtanders by, who making it cleane by pouring out the drinke that remaineth, reſtoreth it to the cupbord from whence he fetched the ſame. By this deuiſe (a thing brought vp at the firſt by Mneſteus of Athens, in conſeruation of the honour of Oreſtes, who had not yet made expiation for the death of his adulterous parents Egiſtus and Clitemneſtra) much idle tipling is furthermore cut off, for if the full pots ſhould continuallie ſtand at the elbow or neere the trencher, diuerſe would alwaies be dealing with them, whereas now they drinke ſeldome and onelie when neceſſitie vrgeth, and ſo auoid the note of great drinking, or often troubling of the ſeruitours with filling of their bols. Neuertheleſſe in the noble mens hals, this order is not vſed, neither in anie mans houſe commonlie vnder the degree of a knight or eſquire of great great reuenues. It is a woꝛld to ſée in theſe our dates, wherin gold and ſiluer moſt aboundeth, how that our gentilitie as lothing thoſe mettals (bicauſe of the plentie) do now generallie chooſe rather the Venice glaſſes both foꝛ our wine and béere, than anie of thoſe mettals oꝛ ſtone wherein before time we haue béene accuſtomed to dꝛinke, but ſuch is the nature of man generallie that it moſt coueteth things difficult to be atteined; & ſuch is the eſtimation of this ſtuffe, that manie become rich onelie with their new trade vnto Murana (a towne néere to Venice ſituat on the Adꝛiatike ſea) from whence the verie beſt are dailie to be had, and ſuch as foꝛ beautie do well néere match the chriſtall oꝛ the ancient Murrhina vaſa, whereof now no man hath knowledge. And as this is ſéene in the gentilitie, ſo in the wealthie communaltie the like deſire of glaſſe is not neglected, whereby the gaine gotten by their purchaſe is yet much moꝛe increaſed to the benefit of the merchant. The poꝛeſt alſo will haue glaſſe if they may, but ſith the Venecian is ſomewhat too déere foꝛ them, they content themſelues with ſuch as are made at home of ferne and burned ſtone, but in fine all go one waie, that is, to ſhards at the laſt, ſo that our great expenſes in glaſſes (beſide that they bꝛéed much ſtrife toward ſuch as haue the charge of them) are woꝛſt of all beſtowed in mine opinion, bicauſe their péeces do turne vnto no pꝛofit. If the philoſophers ſtone were once found, and one part hereof mixed with foꝛtie of molten glaſſe, it would induce ſuch a mettallicall toughneſſe thereunto, that a fall ſhould nothing hurt it in ſuch maner, yet it might peraduenture bunch oꝛ batter it, neuertheleſſe that inconuenience were quickelie to be ꝛedreſſed by the hammer. But whither am I ſlipped?

Ro. Bacon.

The gentlemen and merchants kéepe much about one rate, and each of them contenteth himſelfe with foure, fiue, oꝛ ſix diſhes, when they haue but ſmall reſoꝛt, oꝛ peraduenture with one, oꝛ two, oꝛ thrée at the moſt, when they haue no ſtrangers to accompanie them at their tables. And yet their ſeruants haue their oꝛdinaris diet aſſigned, beſide ſuch as is left at their maſters boꝛdes, & not appointed to be bꝛought thither the ſecond time, which neuertheleſſe is often ſéene generallie in veniſon, lambe, oꝛ ſome eſpeciall diſh, whereon the merchant man himſelfe liketh to feed when it is cold, oꝛ peraduenture foꝛ ſundꝛie cauſes incident to the féeder is better ſo, than if it were warme oꝛ hot. To be ſhoꝛt, at ſuch time as the merchants do make their oꝛdinarie oꝛ voluntarie feaſts, it is a woꝛld to ſée what great pꝛouiſion is made of all maner of delicat meats, from euerie quarter of the countrie, wherein beſide that they are often comparable herein to the nobilitie of the land, they will ſeldome regard anie thing that the butcher vſuallie killeth, but reiect the ſame as not woꝛthie to come in place. In ſuch caſes alſo geliſſes of all colours mixed with a varietie in the repꝛeſentation of ſundꝛie flowres, herbs, trées, foꝛmes of beaſts, fiſh, foules and fruits, and therevnto marchpaine wꝛought with no ſmall curioſitie, tarts of diuerſe hewes and ſundꝛie denominations, conſerues of old fruits foꝛren and home-bꝛed, ſuckets, codinacs, marmilats, marchpaine, ſugerbꝛead, gingerbꝛead, flozentines, wild foule, veniſon of all ſoꝛts, and ſundꝛie outlandiſh confections, altogither ſeaſoned with ſuger (which Plinie calleth Mel ex arundinibus, a deuiſe not common noꝛ greatlie vſed in old time at the table, but onelie in medicine, although it grew in Arabia, Indie & Sicilie) do generallie beare the ſwaie, beſides infinit deuiſes of our owne not poſſible foꝛ me to remember. Of the potato and ſuch venerous roots as are bꝛought out of Spaine, Poꝛtingale, and the Indies to furniſh vp our bankets, I ſpeake not, wherin our Hures of no leſſe foꝛce, and to be had about Croſbie Rauenſwath, do now begin to haue place.

But among all theſe, the kind of meat which is obteined with moſt difficultie and coſt, is commonlie taken foꝛ the moſt delicat, and therevpon each gueſt will ſoneſt deſire to feed. And as all eſtats do exceed herin, I meane foꝛ ſtrangeneſſe and number of coſtlie diſhes, ſo theſe foꝛget not to vſe the like exceſſe in wine, in ſomuch as there is no kind to be had (neither anie where moꝛe ſtoꝛe of all ſoꝛts than in England, although we haue none growing with vs but pcarelie to the pꝛopoꝛtion of 20000 oꝛ 30000 tun and vpwards, notwithſtanding the dailie reſtreints of the ſame bꝛought ouer vnto vs) whereof at great méetings there is not ſome ſtoꝛe to be had. Neither do I meane this of ſmall wines onlie, as Claret, White, Red, French, &c: which amount to about ſixtie ſix ſoꝛts, according to the number of regions from whence they come: but alſo of the thirtie kinds of Italian, Grecian, Spaniſh, Canarian, &c: whereof Meruage, Cate pument, Raſpis, Muſcadell, Romnie, Baſtard Tire, Oleie, Capꝛike, Clareie & Malmeſeie are not leaſt of all accompted of, bicauſe of their ſtrength and valure. Foꝛ as I haue ſaid in meat, ſo the ſtronger the wine is, the moꝛe it is deſired, by means whereof in old time, the beſt was called Theologicum, bicauſe it was had from the cleargie and religious men, vnto whoſe houſes manie of the laitie would often ſend foꝛ bottels filled with the ſame, being ſure that they would neither dꝛinke noꝛ be ſerued of the woꝛſt, oꝛ ſuch as was anie waies mingled oꝛ bꝛued by the vintener: naie the merchant would haue thought that his ſoule ſhould haue gone ſtreightwaie to the diuell, if he ſhould haue ſerued them with other than the beſt. Furthermoꝛe when theſe haue had their courſe which nature yéeldeth, ſundꝛie ſoꝛts of artificiall ſtuffe, as ypocras & woꝛmewood wine muſt in like maner ſucceed in their turnes, beſide ſtale ale and ſtrong béere, which neuertheleſſe beare the greateſt bꝛunt in dꝛinking, and are of ſo manie ſoꝛts and ages as it pleaſeth the bꝛuer to make them.

Béere.

The béere that is vſed at noble mens tables in their fixed and ſtanding houſes, is commonlie of a yeare old, oꝛ peraduenture of two yeares tunning oꝛ moꝛe, but this is not generall. It is alſo bꝛued in March and therefoꝛe called March béere, but foꝛ the houſehold it is vſuallie not vnder a moneths age, ech one coueting to haue the ſame ſtale as he may, ſo that it be not ſoꝛe, and his bꝛead new as is poſſible ſo that it be not hot.

Artificer.

The artificer and huſbandman make greateſt accompt of ſuch meat as they may ſoneſt come by, and haue it quickſieſt readie, except it be in London when the companies of euery trade do meet on their quarter daies, at which time they be nothing inferiour to the nobilitie. Their food alſo conſiſteth pꝛincipallie in béefe and ſuch meat as the butcher ſelleth, that is to ſaie, mutton, veale, lambe, poꝛke, &c: whereof he findeth great ſtoꝛe in the markets adioining, beſide ſouſe, bꝛawne, bacon, fruit, pies of fruit, foules of ſundꝛie ſoꝛts, cheeſe, butter, egs, &c: as the other wanteth it not at home, by his owne pꝛouiſion, which is at the beſt hand, and commonlie leaſt charge. In feaſting alſo this latter ſoꝛt, I meane the huſbandmen do exceed after their maner: eſpeciallie at bꝛidales, purifications of women, and ſuch od méetings, where it is incredible to tell what meat is conſumed & ſpent, ech one bꝛinging ſuch a diſh, oꝛ ſo manie with him as his wife & he do conſult vpon, but alwaies with this conſideration, that the léeſer fréend ſhall haue the better pꝛouiſion. This alſo is commonlie ſéene at theſe bankets, that the good man of the houſe is not charged with any thing ſauing bꝛead, dꝛink, ſauce, houſe-

rome and fire. But the artificers in cities and good townes doo deale far otherwiſe, for albeit that ſome of them doo ſuffer their lawes to go oft before their clawes, and diuerſe of them by making good cheere doo hinder themſelues and other men: yet the wiſer ſort can handle the matter well inough in theſe iunkettings, and therfore their frugalitie deſerueth commendation. To conclude, both the artificer and the huſbandman are ſufficientlie liberall, & verie freendlie at their tables, and when they meet, they are ſo merie without malice, and plaine without inward Italian or French craft and ſubtiltie, that it would doo a man good to be in companie among them. Herein onelie are the inferiour ſort ſomewhat to be blamed, that being thus aſſembled, their talke is now and then ſuch as ſauoureth of ſcurrilitie and ribaldrie, a thing naturallie incident to carters and clownes, who thinke themſelues not to be merie & welcome, if their fooliſh veines in this behalfe be neuer ſo little reſtreined. This is moreouer to be added in theſe meetings, that if they happen to ſtumble vpon a peece of veniſon, and a cup of wine or verie ſtrong beere or ale (which latter they commonlie prouide againſt their appointed daies) they thinke their cheere ſo great, and themſelues to haue fared ſo well, as the lord Maior of London, with whome when their bellies be full they will not often ſticke to make compariſon, because that of a ſubiect there is no publike officer of anie citie in Europe, that may compare in port and countenance with him during the time of his office.

I haue dined ſo well as my lord maior.

I might here talke ſomewhat of the great ſilence that is vſed at the tables of the honorable and wiſer ſort, generallie ouer all the realme (albeit that too much deſerueth no cõmendation, for it belongeth to geſts neither to be muti nor loquaces) likewiſe of the moderate eating and drinking that is dailie ſeene, and finallie of the regard that each one hath to keepe himſelfe from the note of ſurfetting and dronkennelle (for which cauſe ſalt meat, except beefe, bacon, and porke are not anie whit eſteemed, and yet theſe three may not be much powdered) but as in rehearſall thereof I ſhould commend the noble man, merchant, and frugall artificer, ſo I could not cleare the meaner ſort of huſbandmen, and countrie inhabitants of verie much babbling (except it be here and there ſome od yeoman) with whome he is thought to be the merieſt that talketh of moſt ribaldrie, or the wiſeſt man that ſpeaketh faſteſt among them, & now and then ſurfetting and dronkennelle, which they rather fall into for want of heed taking, than wilfullie following or delighting in thoſe errours of ſet mind and purpoſe. It may be that diuers of them liuing at home with hard and pinching diet, ſmall drinke, and ſome of them hauing ſcarſe inough of that, are ſoneſt ouertaken when they come vnto ſuch bankets, howbeit they take it generallie as no ſmall diſgrace if they happen to be cupſhotten, ſo that it is a greeſe vnto them though now ſans remedie ſith the thing is done and paſt. If the freends alſo of the wealthier ſort come to their houſes from farre, they are commonlie ſo welcome till they depart as vpon the firſt daie of their comming, whereas in good townes and cities, as London, &c: men oftentimes complaine of little rome, and in reward of a fat capon or plentie of beefe and mutton, largelie beſtowed vpon them in the countrie, a cup of wine or beere with a napkin to wipe their lips, and an You are hartelie welcome is thought to begreat interteinement, and therefore the old countrie clearkes haue framed this ſaieng in that behalfe, I meane vpon the interteinment of townesmens and Londoners after the daies of their aboad in this maner:

Primus iucundus, tollerabilis eſt q; ſecundus,
Tertius eſt vanus, ſed fetet quatriduanus.

The bread throughout the land is made of ſuch graine as the ſoile yeeldeth, neuertheleſſe the gentilitie commonlie prouide themſelues ſufficientlie of wheat for their owne tables, whileſt their houſehold and poore neighbours in ſome ſhires are inforced to content themſelues with rie, or barlie, pea and in time of dearth manie with bread made either of beans, peaſon, or otes, or of altogither and ſome acornes among, of which ſcourge the poreſt doo ſoneſt taſt, ſith they are leaſt able to prouide themſelues of better. I will not ſaie that this extremitie is oft ſo well to be ſeene in time of plentie as of dearth, but if I ſhould I could eaſilie bring my triall. For albeit that there be much more ground eared now almoſt in euerie place, than hath beene of late yeares, yet ſuch a price of corne continueth in each towne and market without any iuſt cauſe (except it be that landlords doo get licences to carie corne out of the land onelie to keepe vp the peeces for their owne priuate gaines and ruine of the common-wealth) that the artificer and poore laboring man, is not able to reach vnto it, but is driuen to content himſelfe with horſecorne, I meane, beanes, peaſon, otes, tares, and lintels: and therfore it is a true prouerbe, and neuer ſo well verified as now, that hunger ſetteth his firſt foot into the horſſe manger. If the world laſt a while after this rate, wheate and rie will be no graine for poore men to feed on, and ſome catterpillers there are that can ſaie ſo much alreadie.

Bread.

A famine at hand is firſt ſeene in the horſſe manger when the poore doo fall to horſſecorne.

Of bread made of wheat we haue ſundrie ſorts, dailie brought to the table, whereof the firſt and moſt excellent is the manchet, which we commonlie call white bread, in Latine Primarius panis, wherof Budeus alſo ſpeaketh, in his firſt booke De aſſe, and our good workemen deliuer commonlie ſuch proportion, that of the flower of one buſhell with another they make fortie caſt of manchet, of which euerie loſe weigheth eight ounces into the ouen and ſir ounces out, as I haue beene informed. The ſecond is the cheat or wheaten bread, ſo named becauſe the colour therof reſembleth the graie or yellowith wheat, being cleane and well drelled, and out of this is the courſeſt of the bran (vſuallie called gurgeons or pollard) taken. The raueled is a kind of cheat bread alſo, but it reteineth more of the groſſe, and leſſe of the pure ſubſtance of the wheat: and this being more ſleightlie wrought vp, is vſed in the halles of the nobilitie, and gentrie onelie, whereas the other either is or ſhould be baked in cities & good townes of an appointed ſize (according to ſuch price as the corne doth beare) and by a ſtatute prouided by king John in that behalfe. The raueled cheat therfore is generallie ſo made that out of one buſhell of meale, after two and twentie pounds of bran be ſifted and taken from it (wherevnto they ad the gurgeons that riſe from the manchet) they make thirtie caſt, euerie loſe weighing eightéene ounces into the ouen and ſirteene ounces out: and beſide this they ſo handle the matter that to euerie buſhell of meale they ad onelie two and twentie or three and twentie pound of water, waſhing alſo in ſome houſes there corne before it go to the mill, whereby their manchet bread is more excellent in colour and pleaſing to the eie, than otherwiſe it would be. The next ſort is named browne bread of the colour, of which we haue two ſorts, one baked vp as it cõmeth from the mill, ſo that neither the bran nor the floure are anie whit diminiſhed, this Celſus called Autopirus panis, lib. 2. and putteth it in the ſecond place of nouriſhment. The other hath little or no floure left therein at all, howbeit he calleth it Panem Cibarium, and it is not onlie the worſt and weakeſt of all the other ſorts, but alſo appointed in old time for ſeruants, ſlaues, and the inferiour kind of people to feed vpon.

vpon. Herevnto likewise, because it is drie and brickle in the working (for it will hardlie be made vp handsomelie into loaues) some adde a portion of rie meale in our time, whereby the rough drinelle or drie roughnes therof is somwhat qualified, & then it is named miscelin, that is, bread made of mingled corne, albeit that diuerse doo sow or mingle wheat & rie of set purpose at the mill, or before it come there, and sell the same at the markets vnder the aforesaid name.

Summer wheat and winter barlie verie rare in England.

In champeigne countries much rie and barlie bread is eaten, but especiallie where wheat is scant and geson. As for the difference that is betweene the summer and winter wheat, most husbandmen know it not, sith they are neither acquainted with summer wheat, nor winter barlei: yet here and there I find of both sorts, speciallie in the north and about Kendall, where they call it March wheat, and also of summer rie, but in so small quantities as that I dare not pronounce them to be greatlie common among vs.

Drinke.

Our drinke, whose force and continuance is partlie touched alreadie, is made of barlie, water, and hops, sodden and mingled togither, by the industrie of our bruers, in a certeine exact proportion. But before our barlie doo come vnto their hands, it sustaineth great alteration, and is conuerted into malt, the making whereof, I will here set downe in such order, as my skill therein may extend vnto (for I am scarse a good maltster) chiefelie for that forreine writers haue attempted to describe the same, and the making of our beere, wherein they haue shot so farre wide, as the quantitie of ground was betweene themselues & their marke. In the meane time beare with me, gentle reader (I beseech thee) that lead thee from the description of the plentifull diet of our countrie, vnto the fond report of a seruile trade, or rather from a table delicatelie furnished, into a muskie malthouse: but such is now thy hap, wherfore I praie thee be contented.

Malt.

Making of malt.

Our malt is made all the yeare long in some great townes, but in gentlemens and yeomens houses, who commonlie make sufficient for their owne expenses onelie, the winter halfe is thought most meet for that commoditie: howbeit the malt that is made when the willow doth bud, is commonlie worst of all, neuertheless each one indeuoureth to make it of the best barlie, which is steeped in a cesterne, in greater or lesse quantitie, by the space of three daies and three nights, vntill it be throughlie soked. This being doone, the water is drained from it by little and little, till it be quite gone. Afterward they take it out, and laieng it vpon the cleane floore on a round heape, it resteth so vntill it be readie to shote at the rot end, which maltsters call Corning. When it beginneth therefore to shot in this maner, they saie it is come, and then forthwith they spread it abroad, first thicke, and afterward thinner and thinner vpon the said floore (as it commeth) and there it lieth (with turning euerie daie foure or fiue times) by the space of one and twentie daies at the least, the workeman not suffering it in anie wise to take anie heat, whereby the bud end should spire, that bringeth forth the blade, and by which ouersight or hurt of the stuffe it selfe the malt would be spoiled, and turne small commoditie to the bruer. When it hath gone or beene turned so long vpon the floore, they carie it to a kill couered with haire cloth, where they giue it gentle heats (after they haue spread it there verie thin abroad) till it be drie, & in the meane while they turne it often, that it may be vniformelie dried. For the more it be dried (yet must it be done with soft fire) the sweeter and better the malt is, and the longer it will continue, whereas if it be not dried downe (as they call it) but slackelie handled, it will breed a kind of worme, called a wiuell, which groweth in the floure of the corne, and in processe of time will so eat out it selfe, that nothing shall remaine of the graine but euen the verie rind or huske.

The best malt is tried by the hardnelle & colour, for if it loke fresh with a yellow haw, & thereto will write like a peece of chalke, after you haue bitten a kirnell in sunder in the middest, then you may assure your selfe that it is dried downe. In some places it is dried at leisure with wood alone, or strawe alone, in other with wood and strawe togither, but of all the strawe dried, is the most excellent. For the wood dried malt when it is brued, besides that the drinke is higher of colour, it doth hurt and annoie the head of him that is not vsed thereto, because of the smoake. Such also as vse both indifferentlie doo barke, cleaue, and drie their wood in an ouen, thereby to remoue all moisture that should procure the fume, and this malt is in the second place, with the same likewise, that which is made with dried firze, brome, &c: whereas if they also be occupied greene, they are in maner so preiudiciall to the corne, as is the moist wood. And thus much of our malts, in bruing whereof some grinde the same somewhat groselie, and in seething well the liquor that shall be put vnto it, they adde to euerie nine quarters of mault one of headcorne, which consisteth of sundrie graine, as wheate, and otes ground. But what haue I to doo with this matter, or rather so great a quantitie, where with I am not acquainted. Neuertheless, sith I haue taken occasion to speake of bruing, I will exemplifie in such a proportion as I am best skilled in, because it is the vsuall rate for mine owne familie, and once in a moneth practised by my wife & hir maid seruants, who proceed withall after this maner, as she hath oft informed me.

Bruing of beere.

Hauing therefore ground eight bushels of good malt vpon our querne, where the toll is saued, she addeth vnto it halfe a bushell of wheat meale, and so much of otes small ground, and so tempereth or mixeth them with the malt, that you cannot easilie discerne the one from the other, otherwise these later would clunter, fall into lumps, and thereby become vnprofitable. The first liquor which is full eightie gallons, according to the proportion of our furnace, she maketh boiling hot, and then powreth it softlie into the malt, where it resteth (but without stirring) vntill hir second liquor be almost readie to boile. This done she letteth hir mash run till the malt be left without liquor, or at the least wise the greatest part of the moisture, which she perceiueth by the staie and soft issue thereof, and by this time hir second liquor in the furnace is ready to seeth, which is put also to the malt as the first wort also againe into the furnace wherevnto she addeth two pounds of the best English hops, and so letteth them seeth togither by the space of two houres in summer, or an houre and an halfe in winter, whereby it getteth an excellent colour, and continuance without impeachment, or anie superfluous tartnelle. But before she putteth hir first wort into the furnace, or mingleth it with the hops, she taketh out a vessell full, of eight or nine gallons, which she shutteth vp close, and suffereth no aire to come into it till it become yellow, and this she reserueth by it selfe vnto further vse, as shall appeare hereafter, calling it Wrackwort or Charwort, and as she saith it addeth also to the colour of the drinke, whereby it perteth not vnto amber or fine gold in hew vnto the eie. By this time also hir second wort is let runne, and the first being taken out of the furnace and placed to cole, she returneth the middle wort vnto the furnace, where it is striken ouer, or from whence it is taken againe, when it beginneth to boile and mashes the second time, whilest the third liquor is heat (for there are three liquors) and

this last put into the furnace, when the second is mashed againe. When she hath mashed also the last liquor (and set the second to cole by the first) she letteth it runne, and then seetheth it againe with a pound and an halfe of new hops, or peraduenture two pounds as she seeth cause by the goodnesse or basenesse of the hops, & when it hath sodden in summer two houres & in winter an houre & an halfe, she striketh it also and reserueth it vnto mixture with the rest when time doth serue therefore. Finallie when she setteth hir drinke togither, she addeth to hir brackwort or charwort halfe an ounce of arras, and halfe a quarterne of an ounce of balberries finelie powdered, and then putting the same into hir wort with an handfull of wheat flowre, she proceedeth in such vsuall order as common bruing requireth. Some in steed of arras & bales adde so much long pepper onelie, but in hir opinion and my liking it is not so good as the first, and hereof we make three hoggesheads of good beere, such (I meane) as is met for poore men as I am to liue withall, whose small maintenance (for what great thing is fortie pounds a yeare Computatis computandis able to performe) may indure no deeper cut, the charges whereof groweth in this manner. I value my malt at ten shillings, my wood at foure shillings which I buie, my hops at twentie pence, the spice at two pence, seruants wages two shillings six pence with meat and drinke, and the wearing of my vessell at twentie pence, so that for my twentie shillings I haue ten score gallons of beere or more, notwithstanding the losse in seething, which some being loth to forgo doo not obserue the time, and therefore speed thereafter in their successe, and worthilie. The continuance of the drinke is alwaie determined after the quantitie of the hops, so that being well hopped it lasteth longer. For it feedeth vpon the hop, and holdeth out so long as the force of the same continueth, which being extinguished the drinke must be spent or else it dieth, and becommeth of no value.

In this trade also our bruers obserue verie diligentlie the nature of the water, which they dailie occupie; and soile through which it passeth, for all waters are not of like goodnesse, sith the fattest standing water is alwaies the best: for although the waters that run by chalke or cledgie soiles be good, and next vnto the Thames water which is the most excellent, yet the water that standeth in either of these is the best for vs that dwell in the countrie, as whereon the sunne lieth longest, and fattest fish is bred. But of all other the fennie and moorish is the worst, and the clerest spring water next vnto it. In this businesse therfore the skilfull workeman doth redeeme the iniquitie of that element, by changing of his proportions, which trouble in ale (sometime our onelie, but now taken with manie for old and sickmens drinke) is neuer seene nor heard of. Howbeit as the beere well sodden in the bruing, and stale, is cleere and well coloured as muscadell or malueseie, or rather yellow as the gold noble as our potknights call it: so our ale which is not at all or verie little sodden, and without hops, is more thicke, fulsome, and of no such continuance, which are three notable things to be considered in that liquor. But what for that? Certes I know some aleknights so much addicted thereunto, that they will not ceasse from morow vntill euen to visit the same, clensing house after house, till they defile themselues, and either fall quite vnder the bord, or else not daring to stirre from their stooles, sit still pinking with their narrow eies as halfe sleeping, till the fume of their aduersarie be digested that he may go to it afresh. Such slights also haue the alewiues for the vtterance of this drinke, that they will mire it with rosen and salt: but if you heat a knife red hot, and quench it in the ale so neere the bottome of the pot as you can put it, you shall see the rosen come forth hanging on the knife. As for the force of salt, it is well knowne by the effect, for the more the drinker tipleth, the more he may, and so doth he carrie off a drie drunken noll to bed with him, except his lucke be the better. But to my purpose.

In some places of England, there is a kind of drinke made of apples, which they call cider or pomage, but that of peares is named pirrie, and both are ground and pressed in presses made for the nonce. Certes these two are verie common in Syller, Kent, Worcester, and other shires, where these sorts of fruits doo abound, howbeit they are not their onelie drinke at all times, but reserued vnto the delicate sorts of drinke, as metheglin is in Wales, whereof the Welshmen make no lesse accompt (and not without cause if it be well handled) than the Grecians did of their Ambrosia or Nectar, which for the pleasantnesse thereof, was supposed to be such as the gods themselues did delite in. There is a kind of swith swash made also in Essex, and diuerse other places, with honicombs and water, which the homelie countrie wiues, putting some pepper and a little other spice among, call mead, verie good in mine opinion for such as loue to be lose bodied at large, or a little eased of the cough, otherwise it differeth so much fro the true metheglin, as chalke from cheese. Trulie it is nothing else but the washing of the combes, when the honie is wrong out, and one of the best things that I know belonging thereto is, that they spend but litle labour and lesse cost in making of the same, and therefore no great losse if it were neuer occupied. Hitherto of the diet of my countrimen, & somewhat more at large peraduenture than manie men will like of, wherefore I thinke good now to finish this tractation, and so will I, when I haue added a few other things incident vnto that which goeth before, whereby the whole processe of the same shall fullie be deliuered, & my promise to my freend in this behalfe performed.

Heretofore there hath beene much more time spent in eating and drinking than commonlie is in these daies, for whereas of old we had breakefasts in the forenoone, beuerages, or nuntions after dinner, and thereto reare suppers generallie when it was time to go to rest (a toie brought into England by hardie Canutus and a custome thereof Athenæus also speaketh lib. 1, albeit Hippocrates speake but of twise at the most lib. 2. De rat. vict. in feb. ac.) Now these odd repasts thanked be God are verie well left, and each one in maner (except here and there some young hungrie stomath that cannot fast till dinner time) contenteth himselfe with dinner & supper onelie. The Normans misliking the gormandise of Canutus, ordeined after their arriuall, that no table should be couered aboue once in the daie, which Huntingdon imputeth to their auarice: but in the end either waxing wearie of their owne frugalitie, or suffering the cockle of old custome to ouergrow the good corne of their new constitution, they fell to such libertie, that in often feeding they surmounted Canutus surnamed the hardie. For whereas he couered his table but three or foure times in the daie, these spred their clothes fiue or six times, and in such wise as I before rehearsed. They brought in also the custome of long and statelie sitting at meat, whereby their feasts resembled those ancient pontificall bankets whereof Macrobius speaketh lib. 3. cap. 13. and Plin. lib. 10. cap. 10. and which for sumptuousnesse of fare, long sitting and curiositie shewed in the same, exceeded all other mens feasting, which fondnesse is not yet left with vs, notwithstanding that it proueth verie beneficiall for the physicians, who most abound, where most excesse and misgouernement of our bodies doo appeare, although although it be a great expenſe of time, and woꝛthie of repꝛehenſion. Foꝛ the nobilitie, gentlemen, and merchantmen, eſpeciallie at great mætings doo ſit commonlie till two oꝛ thꝛee of the clocke at afternoone, ſo that with manie is an hard matter, to riſe from the table to go to euening pꝛaier, and returne from thence to come time inough to ſupper. Foꝛ my part I am perſuaded that the purpoſe of the Noꝛmans at the firſt was to reduce the ancient Roman oꝛder oꝛ Daniſh cuſtome in fæding once in the daie, and toward the euening, as I haue red and noted. And indæd the Romans had ſuch a cuſtome, and likewiſe the Grecians, as may appeere by the woꝛds of Socrates, who ſaid vnto the Atheniens, Oriente ſole conſilium, occidente conuiuium eſt cogitandum, although a little ſomething was allowed in the moꝛning to yong childꝛen which we now call a bꝛeakefaſt. Plato called the Sicilians monſters, foꝛ that they vſed to eat twiſe in the daie. Among the Perſians onelie the king dined when the ſunne was at the higheſt, and ſhadow of the ſtile at the ſhoꝛteſt: the reſt (as it is repoꝛted) went alwaies but once to meat when their ſtomachs craued it, as the Canariens and Indians doo in my time (who if appetite ſerue refuſe not to go to meat at anie houre of the night) and likewiſe the ancient Caſpians. Yet Arhianus noteth it as a rare thing li. 4. cap. 16. that the Tyꝛhenians had taken vp an ill cuſtome to fæd twiſe in a daie. Howbeit at the laſt they fell generallie to allow of ſuppers toward the ſetting of the ſunne in all places, bicauſe they would haue their whole familie to go to meat togither, and wherevnto they would appoint their gueſts to come at a certeine length of the ſhadow, to be perceiued in their dials. And this is moꝛe to be noted of antiquitie, that if anie man (as Plutarch ſaith) did fæd befoꝛe that time, he incurred a note of repꝛehenſion as if he had bæne gluttonous and giuen vnto the bellie, 8. Sympoſ. 6. Their ſlaues in like ſoꝛt were glad, when it grew to the tenth foot, foꝛ then were they ſure ſome after to go to meat. In the ſcripture we read of manie ſuppers & few dinners, onelie foꝛ that dining was not greatlie vſed in Chriſts time, but taken as a thing latelie ſpꝛong vp, when pampering of the bellie began to take hold, occaſioned by idlenes and great abundance of riches. It is pꝛetie to note in Iuuenal, how he taunteth Marius foꝛ that he gaue himſelfe to dꝛinke befoꝛe the *ninth houre of the daie: foꝛ thinking thꝛee houres to be too little foꝛ the filling of his bellie, he began commonlie at eight, which was an houre too ſone. Afterwards when gurmandiſe increaſed yet moꝛe amongſt the Romans, and from them was diſperſed vnto all nations vnder their ſubiection, it came to paſſe that ſix houres onlie were appointed to woꝛke and conſult in, and the other ſix of the daie to fæd and dꝛinke in, as the verſe ſaith:

Sex horæ tantum rebus tribuantur agendis,
Viuere poſt illas, littera Zetha monet.

Whereunto Maximus Planudes (except my memoꝛie faile me) addeth this ſcholie after his maner, ſaieng that from moꝛning vnto none (which is ſix of the clocke after the vnequall accompt) each one doth trauell about his neceſſarie affaires, that being doone, he betaketh himſelfe to the refreſhing of his bodie, which is noted and ſet doowne by the Gꝛeeke letters of the diall (wherewith the Romane hoꝛologies were marked, as ours be with their numerall letters) whereby the time is deſcribed; foꝛ thoſe which point 7, 8, 9 and 10 are written with ξ η θ ι, and being ioined yeeld ξηθι, which in Engliſh ſignifieth ſo much as liue, as if they ſhould meane, eat that thou maiſt liue. But how Martial diuided his daie, and with him the whole tꝛoupe of the learned & wiſer ſoꝛt, theſe verſes following doo moꝛe euidentlie declare:

Prima ſalutantes, atque altera conſinet horas,
Exercet raucos tertia cauſidicos.
In quintam varios extendit Roma labores,
Sexta quies laſſis, ſeptima finis erit.
Sufficit in nonam nitidis octaua paleſtris,

Long ſitting repꝛehended.

That is at thꝛee of the clocke at afternoone.

Thus we ſee how the ancient maner of the Gentils was to fæd but once in the daie, and that toward night, till gluttonie grew on and altered this good cuſtome. I might here remember alſo their maner in pulling off their ſhoes when they ſat doowne to meat, whereof Martial ſaith:

Depoſui ſoleas, affertur protinus ingens
Inter lactucas oxygarumq; liber, &c.

And Tullie alſo remembꝛeth where he ſaith Seruum à pedibus ad te miſi, which office grew of the ſaid cuſtome, as Seruus ad limina did of kæping the doꝛe, though in moſt houſes both theſe were commonlie one mans office, alſo Ad pocula of attending on the cup. But bicauſe the good wꝛiters of our time haue obſerued theſe thꝛales and ſuch like with their cauſes and deſcriptions, in their infinite and ſeuerall treatiſes, I ſhall not need to diſcourſe anie farther vpon them. With vs the nobilitie, gentrie, and ſtudents, doo oꝛdinarilie go to dinner at eleuen befoꝛe none, and to ſuper at fiue, oꝛ betweene fiue and ſix at afternoone. The merchants dine and ſup ſeldome befoꝛe twelue at none, and ſix at night eſpeciallie in London. The huſbandmen dine alſo at high none as they call it, and ſup at ſeuen oꝛ eight: but out of the tearme in our vniuerſities the ſcholers dine at ten. As foꝛ the pꝛoꝛeſt ſoꝛt they generallie dine and ſup when they may, ſo that to talke of their oꝛder of repaſt, it were but a needleſſe matter. I might here take occaſion alſo to ſet doowne the varietie vſed by antiquitie in their beginnings of their diets, wherin almoſt euerie nation had a ſeuerall faſhion, ſome beginning of cuſtome (as we doo in ſummer time) with ſalets at ſuper, and ſome ending with lettice, ſome making their entrie with egs, and ſhutting vp their tables with mulberies, as we doo with fruit and conceits of all ſoꝛts. Diuerſe (as the old Romans) began with a few cꝛops of rue, as the Venetians did with the fiſh called Gobius, the Belgies with butter (oꝛ as we doo yet alſo) with butter and egs vpon fiſh daies. But whereas we commonlie begin with the moſt groſſe food, and end with the moſt delicate, the Scot thinking much to leaue the beſt foꝛ his menſall ſeruants maketh his entrance at the beſt, ſo that he is ſure therby to leaue the woꝛſt. We vſe alſo our wines by degrees, ſo that the hoteſt commeth laſt to the table, but to ſtand vpon ſuch toies would ſpend much time, and turne to ſmall pꝛofit, wherfoꝛe I will deale with other things moꝛe neceſſarie foꝛ this turne.

Of their apparell and attire.

Chap. 7.

AN Engliſhman, indeuoꝛing ſometime to wꝛite of our attire, made ſundꝛie platfoꝛmes foꝛ his purpoſe, ſuppoſing by ſome of them to find out one ſtedfaſt ground whereon to build the ſumme of his diſcourſe. But in the end (like an oꝛatour long without exerciſe) when he ſaw what a difficult peece of woꝛke he had taken in hand, he gaue ouer his trauell, and onelie dꝛue the picture of a naked man, vnto whome he gaue a paire of sheares in the one hand, and a peece of cloth in the other, to the end he should shape his apparell after such fashion as himselfe liked, sith he could find no kind of garment that could please him anie while togither, and this he called an Englishman. Certes this wꝛiter (otherwise being a lewd popish hypocrite and vngratious pꝛiest) shewed himselfe herein not to be altogether void of iudgement, sith the phantasticall follie of our nation, euen from the courtier to the carter is such, that no foꝛme of apparell liketh vs longer than the first garment is in the wearing, if it continue so long and be not laid aside, to receiue some other trinket newlie deuised by the fickle headed tailoꝛs, who couet to haue seuerall trickes in cutting, thereby to dꝛaw fond cuſtomers to moꝛe expense of monie. Foꝛ my part I can tell better how to inueigh against this enoꝛmitie, than describe anie certeintie of our attire: sithence such is our mutabilitie, that to daie there is none to the Spanish guise, to moꝛrow the French toies are most fine and delectable, yet long no such apparell as that which is after the high Alman fashion, by and by the Turkish maner is generallie best liked of, otherwise the Poꝛisco gowns, the Barbarian sleeues, the mandilion woꝛne to Collie weston ward, and the shoꝛt French bꝛeches make such a comelie vesture, that except it were a dog in a doublet, you shall not see anie so disguised, as are my countrie men of England. And as these fashions are diuerse, so likewise it is a woꝛld to see the cost linesse and the curiositie: the excesse and the vanitie: the pompe and the bꝛauerie: the change and the varietie: and finallie the ficklenesse and the follie that is in all degrees: in somuch that nothing is moꝛe constant in England than inconstancie of attire. Oh how much cost is bestowed now adaies vpon our bodies and how little vpon our soules! how manie suites of apparell hath the one and how little furniture hath the other? how long time is asked in decking vp of the first, and how little space left therin to feed the later? how curious, how nice also are a number of men and women, and how hardlie can the tailoꝛ please them in making it fit foꝛ their bodies? how manie times must it be sent backe againe to him that made it? what chafing, what fretting, what repꝛochfull language doth the poꝛe woꝛkeman beare awaie? and manie times when he doth nothing to it at all, yet when it is bꝛought home againe it is verie fit and handsome; then must we put it on, then must the long seames of our hose be set by a plumb-line, then we puffe, then we blow, and finallie sweat till we dꝛop, that our clothes may stand well vpon vs. I will saie nothing of our heads, which sometimes are polled, sometimes curled, oꝛ suffered to grow at length like womans lockes, manie times cut off aboue oꝛ vnder the eares round as by a woodden dish. Neither will I meddle with our varietie of beards, of which some are shauen from the chin like those of Turks, not a few cut shoꝛt like to the beard of marques Otto, some made round like a rubbing bꝛush, other with a pique de vant (O fine fashion!) oꝛ now and then suffered to grow long, the barbers being growen to be so cunning in this behalfe as the tailoꝛs. And therfoꝛe if a man haue a leane and streight face, a marquesse Ottons cut will make it bꝛoad and large; if it be platter like, a long slender beard will make it seeme the narrower; if he be wesell becked, then much heare left on the cheekes will make the owner loke big like a bowdled hen, and so grim as a goose, if Coꝛnelis of Chelmeresford saie true: manie old men do weare no beards at all. Some lustie courtiers also and gentlemen of courage, doo weare either rings of gold, stones, oꝛ pearle in their eares, whereby they imagine the woꝛkemanship of God not to be a little amended. But herein they rather disgrace than adoꝛne their persons, as by their niceneſſe in apparell, foꝛ which I saie most nations do not vntustlie deride vs, as also foꝛ that we do seeme to imitate all nations round about, vs wherein we be like to the Polypus oꝛ Chameleon; and therevnto bestow most cost vpon our arses, & much moꝛe than vpon all the rest of our bodies, as women doo likewise vpon their heads and shoulders. In women also it is most to be lamented, that they do now farre exceed the lightnesse of our men (who neuertheleſſe are transfoꝛmed from the cap euen to the verie shoo) and such staring attire as in time past was supposed meet foꝛ none but light housewiues onelie, is now become an habit foꝛ chast and sober matrones. What should I saie of their doublets with pendant coppeses on the bꝛest full of iags & cuts, and sleeues of sundꝛie colours? their galligascons to beare out their bums & make their attire to sit plum round (as they terme it) about them? their fardingals, and diuerslie coloured nether stocks of silke, ierdsete, and such like, whereby their bodies are rather defoꝛmed than commended? I haue met with some of these trulles in London so disguised, that it hath passed my skill to discerne whether they were men oꝛ women.

Thus it is now come to passe, that women are become men, and men transfoꝛmed into monsters: and those good gifts which almightie God hath giuen vnto vs to releeue our necessities withall (as a nation turning altogither the grace of God into wantonnesse, foꝛ

not otherwise bestowed than in all excesse, as if we will not otherwise how to consume and waſt them. I pꝛaie God that in this behalfe our sinne be not like vnto that of Sodoma and Gomoꝛha, whose eꝛꝛoꝛs were pꝛide, excesse of diet, and abuse of Gods benefits aboundantlie bestowed vpon them, beside want of charitie toward the poꝛe, and certeine other points which the pꝛophet shutteth vp in silence. Certes the common-wealth cannot be said to floꝛish where these abuses reigne, but is rather oppꝛessed by vnreasonable exactions made vpon rich farmers, and of poꝛe tenants, wherewith to mainteine the same. Neither was it euer merier with England, than when an Englishman was knowne abꝛoad by his owne cloth, and contented himselfe at home with his fine carsie hosen, and a meane slop: his coat, gowne, and cloake of bꝛowne blue oꝛ puke, with some pꝛetie furniture of veluet oꝛ furre, and a doublet of sad tawnie, oꝛ blacke veluet, oꝛ other comelie silke, without such cuts and gawdish colours as are woꝛne in these daies, and neuer bꝛought in but by the consent of the French, who thinke themselues the gaiest men, when they haue most diuersities of iagges and change of colours about them. Certes of all estates our merchants doo least alter their attire, and therefoꝛe are most to be commended: foꝛ albeit that which they weare be verie fine and costlie, yet in foꝛme and colour it repꝛesenteth a great peece of the ancient grauitie apperteining to citizens and burgesses, albeit the yonger soꝛt of their wiues both in attire and costlie housekeeping can not tell when and how to make an end, as being women in deed in whome all kind of curiositie is to be found and seene, and in farre greater measure than in women of higher calling. I might here name a soꝛt of hewes deuised foꝛ the nonce, wherewith to please phantasticall heads, as goseturd greene, pease poꝛrige tawnie, popingaie blue, lustie gallant, the diuell in the head (I should saie the hedge) and such like: but I passe them ouer thinking thinking it ſufficient to haue ſaid thus much of apparell generallie, when nothing can particularlie be ſpoken of anie conſtancie thereof.

Of the high court of parlement, and authoritie of the ſame.

Chap. 8.

IN ſpeaking of parlement lawe, I haue in the chapiter precedent ſaid ſomewhat of this high and moſt honorable court. Wherefore it ſhall not need to remember ought heere that is there touched: I will onelie ſpeake of other things therefore concerning the eſtate of aſſemblie, whereby the magnificence thereof ſhall be in ſome part better knowne vnto ſuch as ſhall come after vs. This houſe hath the moſt high and abſolute power of the realme, for thereby kings and mightie princes haue from time to time béene depoſed from their thrones, lawes either enacted or abrogated, offendors of all ſorts puniſhed, and corrupted religion either diſannulled or reformed, which commonlie is diuided into two houſes or parts, the higher or vpper houſe conſiſting of the nobilitie, including all euen vnto the baron and biſhop: the lower called the nether houſe of knights, ſquires, gentlemen, and burgeſſes of the commons, with whome alſo the inferior members of the cleargie are ioined, albeit they ſit in diuerſe places, and theſe haue to deale onelie in matters of religion, till it come that they ioine with the reſt in confirmation of all ſuch acts as are to paſſe in the ſame. For without the conſent of the three eſtates, that is, of the nobilitie, cleargie, and latetie, ſildome anie thing is ſaid to be concluded vpon, and brought vnto the prince for his conſent and allowance. To be ſhort, whatſoeuer the people of Rome did in their Centuriatis or Tribunitijs comitijs, the ſame is and may be done by authoritie of our parlement houſe, which is the head and bodie of all the realme, and the place wherein euerie particular perſon is intended to be preſent, if not by himſelfe, yet by his aduocate or atturneie. For this cauſe alſo any thing ther enacted is not to be miſliked, but obeied of all men without contradiction or grudge. By the ſpace of fortie dais, before this aſſemblie be begun, the prince ſendeth his writs vnto all his nobilitie particularlie, ſummoning them to appeare at the ſaid court. The like he doth to the ſhiriffe of euerie countie; with commandement to chooſe two knights within ech of their counties, to giue their aduiſe in the name of the ſhire, likewiſe to euerie citie and towne, that they may chooſe their burgeſſes, which commonlie are men beſt ſkilled in the ſtate of their citie or towne, either for the declaration of ſuch benefits as they want, or to ſhew which wate to reforme ſuch enormities as thorough the practiſes of ill members are practiſed and crept in among them: the firſt being choſen by the gentlemen of the ſhire, the other by the citizens and burgeſſes of euerie citie and towne, whereby that court is furniſhed. The firſt daie of the parlement being come, the lords of the vpper houſe, as well eccleſiaſticall as temporall, do attend vpon the prince, who rideth thither in perſon, as it were to open the doore of their authoritie; and being come into the place, after prayers made, and cauſes ſhewed, wherefore ſome not preſent are inforced to be abſent, each man taketh his place according to his degrée. The houſe it ſelfe is curiouſlie furniſhed with tapiſſerie, and the king being ſet in his throne, the ſpirituall lords take vp the ſide of the houſe which is on the right hand of the prince, and the temporall lords the left, I meane, ſo well dukes and earles, as viſcounts and barons, as I before remembred. In the middeſt and a petie diſtance from the prince, lie certeine ſackes ſtuffed with woll or haire, whereon the iudges of the realme, the maſter of the rols, and ſecretaries of eſtate do ſit. Howbeit theſe iudges haue no voice in the houſe, but onelie ſhew what their opinion is of ſuch & ſuch matters as come in queſtion among the lords, if they be commanded ſo to do: as the ſecretaries are to anſwer ſuch letters or things paſſed in the councell, whereof they haue the cuſtodie & knowledge. Finallie, the conſent of this houſe is giuen by each man ſeuerallie, firſt for himſelfe being preſent, then ſeuerallie for ſo manie as he hath letters & proxies directed vnto him, ſaieng onlie, Content or Not content, without anie further debating. Of the number aſſembled in the lower houſe, I haue alreadie made a generall report in the chapter precedent, and their particulars ſhall follow here at hand. Theſe therefore being called ouer by name do chooſe a ſpeaker, who is as it were their mouth, and him they preſent vnto the prince, in whom it is either to refuſe or admit him by the lord chancellor, who in the princes name doth anſwer vnto his oration, made at his firſt entrance & preſentation into the houſe, wherein he declareth the good liking that the king hath conceiued of his choiſe vnto that office & function. Being admitted, he maketh fiue requeſts vnto that honorable aſſemblie, firſt that the houſe may (as in times paſt) inioy hir former liberties and priuileges: ſecondlie, that the congregates may frankelie ſhew their minds vpon ſuch matters as are to come in queſtion: thirdlie, that if anie of the lower houſe do giue anie cauſe of offenſe during the continuance of this aſſemblie, that the ſame may inflict ſuch puniſhment vpon the partie culpable, as to the ſaid aſſemblie ſhall be thought conuenient: fourthlie, if anie doubt ſhould ariſe among them of the lower houſe, that he in their name might haue free acceſſe and recourſe vnto his maieſtie & lords of the higher houſe, to be further inſtructed and reſolued in the ſame: fiftlie and laſt, he craueth pardon for himſelfe, if in his going to and fro betweene the houſes, he forget or miſtake anie thing, requiring that he may returne and be better informed in ſuch things as he did faile in without offenſe: vnto which petitions the lord chancellor doth anſwer as apperteineth, and this is done on the firſt daie, or peraduenture the ſecond, if it could not be conueniently performed in the firſt.

Beſide the lord chancellor there is another in the vpper houſe called the clerke of the parlement, whoſe office is to read the billes. For euerie thing that commeth in conſultation in either houſe, is firſt put in writing in paper, which being read, he that liſteth riſeth vp and ſpeaketh either with it or againſt it, and ſo one after another ſo long as they ſhall thinke good; that done they go to another, and ſo to the third, &c: the inſtrument ſtill wholie or in part raced or reformed, as cauſe moueth for the amendment of the ſame if the ſubſtance be reputed neceſſarie. In the vpper houſe the lord chancellor demandeth if they will haue it ingroſſed, that is to ſaie, put in parchment, which done, it is read the third time, & after debating of the matter to and fro if the more part do conclude withall, vpon the vtterance of theſe words, Are ye contented that it be enacted or no? the clerke writeth vnderneath Soit baille aux commons, and ſo when they ſée time they ſend ſuch billes approued to the commons by ſome of them that ſit on the woll ſackes, who comming into the houſe, & demanding licence to ſpeake, do vſe this kind of words or the like to the ſpeaker, as ſir Thomas Smith doth deliuer and ſet them downe, whoſe onelie direction I vſe, and almoſt word for word in this chapter, requitting him with the like borowage as he hath vſed toward me in his diſcourſe of the ſundrie degrées of eſtates in the common-wealth of England, which (as I hope) ſhall be no diſcredit to his trauell. Maiſter ſpeaker, my lords of the vpper houſe haue paſſed amongſt them, and thinke good that there ſhould be enacted by parlement ſuch an act, and ſuch an act (reading their titles in ſuch ſort as he receiued them) they praie you therefore to conſider & ſhew your aduiſe vpon them. Which done they go their waie, and the doore being ſhut after them, the ſpeaker declareth what meſſage was ſent vnto them, and if they be then void of conſultation vpon anie other bill, he preſentlie demandeth what their pleaſures are, firſt of one, then of another, &c: which are ſolemnelie read, or their contents breéflie ſhewed and then debated vpon among them.

Of the nether houſe.

The ſpeaker ſitteth in a chaire erected ſomewhat higher than the reſt, that he may ſée and be ſéene of all men, and before him on a lower ſeat ſitteth his clerke, who readeth ſuch bils as be firſt propounded in the lower houſe, or ſent downe from the lords: for in that point each houſe hath equall authoritie to propound what they thinke méet, either for the abrogation of old or making of new lawes. All bils be thrise and on diuerſe daies read and diſputed vpon before they come to the queſtion, which is, whether they ſhall be enacted or not; and in diſcourſe vpon them, verie good order is vſed in the lower houſe, wherein he that will ſpeake giueth notice thereof by ſtanding vp bare headed. If manie ſtand vp at once (as now & then it happeneth) he ſpeaketh firſt that was firſt ſéene to moue out of his place, and telleth his tale vnto the ſpeaker, without reherſall of his name whoſe ſpeches he meaneth to confute, ſo that with a perpetuall oration & not with altercation theſe diſcourſes are continued. But as the partie confuted may not replie on that daie, ſo one man can not ſpeake twiſe to one bill in one daie though he would change his opinion, but on the next he may ſpeake againe, & yet but once as afore. No vile, ſeditious, vnreuerent or biting words are vſed in this aſſemblie, yet if anie happen to eſcape and be vttered, the partie is puniſhed according to the cenſure of the aſſemblie and cuſtome in that behalfe. In the afternoone they ſit not except vpon ſome vrgent occaſion, neither hath the ſpeaker anie voice in that houſe, wherewith to moue or diſſuade the furtherance or ſtaie of anie bill, but his office is vpon the reading thereof breéflie to declare the contents. If anie bill paſſe, which commeth vnto them from the lords, it is thus ſubſcribed, Les commons ont aſſentus: ſo if the lords agrée vpon anie bill ſent vnto them from the commons, it is ſubſcribed after this maner, Les ſeigniours ont aſſentus. If it be not agreed on after thrise reading, there is conference required and had betwéene the vpper and nether houſes, by certeine appointed for that purpoſe vpon the points in queſtion, whereupon if no finall agreement by the more part can be obteined, the bill is dalhed and reiected, or (as the ſaieng is) cleane caſt out of the doores. None of the nether houſe can giue his voice by proxie but in his owne perſon, and after the bill twiſe read, then ingroſſed and the third time read againe & diſcourſed vpon, the ſpeaker aſketh if they will go to the queſtion, whervnto if they agrée he holdeth vp the bill & ſaith; So manie as will haue this bill go forward ſaie Yea: herupon ſo manie as allow of the thing crie Yea, the other No, & as the crie is more or leſſe on either ſide, ſo is the bill to ſtaie or elſe go forward. If the number of negatiue and affirmatiue voices ſéeme to be equall, ſo manie as allow of the bill go downe withall, the reſt ſit ſtill, and being told by the poll the greater part do carrie away the matter. If ſomething be allowed and in ſome part reiected, the bill is put to certeine committées to be amended, & then being brought in againe, it is read and paſſeth or ſtaieth as the voices yéeld therto. This is the order of the paſſage of our lawes, which are not ratified till both houſes haue agréed vnto them, and yet not holden for law till the prince haue giuen his aſſent. Vpon the laſt daie therfore of the parlement or ſeſſion, the prince commeth in perſon againe into the houſe, in his robes as at the firſt. Where after thanks giuen to the prince, firſt in the name of the lords by the lord chancellor, then in the name of the commons by the ſpeaker for his great care of the welfare of his realme, &c: the lord chancellor in the princes name giueth thanks to the lords & commons likewiſe for their paines, with promiſe of recompenſe as opportunitie & occaſion ſhall ſerue therefore. This done one readeth the title of euerie act paſſed in that ſeſſion, and then it is noted vpon them what the prince doth allow of with theſe words, Le roy veult. If the prince like not of them, it is written vpon them Le roy aduiſera. And ſo thoſe acts are dalhed, as the other from thenceforth are taken and holden for law, and all imprinted except ſuch as concerne ſome priuat perſons, which are onelie exemplified vnder the ſeale of the parlement, as priuileges to his vſe. And this is the ſumme of the maner after which our parlements in England are holden, without which no forfaiture of life, member or lands of anie Engliſhman, where no law is ordeined for the ſame before hand, is auailable or can take place amongſt vs. And ſo much in maner out of the third chapiter of the ſecond booke of the common-wealth of England written by ſir Thomas Smith: vnto which I will annex a table of the counties, cities, boroughs and ports, which ſend knights, burgeſſes, and barons to the parlement houſe, and doth inſue as followeth.

Chap. 9.

Samothes.

THat Samothes or Dis gaue the first lawes to the Celtes (whose kingdome he erected about the fifteenth of Nimrote) the testimonie of Berosus is proofe sufficient. For he not onelie affirmeth him to publish the same in the fourth of Ninus, but also addeth thereto, how there liued none in his dates of more excellent wisdome, nor politike inuention than he, whereof he was named Samothes, as some other do affirme. What his lawes were, it is now altogither vnknowne, as most things of this age; but that they were altered againe at the comming of Albion, no man can absolutelie denie, sith new lords vse commonlie to giue new lawes, and conquerors abolish such as were in vse before them.

Albion.

Brute.

The like also may be affirmed of our Brute, notwithstanding that the certeine knowledge so well of the one as of the other is perished, and nothing worthie memorie left of all their doings. Somewhat yet we haue of Mulmutius, who not onelie subdued such princes as reigned in this land, but also brought the realme to good order, that long before had bene torne with ciuill discord. But where his lawes are to be found, and which they be from other mens, no man liuing in these dates is able to determine.

Mulmutius.

Certes

The praiſe of Dunwallon.

Certes, there was neuer prince in Britaine, of whome his ſubiects conceiued better hope in the beginning, than of Bladudus, and yet I read of none that made ſo ridiculous an end: in like ſort there hath not reigned anie monarch in this Ile, whoſe waies were more feared at the firſt, than thoſe of Dunwallon (king Henrie the firſt excepted) and yet in the end he proued ſuch a prince, as after his death there was in maner no ſubiect, that did not lament his funerals. And this onelie for his policie in gouernance, ſeuere adminiſtration of iuſtice, and prouident framing of his lawes and conſtitutions, for the gouernment of his ſubiects. His people alſo, coueting to continue his name vnto poſteritie, intituled thoſe his ordinances according to their maker, calling them by the name of the lawes of Mulmutius, which indured in execution among the Britons, ſo long as our homelings had the dominion of this Ile. Afterward when the comeling Saxons had once obteined the ſuperioritie of the kingdom, the maieſtie of thoſe lawes fell for a time into ſuch decaie, that although Non penitus cecidit, ſi non potuit cecidiſſe videri, as Leland ſaith, and the decrees themſelues had vtterlie periſhed in deed at the verie firſt hunt, had they not beene preſerued in Wales, where they remained amongſt the reliks of the Britons, & not onlie vntill the comming of the Normans, but euen vntill the time of Edward the firſt, who obteining the ſouereignitie of that portion, indeuoured verie earneſtlie to extinguiſh thoſe of Mulmutius, and to eſtabliſh his owne.

But as the Saxons at their firſt arriuall did what they could to aboliſh the Britiſh lawes, ſo in proceſſe of time they yelded a little to relent, & not ſo much to abhorre and miſlike of the lawes of Mulmutius, as to receiue and imbrace the ſame, eſpeciallie at ſuch time as the ſaid Saxon princes entered into amitie with the Britiſh nobilitie, and after that began to ioine in matrimonie with the Britiſh ladies, as the Britiſh barons did with the Saxon frowes, both by an eſpeciall ſtatute and decree, wherof in another treatiſe I haue made mention at large. Herof alſo it came to paſſe in the end, that they were contented to make a choiſe, and inſert no ſmall numbers of them into their owne volumes, as may be gathered by thoſe of Athelbert the great, ſurnamed king of Kent, Inas and Alfred kings of the weſt Saxons, and diuerſe other yet extant to be ſeene. Such alſo was the lateward eſtimation of them, that when anie of the Saxon princes went about to make new ordinances, they cauſed thoſe of Mulmutius (which Gildas ſometime tranſlated into Latine) to be firſt expounded vnto them, and in this peruſall if they found anie there alreadie framed, that might ſerue their turnes, they forthwith reuiued the ſame, and annexed them to their owne.

But in this dealing, the diligence of Alfred is moſt of all to be commended, who not onelie choſe out the beſt, but gathered togither all ſuch whatſoeuer the ſaid Mulmutius had made: and then to the end they ſhould lie no more in corners as forlorne bookes, and vnknowne to the learned of his kingdome, he cauſed them to be turned into the Saxon tong, wherein they continued long after his deceaſe.

As for the Normans, who for a ſeaſon neither regarded the Britiſh, nor cared for the Saxon ſtatutes, they alſo at the firſt vtterlie miſliked of them, till at the laſt, when they had well weied that one kind of regiment is not conuenient for all peoples, and that no ſtranger, being in a forren countrie newlie brought vnder obedience, could make ſuch equall ordinances, as he might thereby gouerne his new common-wealth without ſome care & trouble: they fell in with ſuch a deſire to ſee by what rule the ſtate of the land was gouerned in time of the Saxons, that hauing peruſed the ſame, they not onelie commended their maner of regiment, but alſo admitted a great part of their lawes (now currant vnder the name of S. Edwards lawes, and vſed as principles and grounds) whereby they not onelie qualified the rigor of their owne, and mitigated their almoſt intollerable burden of ſeruitude which they had latelie laid vpon the ſhoulders of the Engliſh, but alſo left vs a great number of the old Mulmutian lawes, whereof the moſt part are in vſe to this daie as I ſaid, albeit that we know not certeinlie how to diſtinguiſh them from others, that are in ſtrength amongſt vs.

Martia.

After Dunwallon, the next lawgiuer was Martia, whome Leland ſurnameth Proba; and after him John Bale alſo, who in his Centuries doth inſtlie confeſſe himſelfe to haue beene holpen by the ſaid Leland, as I my ſelfe do likewiſe for manie things conteined in this treatiſe. She was wife vnto Guteline king of the Britons: and being made protectrix of the realme, after hir husbands deceaſſe in the nonage of hir ſonne, and ſeeing manie things dailie to grow vp among hir people worthie reformation, ſhe deuiſed ſundrie and thoſe verie politike lawes, for the gouernance of hir kingdome, which hir ſubiects when ſhe was dead and gone, did name the Martian ſtatutes. Who turned them into Latine, as yet I do not read, howbeit (as I ſaid before of the lawes of Mulmutius) ſo the ſame Alfred cauſed thoſe of this excellentlie well learned ladie (whome diuerſe commend alſo for hir great knowledge in the Greeke tong) to be turned into his owne language, whereupon it came to paſſe that they were dailie executed among his ſubiects, afterward allowed of (among the reſt) by the Normans, and finallie remaine in vſe in theſe our daies, notwithſtanding that we can not diſſeuer them alſo verie readilie from the other.

The ſeuenth alteration of lawes was practiſed by the Saxons, for I ouerpaſſe the vſe of the ciuill ordinances vſed in Rome, finallie brought hither by the Romans, & yet in perfect notice among the Ciuilians of our countrie, though neuer generallie nor fullie receiued by all the ſeuerall regions of this Iland. Certes there are great numbers of theſe later, which yet remaine in ſound knowlege, and are to be read, being comprehended for the moſt part vnder the names of the Martian and the Saxon law. Beſide theſe alſo I read of the Dane law, ſo that the people of middle England were ruled by the firſt, the weſt Saxons by the ſecond, as Eſſex, Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridgeſhire, and part of Herfordſhire were by the third, of all the reſt the moſt inequall and intollerable. And as in theſe daies what ſoeuer the prince in publike aſſemblie commanded vpon the neceſſitie of his ſubiects, or his owne voluntarie authoritie, was counted for law: ſo none of them had appointed anie certeine place, whereunto his people might repaire at ſixed times for iuſtice, but cauſed them to reſort commonlie to their palaces, where in proper perſon they would often determine their cauſes, and ſo make ſhorteſt worke, or elſe commit the ſame to the hearing of other, and ſo diſpatch them awaie. Neither had they any houſe appointed to aſſemble in for the making of their ordinances, as we haue now at Weſtminſter. Wherefore Edmund gaue lawes at London & Lincolne, Ethelred at Habam, Alfred at Woodſtock and Wannetting, Athelſtane in Exceſter, Grecklade, Feuerſham, & Thunderſleie, Canutus at Wincheſter, &c: other in other places, whereof this may ſuffice.

Martian law. Saxon law. Dane law.

Among other things alſo vſed in the time of the Saxons, it ſhall not be amiſſe to ſet downe the forme of their Mydalian law, which they brought hither with with them from beyond the seas out of Scithia, and vsed onelie in the triall of guiltie and vnguiltinesse. Certes it conteined not an ordinarie proceeding by dales and termes, as in the ciuill and common law we see practised in these dales; but a short dispatch e triall of the matter by fire or water, whereof at this present I will deliuer the circumstance, as I haue faithfullie translated it out of an ancient volume, and conferred with an imprinted copie, latelie published by M. Lambert, and now extant to be read. Neuertheless, as the Scithians were the first that vsed this practise, so I read that it was taken vp and occupied also in France in processe of time, yea and likewise in Grecia, as G. Pachymerus remembreth in the first booke of his historie (which beginneth with the empire of Mr Paleologus) where he noteth his owne sight and view in that behalfe. But what stand I here vpon?

Ordalian law. Fire.

The Ordalian (saith the aforesaid author) was a certeine maner of purgation vsed two wales, whereof the one was by fire, the other by water. In the execution of that which was done by fire the partie accused should go a certeine number of pales, with an hot iron in his hand, or else bare foted vpon certeine plough shares red hot, according to the maner. This iron was sometime of one pound weight, and then was it called single Ordalium, sometimes of three, and then named treble Ordalium, and whosoeuer did heare or tread on the same without hurt of his bodie he was adiudged giltlesse, otherwise if his skin were scorched, he was forthwith condemned as guiltie of the trespasse whereof he was accused, according to the proportion and quantitie of the burning.

Water.

There were in like sort two kinds of triall by the water, that is to say, either by hot or cold: and in this triall the partie thought culpable, was either tumbled into some pond or huge vessell of cold water, wherein if he continued for a season, without wiesling or strugling for life, he was forthwith acquited as guiltlesse of the fact wherof he was accused: but if he began to plunge, and labour once for breath immediatlie vpon his falling into that liquor, he was by and by condemned as guiltie of the crime. Or else he did thrust his arme vp to the shoulder into a lead, copper, or caldron of seething water, from whence if he withdrew the same without anie maner of damage, he was discharged of further molestation: otherwise he was taken for a trespasser, and punished accordinglie. The fierie maner of purgation belonged onelie to noble men and women, and such as were free borne: but the husbandmen and villaines were tried by water. Wherof to shew the vnlearned dealing and blind ignorance of those times, it shall not be impertinent to set forth the whole maner, which continued here in England vntill the time of king John, who seeing the manifold subtilties in the same (by sundrie sorcerous and artificiall practises whereby the working of the said elements were restreined) did extinguish it altogither as flat lewdnesse and bouerie. The Rubrike of the treatise entereth thus: Here beginneth the execution of iustice, whereby the giltie or vngiltie are tried by hot iron. Then it followeth: After accusation lawfullie made, and three daies spent in fasting and praier, the priest being clad in all his holie vestures, sauing his vestiment, shall take the iron laid before the altar with a paire of tongs, and singing the hymne of the three children, that is to sale, O all ye workes of God the Lord, and in Latine Benedicite omnia opera, &c. he shall carie it solemnelie to the fire (alreadie made for that purpose) and first saie these words ouer the place where the fire is kindled, whereby this purgation shall be made in Latine as insueth: Benedic Domine Deus locum istum, vt sit nobis in eo sanitas, sanctitas, castitas, virtus, & victoria, & sanctimonia, humilitas, bonitas, lenitas, & plenitudo legis, & obedientia Deo patri, & filio, & spiritui sancto. Hac benedictio sit super hunc locum, & super omnes habitantes in eo. In English: Bless thou O Lord this place, that it may be to vs health, holinesse, chastitie, vertue, and victorie, puretie, humilitie, goodnesse, gentlenesse, and fulnesse of the law, and obedience to God the father, the sonne, and the holie ghost. This blessing be vpon this place, and all that dwell in it. Then followeth the blessing of the fire: Domine Deus pater omnipotens, lumen indeficiens, exaudi nos, quia tu es conditor omnium luminum. Benedic Domine hoc lumen, quod ante sanctificatum est, qui illuminasti omnem hominem venientem in hunc mundum (vel mundum) vt ab eo lumine accendamur igne claritatis tuæ. Et sicut igne illuminasti Moysen, ita nunc illumina corda nostra, & sensus nostros, vt ad vitam æternam mereamur pervenire, per Christum, &c. Lord God father almightie, light euerlasting, heare vs, sith thou art the maker of all lights. Bless O Lord this light, that is alreadie sanctified in thy sight, which hast lightned all men that come into the world (or the whole world) to the end that by the same light we may be lightned with the shining of thy brightnesse. As thou diddest lighten Moses, so now illuminate our hearts, and our senses, that we may deserue to come to euerlasting life, through Christ our, &c. This being ended let him say the Pater noster, &c.: then these words: Salutum facturum, &c. Mitte ei auxilium Deus, &c. De Sion tuere eum, &c. Dominus vobiscum, &c. That is, O Lord saue thy seruant, &c. Send him helpe O God from thy holie place, &c. Defend him out of Sion, &c. Lord heare, &c. The Lord be with you, &c.

The praier. Benedic Domine sancte pater, omnipotens Deus, per inuocationem sanctissimi nominis tui, & per aduentum filij tui, atque per donum spiritus paracleti, ad manifestandum verum iudicium tuum, hoc genus metalli, vt sit sanctificatum, & omni dæmonum falsitate procul remota, veritas veri iudicij tui fidelibus tuis manifestetur, per eundem Dominum, &c. In English: Bless we beseech thee O Lord, holie father, euerlasting God, through the inuocation of thy most holie name, by the comming of thy sonne, and gift of the holie ghost, and to the manifestation of thy true iudgement, this kind of mettall, that being hallowed, and all fraudulent practises of the diuels vtterlie removed, the manifest truth of thy true iudgement may be reuealed, by the same Lord Jesus, &c.

After this, let the iron be laid into the fire, and sprinkled with holie water, and whilest it heateth, let the priest go to masse, and doo as order requireth: and when he hath receiued the host, he shall call the man that is to be purged (as it is written hereafter) first adiuring him, and then permitting him to communicate according to the maner.

The office of the masse.

Iustus es Domine, &c. O Lord thou art iust, &c.

The Praier.

Absolue quæsumus Domine delicta famuli tui, vt à peccatorum suorum nexibus, quæ pro sua fragilitate contraxit, tua benignitate liberetur, & in hoc iudicio quòd meruit, iustitia tua præueniente, ad veritatis censuram peruenire mereatur, per Christum Dominum, &c. That is: Pardon we beseech thee O Lord, the sinnes of thy seruant, that being deliuered from the burden of his offenses, wherewith he is intangled, he may be cleared by thy benignitie, and in this his triall (so far as he hath deserued, thy mercie preuenting him) he may come to the knowledge of the truth, by Christ our Lord, &c.

The Gospell. Mar. 10.

bone, quid faciam vt vitam æternam percipiam? Ieſus autem dixit ei, Quid me dicis bonum? &c. In thoſe daies when Jeſus went forth toward his iournete, and one méeting him in the waie running, and kneéling vnto him, aſked him ſaieng: Good maſter what ſhall I do that I may poſſeſſe eternall life? Jeſus ſaid vnto him, Whie calleſt thou me good? &c. Then followeth the ſecret, and ſo forth all of the reſt of the maſſe. But before the partie dooth communicate, the prieſt ſhall vſe theſe words vnto him: Adiuro te per patrem, & filium, & ſpiritum ſanctum, & per veram chriſtianitatem quam ſuſcepiſti, & per ſanctas relliquias quæ in iſta eccleſia ſunt, & per baptiſmum quo te ſacerdos regenerauit, vt non præſumas vllo modo communicare, neq; accedere ad altare, ſi hoc feciſti aut conſenſiſti, &c. I adiure thée by the father, the ſonne, and the holie Ghoſt, by the true chriſtendome which thou haſt receiued, by the holie relikes which are in this church, and by the baptiſme wherewith the prieſt hath regenerated thée, that thou preſume not by any maner of means to communicate, nor come about the altar, if thou haſt done or conſented vnto this, whereof thou art accuſed, &c. Here let the prieſt ſuffer him to communicate, ſaieng; Corpus hoc, & ſanguis Domini noſtri Ieſu Chriſti, ſit tibi ad probationem hodie. This bodie & this bloud of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, be vnto thée a triall this daie. The praier: Perceptis Domine Deus noſter ſacris muneribus, ſupplices deprecamur, vt huius participatio ſacramenti à propriis nos reatibus expediat, & in famulo tuo veritatis ſententiam declaret, &c. Hauing receiued O Lord God theſe holie myſteries, we humblie beſéech thée that the participation of this ſacrament may rid vs of our guiltineſſe, and in this thy ſeruant ſet forth the truth. Then ſhall follow Kyrieleſon, the Letanie, and certeine Pſalmes, and after all them Oremus: Let vs praie. Deus qui per ignem ſigna magna oſtendens, Abraham puerum tuum de incendio Chaldæorum quibuſdam pereuntibus eruiſti, Deus qui rubum ardere ante conſpectum Moſis & minimè comburi permiſiſti, Deus qui de incendio fornacis Chaldaicis pleriſque ſuccenſis, tres pueros tuos illæſos eduxiſti, Deus qui incendio ignis populum Sodomæ inuoluens, Loth famulum tuum cum ſuis ſalute donaſti, Deus qui in aduentu ſancti ſpiritus tui, illuſtratione ignis fideles tuos ab infidelibus decreuiſti: oſtende nobis in hoc prauitatis noſtræ examine virtutem eiuſdem ſpiritus, &c: & per ignis huius feruorem diſcernere infideles, vt à tactu eius cuius inquiſitio agitur, conſcius exhorreſcat, & manus eius comburatur, innocens verò pœnitus illæſus permaneat, &c. Deus cuius noticiam nulla vnquam ſecreta effugiunt, fidei noſtræ tua bonitate reſponde, & præſta vt quiſquis purgandi ſe gratia, hoc ignitum tulerit ferrum, vel abſoluatur vt innocens, vel noxius detegatur, &c. In Engliſh thus: O God, which in ſhewing great tokens by fire diddeſt deliuer Abraham thy ſeruant from the burning of the Chaldeis, whileſt other periſhed; O God which ſufferedſt the buſh to burne in the ſight of Moſes, and yet not to conſume; O God which deliueredſt the thrée children from bodilie harme in the fornace of the Chaldeis, whileſt diuerſe were conſumed; O God which by fire didſt wrap the people of Sodome in their deſtruction, and yet ſauedſt Lot and his daughters from perill; O God which by the ſhining of thy brightneſſe at the comming of the holie ghoſt in likeneſſe of fire, diddeſt ſeparate the faithfull from ſuch as beléeued not: ſhew vnto vs in the triall of this our wickedneſſe, the power of the ſame ſpirit, &c: and by the heat of this fire diſcerne the faithfull from the vnfaithfull, that the guiltie whoſe cauſe is now in triall, by touching thereof, may tremble and feare, and his hand be burned, or being innocent, that he may remaine in ſafetie, &c. O God from whom no ſecrets are hidden, let thy goodneſſe anſwer to our faith, and grant that whoſoeuer in this purgation, ſhall touch and beare this iron, may either be tried an innocent, or reueled as an offendor, &c.* After this the prieſt ſhall ſprinkle the iron with holie water, ſaieng: The bleſſing of God the father, the ſonne, and the holie ghoſt, be vpon this iron, to the reuelation of the iuſt iudgement of God. And forthwith let him that is accuſed beare it, by the length of nine foot, and then let his hand be wrapped and ſealed vp for the ſpace of three daies: after this if any corruption or raw fleſh appeare where the iron touched it, let him be condemned as guiltie: if it be whole and ſound, let him giue thanks to God. And thus much of the firſt Ordalia, whereunto that of the water hath ſo preciſe relation, that in ſetting forth of the one, I haue alſo deſcribed the other, wherefore it ſhall be but in vaine to deale anie further withall.

The cup yet in vſe.

Water.

Hitherto alſo (as I thinke) ſufficientlie of ſuch lawes as were in vſe before the conqueſt. Now it reſteth that I ſhould declare the order of thoſe, that haue béene made and receiued ſince the comming of the Normans, referred to the eight alteration or change of our maner of gouernance, and thereunto do produce three ſcore and foure ſeuerall courts. But for aſmuch as I am no lawier, and therefore haue but little ſkill to proceed in the ſame accordinglie, it ſhall ſuffice to ſet downe ſome generall diſcourſe of ſuch as are vſed in our daies, and ſo much as I haue gathered by report and common heare-ſaie.

Ciuill lawe.

We haue therefore in England ſundrie lawes, and firſt of all the ciuill, vſed in the chancerie, admeraltie, and diuerſe other courts, in ſome of which, the ſeuere rigor of iuſtice is often ſo mitigated by conſcience, that diuerſe things are thereby made eaſie and tollerable, which otherwiſe would appeare to be méere iniurie and extremitie.

Canon lawe.

We haue alſo a great part of the Canon law dailie practiſed among vs, eſpeciallie in caſes of tithes, contracts of matrimonie, and ſuch like, as are vſuallie to be ſéene in the conſiſtories of our biſhops and higher courts of the two archbiſhops, where the exerciſe of the ſame is verie hotlie followed. The third ſort of lawes that we haue are our owne, & thoſe alwaies ſo variable, & ſubiect to alteration and change, that oft in one age, diuerſe iudgements do paſſe vpon one maner of caſe, whereby the ſaieng of the poet,

Tempora mutantur, & nos mutamur in illis,

Lawiers of England not alwaies conſtant in iudgment.

may verie well be applied vnto ſuch, as being vrged with theſe words; In ſuch a yeare of the prince, this opinion was taken for ſound law; do anſwer nothing elſe, but that the iudgement of our lawiers is now altered, ſo that they ſaie farre otherwiſe. The regiment that we haue therefore after our owne ordinances, dependeth vpon three lawes, to wit, Statute law, Common law, Cuſtomaris law, and Preſcription, according to the triple maner of our trials and iudgments, which is by parlement, verdict of twelue men at an aſſiſe, or wager of battell, of which the laſt is little vſed in our daies, as no appeale doth hold in the firſt and laſt rehearſed. But to returne to my purpoſe.

Parlement law.

The firſt is deliuered vnto vs by parlement, which court, being for the moſt part holden at Weſtminſter néere London, is the higheſt of all other, & conſiſteth of three ſeuerall ſorts of people, that is to ſaie, the nobilitie, cleargie, and commons of this realme. And thereto is not ſummoned, but vpon vrgent occaſion when the prince doth ſée his time, and that by ſeuerall writs, dated commonlie full ſix weékes before it begin to be holden. Such lawes as are agreed vpon in the higher houſe by the lords ſpirituall and temporall, and in the lower houſe by the commons and bodie of the realme (whereof the conuocation of the cleargie holden in Powles, or if occaſion ſo require in Weſtminſter church, is a member) there ſpeaking by the mouth of the knights of the ſhire and burgeſſes, remaine in the end to be confirmed by by the prince, who commonlie reſorteth thither of cuſtome, vpon the firſt and laſt daies of this court, there to vnderſtand what is doone, and giue his roiall conſent to ſuch ſtatutes as him liketh of. Comming therefore thither into the higher houſe, and hauing taken his throne, the ſpeaker of the parlement (for one is alwaies appointed to go betweene the houſes, as an indifferent mouth for both) readeth openlie the matters there determined by the ſaid three eſtates, and then craueth the princes conſent and finall confirmation to the ſame. The king hauing heard the ſumme and principall points of each eſtatute briefflie recited vnto him, anſwereth in French with great deliberation vnto ſuch as he liketh (Il nous plaiſt) but to the reſt Il ne plaiſt, whereby the latter are made void and fruſtrate. That alſo which his maieſtie liketh of, is hereby authoriſed, confirmed, & euer after holden for law, except it be repealed in anie the like aſſemblie. The number of the commons aſſembled in the lower houſe, beſide the cleargie, conſiſteth of ninetie knights. For each ſhire of England hath two gentlemen or knights of greateſt wiſedome and reputation, choſen out of the bodie of the ſame for that onelie purpoſe, ſauing that for Wales one onlie is ſuppoſed ſufficient in euerie countie, whereby the number afore mentioned is made vp. There are likewiſe fourtie and ſix citizens, 289 burgeſſes, and fourteene barons, ſo that the whole aſſemblie of the laitie of the lower houſe, conſiſteth of foure hundred thirtie and nine perſons, if the iuſt number be ſupplied. Of the lawes here made likewiſe ſome are penall and reſtraine the common law, and ſome againe are found to inlarge the ſame. The one ſort of theſe alſo are for the moſt part taken ſtrictlie according to the letter, the other more largelie and beneficiallie after their intendment and meaning.

Number of congregates in the parlement.

Common law.

The Common law ſtandeth vpon ſundrie maximes or principles, and yeares or termes, which doo conteine ſuch caſes as by great ſtudie and ſolemne argument of the iudges ſound practiſe confirmed by long experience, fetched euen from the courſe of moſt ancient lawes made farre before the conqueſt, and thereto the deepeſt reach and foundations of reaſon, are ruled and adiudged for law. Certes theſe caſes are otherwiſe called pleas or action, whereof there are two ſorts, the one criminall and the other ciuill. The meanes and meſſengers alſo to determine thoſe cauſes are our writs or breefes, whereof there are ſome originall and ſome iudiciall. The parties plaintiffe & defendant when they appeare proceed (if the caſe doo ſo require) by plaint or declaration, barre or anſwer, replication, reioinder, and ſo by rebut, ſurrebut to iſſue and triall if occaſion ſo fall out, the one ſide affirmatiuelie, the other negatiuelie as common experience teacheth. Our trials and recoueries are either by verdict and demourre, confeſſion or default, wherein if anie negligence or treſpaſſe hath beene committed, either in proceſſe and forme, or in matter and iudgement, the partie grieued may haue a writ of errour to vndoo the ſame, but not in the ſame court where the former iudgement was giuen.

Cuſtomarie law.

Cuſtomarie law conſiſteth of certeine laudable cuſtomes vſed in ſome priuat countrie, intended firſt to begin vpon good and reaſonable conſiderations, as gauell kind, which is all the male children equallie to inherit, and continued to this daie in Kent: where it is onelie to my knowledge reteined, and no where elſe in England. It was at the firſt deuiſed by the Romans, as appeareth by Cæſar in his cõmentaries, wherein I find, that to breake and daunt the force of the rebellious Germans, they made a law that all the male children (or females for want of males which holdeth ſtill in England) ſhould haue their fathers inheritance equallie diuided amongſt them. By this meanes alſo it came to paſſe, that whereas before time for the ſpace of ſixtie yeares, they had put the Romans to great and manifold troubles, within the ſpace of thirtie yeares after this law made, their power did wax ſo feeble, and ſuch diſcord fell out amongſt themſelues, that they were not able to maintaine warres with the Romans, nor raiſe anie iuſt armie againſt them. For as a riuer runing with one ſtreame is ſwift and more plentifull of water than when it is drained or drawne into manie branches: ſo the lands and goods of the anceſtors being diſperſed amongſt their iſſue males, of one ſtrong there were raiſed ſundrie weake, whereby the originall or generall ſtrength to reſiſt the aduerſarie, became infeebled and brought almoſt to nothing. Vis vnita (ſaith the philoſopher) fortior eſt eadem diſperſa, and one good purſſe is better than manie euill, and when euerie man is benefited alike, each one will ſeeke to maintaine his priuate eſtate, and few take care to prouide for publike welfare.

Burrow kind, is where the yongeſt is preferred before the eldeſt, which is the cuſtome of manie countries of this region: alſo the woman to haue the third of hir huſbands poſſeſſions, the huſband that marieth an heire to haue ſuch lands as moue by hir during his naturall life, if he ſuruiue hir, and hath a child by hir which hath beene heard crie thorough foure wals, &c: of ſuch like to be learned elſewhere, and ſometimes frequented generallie ouer all.

Preſcription.

Preſcription is a certeine cuſtome, which hath continued time out of minde, but it is more particular than cuſtomarie law, as where onelie a parith or ſome priuat perſon doth preſcribe to haue common, or a waie in another mans ſoile, or tithes to be paid after this or that maner, I meane otherwiſe than the common courſe and order of the law requireth, whereof let this ſuffice at this time, in ſtead of a larger diſcourſe of our owne lawes, leaſt I ſhould ſeeme to enter farre into that whereof I haue no ſkill. For what hath the meditation of the law of God to doo with anie preciſe knowledge of the law of man, ſith they are ſeuerall trades, and incident to diuerſe perſons?

Terme.

There are alſo ſundrie vſuall courts holden once in euerie quarter of the yeare, which we commonlie call termes, of the Latine word Terminus, wherein all controuerſies are determined, that happen within the Quæenes dominions. Theſe are commonlie holden at London, except vpon ſome great occaſion they be tranſferred to other places. At what times alſo they are kept both for ſpirituall and temporall dealing, the table inſuing ſhall eaſilie declare. Finallie how well they are followed by ſuitors, the great wealth of lawiers without anie trauell of mine can readilie expreſſe. For as after the comming of the Normans the nobilitie had the ſtart, and after them the cleargie: ſo now all the wealth of the land doth flow vnto our common lawiers, of whome ſome one hauing practiſed little aboue thirteene or fourteene yeares is able to buie a purchaſe of ſo manie 1000 pounds: which argueth that they wax rich apace, and will be richer if their clients become not the more wiſer & warie hereafter. It is not long, ſince a ſergeant at the law (whome I could name) was arreſted vpon an ertent, for three or foure hundred pounds, and another ſtanding by did greatlie maruell that he could not ſpare the gaines of one terme for the ſatiſfaction of that dutie. The time hath beene that our lawiers did ſit in Powles vpon ſtooles againſt the pillers and walles to get clients, but now ſome of them will not come from their chambers to the Guildhall in London vnder ten pounds or twentie nobles at the leſt. And one being demanded why he made ſo much of his trauell, answered, that it was but follie for him to go so farre, when he was assured to get more monie by sitting still at home. A friend of mine also had a suite of late of some valure, and to be sure of counsell at his time, he gaue vnto two lawiers (whose names I forbeare to deliuer) twentie shillings a peece, telling them of the date and houre wherein his matter should be called vpon. To be short, they came not vnto the barre at all, whervpon he stated for that date. On the morrow after he met them againe, increased his former gifts by so much more, and told them of the time, but they once againe serued him as before. In the end he met them both in the verie hall doore, and after some timorous reprehension, of their vncourteous demeanour toward him, he bestowed either three angels or foure more vpon each of them, whereupon they promised peremptorilie to speake earnestlie in his cause. And yet for all this, one of them hauing not yet sucked enough, vtterlie deceiued him: the other in deed came in, and wagging a scroll which he had in his hand before the iudge, he spake not aboue three or foure words, almost so soone vttered as a good morrow, and so went from the bar, and this was all the poore man gat for his monie, and the care which his counsellours did seeme to take of his cause, then standing vpon the hazard. But inough of these matters, for if I should set downe how little law poore men can haue for their small fees in these daies, and the great murmurings that are on all sides vttered against their excessiue taking of monie (for they can abide no small gaine) I should extend this treatise into a farre greater volume than is conuenient for my purpose. Wherfore it shall suffice to haue set downe so much of their demeanour, and so much as is euen enough to cause them to looke with somewhat more conscience into their dealings, except they be dull and senseless.

Deceipt.

Want of our lawiers steppe not at small fees.

This furthermore is to be noted, that albeit the princes heretofore reigning in this land haue erected sundrie courts, especiallie of the chancerie at Yorke and Ludlow, for the ease of poore men dwelling in those parts, yet will the poorest (of all men commonlie most contentious) refuse to haue his cause heard so neere home, but indeuoureth rather to his vtter vndoing to trauell vp to London, thinking there somest to preuaile against his aduersarie, though his case be neuer so doubtfull. But in this toie our Welshmen do exceed of all that euer I heard, for you shall here and there haue some one od poore Dauid of them giuen so much to contention and strife, that without all respect of charges he will vp to London, though he go bare legged by the waie, and carie his hosen on his necke (to saue their feet from wearing) because he hath no change. When he commeth there also, he will make such importunate begging of his countrimen, and hard shift otherwise, that he will sometimes carie downe six or seuen writs with him in his purse, wherewith to molest his neighbor, though the greatest quarrell be scarselie worth the fee that he hath paid for anie one of them. But inough of this, least in reuealing the superfluous follie of a few brablers in this behalfe, I bring no good will to my selfe amongst the wisest of that nation. Certes it is a lamentable case to see furthermore, how a number of poore men are dailie abused and vtterlie vndone, by sundrie varlets that go about the countrie, as promoters or brokers betweene the pettie foggers of the lawe, and the common people, onelie to kindle and espie coales of contention, whereby the one side may reape commoditie, and the other spend and be put to trauell. But of all that euer I knew in Esser, Denis and Mainford excelled, till John of Ludlow, aliàs Mason came in place, vnto whome in comparison they two were but children: for this last in lesse than three or foure yeares, did bring one man (among manie else-where in other places) almost to extreame miserie (if beggerie be the vttermost) that before he had the shauing of his beard, was valued at two hundred pounds (I speake with the least) and finallie feeling that he had not sufficient wherwith to sustaine himselfe and his familie, and also to satisfie that greedie rauenour, which still called vpon him for new fees, he went to bed, and within foure daies made an end of his wofull life, euen with care and pensiuenesse. After his death also he so handled his sonne, that there was neuer sheepe shorne in Wales, so neere clipped of his fleece present, as he was of manie to come: so that he was compelled to let awaie his land, because his cattell & stocke were consumed, and he no longer able to occupie the ground. But hereof let this suffice, & in steed of these enormities, a table shall follow of the termes conteining their beginnings and endings, as I haue borrowed them from my freend Iohn Stow, whose studie is the onelie store house of antiquities in my time, and he worthie therefore to be had in reputation and honour.

Poore men contentious.

Promoters seeke matters to set lawiers on worke withall.

The times of our termes no hinderance to iustice.

A man would imagine that the time of the execution of our lawes, being little aboue one quarter, or not fullie a third part of the yeare, and the appointment of the same to be holden in one place onelie, to wit, neere London in Westminster, and finallie the great expenses employed vpon the same, should be no small cause of the state and hinderance of the administration of iustice in this land: but as it falleth out they proue great occasions and the state of much contention. The reasons of these are soone to be conceiued, for as the broken sleeue doth hold the elbow backe, and paine of trauell cause manie to sit at home in quiet; so the shortnesse of time and feare of delaie doth driue those oftentimes to like of peace, who otherwise would liue at strife, and quickelie be at ods. Some men desirous of gaines would haue the termes yet made shorter, that more delaie might ingender longer suite; other would haue the houses made larger, and more offices erected, wherein to minister the lawes. But as the times of the tearmes are rather too short than too long by one returne a peece: so if there were smaller romes and fowler waies vnto them, they would inforce manie to make pawses before they did rashlie enter into plee. But sith my purpose is not to make an ample discourse of these things, it shall suffice to deliuer the times of the holding of our termes, which insueth after this manner.

A perfect rule to know the beginning and ending of euerie terme, with their returnes.

Hilarie terme beginneth the three and twentith daie of Ianuarie (if it be not sundaie) otherwise the next daie after, and is finished the twelfe of Februarie, it hath foure returnes.

{ Octabis Hilarij. } { Crastino Purific. } { Quind. Hilarij. } { Octabis Purific. }

¶ Easter terme beginneth seuentéene daies after Easter, endeth foure daies after the Ascension daie, and hath fiue returnes.

{ Quind. Pasch. } { Mense } { Quinque Paschæ. }
{ Tres Paschæ. } { Paschæ. } { Crast. Ascention. }

¶ Trinitie terme beginneth the fridaie after Trinitie sundaie, and endeth the wednesdaie fortnight after, in which time it hath foure returnes.

{ Crast. Trinitatis. } { Quind. Trinitatis. } { Octabis Trinitatis. } { Tres Trinitatis. }

¶ Michaelmasse terme beginneth the ninth of October (if it be not sundaie) and ending the eight and twentith twentith of Nouember, it hath eight returnes.

Octabis Michael.	Craſt. anima.
Quind. Michael.	Craſt. Martini.
Tres Michael.	Octa. Martini.
Menſe Michael.	Quind. Martini.

Note alſo that the eſcheker, which is Fiſcus or erarium publicum principis, openeth eight daies before anie terme begin, except Trinitie terme, which openeth but foure daies before.

And thus much for our vſuall termes as they are kept for the adminiſtration of our common lawes, wherevnto I thinke good to adde the lawdaies accuſtomablie holden in the arches and audience of Canturburie, with other eccleſiaſticall and ciuill courts thorough the whole yeare, or for ſomuch time as their execution indureth (which in compariſon is ſcarſelie one halfe of the time if it be diligentlie examined) to the end each one at home being called vp to anſwer may trulie know the time of his appearance; being ſorie in the meane ſeaſon, that the vſe of the popiſh calendar is ſo much reteined in the ſame, and not rather the vſuall daies of the moneth placed in their romes, ſith moſt of them are fixed and palter not their place of ſtanding. Howbeit ſome of our infected lawiers will not let them go awaie ſo eaſilie, pretending facilitie and cuſtome of vſage, but meaning peraduenture inwardlie to kéepe a commemoration of thoſe dead men whoſe names are there remembred.

¶ It is to be remembred that the firſt daie following euerie of theſe feaſts noted in each terme, the court of the arches is kept in Bow church in the forenoone. And the ſame firſt daie in the afternoone is the admiraltie court for ciuill and ſeafaring cauſes kept in Southwarke, where iuſtice is miniſtred & execution done continuallie according to the ſame.

The ſecond daie following euerie one of the ſaid feaſts, the court of audience of Canturburie is kept in the conſiſtorie in Paules in the forenoone. And the ſelfe daie in the afternoone, in the ſame place is the prerogatiue court of Canturburie holden.

The third day after anie ſuch feaſt in the forenoone, the conſiſtorie court of the biſhop of London is kept in Paules church in the ſaid conſiſtorie, and the ſame third daie in the afternoone is the court of the delegates, and the court of the Quéenes highneſſe commiſſioners vpon appeales is likewiſe kept in the ſame place on the fourth daie.

For if it ſo happen that one of thoſe feaſts fall on wedneſdaie, commonlie called Aſhwedneſdaie after the daie of S. Blaſe (ſo that the ſame lawdaie after Aſhwedneſdaie cannot be kept becauſe the lawdaie of the other feaſt doth light on the ſame) then the ſecond lawdaie after Aſhwedneſdaie ſhall be kept, and the other omitted. And if the lawdaie after Aſhwedneſdaie be the next daie after the feaſt of S. Blaſe, then ſhall all and euerie court daies be obſerued in order, as they may be kept conuenientlie. And marke that although Aſhwedneſdaie be put the ſeuenth in order, yet it hath no certeine place, but is changed as the courſe of Eaſter cauſeth it.

The reſt of the lawdaies are kept to the third of the Aſcenſion, which is the laſt day of this terme. And if it happen that the feaſt of the Aſcenſion of our Lord, do come before anie of the feaſts aforeſaid, then they are omitted for that yeare. And after the ſecond ſeſſion account foure daies or thereabout, and then loke which is the next feaſt day, and the firſt lawdaie after the ſaid feaſt ſhall be the third ſeſſion. The other law daies follow in order, but ſo manie of them are kept, as for the time of the yeare ſhall be thought méet.

It is alſo generallie to be obſerued, that euerie daie is called a lawdaie that is not ſundaie or holie daie: and that if the feaſt daie being knowne of anie court daie in anie terme, the firſt or ſecond daie following be ſundaie, then the court daie is kept the daie after the ſaid holie daie or feaſt.

Of prouiſion made for the poore.

Chap. 10.

THere is no common-wealth at this daie in Europe, wherin there is not great ſtore of poore people, and thoſe neceſſarilie to be relieued by the welthier ſort, which otherwiſe would ſtarue and come to vtter confuſion. With vs the poore is commonlie diuided into three ſorts, ſo that ſome are poore by impotencie, as the fatherleſſe child, the aged, blind and lame, and the diſeaſed perſon that is iudged to be incurable: the ſecond are poore by caſualtie, as the wounded ſouldier, the decaied houſeholder, and the ſicke perſon viſited with grieuous and painefull diſeaſes: the third conſiſteth of thriftleſſe poore, as the riotour that hath conſumed all, the vagabund that will abide no where, but runneth vp and downe from place to place (as it were ſéeking worke and finding none) and finallie the roge and ſtrumpet which are not poſſible to be diuided in ſunder, but runne too and fro ouer all the realme, chéefelie kéeping the champaine ſoiles in ſummer to auoid the ſcorching heat, and the woodland grounds in winter to eſchew the bluſtering winds.

Three ſorts of poore.

For

For the first two sorts, that is to saie, the poore by impotencie, and the poore by casualtie, which are the true poore in deed, and for whome the word doth bind vs to make some dailie prouision: there is order taken throughout euerie parish in the realme, that weekelie collection shall be made for their helpe and sustentation, to the end they should not scatter abroad, and by begging here and there annoie both towne and countrie. Authoritie also is giuen vnto the iustices in euerie countie, and great penalties appointed for such as make default, to see that the intent of the statute in this behalfe be trulie executed, according to the purpose and meaning of the same, so that these two sorts are sufficientlie prouided for: and such as can liue within the limits of their allowance (as each one will doo that is godlie and well disposed) may well forbeare to rome and range about. But if they refuse to be supported by this benefit of the law, and will rather indeuour by going to and fro to mainteine their idle trades, then are they adiudged to be parcell of the third sort, and so in steed of courteous refreshing at home, are often corrected with sharpe execution, and whip of iustice abroad. Manie there are, which notwithstanding the rigor of the lawes prouided in that behalfe, yeeld rather with this libertie (as they call it) to be dailie vnder the feare and terrour of the whip, than by abiding where they were borne or bred, to be prouided for by the deuotion of the parishes. I found not long since a note of these latter sort, the effect whereof insueth. Idle beggers are such either through other mens occasion, or through their owne default. By other mens occasion (as one waie for example) when some couetous man, such I meane as haue the cast or right veine, dailie to make beggers inough wherby to peister the land, espieng a further commoditie in their commons, holds, and tenures, doth find such meanes as thereby to wipe manie out of their occupiengs, and turne the same vnto his priuate gaines. Herevpon it followeth, that although the wise and better minded, doo either forsake the realme for altogether, and seeke to liue in other countries, as France, Germanie, Barbarie, India, Moscouia, and verie Calecute, complaining of no rome to be left for them at home, doo so behaue themselues that they are worthilie to be accompted among the second sort: yet the greater part commonlie hauing nothing to staie vpon are wilfull, and therevpon doo either proue idle beggers, or else continue starke theeues till the gallowes doo eat them vp, which is a lamentable case. Certes in some mans iudgements these things are but trifles, and not worthie the regarding. Some also doo grudge at the great increase of people in these daies, thinking a necessarie brood of cattell farre better than a superfluous augmentation of mankind. But I can liken such men best of all vnto the pope and the diuell, who practise the hinderance of the furniture of the number of the elect to their vttermost, to the end the authoritie of the one vpon earth, the deferring of the locking vp of the other in euerlasting chaines, and the great gaines of the first may continue and indure the longer. But if it should come to passe that any forren inuasion should be made, which the Lord God forbid for his mercies sake! then should these men find that a wall of men is farre better than stackes of corne and bags of monie, and complaine of the want when it is too late to seeke remedie. The like occasion caused the Romans to deuise their law Agraria: but the rich not liking of it, and the couetous vtterlie condemning it as rigorous and vnprofitable, neuer ceased to practise disturbance till it was quite abolished. But to proceed with my purpose.

A thing often seene.

At whose hands shall the bloud of these men be required.

Such as are idle beggers through their owne default are of two sorts, and continue their estates either by casuall or meere voluntarie meanes: those that are such by casuall means, are in the beginning iustlie to be referred either to the first or second sort of poore afore mentioned: but degenerating into the thriftlesse sort, they doo what they can to continue their miserie, and with such impediments as they haue to straie and wander about, as creatures abhorring all labour and euerie honest exercise. Certes I call these casuall meanes, not in respect of the originall of their pouertie, but of the continuance of the same, from whence they will not be deliuered, such is their owne vngratious lewdnesse, and froward disposition. The voluntarie meanes proceed from outward causes, as by making of corosiues, and applieng the same to the more fleshie parts of their bodies: and also laieng of rattsbane, spurrewort, crowfoot, and such like vnto their whole members, thereby to raise pitifull and odious sores, and moue the harts of the goers by such places where they lie, to yerne at their miserie, and therevpon bestow large almesse vpon them. How artificiallie they beg, what forcible speech, and how they select and chose out words of vehemencie, whereby they doo in maner coniure or adiure the goer by to pitie their cases, I passe ouer to remember, as iudging the name of God and Christ to be more conuersant in the mouths of none: and yet the presence of the heuenlie maiestie further off from no men than from this vngratious companie. Which maketh me to thinke that punishment is farre meeter for them than liberalitie or almesse, and sith Christ willeth vs chieflie to haue a regard to himselfe and his poore members.

Unto this nest is another sort to be referred, more sturdie than the rest, which hauing sound and perfect lims, doo yet notwithstanding sometime counterfeit the possession of all sorts of diseases. Diuerse times in their apparell also they will be like seruing men or labourers: oftentimes they can plaie the mariners, and seeke for ships which they neuer losse. But in fine, they are all theeues and caterpillers in the commonwealth, and by the word of God not permitted to eat, sith they doo but licke the sweat from the true labourers browes, & beareue the godlie poore of that which is due vnto them, to mainteine their excesse, consuming the charitie of well disposed people bestowed vpon them, after a most wicked & detestable maner.

It is not yet full three score yeares since this trade began: but how it hath prospered since that time, it is easie to iudge, for they are now supposed of one sort and another, to amount vnto aboue 10000 persons; as I haue heard reported. Moreouer, in counterfeiting the Egyptian roges, they haue deuised a language among themselues, which they name Canting, but other pedlers French, a speach compact thirtie yeares since of English, and a great number of od words of their owne deuising, without all order or reason: and yet such is it as none but themselues are able to vnderstand. The first deuiser thereof was hanged by the necke, a iust reward no doubt for his deserts, and a common end to all of that profession. A gentleman also of late hath taken great paines to search out the secret practises of this vngratious rable. And among other things he setteth downe and describeth three & twentie sorts of them, whose names it shall not be amisse to remember, wherby ech one may take occasion to read and know as also by his industrie what wicked people they are, and what villanie remaineth in them.

The puniſhment that is ordeined for this kind of people is verie ſharpe, and yet it can not reſtreine them from their gadding: wherefore the end muſt néeds be martiall law, to be exerciſed vpon them, as vpon théeues, robbers, deſpiſers of all lawes, and enimies to the common-wealth & welfare of the land. What notable roberies, pilferies, murders, rapes, and ſtealings of yong children, burning, breaking and diſfiguring their limbs to make them pitifull in the ſight of the people, I néed not to rehearſe: but for their idle roging about the countrie, the law ordeineth this maner of correction. The roge being apprehended, committed to priſon, and tried in the next aſſiſes (whether they be of gaole deliuerie or ſeſſions of the peace) if he happen to be conuicted for a vagabond either by inqueſt of office, or the teſtimonie of two honeſt and credible witneſſes vpon their oths, he is then immediatlie adiudged to be gréeuouſlie whipped and burned through the griſtle of the right eare, with an hot iron of the compaſſe of an inch about, as a manifeſtation of his wicked life, and due puniſhment receiued for the ſame. And this iudgement is to be executed vpon him, except ſome honeſt perſon worth fiue pounds in the quéenes boks in goods, or twentie ſhillings in lands, or ſome rich houſholder to be allowed by the iuſtices, will be bound in recogniſance to reteine him in his ſeruice for one whole yeare. If he be taken the ſecond time, and proued to haue forſaken his ſaid ſeruice, he ſhall then be whipped againe, bored likewiſe through the other eare and ſet to ſeruice: from whence if he depart before a yeare be expired, and happen afterward to be attached againe, he is condemned to ſuffer paines of death as a fellon (except before excepted) without benefit of clergie or ſanctuarie, as by the ſtatute doth appeare. Among roges and idle perſons finallie, we find to be compriſed all proctors that go vp and downe with counterfeit licences, coſiners, and ſuch as gad about the countrie, vſing vnlawfull games, practiſers of phiſiognomie and palmeſtrie, tellers of fortunes, fenſers, players, minſtrels, iugglers, pedlers, tinkers, pretenſed ſcholers, ſhipmen, priſoners gathering for fées, and others ſo oft as they be taken without ſufficient licence. From among which companie our bearewards are not excepted, and iuſt cauſe: for I haue read that they haue either voluntarilie, or for want of power to maſter their ſauage beaſts, béene occaſion of the death and deuouration of manie children in ſundrie countries by which they haue paſſed, whoſe parents neuer knew what was become of them. And for that cauſe there is & haue béene manie ſharpe lawes made for bearwards in Germanie, wherof you may read in other. But to our roges. Each one alſo that harboreth or aideth them with meat or monie, is taxed and compelled to fine with the quéenes maieſtie for euerie time that he doth ſo ſuccour them, as it ſhall pleaſe the iuſtices of peace to aſſigne, ſo that the taxation exceed not twentie ſhillings, as I haue béene informed. And thus much of the poze, & ſuch prouiſion as is appointed for them within the realme of England.

Of ſundrie kinds of puniſhments appointed for malefactors.

Chap. 11.

IN caſes of felonie, manſlaughter, roberie, murther, rape, piracie, & ſuch capitall crimes as are not reputed for treaſon or hurt of the eſtate, our ſentence pronounced vpon the offendor is to hang till he be dead. For of other puniſhments vſed in other countries we haue no knowledge or vſe, and yet ſo few gréeuous crimes committed with vs as elſe where in the world. To vſe torment alſo or queſtion by paine and torture in theſe common caſes with vs is greatlie abhorred, ſith we are found alwaie to be ſuch as deſpiſe death, and yet abhorre to be tormented, chooſing rather frankelie to open our minds than to yéeld our bodies vnto ſuch ſeruile halings and tearings as are vſed in other countries. And this is one cauſe wherefore our condemned perſons dw go ſo chéerefullie to their deths, for our nation is frée, ſtout, hautie, prodigall of life and bloud, as ſir Thomas Smith ſaith lib. 2. cap. 25. de republica, and therefore cannot in anie wiſe digeſt to be vſed as villanes and ſlaues, in ſuffering continuallie beating, ſeruitude, and ſeruile torments. No, our gailers are guiltie of fellonie by an old law of the land, if they torment anie priſoner committed to their cuſtodie for the reuealing of his complices.

The greateſt and moſt gréeuous puniſhment vſed in England, for ſuch as offend againſt the ſtate, is drawing from the priſon to the place of execution vpon an hardle or ſled, where they are hanged till they be halfe dead, and then taken downe and quartered aliue, after that their members and bowels are cut from their bodies, and throwne into a fire prouided nére hand and within their owne ſight, euen for the ſame purpoſe. Sometimes, if the treſpaſſe be not the more hainous, they are ſuffered to hang till they be quite dead. And when ſoeuer anie of the nobilitie are conuicted of high treaſon by their péeres, that is to ſaie, equals (for an inqueſt of yeomen paſſeth not vpon them, but onelie of the lords of the parlement) this maner of their death is conuerted into the loſſe of their heads onelie, notwithſtanding that the ſentence dw run after the former order. In triall of caſes concerning treaſon, fellonie, or anie other gréeuous crime not confeſſed, the partie accuſed doth yéeld, if he be a noble man, to be tried by an inqueſt (as I haue ſaid) and his péeres: if a gentleman, by gentlemen: and an inferiour, by God and by the countrie, to wit, the yeomanrie (for combat or battell is not greatlie in vſe) and being condemned of fellonie, manſlaughter, &c: he is eſſoons hanged by the necke till he be dead, and then cut downe and buried. But if he be conuicted of wilfull murther, done either vpon pretended malice, or in anie notable robberie, he is either hanged aliue in chaines nére the place where the fact was committed (or elſe vpon compaſſion taken firſt ſtrangled with a rope) and ſo continueth till his bones conſume to nothing. We haue vſe neither of the wheéle nor of the barre, as in other countries; but when wilfull manſlaughter is perpetrated, beſide hanging, the offendor hath his right hand commonlie ſtriken off before or nére vnto the place where the act was done, after which he is led forth to the place of execution, and there put to death according to the law.

The word fellon is deriued of the Saxon words Fell and One, that is to ſay, an euill and wicked one,

one

a one of vntamable nature, and lewdnesse not to be suffered for feare of euill example and the corruption of others. In like sort in the word fellonie are manie grieuous crimes conteined, as breach of prison An. 1 of Edward the second. Disfigurers of the princes liege people An. 5. of Henrie the fourth. Hunting by night with painted faces and visors An. 1. of Henrie the seuenth. Rape or stealing of women & maidens An. 3 of Henrie the eight. Conspiracie against the person of the prince An. 3. of Henrie the seuenth. Embesilling of goods committed by the maister to the seruant, aboue the value of fourtie shillings An. 17. of Henrie the eight. Carieng of horses or mares into Scotland An. 23. of Henrie the eight. Sodomie and buggerie An. 25. of Henrie the eight. Stealing of hawkes egs An. 31. of Henrie the eight. Coniuring, sorcerie, witchcraft, and digging vp of crosses An. 33. of Hen. 8. Prophesieng vpon armes, cognisances, names & badges An. 33. of Hen. 8. Casting of slanderous bils An. 37. Hen. 8. Wilfull killing by poison An. 1. of Edw. the first. Departure of a soldier from the field An. 2. of Edward the first. Diminution of coine, all offenses within case of præmunire, embesselling of records, goods taken from dead men by their seruants, stealing of what soeuer cattell, robbing by the high waie, vpon the sea, or dwelling houses, letting out of ponds, cutting of purses, stealing of deere by night, counterfeitors of coine, euidences, charters, and writings, & diuerse other needlesse to be remembred. If a woman poison hir husband she is burned aliue, if the seruant kill his maister he is to be executed for petie treason, he that poisoneth a man is to be boiled to death in water or lead, although the partie die not of the practise: in cases of murther all the accessaries are to suffer paines of death accordinglie. Periurie is punished by the pillorie, burning in the forehead with the letter P, the rewalting of the trees growing vpon the grounds of the offendors and losse of all his moueables. Manie trespasses also are punished by the cutting of one or both eares from the head of the offendor, as the vtterance of seditious words against the magistrates, fraimakers, petie robbers, &c. Rogues are burned through the eares, carters of sheepe out of the land by the losse of their hands, such as kill by poison are either boiled or skalded to death in lead or seething water. Heretikes are burned quicke, harlots and their mates by carting, ducking, and doing of open penance in sheets, in churches and market steads are often put to rebuke. Howbeit as this is counted with some either as no punishment at all to speake of, or but smallie regarded of the offendors, so I would wish adulterie and fornication to haue some sharper law. For what great smart is it to be turned out of an hot sheet into a cold, or after a little washing in the water to be let loose againe vnto their former trades? Howbeit the dragging of some of them ouer the Thames betweene Lambeth and Westminster at the taile of a boat, is a punishment that most terrifieth them which are condemned thereto; but this is inflicted vpon them by none other than the knight marshall, and that within the compasse of his iurisdiction & limits onelie. Canutus was the first that gaue authoritie to the cleargie to punish whordome, who at that time found fault with the former lawes as being too seuere in this behalfe. For before the time of the said Canutus, the adulterer forfeited all his goods to the king, and his bodie to be at his pleasure; and the adulteresse was to lose hir eies or nose, or both, if the case were more than common: whereby it appeareth of what estimation mariage was amongst them, sith the breakers of that holie estate were so grieuouslie rewarded. But afterward the cleargie dealt more fauourablie with them, shewting rather at the punishments of such preests and clearkes as were maried, than the reformation of adulterie and fornication, wherein you shall find no example that anie seueritie was shewed, except vpon such late men as had defiled their nuns. As in theft therfore so in adulterie and whordome I would with the parties trespassant, to be made bond or slaues vnto those that receiued the iniurie, to sell and giue where they listed, or to be condemned to the gallies: for that punishment would proue more bitter to them than halfe an houres hanging, or than standing in a sheet, though the weather be neuer so cold.

Manslaughter in time past was punished by the purse, wherin the quantitie or qualitie of the punishment was rated after the state and calling of the partie killed: so that one was valued sometime at 1200, another at 600, or 200 shillings. And by an estatute made vnder Henrie the first, a citizen of London at 100, whereof else-where I haue spoken more at large. Such as kill themselues are buried in the field with a stake driuen through their bodies.

Witches are hanged or sometimes burned, but theeues are hanged (as I said before) generallie on the gibbet or gallowes, sauing in Halifax where they are beheaded after a strange maner, and whereof I find this report. There is and hath beene of ancient time a law or rather a custome at Halifax, that who soeuer doth commit anie fellonie, and is taken with the same, or confesse the fact vpon examination: if it be valued by foure constables to amount to the sum of thirteene pence halfe penie, he is forthwith beheaded vpon one of the next market daies (which fall vsuallie vpon the tuesdaies, thursdaies, & saturdaies) or else vpon the same daie that he is so conuicted, if market be then holden. The engine wherewith the execution is done, is a square blocke of wood of the length of foure fot and an halfe, which doth ride vp and downe in a slot, rabet, or regall betweene two peeces of timber, that are framed and set vpright of fiue pardes in height. In the neather end of the sliding blocke is an ax keied or fastened with an iron into the wood, which being drawne vp to the top of the frame is there fastned by a woodden pin (with a notch made into the same after the maner of a Samsons post) vnto the middest of which pin also there is a long rope fastened that commeth downe among the people, so that when the offendor hath made his confession, and hath laid his necke ouer the neathermost blocke, euerie man there present doth either take hold of the rope (or putteth forth his arme so neere to the same as he can get, in token that he is willing to see true iustice executed) and pulling out the pin in this maner, the head blocke wherein the ax is fastened doth fall downe with such a violence, that if the necke of the transgressor were so big as that of a bull, it should be cut in sunder at a stroke, and roll from the bodis by an huge distance. If it be so that the offendor be apprehended for an ox, oxen, sheepe, kine, horsse, or anie such cattell: the selfe beast or other of the same kind shall haue the end of the rope tied somewhere vnto them, so that they being driuen dow draw out the pin wherby the offendor is executed. Thus much of Halifax law, which I set downe onelie to shew the custome of that countrie in this behalfe. Halifax law.

Roges and vagabonds are often stocked and whipped, scolds are ducked vpon cuckingstooles in the water. Such fellons as stand mute and speake not at their arraignement are pressed to death by huge weights laid vpon a bord, that lieth ouer their brest, and a sharpe stone vnder their backs, and these commonlie hold their peace, thereby to saue their goods vnto their wiues and children, which if they were condemned should be confiscated to the prince. Theeues that are saued by their bookes and cleargie, for the first offense, Mute. Cleargie.

offenſe, if they haue ſtollen nothing elſe but oxen, ſheepe, monie, or ſuch like, which be no open robberies, as by the high waie ſide, or aſſailing of anie mans houſe in the night, without putting him in feare of his life, or breaking vp of his wals or doores, are burned in the left hand, vpon the brawne of the thombe with an hot iron, ſo that if they be apprehended againe, that marke bewraieth them to haue beene arraigned of fellonie before, whereby they are ſure at that time to haue no mercie. I do not read that this cuſtome of ſauing by the booke is vſed anie where elſe than in England, neither do I find (after much diligent inquirie) what Saxon prince ordeined that lawe. Howbeit, this I generallie gather thereof, that it was deuiſed to traine the inhabiters of this land to the loue of learning, which before contemned letters and all good knowledge, as men onelie giuing themſelues to huſbandrie and the warres, the like whereof I read to haue beene amongſt the Gothes and Vandals, who for a time would not ſuffer euen their princes to be lerned for weakening of their courages, nor anie learned men to remaine in the counſell houſe, but by open proclamation would command them to auoid, whenſoeuer anie thing touching the ſtate of the land was to be conſulted vpon. Pirats and robbers by ſea are condemned in the court of the admiraltie, and hanged on the ſhore at lowe water marke, where they are left till three tides haue ouerwaſhed them. Finallie, ſuch as hauing wals and banks neere vnto the ſea, and do ſuffer the ſame to decaie (after conuenient admonition) whereby the water entereth and drowneth vp the countrie, are by a certeine ancient cuſtome apprehended, condemned, and ſtaked in the breach, where they remaine for euer as parcell of the foundation of the new wall that is to be made vpon them, as I haue heard reported.

Pirats.

And thus much in part of the adminiſtration of iuſtice vſed in our countrie, wherein notwithſtanding that we do not often heare of horrible, merciles, and wilfull murthers (ſuch I meane as are not ſildome ſeene in the countries of the maine) yet now and then ſome manſlaughter and bloudie robberies are perpetrated and committed, contrarie to the lawes, which be ſeuerelie puniſhed, and in ſuch wiſe as I before reported. Certes there is no greater miſchefe done in England than by robberies, the firſt by yong ſhifting gentlemen, which oftentimes do beare more port than they are able to mainteine. Secondlie by ſeruingmen, whoſe wages cannot ſuffice ſo much as to find them breeches, wherefore they are now and then conſtreined either to keepe high waies, and breake into the wealthie mens houſes with the firſt ſort, or elſe to walke vp and downe in gentlemens and rich farmers paſtures, there to ſee and view which horſſes feed beſt, whereby they manie times get ſomething, although with hard aduenture it hath beene knowne by their confeſſion at the gallowes, that ſome one ſuch chapman hath had fortie, fiftie, or ſixtie ſtolne horſſes at paſture here and there abroad in the countrie at a time, which they haue ſold at faires and markets farre off, they themſelues in the meane ſeaſon being taken about home for honeſt yeomen, and verie wealthie drouers, till their dealings haue been bewraied. It is not long ſince one of this companie was apprehended, who was before time reputed for a verie honeſt and wealthie townelman, he vttered alſo more horſſes than anie of his trade, becauſe he ſold a reaſonable pennworth, and was a faire ſpoken man. It was his cuſtome likewiſe to ſaie, if anie man hucked hard with him about the price of a gelding; So God helpe me gentleman or ſir, either he did coſt me ſo much, or elſe by Jeſus I ſtole him. Which talke was plaine inough, and yet ſuch was his eſtimation, that each beleeued the firſt part of his tale, and made no account of the later, which was the truer indeed.

Our third annoiers of the common-wealth are roges, which do verie great miſchefe in all places where they become. For whereas the rich onelie ſuffer iniurie by the firſt two, theſe ſpare neither rich nor poore: but whether it be great gaine or ſmall, all is fiſh that commeth to net with them, and yet I ſaie both they and the reſt are truſſed vp apace. For there is not one yeare commonlie, wherein three hundred or foure hundred of them are not deuoured and eaten vp by the gallowes in one place and other. It appeareth by Cardane (who writeth it vpon the report of the biſhop of Leroula) in the geniture of king Edward the firſt, how Henrie the eight, executing his lawes verie ſeuerelie againſt ſuch idle perſons, I meane great theeues, pettie theeues and roges, did hang vp threeſcore and twelue thouſand of them in his time. He ſeemed for a while greatlie to haue terrified the reſt: but ſince his death the number of them is ſo increaſed, yea although we haue had no warres, which are a great occaſion of their breed (for it is the cuſtome of the more idle ſort, hauing once ſerued or but ſeene the other ſide of the ſea vnder colour of ſeruice to ſhake hand with labour, for euer, thinking it a diſgrace for himſelfe to returne vnto his former trade) that except ſome better order be taken, or the lawes alreadie made be better executed, ſuch as dwell in vplandiſh townes and little villages ſhall liue but in ſmall ſafetie and reſt. For the better apprehenſion alſo of theeues and mankillers, there is an old law in England verie well prouided, whereby it is ordered, that if he that is robbed, or anie man complaine and giue warning of ſlaughter or murther committed, the conſtable of the village whereunto he commeth and crieth for ſuccour, is to raiſe the pariſh about him, and to ſearch woods, groues, and all ſuſpected houſes and places, where the treſpaſſer may be, or is ſuppoſed to lurke; and not finding him there, he is to giue warning vnto the next conſtable, and ſo one conſtable after ſerch made to aduertiſe another from pariſh to pariſh, till they come to the ſame where the offendor is harbored and found. It is alſo prouided, that if anie pariſh in this buſineſſe do not his dutie, but ſuffereth the theefe (for the auoiding of trouble ſake) in carrieng him to the gaile, if he ſhould be apprehended, or other letting of their worke, to eſcape the ſame pariſh, is not onlie to make fine to the king, but alſo the ſame with the whole hundred wherein it ſtandeth, to repaie the partie robbed his damages, and leaue his eſtate harmleſſe. Certes this is a good law, howbeit I haue knowne by mine owne experience, fellons being taken to haue eſcaped out of the ſtocks, being reſcued by other for want of watch & gard, that theeues haue beene let paſſe, becauſe the couetous and greedie pariſhoners would neither take the paines, nor be at the charge to carrie them to priſon, if it were far off, that when hue and crie haue beene made euen to the faces of ſome conſtables, they haue ſaid; God reſtore your loſſe, I haue other buſineſſe at this time. And by ſuch meanes the meaning of manie a good law is left vnexecuted, malefactors imboldened, and manie a poore man turned out of that which he hath ſwet and taken great paines for, toward the maintenance of himſelfe and his poore children and familie.

Of the maner of building and furniture of our houſes.

Chap. 12.

THe greateſt part of our building in the cities and good townes of England conſiſteth onelie of timber, for as yet few of the houſes of the communaltie (except here & there in the Weſt countrie townes) are made of ſtone, although they may (in my opinion) in diuerſe other places be builded ſo good cheape of the one as of the other. In old time the houſes of the Britons were ſlightlie ſet vp with a few poſts & many radels, with ſtable and all offices vnder one rooſe, the like whereof almoſt is to be ſéene in the fennie countries and northerne parts vnto this daie, where for lacke of wood they are inforced to continue this ancient maner of building. It is not in vaine therefore in ſpeaking of building to make a diſtinction betweéne the plaine and woddie ſoiles: for as in theſe, our houſes are commonlie ſtrong and well timbered, ſo that in manie places, there are not aboue foure, ſix, or nine inches betweéne ſtud and ſtud; ſo in the open and champaine countries they are inforced for want of ſtuffe to vſe no ſtuds at all, but onlie ſtranke poſts, railins, beames, prickepoſts, groundſels, ſummers (or dormants) tranſoms, and ſuch principals, with here and there a girding, whervnto they faſten their ſplints or radels, and then call it all ouer with thicke claie to keepe out the wind, which otherwiſe would annoie them. Certes this rude kind of building made the Spaniards in quéene Maries daies to wonder, but cheéflie when they ſaw what large diet was vſed in manie of theſe ſo homelie cottages, in ſo much that one of no ſmall reputation amongſt them ſaid after this maner: Theſe Engliſh (quoth he) haue their houſes made of ſticks and durt, but they fare commonlie ſo well as the king. Whereby it appeareth that he liked better of our good fare in ſuch courſe cabins, than of their owne thin diet in their princelike habitations and palaces. In like ſort as euerie countrie houſe is thus apparelled on the out ſide, ſo is it inwardlie diuided into ſundrie roomes aboue and beneath; and where plentie of wood is, they couer them with tiles, otherwiſe with ſtraw, ſedge, or reed, except ſome quarrie of ſlate be nére hand, from whence they haue for their monie ſo much as may ſuffice them.

The claie wherewith our houſes are impanelled is either white, red, or blue, and of theſe the firſt doth participat verie much with the nature of our chalke, the ſecond is called lome, but the third eſtſoones changeth colour ſo ſone as it is wrought, notwithſtanding that it looke blue when it is throwne out of the pit. Of chalke alſo we haue our excellent Aſbeſtos or white lime, made in moſt places, wherewith being quenched we ſtrike ouer our claie workes and ſtone wals, in cities, good townes, rich farmers and gentlemens houſes: otherwiſe in ſtéed of chalke (where it wanteth for it is ſo ſcant that in ſome places it is ſold by the pound) they are compelled to burne a certeine kind of red ſtone, as in Wales, and elſe where other ſtones and ſhels of oiſters and like fiſh found vpon the ſea coaſt, which being conuerted into lime doth naturallie (as the other) abhorre and eſchew water whereby it is diſſolued, and neuertheleſſe deſire oile wherewith it is eaſilie mixed, as I haue ſeene by experience. Within their doores alſo ſuch as are of abilitie do oft make their floores and parget of fine alabaſter burned, which they call plaſter of Paris, whereof in ſome places we haue great plentie, and that verie profitable againſt the rage of fire.

In plaſtering likewiſe of our faireſt houſes ouer our heads, we vſe to laie firſt a laine or two of white morter tempered with haire vpon laths, which are nailed one by another (or ſometimes vpon reed or wickers more dangerous for fire, and made faſt here and there with ſaplaths for falling downe) and finallie couer all with the aforeſaid plaſter, which beſide the delectable whiteneſſe of the ſtuffe it ſelfe, is laied on ſo euen and ſmoothlie, as nothing in my iudgment can be done with more exactneſſe. The wals of our houſes on the inner ſides in like ſort be either hanged with tapiſſerie, arras worke, or painted cloths, wherein either diuerſe hiſtories, or hearbes, beaſts, knots, and ſuch like are ſtained, or elſe they are ſeeled with oke of our owne, or waineſcot brought hither out of the eaſt countries, whereby the roomes are not a little commended, made warme, and much more cloſe than otherwiſe they would be. As for ſtoues we haue not hitherto vſed them greatlie, yet do they now begin to be made in diuerſe houſes of the gentrie and wealthie citizens, who build them not to worke and feed in as in Germanie and elſe where, but now and then to ſweat in, as occaſion and néed ſhall require it. This alſo hath béene common in England, contrarie to the cuſtomes of all other nations, and yet to be ſéene (for example in moſt ſtréets of London) that many of our greateſt houſes haue outwardlie béene verie ſimple and plaine to ſight, which inwardlie haue bene able to receiue a duke with his whole traine, and lodge them at their eaſe. Hereby moreouer it is come to paſſe, that the fronts of our ſtréets haue not béene ſo vniforme and orderlie builded as thoſe of forreine cities, where (to ſaie truth) the vtterſide of their manſions and dwellings haue oft more coſt beſtowed vpon them, than all the reſt of the houſe, which are often verie ſimple and vneaſie within, as experience doth confirme. Of old time our countrie houſes in ſtéed of glaſſe did vſe much lattiſe and that made either of wicker or fine riftes of oke in chekerwiſe. I read alſo that ſome of the better ſort, in and before the times of the Saxons (who notwithſtanding vſed ſome glaſſe alſo ſince the time of Benedict Biſcop the monke that brought the feat of glaſſing firſt into this land) did make panels of horne in ſtéed of glaſſe, & fix them in wodden calmes. But as horne in windowes is now quite laid downe in euerie place, ſo our lattiſes are alſo growne into leſſe vſe, bicauſe glaſſe is come to be ſo plentifull, and within a verie little ſo good cheape if not better then the other.

I find obſcure mention of the ſpecular ſtone alſo to haue béene found and aplied to this vſe in England, but in ſuch doubtfull ſort as I dare not affirme it for certeine. Neuertheleſſe certeine it is that antiquitie vſed it before glaſſe was knowen, vnder the name of Selenites. And how glaſſe was firſt found I care not greatlie to remember euen at this preſent, although it be directlie beſide my purpoſed matter. In Syria phenices which bordereth vpon Iurie, & nére to the ſot of mount Carmell there is a more or marris, wherout riſeth a brooke called ſomtime Belus, and falleth into the ſea nére to Ptolemais. This riuer was fondlie aſcribed vnto Baall, and alſo honored vnder that name by the infidels, long time before there was anie king in Iſraell. It came to paſſe alſo as a certeine merchant ſailed that waie laden with Nitrum, the paſſengers went to land for to repoſe themſelues, and to take in ſome ſtore of freſh water into their veſſell. Being alſo on the ſhore they kindled a fire, and made proviſion for their dinner, but bicauſe they wanted treuets or ſtones whereon to ſet their kettels on, ran by chance into the ſhip, and brought great peeces of Nitrum with him, which ſerued their turne for that preſent. To be ſhort, the ſaid ſubſtance being hot, and beginning to melt, it mixed by chance with the grauell that laie vnder it; and ſo brought forth that ſhining ſubſtance which now is called glaſſe, and about the time of Semiramis. When the companie ſaw this, they made no ſmall accompt of their ſucceſſe, and forthwith began to practiſe the like in other mixtures, whereby great varietie of the ſaid ſtuffe did alſo inſue. Certes for the time this hiſtorie may well be true: for I read of glaſſe in Iob, but for the reſt I refer me to the common opinion conceiued by writers. Now to turne againe to our windowes. Heretofore alſo the houſes of our princes and noble men were often glaſed with Berill (an example whereof is yet to be ſeene in Sudleie caſtell) and in diuerſe other places with fine chriſtall, but this eſpeciallie in the time of the Romans, whereof alſo ſome fragments haue beene taken vp in old ruines. But now theſe are not in vſe, ſo that onelie the cleareſt glaſſe is moſt eſteemed: for we haue diuerſe ſorts, ſome brought out of Burgundie, ſome out of Normandie, much out of Flanders, beſide that which is made in England, which would be ſo good as the beſt, if we were diligent and carefull to beſtow more coſt vpon it, and yet as it is, each one that may, will haue it for his building. Moreouer the manſion houſes of our countrie townes and villages (which in champaine ground ſtand altogither by ſtreets, & ioining one to an other, but in woodland ſoiles diſperſed here and there, each one vpon the ſeuerall grounds of their owners) are builded in ſuch ſort generallie, as that they haue neither dairie, ſtable, nor brewhouſe annered vnto them vnder the ſame roofe (as in manie places beyond the ſea & ſome of the north parts of our countrie) but all ſeparate from the firſt, and one of them from an other. And yet for all this, they are not ſo farre diſtant in ſunder, but that the goodman lieng in his bed may lightlie heare what is done in each of them with eaſe, and call quicklie vnto his meinie if anie danger ſhould attach him.

The ancient manours and houſes of our gentlemen are yet and for the moſt part of ſtrong timber, in framing whereof our carpenters haue beene and are worthilie preferred before thoſe of like ſcience among all other nations. Howbeit ſuch as be latelie builded, are cõmonlie either of bricke or hard ſtone, or both; their romes large and comelie, and houſes of office further diſtant from their lodgings. Thoſe of the nobilitie are likewiſe wrought with bricke and hard ſtone, as prouiſion may beſt be made: but ſo magnificent and ſtatelie, as the baſeſt houſe of a baron doth often match in our daies with ſome honours of princes in old time. So that if euer curious building did floriſh in England, it is in theſe our yeares, wherin our workemen excell, and are in maner comparable in ſkill with old Vitruuius, Leo Baptiſta, and Serlo. Neuertheleſſe, their eſtimation more than their greedie and ſeruile couetouſneſſe, ioined with a lingering humour cauſeth them often to be reiected, & ſtrangers preferred to greater bargaines, who are more reaſonable in their takings, and leſſe waſters of time by a great deale than our owne.

The furniture of our houſes alſo exceedeth, and is growne in maner euen to paſſing delicacie: and herein I doo not ſpeake of the nobilitie and gentrie onelie, but likewiſe of the loweſt ſort in moſt places of our ſouth countrie, that haue anie thing at all to take to. Certes in noble mens houſes it is not rare to ſee abundance of Arras, rich hangings of tapiſtrie, ſiluer veſſell, and ſo much other plate, as may furniſh ſundrie cupboords, to the ſumme oftentimes of a thouſand or two thouſand pounds at the leaſt: whereby the value of this and the reſt of their ſtuffe doth grow to be almoſt ineſtimable. Likewiſe in the houſes of knights, gentlemen, merchantmen, and ſome other wealthie citizens, it is not geſon to behold generallie their great proniſion of tapiſtrie, Turkie worke, pewter, braſſe, fine linen, and thereto coſtlie cupboords of plate, worth fiue or ſir hundred or a thouſand pounds, to be deemed by eſtimation. But as herein all theſe ſorts doo far exceed their elders and predeceſſors, and in neatneſſe and curioſitie, the merchant all other; ſo in time paſt, the coſtlie furniture ſtaied there, whereas now it is deſcended yet lower, euen vnto the inferiour artificers and manie farmers, who by vertue of their old and not of their new leaſes haue for the moſt part learned alſo to garniſh their cupboords with plate, their ioined beds with tapiſtrie and ſilke hangings, and their tables with carpets & fine naperie, whereby the wealth of our countrie (God be praiſed therefore, and giue vs grace to imploie it well) doth infinitelie appeare. Neither doo I ſpeake this in reproch of anie man, God is my iudge, but to ſhew that I do reioiſe rather, to ſee how God hath bleſſed vs with his good gifts; and whileſt I behold how that in a time wherein all things are growen to moſt exceſſiue prices, & what commoditie ſo euer is to be had, is daille plucked from the communaltie by ſuch as looke into euerie trade, we doo yet find the means to obtein & atchiue ſuch furniture as heretofore hath beene vnpoſſible. There are old men yet dwelling in the village where I remaine, which haue noted three things to be marueilouſlie altered in England within their ſound remembrance; & other three things too too much increaſed. One is, the multitude of chimnies latelie erected, whereas in their yong daies there were not aboue two or three, if ſo manie in moſt vplandiſh townes of the realme (the religious houſes, & manour places of their lords alwaies excepted, and peraduenture ſome great perſonages) but ech one made his fire againſt a reredoſſe in the hall, where he dined and dreſſed his meat.

Three things greatlie amended in England.

Chimnies.

The ſecond is the great (although not generall) amendment of lodging, for (ſaid they) our fathers (yea and we our ſelues alſo) haue lien full oft vpon ſtraw pallets, on rough mats couered onelie with a ſheet vnder couerlets made of dagſwain or hopharlots (I vſe their owne termes) and a good round log vnder their heads in ſtead of a bolſter or pillow. If it were ſo that our fathers or the good man of the houſe, had within ſeuen yeares after his mariage purchaſed a matteres or flockebed, and thereto a ſacke of chaffe to reſt his head vpon, he thought himſelfe to be as well lodged as the lord of the towne, that peraduenture laie ſeldome in a bed of downe or whole fethers; ſo well were they contented, and with ſuch baſe kind of furniture: which alſo is not verie much amended as yet in ſome parts of Bedfordſhire, and elſewhere further off from our ſouthern parts. Pillowes (ſaid they) were thought meet onelie for women in childbed. As for ſeruants, if they had anie ſheet aboue them it was well, for ſeldome had they anie vnder their bodies, to keepe them from the pricking ſtraws that ran off through the canuas of the pallet, and raſed their hardened hides.

Hard lodging

The third thing they tell of, is the exchange of veſſell, as of treene platters into pewter, and wodden ſpoones into ſiluer or tin. For ſo common were all ſorts of treene ſtuffe in old time, that a man ſhould hardlie find foure peeces of pewter (of which one was peraduenture a ſalt) in a good farmers houſe, and yet for all this frugalitie (if it may ſo be iuſtlie called) they were ſcarſe able to liue and paie their rents at their daies without ſelling of a cow, or an horſſe, or more, although they paid but foure pounds at the vtter-

Furniture of houſehold.

This was in the time of generall idleneſſe.

most by the yeare. Such also was their pouertie, that if some one od farmer or husbandman had béene at the alehouse, a thing greatlie vsed in those daies, amongst six or seuen of his neighbours, and there in a brauerie to shew what store he had, did cast downe his purse, and therein a noble or six shillings in siluer vnto them (for few such men then cared for gold bicause it was not so readie paiment, and they were oft inforced to giue a penie for the exchange of an angell) it was verie likelie that all the rest could not laie downe so much against it: whereas in my time, although peraduenture foure pounds of old rent be improued to fortie, fiftie, or an hundred pounds, yet will the farmer as another palme or date tree thinke his gaines verie small toward the end of his terme, if he haue not six or seuen yeares rent lieng by him, therewith to purchase a new lease, beside a faire garnish of pewter on his cupbord, with so much more in od vessell going about the house, three or foure featherbeds, so manie couerlids and carpets of tapistrie, a siluer salt, a bowle for wine (if not an whole neast) and a dozzen of spoones to furnish vp the suite. This also he taketh to be his owne cléere, for what stocke of monie soeuer he gathereth & laieth vp in all his yeares, it is often séene, that the landlord will take such order with him for the same, when he renueth his lease, which is commonlie eight or six yeares before the old be expired (sith it is now growen almost to a custome, that if he come not to his lord so long before, another shall step in for a reuersion, and so defeat him out right) that it shall neuer trouble him more than the haire of his beard, when the barber hath washed and shauen it from his chin. And as they commend these, so (beside the decaie of housekéeping whereby the poore haue bene relieued) they speake also of three things that are growen to be verie grieuous vnto them, to wit, the inhansing of rents, latelie mentioned; the dailie oppression of copiholders, whose lords séeke to bring their poore tenants almost into plaine seruitude and miserie, dailie deuising new meanes, and séeking vp all the old how to cut them shorter and shorter, doubling, trebling, and now & then seuen times increasing their fines, driuing them also for euerie trifle to lose and forfeit their tenures (by whome the greatest part of the realme doth stand and is mainteined) to the end they may fléece them yet more, which is a lamentable hering. The third thing they talke of is vsurie, a trade brought in by the Iewes, now perfectlie practised almost by euerie christian, and so commonlie that he is accompted but a fole that doth lend his monie for nothing. In time past it was Sors pro sorte, that is, the principall onelie for the principall; but now beside that which is aboue the principall properlie called Vsura, we chalenge Fœnus, that is commoditie of soile, & fruits of the earth, if not the ground it selfe. In time past also one of the hundred was much, from thence it rose vnto two, called in Latine Vsura, Ex sextante; three, to wit Ex quadrante; then to foure, to wit Ex triente; then to fiue, which is Ex quincunce; then to six, called Ex semisse, &c: as the accompt of the Assis ariseth, and comming at the last vnto Vsura ex asse, it amounteth to twelue in the hundred, and therefore the Latines call it Centesima, for that in the hundred moneth it doubleth the principall; but more of this elsewhere. Sée Cicero against Verres, Demosthenes against Aphobus, and Athenæus lib. 13. in fine: and when thou hast read them well, helpe I praie thée in lawfull maner to hang vp such as take Centũ pro cento, for they are no better worthie as I dow iudge in conscience. Forget not also such landlords as vse to value their leases at a secret estimation giuen of the wealth and credit of the taker, whereby they séeme (as it were) to eat them vp and deale with bondmen, so that if the leasse be thought to be worth an hundred pounds, he shall paie no lesse for his new terme, or else another to enter with hard and doubtfull couenants. I am sorie to report it, much more grieued to vnderstand of the practise; but most sorowfull of all to vnderstand that men of great port and countenance are so farre from suffering their farmers to haue anie gaine at all, that they themselues become grasiers, butchers, tanners, sheepmasters, woodmen, and denique quid non, thereby to inrich themselues, and bring all the wealth of the countrie into their owne hands, leauing the communaltie weake, or as an idoll with broken or feeble armes, which may in a time of peace haue a plausible shew, but when necessitie shall inforce, haue an heauie and bitter sequele.

By the yeare.

Of cities and townes in England.

Cap. 13.

Six and twentie cities in England.

AS in old time we read that there were eight and twentie flamines and archflamines in the south part of this Ile, and so manie great cities vnder their iurisdiction: so in these our daies there is but one or two fewer, and each of them also vnder the ecclesiasticall regiment of some one bishop or archbishop, who in spirituall cases haue the charge and ouersight of the same. So manie cities therefore are there in England and Wales, as there be bishoprikes & archbishoprikes. For notwithstanding that Lichfield and Couentrie, and Bath and Welles, do séeme to extend the aforesaid number vnto nine and twentie: yet neither of these couples are to be accounted, but as one entier citie and sée of the bishop, sith one bishoprike can haue relation but vnto one sée, and the said sée be situate but in one place, after which the bishop doth take his name. It appeareth by our old and ancient histories, that the cities of this southerlie portion haue bene of excéeding greatnesse and beautie, whereof some were builded in the time of the Samotheans, and of which not a few in these our times are quite decaied, and the places where they stood worne out of all remembrance. Such also for the most part as yet remaine are maruellouslie altered, insomuch that whereas at the first they were large and ample, now are they come either vnto a verie few houses, or appeare not to be much greater in comparison than poore & simple villages. Antoninus the most diligent writer of the thorough fares of Britaine, noteth among other these ancient townes following, as Sitomagus, which he placeth in the waie from Norwich, as Leland supposeth (wherin they went by Colchester) to London, Nouiomagus that lieth betweene Carleill and Canturburie, within ten miles east of London, and likewise Neomagus and Niomagus which take their names of their first founder Magus, the sonne of Samothes, & second king of the Celtes that reigned in this Iland; and not A profunditate, onelie, as Bodinus affirmeth out of Plinie, as if all the townes that ended in Magus should stand in holes and low grounds: which is to be disproued in diuerse cities in the maine, as also here with vs. Of these moreouer sir Thomas Eliot supposeth Neomagus to haue stood somewhere about Chester; & George Lillie in his booke of the names of ancient places, iudgeth Niomagus to be the verie same that we do now call Buckingham, and lieth farre from the shore. And as these and sundrie other now perished toke their denomination of this prince, so there are diuerse causes, which moue me to coniecture, that Salisburie doth rather take the first name of Sarron the sonne of the said Magus, than of Cæsar, Caradoc or Seuerus (as some of our writers do imagine) or else at the least wise of Salisburge of the maine, from whence some Sarons came to inhabit in this land. And for this later not vnlikelie, sith before the comming of the Sarons, the king of the Suessionenses had a great part of this Iland in subiection, as Cæsar saith; and in another place that such of Belgie as stale ouer hither from the maine, builded and called diuerse cities after the names of the same from whence they came, I meane such as stood vpon the coast, as he himselfe doth witnesse. But sith coniectures are no verities, and mine opinion is but one mans iudgement, I will not stand now vpon the proofe of this matter, least I should seeme to take great paines in adding new coniectures vnto old, in such wise to deteine the heads of my readers about these trifles, that otherwise peraduenture would be farre better occupied in matters of more importance. To proceed therefore. As some after the first inhabitation of this Iland, our cities began no doubt to be builded and increased, so they ceased not to multiplie from time to time, till the land was throughlie furnished with hir conuenient numbers, whereof some at this present with their ancient names, do still remaine in knowledge, though diuerse be doubted of, and manie more perished by continuance of time, and violence of the enimie. I doubt not also but the least of these were comparable to the greatest of those which stand in our time, for sith that in those daies the most part of the Iland was reserued vnto pasture, the townes and villages either were not at all (but all sorts of people dwelled in the cities indifferentlie, an image of which estate may yet be seene in Spaine) or at the least wise stood not so thicke, as they did afterward in the time of the Romans, but chéefelie after the comming of the Sarons, and after them the Normans, when euerie lord builded a church neare vnto his owne mansion house, and thereto imparted the greatest portion of his lands vnto sundrie tenants, to hold the same of him by copie of court roll, which rolles were then kept in some especiall place indifferentlie appointed by them and their lord, so that the one could haue no resort vnto them without the other, by which means the number of townes and villages was not a little increased. If anie man be desirous to know the names of those ancient cities, that stood in the time of the Romans, he shall haue them here at hand, in such wise as I haue gathered them out of our writers, obseruing euen their manner of writing of them so neare as to me is possible, without alteration of anie corruption crept vp into the same.

As for Cair Dorme (another whereof I read likewiſe) it ſtood ſomewhere vpon the Nene in Huntingdon ſhire, but now vnknowne, ſith it was twiſe raced to the ground, firſt by the Saxons, then by the Danes, ſo that the ruines thereof are in theſe daies not extant to be ſeene. And in like ſort I am ignorant where moſt of them ſtood, that are noted with the ſtar. I find in like ſort mention of a noble citie called Alcluid ouer and beſide theſe afore mentioned, ſometime builded by Ebracus of Britaine, as the fame goeth, and finallie deſtroied by the Danes, about the yeare of Grace 870. It ſtood vpon the banks of the riuer Cluda, to wit, betweene it and the blanke on the north, and the Lound lake on the weſt, and was ſometime march betweene the Britons and the Picts, and likewiſe the Picts and the Scots; neuertheleſſe, the caſtell (as I heare) doth yet remaine, and hath beene ſince well repared by the Scots, and called Dombrittain or Dunbritton, ſo that it is not an hard matter by theſe few words to find where Alcluid ſtood. I could here, if leiſure ſerued, and haſt of the printer not require diſpatch, deliuer the ancient names of ſundrie other townes, of which Stafford in time paſt was called Stadtford, and therfore (as I geſſe) builded or the name altered by the Saxons, Kinebanton now Kimbalton. But if anie man be deſirous to ſee more of them, let him reſort to Houeden in the life of Henrie the ſecond, and there he ſhall be farther ſatisfied of his deſire in this behalfe.

When Albane was martyred Aſclepiodotus was legat in Britaine.

It ſhould ſeeme when theſe ancient cities flouriſhed, that the ſame towne, which we now call ſaint Albons, did moſt of all excell: but cheefelie in the Romans time, and was not onelie nothing inferior to London it ſelfe, but rather preferred before it, becauſe it was newer, and made a Municipium of the Romans, whereas the other was old and ruinous, and inhabited onelie by the Britons, as the moſt part of the Iland was alſo in thoſe daies. God notice hereof alſo is to be taken by Matthew Paris, and others before him, out of whoſe writings I haue thought good to note a few things, whereby the maieſtie of this ancient citie may appeare vnto poſteritie, and the former eſtate of Verlamceſter not lie altogither (as it hath done hitherto) raked vp in forgetfulnes, through the negligence of ſuch as might haue deſerued better of their ſucceſſours, by leauing the deſcription thereof in a booke by it ſelfe, ſith manie particulars thereof were written to their hands, that now are loſt and periſhed. Tacitus in the fourteenth booke of his hiſtorie maketh mention of it, ſhewing that in the rebellion of the Britons, the Romans there were miſerablie diſtreſſed, Eadem clades (ſaith he) municipio Verolamio fuit. And herevpon Nennius in his catalog of cities calleth it Cair municip, as I before haue noted. Ptolome ſpeaking of it, doth place it among the Catyeuchlanes, but Antonius maketh it one and twentie Italian miles from London, placing Sullomaca nine mile from thence, whereby it is euident, that Sullomaca ſtood nere to Barnet, if it were not the verie ſame. Of the old compaſſe of the walles of Verolamium there is now ſmall knowledge to be had by the ruines, but of the beautie of the citie it ſelfe you ſhall partlie vnderſtand by that which followeth at hand, after I haue told you for your better intelligence what Municipium Romanorum is: for there is great difference betweene that and Colonia Romanorum, ſith Colonia aliò traducitur a ciuitate Roma, but Municipes aliunde in ciuitatem veniunt, ſuis, iuribus & legibus viuunt: moreouer their ſoile is not changed into the nature of the Romane, but they liue in the ſtedfaſt friendſhip and protection of the Romans, as did ſomtime the Ceretes who were the firſt people which euer obteined that priuilege. The Britiſh Verolamians therefore, hauing for their noble ſeruice in the warres deſerued great commendations at the hands of the Romans, they gaue vnto them the whole freedome of Romans, whereby they were made Municipes, and became more free in truth than their Colonies could be. To conclude therefore, Municipium is a citie infranchiſed and indued with Romane priuileges, without anie alteration of hir former inhabitants or priuileges; whereas a Colonie is a companie ſent from Rome into anie other region or prouince, to poſſeſſe either a citie newlie builded, or to replenith the ſame from whence hir former citizens haue beene expelled and driuen out. Now to proceed.

Sullomaca and Barnet all one, or not far in ſunder.

In the time of king Edgar it fell out, that one Eldred was abbat there; who being deſirous to inlarge that houſe, it came into his mind to ſearch about in the ruines of Verolamium (which now was ouerthrowne by the furie of the Saxons & Danes) to ſee if he might there come by anie curious peeces of worke, wherewith to garniſh his building taken in hand. To be ſhort, he had no ſooner begun to dig among the rubbiſh, but he found an exceeding number of pillers, peeces of antike worke, threſholds, doore frames, and ſundrie other peeces of fine maſonrie for windowes and ſuch like, verie conuenient for his purpoſe. Of theſe alſo ſome were of porphyrite ſtone, ſome of diuerſe kinds of marble, touch, and alabaſter, beſide manie curious deuiſes of hard mettall, in finding whereof he thought himſelfe an happie man, and his ſucceſſe to be greatlie guided by S. Albane. Beſides theſe alſo he found ſundrie pillers of braſſe, and ſockets of latton, alabaſter and touch, all which he laid aſide by great heaps, determining in the end (I ſaie) to laie the foundation of a new abbaie, but God ſo preuented his determination, that death tooke him awaie, before his building was begun. After him ſucceeded one Eadmerus, who followed the doings of Eldred to the vttermoſt: and therefore not onlie peruſed what he had left with great diligence, but alſo cauſed his pioners to ſearch yet further, within the old walles of Verolamium, where they not onelie found infinite other peeces of excellent workemanſhip, but came at the laſt to certeine vaults vnder the ground, in which ſtood diuers idols, and not a few altars, verie ſuperſtitiouſlie and religiouſlie adorned, as the pagans left them belike in time of neceſſitie. Theſe images were of ſundrie mettals, and ſome of pure gold, their altars likewiſe were richlie couered, all which ornaments Edmerus tooke awaie, and not onelie conuerted them to other vſe in his building, but alſo deſtroied an innumerable ſort of other idols, whoſe eſtimation conſiſted in their formes, and ſubſtances could doo no ſeruice. He tooke vp alſo ſundrie curious pots, iugs, and cruſes of ſtone and wood moſt artificiallie wrought and carued, and that in ſuch quantitie, beſides infinite ſtore of fine houſhold ſtuffe, as if the whole furniture of the citie had beene brought thither of purpoſe to be hidden in thoſe vaults. In proceeding further, he tooke vp diuerſe pots of gold, ſiluer, braſſe, glaſſe and earth, whereof ſome were filled with the aſhes and bones of the gentils, the mouths being turned downewards (the like of which, but of finer earth, were found in great numbers alſo of late in a well at little Wallingham in Norfolke, of ſix or eight gallons a peece, about the yeare 1578, and alſo in the time of Henrie the eight) and not a few with the coines of the old Britons and Romane emperours. All which veſſels the ſaid abbat brake into peeces, and melting the mettall, he reſerued it in like ſort for the garniſhing of his church.

He found likewiſe in a ſtone wall two old bookes, whereof one conteined the rites of the gentils, about the ſacrifices of their gods, the other (as they now ſaie) the martyrdome of ſaint Albane, both of them written in old Britiſh letters, which either becauſe no man then liuing could read them, or for that they were not worth the keeping, were both conſumed to aſhes, ſauing that a few notes were firſt taken out of this later, concerning the death of their Albane. This much haue I thought good to note of the former beautie of Verolamium, whereof infinite other tokens haue beene found ſince that time, and diuerſe within the memorie of man, of paſſing workemanſhip, the like whereof hath no where elſe beene ſeene in anie ruines within the compaſſe of this Ile, either for coſt or quantitie of ſtuffe.

This ſeemeth like a lie.

Furthermore, whereas manie are not afraid to ſaie that the Thames came ſometimes by this citie, indeed it is nothing ſo; but that the Uerlume (afterward called Uere and the Pure) did and doth ſo ſtill (whatſoeuer Gildas talketh hereof, whoſe booke may be corrupted in that behalfe) there is yet euident proofe to be confirmed by experience. For albeit that the riuer be now growne to be verie ſmall by reaſon of the ground about it, which is higher than it was in old time; yet it keepeth in maner the old courſe, and runneth betweene the old citie that was, and the new towne that is ſtanding on Holmehirſt crag, as I beheld of late. Thoſe places alſo which now are meadow beneath the abbaie, were ſometimes a great lake, mere, or pole, through which the ſaid riuer ran, and (as I read) with a verie ſwift and violent courſe, whereas at this preſent it is verie ſlow, and of no ſuch deapth as of ancient times it hath beene. But heare what mine author ſaith further of the ſame. As thoſe aforeſaid workemen digged in theſe ruines, they happened oftentimes vpon Lempet ſhels, peeces of ruſtie anchors, and keeles of great veſſels, whereupon ſome by and by gathered that either the Thames or ſome arme of the ſea did beat vpon that towne, not vnderſtanding that theſe things might aſwell happen in great lakes and meres, whereof there was one adioining to the north ſide of the citie, which laie then (as ſome men thinke) vnwalled, but that alſo is falſe. For being there vpon occaſion this ſummer paſſed, I ſaw ſome remnant of the old wals ſtanding in that place, which appeared to haue beene verie ſubſtantiallie builded; the ruines likewiſe of a greater part of them are to be ſeene running along by the old chappell hard by in maner of a banke. Whereby it is euident that the new towne ſtandeth cleane without the limits of the old, and that the bridge whereof the hiſtorie of S. Albane ſpeaketh, was at the nether end of Halliwell ſtreet or there about, for ſo the view of the place doth inforce me to coniecture. This mere (which the Latine copie of the deſcription of Britaine, written of late by Humfrey Lhoid our countrie man calleth corruptlie Stagnum enaximum for Stagnum maximum) at the firſt belonged to the king, and thereby Offa in his time did reape no ſmall commoditie. It continued alſo vntill the time of Alfrije the ſeuenth abbat of that houſe, who bought it outright of the king then liuing, and by exceſſiue charges drained it ſo narrowlie, that within a while he left it drie (ſauing that he reſerued a chanell for the riuer to haue hir vſuall courſe, which he held vp with high bankes) becauſe there was alwaies contention betweene the monks and the kings ſeruants, which fiſhed on that water vnto the kings behooſe.

In theſe daies therefore remaineth no maner mention of this poole, but onelie in one ſtreet, which yet is called Fiſhpoole ſtreet, whereof this may ſuffice for the reſolution of ſuch men, as ſeeke rather to yeeld to an inconuenience, than that their Gildas ſhould ſeeme to miſtake this riuer.

Hauing thus digreſſed to giue ſome remembrance of the old eſtate of Verolamium, it is now time to returne againe vnto my former purpoſe. Certes I would gladlie ſet downe with the names and number of the cities, all the townes and villages in England and Wales, with their true longitudes and latitudes, but as yet I cannot come by them in ſuch order as I would: howbeit the tale of our cities is ſome found by the biſhoprikes, ſith euerie ſee hath ſuch prerogatiue giuen vnto it, as to beare the name of a citie, & to vſe Regale ius within hir owne limits. Which priuilege alſo is granted to ſundrie ancient townes in England, eſpeciallie northward, where more plentie of them is to be found by a great deale than in the ſouth. The names therefore of our cities are theſe:

Whoſe particular plots and models with their deſcriptions ſhall inſue, if it may be brought to paſſe, that the cutters can make diſpatch of them before this chronologie be publiſhed. Of townes and villages likewiſe thus much will I ſaie, that there were greater ſtore in old time (I meane within three or foure hundred yeare paſſed) than at this preſent. And this I note out of diuerſe records, charters, and donations (made in times paſt vnto ſundrie religious houſes, as Glaſſenburie, Abbandon, Ramſeie, Elie, and ſuch like) and whereof in theſe daies I find not ſo much as the ruines. Leland in ſundrie places complaineth likewiſe of the decaie of pariſhes in great cities and townes, miſſing in ſome ſix, or eight, or twelue churches and more, of all which he giueth particular notice. For albeit that the Saxons builded manie townes and villages, and the Normans well more at their firſt comming, yet ſince the firſt two hundred yeares after the latter conqueſt, they haue gone ſo faſt againe to decaie, that the ancient number of them is verie much abated. Ranulph the monke of Cheſter telleth of generall ſurueie made in the fourth, ſirteenth, & nineteenth of the reigne of William Conqueror, ſurnamed the Baſtard, wherein it was found, that (notwithſtanding the Danes had ouerthrowne a great manie) there were to the number of 52000 townes, 45002 parith churches, and 75000 knights fées, whereof the cleargie held 28015. He addeth moreouer that there were diuerſe other builded ſince that time, within the ſpace of an hundred yeares after the comming of the Baſtard, as it were in lieu or recompenſe of thoſe that William Rufus pulled downe for the erection of his new forreſt. For by an old booke which I haue, and ſometime written as it ſeemeth by an vnderſhriffe of Nottingham, I find, euen in the time of Edw. 4. 45120 parith churches, and but 60216 knights fées, whereof the cleargie held as before 28015, or at the leaſt 28000: for ſo ſmall is the difference which he doth ſeeme to vſe. Howbeit if the aſſertions of ſuch as write in our time concerning this matter, either are or ought to be of anie credit in this behalfe, you ſhall not find aboue 17000 townes and villages, and 9210 in the whole, which is little more than a fourth part of the aforeſaid number, if it be throughlie ſcanned.

Certes this miſfortune hath not onelie happened vnto our Ile & nation, but vnto moſt of the famous countries of the world heretofore, and all by the grédie deſire of ſuch as would liue alone and onelie to themſelues. And hereof we may take example in Candie of old time called Creta, which (as Homer writeth) was called Hetacompolis, becauſe it conteined an hundred cities, but now it is ſo vnfurniſhed that it may hardlie be called Tripolis. Diodorus Siculus ſaith, that Aegypt had once 18000 cities, which ſo decaied in proceſſe of time, that when Ptolomeus Lagus reigned, there were not aboue 3000: but in our dates both in all Aſia & Aegypt this leſſer number ſhall not verie readilie be found. In time paſt in Lincolne (as the fame goeth) there haue béene two and fiftie parith churches, and good record appeareth for eight and thirtie: but now if there be foure and twentie it is all. This inconuenience hath growen altogither to the church by appropriations made vnto monaſteries and religious houſes, a terrible canker and enimie to religion.

But to leaue this lamentable diſcourſe of ſo notable and gréeuous an inconuenience, growing (as I ſaid) by incrotching and ioining of houſe to houſe, and laieng land to land, whereby the inhabitants of manie places of our countrie are deuoured and eaten vp, and their houſes either altogither pulled downe or ſuffered to decaie by litle and litle, although ſometime a poore man peraduenture dooth dwell in one of them, who not being able to repare it, ſuffereth it to fall downe, & thereto thinketh himſelfe verie friendlie dealt withall, if he may haue an acre of ground aſſigned vnto him whereon to kéepe a cow, or wherein to ſet cabbages, radiſhes, parſneps, carrets, melons, pompons, or ſuch like ſtuffe, by which he and his poore houſehold liueth as by their principall food, ſith they can doo no better. And as for wheaten bread, they eat it when they can reach vnto the price of it, contenting themſelues in the meane time with bread made of otes or barleie: a poore eſtate God wot! Howbeit what care our great incrochers? But in diuers places where rich men dwelled ſometime in good tenements, there be now no houſes at all, but hoppards, and theads for poles, or peraduenture gardens, as we may ſée in caſtell Hedingham, and diuerſe other places. But to proceed.

It is ſo, that our ſoile being diuided into champaine ground and woodland, the houſes of the firſt lie vniformelie builded in euerie towne together with ſtréets and lanes, whereas in the woodland countries (except here and there in great market townes) they ſtand ſcattered abroad, each one dwelling in the midſt of his owne occupieng. And as in manie and moſt great market townes, there are commonlie three hundred or foure hundred families or manſions, & two thouſand communicants, or peraduenture more: ſo in the other, whether they be woodland or champaine, we find not often aboue fortie, fiftie, or three ſcore houſeholds, and two or three hundred communicants, whereof the greateſt part neuertheleſſe are verie poore folkes, oftentimes without all maner of occupieng, ſith the ground of the parith is gotten vp into a few mens hands, yea ſometimes into the tenure of one, two or three, whereby the reſt are compelled either to be hired ſeruants vnto the other, or elſe to beg their bread in miſerie from doore to doore.

There are ſome (ſaith Leland) which are not ſo fauourable when they haue gotten ſuch lands, as to let the houſes remaine vpon them to the vſe of the poore; but they will compound with the lord of the ſoile to pull them downe for altogither, ſaieng that if they did let them ſtand, they ſhould but toll beggers to the towne, therby to ſurcharge the reſt of the parith, & laie more burden vpon them. But alas theſe pitifull men ſée not that they themſelues hereby do laie the greateſt log vpon their neighbors necks. For ſith the prince dooth commonlie loſe nothing of his duties accuſtomable to be paid, the reſt of the pariſhioners that remaine muſt anſwer and beare them out: for they plead more charge other waies, ſaieng; I am charged alreadie with a light horſſe, I am to anſwer in this ſort and after that maner. And it is not yet altogither out of knowledge, that where the king had ſeuen pounds thirteene ſhillings at a taſke gathered of fiftie wealthie houſeholders of a parith in England: now a gentleman hauing three parts of the towne in his owne hands, foure houſholds do beare all the aforeſaid paiment, or elſe Leland is deceiued in his Commentaries lib. 13. latelie come to my hands, which thing he eſpeciallie noted in his trauell ouer this Ile. A common plague & enormitie, both in the hart of the land and likewiſe vpon the coaſts. Certes a great number complaine of the increaſe of pouertie, laieng the cauſe vpon God, as though he were in fault for ſending ſuch increaſe of people, or want of wars that ſhould conſume them, affirming that the land was neuer ſo full, &c: but few men do ſée the verie root from whence it dooth proceed. Yet the Romans found it out, when they flouriſhed, and therefore preſcribed limits to euerie mans tenure and occupieng. Homer commendeth Achilles for ouerthrowing of fiue and twentie cities: but in mine opinion Ganges is much better preferred by Suidas for building of three ſcore in Inde, where he did plant himſelfe. I could (if néed required) ſet downe in this place the number of religious houſes and monaſteries, with the names of their founders that haue béene in this Iland: but ſith it is a thing of ſmall importance, I paſſe it ouer as impertinent to my purpoſe. Yet herein I will commend ſundrie of the monaſticall votaries, eſpeciallie monkes, for that they were authors of manie goodlie bookes and profitable wares, néere vnto their dwellings, although otherwiſe they pretended to be men ſeparated from the world. But alas their couetous minds one waie in inlarging their reuenues, and carnall intent another, appeered herin to too much. For being hold from time to time to viſit their tenants, they wrought oft great great wickednesse, and made those endwares little better than brodelhouses, especiallie where nunries were farre off, or else no safe accesse vnto them. But what doo I spend my time in the rehearsall of these filthinesses? Would to God the memorie of them might perish with the malefactors! My purpose was also at the end of this chapter to haue set downe a table of the parish churches and market townes thorough out all England and Wales: but sith I can not performe the same as I would, I am forced to giue ouer my purpose: yet by these few that insue you shall easilie see what order I would haue vsed according to the shires, if I might haue brought it to passe.

Of castels and holds.

Chap. 14.

IT hath béene of long time a question in controuersie, and not yet determined, whether holds and castels néere cities or anie where in the hart of common-wealths, are more profitable or hurtfull for the benefit of the countrie: Nevertheles it séemeth by our owne experience that we here in England suppose them altogither vnnédfull. This also is apparant by the testimonie of sundrie writers, that they haue béene the ruine of manie a noble citie. Of old Salisburie I speake not, of Anwarpe I saie nothing more than of sundrie other, whereof some also in my time neuer cease to incroch vpon the liberties of the cities adioining, thereby to hinder them what and wherin they may. For my part I neuer read of anie castell that did good vnto the citie abutting theron, but onelie the capitoll of Rome: and yet but once good vnto the same, in respect of the nine times whereby it brought it into danger of vtter ruine and confusion. Aristotle vtterlie denieth that anie castle at all can be profitable to a common wealth well gouerned. Timotheus of Corinthum affirmeth, that a castle in a common wealth is but a bréeder of tyrants. Pyrhus king of Epire being receiued also on a time into Athens, among other courtesies shewed vnto him, they led him also into their castell of Pallas, who at his departure gaue them great thanks for the frendlie intertainment; but with this item, that they should let so few kings come into the same as they might, least (saith he) they teach you to repent too late of your great gentlenesse. Caietanus in his common-wealth hath finallie no liking of them, as appéereth in his eight booke of that most excellent treatise. But what haue I to deale whether they be profitable or not, sith my purpose is rather to shew what plentie we haue of them, which I will performe so far as shall be nédfull.

There haue béene in times past great store of castels & places of defense within the realme of England, of which some were builded by the Britons, manie by the Romans, Saxons, and Danes, but most of all by the barons of the realme, in & about the time of king Stephan, who licenced each of them to build so manie as them liked vpon their owne demeasnes, hoping thereby that they would haue imploied their vse to his aduantage and commoditie. But finallie when he saw that they were rather fortified against himselfe in the end, than vsed in his defense, he repented all too late of his inconsiderate dealing, sith now there was no remedie but by force for to subdue them. After his decease king Henrie the second came no sooner to the crowne, but he called to mind the inconuenience which his predecessour had suffered, and he himselfe might in time sustaine by those fortifications. Therefore one of the first things he did was an attempt to race and deface the most part of these holds. Certes he thought it better to hazard the méeting of the enimie now and then in the plaine field, than to liue in perpetuall feare of those houses, and the rebellion of his lords vpon euerie light occasion conceiued, who then were full so strong as he, if not more strong; and that made them the readier to withstand and gainesaie manie of those procéedings, which he and his successours from time to time intended. Herevpon therefore he caused more than eleuen hundred of their said castels to be raced and ouerthrowne, whereby the power of his nobilitie was not a little restreined. Since that time also, not a few of those which remained, haue decaied, partlie by the commandement of Henrie the third, and partlie of themselues, or by conuersion of them into the dwelling houses of noble men, their martiall fronts being remoued: so that at this present, there are verie few or no castels at all maintained within England, sauing onelie vpon the coasts and marches of the countrie for the better kéeping backe of the forren enimie, when soeuer he shall attempt to enter and annoie vs.

The most prouident prince that euer reigned in this land, for the fortification thereof against all outward enimies, was the late prince of famous memorie king Henrie the eight, who beside that he repared most of such as were alreadie standing, builded sundrie out of the ground. For hauing shaken off the more than seruile yoke of popish tyrannie, and espieng that the emperour was offended for his diuorce from quéene Catharine his aunt, and thereto vnderstanding that the French king had coupled the Dolphin his sonne with the popes neece, and maried his daughter to the king of Scots (whereby he had cause more iustlie to suspect than safelie to trust anie one of them all as Lambert saith) he determined to stand vpon his owne defense, and therefore with no small speed, and like charge, he builded sundrie blockehouses, castels, and platformes vpon diuerse frontiers of his realme, but chieflie the east and southeast parts of England, whereby (no doubt) he did verie much qualifie the conceiued grudges of his aduersaries, and vtterlie put off their hastie purpose of inuasion. But would to God he had cast his eie toward Harwich, and the coasts of Norffolke and Suffolke, where nothing as yet is done: albeit there be none so fit and likelie places for the enimie to enter vpon, as in those parts, where, at a full sea they may touch vpon the shore and come to land without resistance. And thus much briefflie for my purpose at this present. For I néed not to make anie long discourse of castels,

The best keepers of kingdomes.

The wandles in time past were called windles.

ſtels, ſith it is not the nature of a good Engliſhman to regard to be caged vp as in a coope, and hedged in with ſtone wals, but rather to meet with his enimie in the plaine field at handſtrokes, where he may trauaile his ground, chooſe his plot, and vſe the benefit of ſunne ſhine, wind and weather, to his beſt aduantage & commoditie. Iſocrates alſo ſaith that towres, walles, bulworkes, ſoldiers, and plentie of armour, are not the beſt keepers of kingdomes; but freends, loue of ſubiects, & obedience vnto martiall diſcipline, which they want that ſhew themſelues either cruell or couetous toward their people. As for thoſe tales that go of Beſton caſtell, how it ſhall ſaue all England on a date, and likewiſe the brag of a rebellious baron in old time named Hugh Bigot, that ſaid in contempt of king Henrie the third, and about the ſixth yeare of his reigne:

The beſt keepers of kingdomes.

If I were in my caſtell of Bungeie,
Vpon the water of Waueneie,
I wold not ſet a button by the king of Cockneie,

I repute them but as toies, the firſt mere vaine, the ſecond fondlie vttered if anie ſuch thing were ſaid, as manie other words are and haue beene ſpoken of like holds (as Wallingford, &c:) but now growen out of memorie, and with ſmall loſſe not heard of among the common ſort. Certes the caſtell of Bungeie was ouerthrowen by the aforeſaid prince, the ſame yeare that he ouerthrew the walles and caſtell of Leiceſter, alſo the caſtels of Treſke and Paleſar, apperteining to Roger Mowbraie, and that of Fremlingham belonging likewiſe to Hugh Bigot, wherof in the chronologie following you may read at large. I might here in like ſort take occaſion to ſpeake of ſundrie ſtrong places where camps of men haue lien, and of which we haue great plentie here in England in the plaine fields: but I paſſe ouer to talke of any ſuch needleſſe diſcourſes. This neuertheleſſe concerning two of them is not to be omitted, to wit, that the one nere vnto Cambridge now Gogmagogs hill, was called Windleburie before time, as I read of late in an old pamphlet. And to ſaie the truth I haue often heard them named Winterburie hilles, which difference may eaſilie grow by corruption of the former word: the place likewiſe is verie large and ſtrong. The ſecond is to be ſeene in the edge of Shropſhire about two miles from Colme, betweene two riuers, the Clun or Colunus, and the Tewie otherwiſe named Themis, wherevnto there is no acceſſe but at one place. The Welſhmen call it Cair Caradoc, and they are of the opinion, that Caractatus king of the Sillures was ouercome there by Oſtorius, at ſuch time as he fled to Cartimanda queene of the Brigants for ſuccour, who betraied him to the Romans, as you may ſee in Tacitus.

The wandles in time paſt were called windles.

Of palaces belonging to the prince.

Chap. 15.

IT lieth not in me to ſet down exactlie the number & names of the palaces belonging to the prince, nor to make anie deſcription of hir graces court, ſith my calling is and hath beene ſuch, as that I haue ſcarſelie preſumed to peepe in at hir gates, much leſſe then haue I aduentured to ſearch out and know the eſtate of thoſe houſes, and what magnificent behauiour is to be ſeene within them. Yet thus much will I ſaie generallie of all the houſes and honours perteining to hir maieſtie, that they are builded either of ſquare ſtone or bricke, or elſe of both. And therevnto although their capacitie and hugeneſſe be not ſo monſtrous, as the like of diuerſe forren princes are to be ſeene in the maine, and new found nations of the world: yet are they ſo curious, neat, and commodious as anie of them, both for conueiance of offices and lodgings, and excellencie of ſituation, which is not the leaſt thing to be conſidered of in building. Thoſe that were builded before the time of king Henrie the eight, reteine to theſe daies the ſhew and image of the ancient kind of workemanſhip vſed in this land: but ſuch as he erected after his owne deuiſe (for he was nothing inferiour in this trade to Adrian the emperour and Iuſtinian the lawgiuer) doo repreſent another maner of paterne, which as they are ſuppoſed to exceſſe all the reſt that he found ſtanding in this realme, ſo they are and ſhall be a perpetuall preſident vnto thoſe that doo come after, to follow in their workes and buildings of importance. Certes maſonrie did neuer better flouriſh in England than in his time. And albeit that in theſe daies there be manie goodlie houſes erected in the ſundrie quarters of this Iland; yet they are rather curious to the eie like paper worke, than ſubſtantiall for continuance: whereas ſuch as he did ſet vp excell in both, and therefore may iuſtlie be preferred farre aboue all the reſt. The names of thoſe which come now to my remembrance, and are as yet reſerued to hir maieſties onelie vſe at pleaſure are theſe: for of ſuch as are giuen awaie I ſpeake not, neither of thoſe that are vtterlie decaied, as Bainards caſtell in London builded in the daies of the Conquerour by a noble man called William Bainard, whoſe wife Inga builded the priorie of litle Donemow in the daies of Henrie the firſt; neither of the tower roiall there alſo, &c: ſith I ſee no cauſe wherefore I ſhould remember them and manie of the like, of whoſe verie ruines I haue no certeine knowledge. Of ſuch I ſaie therfore as I erſt mentioned, we haue firſt of all White hall at the weſt end of London (which is taken for the moſt large & principall of all the reſt) was firſt a lodging of the archbiſhops of Yorke, then pulled downe, begun by cardinall Wolſeie, and finallie inlarged and finiſhed by king Henrie the eight. By eaſt of this ſtandeth Durham place, ſometime belonging to the biſhops of Durham, but conuerted alſo by king Henrie the eight into a palace roiall, & lodging for the prince. Of Summerſet place I ſpeake not, yet if the firſt beginner thereof (I meane the lord Edward, the learned and godlie duke of Summerſet) had liued, I doubt not but it ſhould haue beene well finiſhed and brought to a ſumptuous end: but as vntimelie death tooke him from that houſe & from vs all, ſo it prooued the ſtaie of ſuch proceeding as was intended about it. Wherby it commeth to paſſe that it ſtandeth as he left it. Neither will I remember the Tower of London, which is rather an armorie and houſe of munition, and therevnto a place for the ſafekeeping of offendors, than a palace roiall for a king or queene to ſoiourne in. Yet in times paſt I find that Belline held his aboad there, and therevnto extended the ſite of his palace in ſuch wiſe, that it ſtretched ouer the Broken wharfe, and came further into the citie, in ſo much that it approched nere to Bellines gate, & as it is thought ſome of the ruines of his houſe are yet extant, howbeit patched vp and made warehouſes in that tract of ground in our times. S. James ſometime a nonrie, was builded alſo by the ſame prince. Hir grace hath alſo Otelande, Aſhridge, Hatfield, Hauering, Enuelde, Eltham, Langleie, Richmond builded by Henrie the firſt, Hampton court (begun ſometime by cardinall Wolſeie, and finiſhed by hir father) and therevnto Woodſtocke, erected by king Henrie the first, in which the quænes maiestie delighteth greatlie to sojourne, notwithstanding that in time past it was the place of a parcell of hir captivitie, when it pleased God to trie hir by affliction and calamitie.

Windsor. For strength Windlesor or Winsor is supposed to be the cheefe, a castell builded in time past by king Arthur, or before him by Aruiragus, as it is thought, and repared by Edward the third, who erected also a notable college there. After him diuerse of his successours haue bestowed exceeding charges vpon the same, which notwithstanding are farre surmounted by the quænes maiestie now liuing, who hath appointed huge summes of monie to be employed vpon the ornature and alteration of the mould, according to the forme of building vsed in our daies, which is more for pleasure than for either profit or safegard. Such also hath béene the estimation of this place, that diuerse kings haue not onelie béene interred there, but also made it the cheefe house of assemblie, and creation of the knights of the honorable order of the garter, than the which there is nothing in this land more magnificent and statelie.

Grenewich. Greenewith was first builded by Humfreis duke of Glocester, vpon the Thames side foure miles east from London, in the time of Henrie the first, and called Pleasance. Afterwards it was greatlie inlarged by king Edw. 4. garnished by king Hen. 7. and finallie made perfect by king Hen. 8. the onelie Phenix of his time for fine and curious masonrie.

Dartford. Not farre from this is Dartford, and not much distant also from the southside of the said streame, sometime a nonnerie builded by Edward the third, but now a verie commodious palace, whereunto it was Eltham. also conuerted by K. Henrie the eight. Eltham (as I take it) was builded by king Henrie the third, if not before. There are beside these moreouer diuerse other. But what shall I need to take vpon me to repeat all, and tell what houses the quenes maiestie hath: sith all is hirs, and when it pleaseth hir in the summer season to recreat hir selfe abroad, and view the estate of the countrie, and heare the complaints of hir poore commons iniuried by hir vniust officers or their substitutes, euerie noble mans house is hir palace, where shee continueth during pleasure, and till shee returne againe to some of hir owne, in which she remaineth so long as pleaseth hir.

Of the court. The court of England, which necessarilie is holden alwaies where the prince lieth, is in these daies one of the most renowmed and magnificent courts that are to be found in Europe. For whether you regard the rich and infinit furniture of household, order of officers, or the interteinement of such strangers as dailie resort vnto the same, you shall not find manie equall thereunto, much lesse one excelling it in anie maner of wise. I might here (if I would, or had sufficient disposition of matter conceiued of the same) make a large discourse of such honorable ports, of such graue councellors, and noble personages, as giue their dailie attendance vpon the quénes maiestie there. I could in like sort set forth a singular commendation of the vertuous beautie, or beautifull vertues of such ladies and gentlewomen as wait vpon hir person, betweene whose amiable countenances and costlinesse of attire, there séemeth to be such a dailie conflict and contention, as that it is verie difficult for me to gesse, whether of the twaine shall beare awaie the prehéminence. This further is English courtiers the best learned & the worst liuers. not to be omitted, to the singular commendation of both sorts and sexes of our courtiers here in England, that there are verie few of them, which haue not the vse and skill of sundrie speaches, beside an excellent veine of writing before time not regarded. Would to God the rest of their liues and conuersations were correspondent to these gifts! for as our common courtiers (for the most part) are the best learned and indued with excellent gifts, so are manie of them the worst men when they come abroad, that anie man shall either heare or read of. Trulie it is a rare thing with vs now, to heare of a courtier which hath but his owne language. And to saie how many gentlewomen and ladies there are, that beside sound knowledge of the Greeke and Latine tongs, are thereto no lesse skilfull in the Spanish, Italian, and French, or in some one of them, it resteth not in me: sith I am persuaded, that as the noble men and gentlemen doo surmount in this behalfe, so these come verie little or nothing at all behind them for their parts, which industrie God continue, and accomplish that which otherwise is wanting!

Beside these things I could in like sort set downe the waies and meanes, wherby our ancient ladies of the court doo shun and auoid idleneste, some of them exercising their fingers with the needle, other in caul worke, diuerse in spinning of silke, some in continuall reading either of the holie scriptures, or histories of our owne or forren nations about vs, and diuerse in writing volumes of their owne, or translating of other mens into our English and Latine tong, whilest the youngest sort in the meane time applie their lutes, citharnes, prickesong, and all kind of musike, which they vse onelie for recreation sake, when they haue leisure, and are free from attendance vpon the quénes maiestie, or such as they belong vnto. How manie of the eldest sort also are skilfull in surgerie and distillation of waters, beside sundrie other artificiall practises perteining to the ornature and commendations of their bodies, I might (if I listed to deale further in this behalfe) easilie declare, but I passe ouer such maner of dealing, least I should séeme to glauer, and currie fauour with some of them. Neuertheless this I will generallie saie of them all, that as ech of them are cuning in somthing wherby they kéepe themselues occupied in the court, so there is in maner none of them, but when they be at home, can helpe to supplie the ordinarie want of the kitchen with a number of delicat dishes of their owne deuising, wherein the Portingall is their chéefe counsellor, as some of them are most commonlie with the clearke of the kitchen, who vseth (by a tricke taken vp of late) to giue in a brééfe rehearsall of such and so manie dishes as are to come in at euerie course throughout the whole seruice in the dinner or supper while: which bill some doo call a memoriall, other a billet, but some a fillet, bicause such are commonlie hanged on the file, and kept by the ladie or gentlewoman vnto some other purpose. But whither am I digressed?

Traines of attendants.

I might finallie describe the large allowances in offices, and yearelie liueries, and thereunto the great plentie of gold and siluer plate, the seuerall peeces whereof are commonlie so great and massie, and the quantitie therof so abundantlie seruing all the household, that (as I suppose) Cyrus, Cresus, and Crassus had not the like furniture: naie if Midas were now liuing & once againe put to his choise, I thinke he could aske no more, or rather not halfe so much as is there to be seene and vsed. But I passe ouer to make such needlesse discourses, resoluing my selfe, that euen in this also, as in all the rest, the exceeding mercie and louing kindnesse of God doth wonderfullie appéere towards vs, in that he hath so largelie indued vs with these his so ample benefits.

In some great princes courts beyond the seas, & which euen for that cause are likened vnto hell by diuerse learned writers that haue spent a great part of their time in them, as Henricus Cornelius Agrippa, one (for example) who in his epistle Ad aulicum quendam dam, ſaith thus: An non in inferno es amice, qui es in aula, vbi dæmonum habitatio eſt, qui illic ſuis artibus humana licèt effigie regnant, atque vbi ſcelerum ſchola eſt, & animarum iactura ingens, ac quicquid vſpiam eſt perfidiæ ac doli, quicquid crudelitatis & inclemẽtiæ, quicquid effrænatæ ſuperbiæ, & rapacis auariciæ, quicquid obſcenæ libidinis fœdiſſimæ impudicitiæ, quicquid nefandæ impietatis, & morum peſſimorum, totum illic acerruatur cumulatiſſimè, vbi ſtupra, raptus, incęſtus, adulteria, principum & nobilium ludi ſunt, vbi faſtus & tumor, ira, liuor, fœdáque cupido cum ſocijs ſuis imperauit, vbi criminum omnium procellæ virtutumque omnium inenarrabile naufragium, &c. In ſuch great princes courts (I ſaie) it is a woꝛld to ſée what lewd behauiour is vſed among diuerſe of thoſe that reſoꝛt vnto the ſame, and what whoꝛedome, ſwearing, ribaldꝛie, atheiſme, dicing, carding, carowſing, dꝛunkennelle, gluttonie, quarelling, and ſuch like inconueniences do dailie take hold, and ſometimes euen among thoſe, in whoſe eſtates the like behauiour is leaſt conuenient (whereby their talke is verified which ſay that the thing increaſeth and gꝛoweth in the courts of pꝛinces ſauing vertue, which in ſuch places doth languiſh and dailie vade away) all which enoꝛmities are either vtterlie expelled out of the court of England, oꝛ elſe ſo qualified by the diligent endeuour of the chiefe officers of hir graces houſehold, that ſeldome are ante of theſe things apparantlie ſéene there, without due repꝛehenſion, and ſuch ſeuere coꝛrection as belongeth to thoſe treſpaſſes. Finallie to auoid idlenelle, and pꝛeuent ſundꝛie tranſgreſſions, otherwiſe likelie to be committed and done, ſuch oꝛder is taken, that euerie office hath either a bible, oꝛ the bookes of the acts and monuments of the church of England, oꝛ both, beſide ſome hiſtoꝛies and chꝛonicles lieng therein, foꝛ the exerciſe of ſuch as come into the ſame: whereby the ſtranger that entereth into the court of England vpon the ſudden, ſhall rather imagine himſelfe to come into ſome publike ſchoole of the vniuerſities, where manie giue eare to one that readeth, than into a pꝛinces palace, if you conferre the ſame with thoſe of other nations. Would to God all honoꝛable perſonages would take eꝛample of hir graces godlie dealing in this behalfe, and ſhew their confoꝛmitie vnto theſe hir ſo good beginnings! which if they would, then ſhould manie grieuous offenſes (wherewith God is highlie diſpleaſed) be cut off and reſtreined, which now do reigne exceedinglie, in moſt noble and gentlemens houſes, wherof they ſée no paterne within hir graces gates.

Traines of attendants.

I might ſpeake here of the great traines and troopes of ſeruing men alſo, which attend vpon the nobilitie of England in their ſeuerall liueries, and with differences of cogniſances on their ſléeues, whereby it is knowen to whome they apperteine. I could alſo ſet downe what a goodlie ſight it is to ſée them muſter in the court, which being filled with them doth yéeld the contemplation of a noble varietie vnto the beholder, much like to the ſhew of the pecocks taile in the full beautie, oꝛ of ſome medow garniſhed with infinit kinds and diuerſitie of pleaſant floures. But I paſſe ouer the rehearſall hereof to other men, who moꝛe delite in vaine amplification than I, and ſéeke to be moꝛe curious in theſe points than I pꝛofeſſe to be.

The diſcipline of firme peace alſo that is maintened within a certeine compaſſe of the pꝛinces palace, is ſuch, as is nothing inferiour to that we ſée dailie pꝛactiſed in the beſt gouerned holds & foꝛtreſſes. And ſuch is the ſeuere puniſhment of thoſe that ſtrike within the limits pꝛohibited, that without all hope of mercie, benefit of clergie, oꝛ ſanctuarie, they are ſure to loſe their right hands at a ſtroke, and that in verie ſolemne maner, the foꝛme whereof I will ſet downe, and then make an end of this chapter, to deale with other matters.

Striking within the court and palace of the pꝛince.

At ſuch time therefoꝛe as the partie tranſgreſſing is conuicted by a ſufficient inqueſt impanelled foꝛ the ſame purpoſe, and the time come of the execution of the ſentence, the ſergeant of the kings wood-yard pꝛouideth a ſquare blocke, which he bꝛingeth to ſome appointed place, and therewithall a great bœtle, ſtaple, and coꝛds, wherewith to faſten the hand of the offendoꝛ vnto the ſaid blocke, vntill the whole circumſtance of his execution be perfoꝛmed. The yeoman of the ſcullarie likewiſe foꝛ the time being, doth pꝛouide a great fire of coales hard by the blocke, wherein the ſearing irons are to be made readie againſt the chiefe ſurgeon to the pꝛince oꝛ his deputie ſhall occupie the ſame. Upon him alſo doth the ſergeant oꝛ chiefe farrour attend with thoſe irons, whoſe office is to deliuer them to the ſaid ſurgeon when he ſhall be redie by ſearing to vſe the ſame. The gꝛoome of the ſalarie foꝛ the time being oꝛ his deputie is furthermoꝛe appointed to be readie with vineger and cold waſter, and not to depart from the place vntill the arriue of the offendoꝛ be bound vp and fullie dꝛeſſed. And as theſe things are thus pꝛouided, ſo the ſergeant ſurgeon is bound from time to time to be readie to execute his charge, and ſeare the ſtumpe, when the hand is taken from it. The ſergeant of the cellar is at hand alſo with a cup of red wine, and likewiſe the chiefe officer of the pantrie with manchet bꝛead to giue vnto the ſaid partie after the execution done, and the ſtumpe ſeared, as the ſergeant of the ewerie is with clothes, wherein to wind and wꝛap vp the arme, the yeoman of the poultrie with a cocke to laie vnto it, the yeoman of the chandꝛie with ſeared cloths, and finallie the maiſter cooke oꝛ his deputie with a ſharpe dꝛeſſing knife, which he deliuereth at the place of execution to the ſergeant of the larder, who doth hold it vpꝛight in his hand, vntill the execution be perfoꝛmed by the publike officer appointed therevnto. And this is the maner of puniſhment oꝛdeined foꝛ thoſe that ſtrike within the pꝛinces palace, oꝛ limits of the ſame. Which ſhould firſt haue bœne executed on ſir Edmund Kneuet, in the yeare 1541. But when he had made great ſute to ſaue his right hand foꝛ the further ſeruice of the king in his warres, and willinglie yælded to foꝛgo his left, in the end the king pardoned him of both, to no ſmall benefit of the offendoꝛ, and publication of the bountifull nature that remained in the pꝛince. The like pꝛiuilege almoſt is giuen to churches and churchyards, although in maner of puniſhment great difference doo appœre. Foꝛ he that bꝛalleth oꝛ quarelleth in either of them, is by and by ſuſpended Ab ingreſſu eccleſiæ, vntill he be abſolued: as he is alſo that ſtriketh with the fiſt, oꝛ laieth violent hands vpon anie whome ſo euer. But if he happen to ſmite with ſtaffe, dagger, oꝛ anie maner of weapon, & the ſame be ſufficientlie found by the verdict of twelue men at his arrainement, beſide excommunication, he is ſure to loſe one of his eares without all hope of releaſe. But if he be ſuch a one as hath bœne twiſe condemned and executed, whereby he hath now none eares, then is he marked with an hot iron vpon the cheeke, and by the letter F, which is ſeared deepe into his fleſh, he is from thenceforth noted as a common barratour and traie maker, and therevnto remaineth excommunicate, till by repentance he deſerue to be abſolued. To ſtrike a clearke alſo (that is to ſaie) a miniſter, is plaine excommunication, and the offendoꝛ not to be abſolued but by the pꝛince oꝛ his eſpeciall cõmiſſion. Such alſo is the generall eſtate of the excõmunicate in euery reſpect, that he can yéeld no teſtimonie in anie matter ſo long as he ſo ſtandeth. No bargaine oꝛ ſale that he maketh is auaileable in law, neither any of his acts whatſoeuer pleadable, wherby he liueth as an outlaw & a man altogither out of the princes protection, although it be not lawfull to kill him, nor anie man otherwiſe outlawed, without the danger of felonie.

Of armour and munition.

Chap. 16.

HOw well or how ſtronglie our countrie hath beene furniſhed in times paſt with armor and artillerie, it lieth not in me as of my ſelfe to make rehearſall. Yet that it lacked both in the late time of queen Marie, not onlie the experience of mine elders, but alſo the talke of certeine Spaniards not yet forgotten, did leaue ſome manifeſt notice. Upon the firſt I need not ſtand, for few will denie it. For the ſecond I haue heard, that when one of the greateſt peeres of Spaine eſpied our nakednelle in this behalfe, and did ſolemnelie vtter in no obſcure place, that it ſhould be an eaſie matter in ſhort time to conquer England, bicauſe it wanted armor, his words were then not ſo raſhlie vttered, as they were politikelie noted. For albeit that for the preſent time their efficacie was diſſembled, and ſemblance made as though he ſpake but merilie, yet at the verie enterance of this our gratious queene vnto the poſſeſſion of the crowne, they were ſo prouidentlie called to remembrance, and ſuch ſpeedie reformation ſought of all hands for the redreſſe of this inconuenience, that our countrie was ſoner furniſhed with armour and munition, from diuerſe parts of the maine (beſide great plentie that was forged here at home) than our enimies could get vnderſtanding of anie ſuch prouiſion to be made. By this policie alſo was the no ſmall hope conceiued by Spaniards vtterlie cut off, who of open frends being now become our ſecret enimies, and thereto watching a time wherein to atchieue ſome braue exploit againſt vs and our countrie, did thereupon change their purpoſes, whereby England obteined reſt, that otherwiſe might haue beene ſore of ſharpe and cruell wars. Thus a Spaniſh word vttered by one man at one time, ouerthrew or at the leaſt wiſe hindered ſundrie priuie practiſes of manie at another. In times paſt the cheefe force of England conſiſted in their long bowes. But now we haue in maner generallie giuen ouer that kind of artillerie, and for long bowes in deed do practiſe to ſhoot compaſſe for our paſtime: which kind of ſhooting can neuer yeeld anie ſmart ſtroke, nor beat downe our enimies, as our countrie men were wont to do at euerie time of need. Certes the Frenchmen and Kutters deriding our new archerie in reſpect of their corſlets, will not let in open ſkirmiſh, if anie leiſure ſerue, to turne vp their tailes and crie; Shoote Engliſh, and all bicauſe our ſtrong ſhooting is decaied and laid in bed. But if ſome of our Engliſhmen now liued that ſerued king Edward the third in his warres with France, the breech of ſuch a varlet ſhould haue beene nailed to his bum with one arrow, and an other fethered in his bowels, before he ſhould haue turned about to ſee who ſhot the firſt. But as our ſhooting is thus in manner vtterlie decaied among vs one waie, ſo our countrie men wer ſkilfull in ſundrie other points, as in ſhooting in ſmall peeces, the caliuer, and handling of the pike, in the ſeuerall vſes whereof they are become verie expert.

Our armour differeth not from that of other nations, and therefore conſiſteth of corſlets, almaine riuets, ſhirts of maile, iackes quilted and couered ouer with leather, fuſtian, or canuas, ouer thicke plates of iron that are ſowed in the ſame, & of which there is no towne or village that hath not hir conuenient furniture. The ſaid armour and munition likewiſe is kept in one ſeuerall place of euerie towne, appointed by the conſent of the whole pariſh, where it is alwaies readie to be had and worne within an houres warning. Sometime alſo it is occupied, when it pleaſeth the magiſtrate either to view the able men, & take note of the well keeping of the ſame, or finallie to ſee thoſe that are inrolled to exerciſe each one his ſeuerall weapon, at the charge of the townelmen of each pariſh according to his appointment. Certes there is almoſt no village ſo poore in England (be it neuer ſo ſmall) that hath not ſufficient furniture in a readineſſe to ſet forth three or foure ſoldiors, as one archer, one gunner, one pike, & a bilman at the leaſt. No there is not ſo much wanting as their verie liueries and caps, which are leaſt to be accounted of, if anie haſt required: ſo that if this good order may continue, it ſhall be vnpoſſible for the ſudden enimie to find vs vnprouided. As for able men for ſeruice, thanked be God, we are not without good ſtore, for by the muſters taken 1574 and 1575, our number amounted to 1172674, and yet were they not ſo narrowlie taken, but that a third part of this like multitude was left vnbilled and vncalled. What ſtore of munition and armour the queenes maieſtie hath in hir ſtorehouſes, it lieth not in me to yeeld account, ſith I ſuppoſe the ſame to be infinit. And whereas it was commonlie ſaid after the loſſe of Calis, that England ſhould neuer recouer the ſtore of ordinance there left and loſt: that ſame is at this time prooued falſe, ſith euen ſome of the ſame perſons do now confeſſe, that this land was neuer better furniſhed with theſe things in anie kings daies that reigned ſince the conqueſt.

The names of our greateſt ordinance are commonlie theſe.

I might here take iust occasion to speake of the princes armories. But what shall it need? sith the whole realme is hir armorie, and therefore hir furniture infinit. The Turke had one gun made by one Orban a Dane, the caster of his ordinance, which could not be drawen to the siege of Constantinople, but by seauentie yokes of oxen, and two thousand men; he had two other there also whose shot poised aboue two talents in weight, made by the same Orban. But to proceed. As for the armories of some of the nobilitie (whereof I also haue seene a part) they are so well furnished, that within some one barons custodie I haue seene three score or a hundred corslets at once, beside caliuers, handguns, bowes, sheffes of arrowes, pikes, bils, polaxes, flaskes, touchboxes, targets, &c: the verie sight whereof appalled my courage. What would the wearing of some of them do then (trow you) if I should be inforced to vse one of them in the field? But thanked be God, our peaceable daies are such, as no man hath anie great cause to occupie them at all, but onelie taketh good leisure to haue them in a readinesse, and therefore both high and lowe in England

Cymbala pro galeis pro scutis tympana pulsant.

I would write here also of our maner of going to the warres, but what hath the long blacke gowne to do with glistering armour? what sound acquaintance can there be betwixt Mars and the Muses? or how should a man write anie thing to the purpose of that wherewith he is nothing acquainted? This neuertheless will I adde of things at home, that seldome shall you see anie of my countriemen aboue eightéene or twentie yéeres old to go without a dagger at the least at his backe or by his side, although they be aged burgesses or magistrates of anie citie, who in appearance are most exempt from brabling and contention. Our nobilitie weare commonlie swords or rapiers with their daggers, as doth euerie common seruing man also that followeth his lord and maister. Some desperate cutters we haue in like sort, which carrie two daggers or two rapiers in a sheath alwaies about them, wherewith in euerie dronken fraie they are knowen to worke much mischiefe; their swords & daggers also are of a great length, and longer than the like vsed in anie other countrie, whereby ech one pretendeth to haue the more aduantage of his enimie. But as manie orders haue béene taken for the intollerable length of these weapons; so I see as yet small redresse: but where the cause thereof doth rest, in sooth for my part I wote not. I might here speake of the excessiue staues which diuerse that trauell by the waie do carrie vpon their shoulders, whereof some are twelue or thirtéene foote long, beside the pike of twelue inches: but as they are commonlie suspected of honest men to be théeues and robbers, or at the least wise scarse true men which beare them; so by reason of this and the like suspicious weapons, the honest trauellor is now inforced to ride with a case of dags at his sadle bow, or with some prettie short snapper, whereby he may deale with them further off in his owne defense before he come within the danger of these weapons. Finallie, no man trauelleth by the waie without his sword, or some such weapon, with vs; except the minister, who cõmonlie weareth none at all, vnlesse it be a dagger or hanger at his side. Seldome also are they or anie other wayfaring men robbed without the consent of the chamberleine, tapster, or ostler where they bait & lie, who séeing at their alighting whether their capcases or budgets be of anie weight or not, by taking them downe from their sadles, or otherwise sée their store in drawing of their purses, do by and by giue intimation to some one or other attendant dallie in the yard or house, or dwelling hard by vpon such matches, whether the preie be worth the following or no. If it be for their turne, then the gentleman peraduenture is asked which waie he trauelleth, and whether it please him to haue another ghest to beare him companie at supper, who rideth the same waie in the morning that he doth, or not. And thus if he admit him or be glad of his acquaintance, the cheate is halfe wrought. And often it is séene that the new ghest shall be robbed with the old, onelie to colour out the matter and kéepe him from suspicion. Sometimes when they knowe which waie the passenger trauelleth, they will either go before and lie in wait for him, or else come galloping apace after, wherby they will be sure, if he ride not the stronger, to be fingering with his purse. And these are some of the policies of such shrewes or close bowed gentlemen as lie in wait for fat bootes by the high waies, and which are most commonlie practised in the winter season about the feast of Christmas, when seruing men and vnthriftie gentlemen want monie to plaie at the dice and cards, lewdlie spending in such wise whatsoeuer they haue wickedlie gotten, till some of them sharplie set vpon their chenisances, be trussed vp in a Tiburne tippet, which happeneth vnto them commonlie before they come to middle age. Wherby it appéereth that some sort of youth will oft haue his swinge, although it be in a halter.

Male musis cum Marte.

I might also intreat of our old maner of warfare vsed in and before the time of Cesar, when as the cheefe brunt of our fight was in Essedis or wagons; but this I also passe ouer, noting neuertheless out of Propertius, that our said wagons were gorgeous and gallie painted, which he setteth downe in these foure verses insuing, Arethusæ ad Lycotam, lib. 4. eleg. 3.

Of the nauie of England.

Chap. 17.

THere is nothing that hath brought me into more admiration of the power and force of antiquitie, than their diligence and care had of their nauies: wherein, whether I conſider their ſpéedie building, or great number of ſhips which ſome one kingdome or region poſſeſſed at one inſtant; it giueth me ſtill occaſion, either to ſuſpect the hiſtorie, or to thinke that in our times we come verie farre behind them. For what a thing is it to haue a ſhip growing on the ſtub, and ſailing on the ſea within the ſpace of fiue and fiftie daies? And yet ſuch a nauie was to be ſéene in the firſt warre of Carthage, led thither by Duellius the Romane. In the warres alſo againſt Hieron two hundred and twentie tall ſhips bare leafe & ſaile within fiue and fortie daies. In the ſecond warre of Carthage the nauie that went with Scipio was felled in the wood, and ſéene to ſaile on the ſea fullie furniſhed in ſixe wéekes: which vnto them that are ignorant of things doth ſéeme to be falſe and vnpoſſible. In like maner for multitude, we find in Polybius, that at one ſkirmiſh on the ſea the Romans loſt ſeauen hundred veſſels, which bare ech of them fiue rowes of ores on a ſide, and the Carthaginenſes fiue hundred. And albeit the formes and apparell of theſe veſſels were not altogither correſpondent to our ſhips and gallies made in theſe daies: yet the capacitie of moſt of them did not onelie match, but farre exceed them; ſo that if one of their biremes onlie conteined ſo much in burden as a ſhip of ours of ſix hundred tun: what ſhall we thinke of thoſe which had ſeauen rowes of ores walking on a ſide? But leaſt I ſhould ſéeme to ſpeake more of theſe forren things than the courſe of the hiſtorie doth permit without licence to digreſſe: giue me leaue (I beſéech thee gentle reader) to wade yet a little further in the report of theſe ancient formes & kinds of veſſels. For albeit that the diſcourſe hereof maketh little to the deſcription of our preſent nauie in England: yet ſhall the report thereof not be vnprofitable and vnpleaſant to ſuch as ſhall reade among the writings of their capacities and moulds. It ſhall not be amiſſe therefore to begin at the nauie of Xerxes, of which ech meane veſſell (as appéereth by Herodot) was able to receiue two hundred and thirtie ſouldiers, and ſome of them thrée hundred. Theſe were called triremes, and were indéede gallies that had thrée rowes of ores on euerie ſide; for the word Nauis is indifferentlie applied ſo well to the gallie as ſhip, as to the conuerſant in hiſtories is eaſie to be found. In old time alſo they had gallies of foure rowes, fiue rowes, ſix, ſeauen, eight, nine, twelue, yea fiftéene rowes of ores on a ſide; iudge you then of what quantitie thoſe veſſels were. Plinie lib. 7. noteth one Damaſthenes to be the firſt maker of the gallies with two rowes called biremes: Thucidides referreth the triremes to Ammocles of Corinthum; the quadriremes were deuiſed by Ariſtotle of Carthage; the quinquiremes by Neſichthon of Salamina; the gallie of ſix rowes by Xenagoras of Syracuſa: from this to the tenth Neſigiton brought vp; Alexander the great cauſed one to be made of twelue; Ptolomeus Soter of fiftéene; Demetrius the ſonne of Antigonus of thirtie; Ptolom. Philad. of fortie; Ptol. Triphon of fiftie: all which aboue foure were none other (in mine opinion) than vnweldie carts, and more ſeruing for pleaſure and to gaze vpon, than anie vſe in the wars for which they ſhould be deuiſed. But of all other I note one of fortie rowes, which Ptolo. Philopater builded, conteining 200 and eightie cubits in length, and eight and fortie cubits in breadth: it held alſo foure thouſand ores, foure hundred mariners, and three thouſand ſouldiers, ſo that in the ſaid veſſell were ſeauen thouſand and foure hundred perſons: a report incredible, if truth and good teſtimonie did not confirme the ſame. I muſt néeds confeſſe therefore, that the ancient veſſels far exceeded ours for capacitie: neuertheleſſe if you regard the forme, and the aſſurance from perill of the ſea, and therewithall the ſtrength and nimbleneſſe of ſuch as are made in our time, you ſhall eaſilie find that ours are of more value than theirs: for as the greateſt veſſell is not alwaies the ſafeſt, ſo that of moſt huge capacitie is not alwaies the aptеſt to ſhift and breake the ſeas: as might be ſéene by the great Henrie, the higeſt veſſell that euer England framed in our times. Neither were the ſhips of old like vnto ours in mould and maner of building aboue the water (for of low gallies in our ſeas we make ſmall account) nor ſo full of eaſe within, ſith time hath ingendred more ſkill in the wights, and brought all things to more perfection than they had in the beginning. And now to come vnto our purpoſe at the firſt intended.

The nauie of England may be diuided into three ſortes, of which the one ſerueth for the warres, the other for burden, and the third for fiſhermen, which get their liuing by fiſhing on the ſea. How manie of the firſt order are mainteined within the realme, it paſſeth my cunning to expreſſe: yet ſith it may be parted into the nauie rotall and common fléete, I thinke good to ſpeake of thoſe that belong vnto the prince, and ſo much the rather, for that their number is certeine & well knowne to verie manie. Certes there is no prince in Europe that hath a more beautifull or gallant ſort of ſhips than the quéenes maieſtie of England at this preſent, and thoſe generallie are of ſuch exceeding force, that two of them being well appointed and furniſhed as they ought, will not let to encounter with thrée or foure of thoſe of other countries, and either bowge them or put them to flight, if they may not bring them home.

Neither are the moulds of anie forren barkes ſo conuenientlie made, to breake ſo well one ſea as another lieng vpon the ſhore in anie part of the continent as thoſe of England. And therefore the common report that ſtrangers make of our ſhips amongſt themſelues is dailie confirmed to be true, which is, that for ſtrength, aſſurance, nimbleneſſe and ſwiftneſſe of ſailing, there are no veſſels in the world to be compared with ours. And all theſe are committed to the regiment and ſafe cuſtodie of the admerall, who is ſo called (as ſome imagine) of the Gréeke word Almiras a capiteine on the ſea, for ſo ſaith Zonaras in Baſilio Macedone & Baſilio Porphyriogenito, though other fetch it from Ad mare the Latine words, another ſort from Amyras the Saracen magiſtrate, or from ſome French deriuation: but theſe things are not for this place, and therefore I paſſe them ouer. The quéenes highneſſe hath at this preſent (which is the foure and twentith of hir reigne) alreadie made and furniſhed, to the number of foure or fiue and twentie great ſhips, which lie for the moſt part in Gillingham rode, beſide thrée gallies, of whoſe particular names and furnitures (ſo far forth as I can come by them) it ſhall not be amiſſe to make report at this time.

It is said, that as kings and princes haue in the yong daies of the world, and long since framed themselues to erect euerie yeare a citie in some one place or other of their kingdoms (and no small wonder that Sardanapalus should begin & finish two, to wit, Anchialus and Tharsus in one daie) so hir grace doth yearelie build one ship or other to the better defense of hir frontiers from the enimie. But as of this report I haue no assured certeintie, so it shall suffice to haue said so much of these things: yet this I thinke worthie further to be added, that if they should all be drawen to seruice at one instant) which God forbid) she should haue a power by sea of about nine or ten thousand men, which were a notable compasse, beside the supplie of other vessels apperteining to hir subiects to furnish vp hir voiage.

Beside these hir grace hath other in hand also, of whom hereafter as their turnes do come about, I will not let to leaue some further remembrance. She hath likewise three notable gallies: the Speed well, the Trie right, and the Blacke gallie, with the sight whereof and rest of the nauie roiall, it is incredible to saie how greatlie hir grace is delighted: and not without great cause (I saie) sith by their meanes hir coasts are kept in quiet, and sundrie forren enimies put backe, which otherwise would inuade vs. The number of those that serue for burden with the other, whereof I haue made mention alreadie, and whose vse is dailie seene, as occasion serueth, in time of the warres, is to me vtterlie vnknowne. Yet if the report of one record be anie thing at all to be credited, there are 135 ships that exceed 500 tun, topmen vnder 100 and aboue fortie 656: boies 100: but of hulkes, catches, fisherboats, and craiers, it lieth not in me to deliuer the iust account, sith they are hardlie to come by. Of these also there are some of the quenes maiesties subiects that haue two or three, some foure or fiue, and (as I heard of late) one man whose name I suppresse for modesties sake, hath bene knowne not long since to haue had sixteene or seuenteene, and employed them wholie to the wafting in and out of our merchants, whereby he hath reaped no small commoditie and gaine. I might take occasion to tell of the notable and difficult voiages made into strange countries by Englishmen, and of their dailie successe there: but as these things are nothing incident to my purpose, so I surcease to speake of them. Onelie this will I add, to the end all men shall vnderstand somewhat of the great masses of treasure dailie employed vpon our nauie, how there are few of those ships, of the first and second sort, that being apparelled and made readie to sale, are not worth one thousand pounds, or three thousand ducats at the least, if they should presentlie be sold. What shall we thinke then of the greater, but especiallie of the nauie roiall, of which some one vessell is worth two of the other, as the shipwrights haue often told me? It is possible that some couetous person hearing this report, will either not credit it at all, or suppose monie so employed to be nothing profitable to the quenes coffers: as a good husband said once when he hard there should be prouision made for armor, wishing the quenes monie to be rather laid out to some speedier returne of gaine vnto hir grace, because the realme (saith he) is in case good enough, and so peraduenture he thought. But if as by store of armour for the defense of the countrie, he had likewise vnderstanded that the good keeping of the sea, is the safegard of our land, he would haue altered his censure, and some giuen ouer his iudgement. For in times past, when our nation made small account of nauigation, how some did the Romans, then the Saxons, & last of all the Danes inuade this Iland: whose crueltie in the end inforced our countrimen, as it were euen against their wils, to prouide for ships from other places, and build at home of their owne, whereby their enimies were oftentimes distressed. But most of all were the Normans therein to be commended. For in a short processe of time after the conquest of this Iland, and good consideration had for the well keeping of the same, they supposed nothing more commodious for the defense of the countrie, than the maintenance of a strong nauie, which they speedilie prouided, maintained, and thereby reaped in the end their wished securitie, wherewith before their times this Iland was neuer acquainted. Before the comming of the Romans, I do not read that we had anie ships at all, except a few made of wicker and couered with buffle hides, like vnto the which there are some to be seene at this present in Scotland (as I heare) although there be a little (I wote not well what) difference betweene them. Of the same also Solinus speaketh, so far as I remember: neuertheless it may be gathered by his words, how the vpper parts of them aboue the water onelie were framed of the said wickers, and that the Britons did vse to fast all the whiles they went to the sea in them: but whether it were done for policie or superstition, as yet I do not read.

The Britons fasted all the whyle they were at the sea in these ships.

In the beginning of the Saxons regiment we had some ships also, but as their number and mould was litle and nothing to the purpose, so Egbert was the first prince that euer throughlie began to know this necessitie of a nauie, and vse the seruice thereof in the defense of his countrie. After him also other princes, as Alfred, Edgar, Ethelred, &c: indeuoured more and more to store themselues at the full with ships of all quantities, but chieflie Edgar, for he prouided a nauie of 1600 alias 3600 saile, which he diuided into foure parts, and sent them to abide vpon foure sundrie coasts of the land to keepe the same from pirats. Next vnto him (and worthie to be remembred) is Ethelred, who made a law, that euerie man holding 310 hidelands, should find a ship furnished to serue him in the warres. Howbeit, and as I said before, when all their nauie was at the greatest, it was not comparable for force and sure building, to that which afterward the Normans prouided; neither that of the Normans anie thing like to the same that is to be seene now in these our daies. For the iourneies also of our ships, you shall vnderstand, that a well builded vessell will run or saile commonlie three hundred leagues or nine hundred miles in a weeke, or peraduenture some will go 2200 leagues in six weekes and an halfe. And suerlie, if their lading be readie against they come thither, there be of them that will be here, at the west Indies, & home againe in twelue or thirteene weekes from Colchester; although the said Indies be eight hundred leagues from the cape or point of Cornewall, as I haue beene informed. This also I vnderstand

by

by report of ſome trauellers, that if anie of our veſſels happen to make a voiage to Hiſpaniola or new Spaine, called in time paſt Quinquezia and Haiti, and lieth betweene the north tropike and the equator, after they haue once touched at the Canaries, (which are eight daies ſailing or two hundred and fiftie leages from S. Lucas de Barameda in Spaine) they will be there in thirtie or fourtie daies, & home againe in Cornewall in other eight weekes, which is a goodlie matter, beſide the ſafetie and quietneſſe in the paſſage. But more of this elſewhere.

Of faires and markets.

Chap. 18.

THere are (as I take it) few great townes in England, that haue not their weekelie markets, one or more granted from the prince, in which all maner of proviſion for houſhold is to be bought and ſold, for eaſe and benefit of the countrie round about. Whereby as it cõmeth to paſſe that no buier ſhall make anie great iourneie in the purueiance of his neceſſities: ſo no occupier ſhall haue occaſion to trauell far off with his commodities, except it be to ſeeke for the higheſt prices, which commonlie are neere vnto great cities, where round and ſpeediеſt vtterance is alwaies to be had. And as theſe haue beene in times paſt erected for the benefit of the realme, ſo are they in many places too too much abuſed: for the reliefe and eaſe of the buier is not ſo much intended in them, as the benefit of the ſeller. Neither are the magiſtrats for the moſt part (as men loth to diſpleaſe their neighbours for their one prates dignitie) ſo carefull in their offices, as of right and dutie they ſhould bee. For in moſt of theſe markets neither aſſiſes of bread nor orders for goodneſſe and ſweetneſſe of graine, and other commodities that are brought thither to be ſold, are anie whit looked vnto; but eche one ſuffered to ſell or ſet vp what and how himſelfe liſteth: & this is one euident cauſe of dearth and ſcarſitie in time of great abundance.

I could (if I would) exemplifie in manie, but I will touch no one particularlie, ſith it is rare to ſee in anie countrie towne (as I ſaid) the aſſiſe of bread well kept according to the ſtatute. And yet if anie countrie baker happen to come in among them on the market daie with bread of better quantitie, they find fault by and by with one thing or another in his ſtuffe; whereby the honeſt poore man, whome the lawes of nations do commend, for that he indeuoureth to liue by anie lawfull meanes, is driuen awaie, and no more to come there vpon ſome round penaltie, by vertue of their priuileges. Howbeit though they are ſo nice in the proportion of their bread, yet in lieu of the ſame, there is ſuch headie ale & beere in moſt of them, as for the mightineſſe thereof among ſuch as ſeeke it out, is commonlie called huffecap, the mad dog, father whoreſonne, angels food, dragons milke, go by the wall, ſtride wide, and lift leg, &c. And this is more to be noted, that when one of late fell by Gods prouidence into a troubled cõſcience, after he had conſidered well of his reachleſſe life, and dangerous eſtate: another thinking belike to change his colour and not his mind, carried him ſtraightwaie to the ſtrongeſt ale, as to the next phyſician. It is incredible to ſaie how our maltbugs lug at this liquor, euen as pigs ſhould lie in a row, lugging at their dames teats, till they lie ſtill againe, and be not able to wag. Neither did Romulus and Remus ſucke their thee woolfe or ſhepheards wife Lupa, with ſuch eger and ſharpe deuotion, as theſe men hale at huffcap, till they be red as cockes, & little wiſer than their combs. But how am I fallen from the market into the alehouſe? In returning therefore vnto my purpoſe, I find that in corne great abuſe is dailie ſuffered, to the great preiudice of the towne and countrie, eſpeciallie the poore artificer and houſeholder, which tilleth no land, but laboring all the weeke to buie a buſhell or two of graine on the market daie, can there haue none for his monie: becauſe bodgers, loders, and common carriers of corne do not onlie buie vp all, but giue aboue the price, to be ſerued of great quantities. Shall I go anie further? Well I will ſaie yet a little more, and ſomewhat by mine owne experience.

At Michaelmaſſe time poore men muſt make monie of their graine, that they may paie their rents. So long then as the poore man hath to ſell, rich men will bring out none, but rather buie vp that which the poore bring, vnder pretenſe of ſeed corne, or alteration of graine, although they bring none of their owne, becauſe one wheat often ſowen without change of ſeed, will ſome deale and be conuerted into darnell. For this cauſe therefore they muſt needs buie in the markets, though they be twentie miles off and where they be not knowne, promiſing there if they happen to be eſpied (which God wot is verie ſeldome) to ſend ſo much to their next market, to be performed I wot not when.

If this ſhift ſerue not (neither doth the for vſe alwaies one tracke for feare of a ſnare) they will compound with ſome one of the towne where the market is holden, who for a pot of huffcap or merie go downe, will not let to buie it for them, and that in his owne name. Or elſe they wage one poore man or other, to become a bodger, and thereto get him a licence vpon ſome forged ſurmiſe, which being done, they will feed him with monie, to buie for them till he hath filled their lofts, and then if he can do any good for himſelfe ſo it is, if not, they will giue him ſomewhat for his paines at this time, & reſerue him for an other yeare. How manie of the like prouiders ſtumble vpon blind creekes at the ſea coaſt, I wote not well; but that ſome haue ſo done and yet do vnder other mens wings, the caſe is too too plaine. But who dare find fault with them, when they haue once a licence? yea though it be but to ſerue a meane gentlemans houſe with corne, who hath call vp all his tillage, becauſe he boaſteth how he can buie his graine in the market better cheape, than he can ſow his land, as the rich graſier often doth alſo vpon the like deuiſe, becauſe graſing requireth a ſmaller houſehold and leſſe attendance and charge. If anie man come to buie a buſhell or two for his expenſes vnto the market croſſe, anſwer is made; Forſooth here was one euen now that bad me monie for it, and I hope he will haue it. And to ſaie the truth, theſe bodgers are faire chapmen, for there are no more words with them, but Let me ſee it, what ſhall I giue you, knit it vp, I will haue it, go carie it to ſuch a chamber, and if you bring in twentie ſeme more in the weeke daie to ſuch an Inne or ſollar where I laie my corne, I will haue it and giue you pence or more in euerie buſhell for ſix weekes day of paiment than an other will. Thus the bodgers beare awaie all, ſo that the poore artificer and labourer cannot make his proviſion in the markets, ſith they will hardlie now adaies ſell by the buſhell, nor breake their meaſure; and ſo much the rather, for that the buier will looke (as they ſaie) for ſo much ouer meaſure in a buſhell as the bodger will do in a quarter. Maie the poore man cannot oft get anie of the farmer at home, becauſe he prouideth altogither to ſerue the bodger, or hath an hope grounded vpon a greedie and inſatiable deſire of gaine, that the ſale will be better in the market: ſo that he muſt giue two pence or a groate more in a bushell at his house than the last market craued, or else go without it, and kéepe with an hungrie bellie. Of the common carriage of corne ouer vnto the parts beyond the seas I speake not; or at the leastwise if I should, I could not touch it alone but néeds must ioine other prouision withall, whereby not onelie our frends abroad, but also manie of our aduersaries and countriemen the papists are abundantlie relieued (as the report goeth) but sith I see it not, I will not so trust mine eares as to write it for a truth. But to returne to our markets againe.

By this time the poore occupier hath all sold his crop for néed of monie, being readie peraduenture to buie againe yer long. And now is the whole sale of corne in the great occupiers hands, who hitherto haue threshed little or none of their owne, but bought vp of other men, so much as they could come by. Henceforth also they begin to sell, not by the quarter or load at the first, for marring the market, but by the bushell or two, or an horseload at the most, thereby to be séene to kéepe the crosse, either for a shew, or to make men eger to buie, and so as they may haue it for monie, not to regard what they paie. And thus corne wareth dære, but it will be dérer the next market date. It is possible also that they mislike the price in the beginning for the whole yeare insuing, as men supposing that corne will be litle worth for this, & of better price in the next yeare. For they haue certeine superstitious obseruations, where by they will giue a gesse at the sale of corne for the yeare following. And our countriemen do vse commonlie for barleie where I dwell, to iudge after the price at Baldocke vpon S. Matthewes date, and for wheat as it is sold in séed time. They take in like sort experiment by sight of the first flockes of cranes that flée southward in winter, the age of the mone in the beginning of Januarie, & such other apish toies, as by laieng twelue cornes vpon the hot hearth for the twelue moneths, &c: whereby they shew themselues to be scant good christians, but what care they so they may come by monie? Herevpon also will they thresh out three parts of the old corne, toward the latter end of the summer, when new commeth apace to hand, and cast the same in the fourth vnthreshed, where it shall lie vntill the next spring, or peraduenture till it must and putrifie. Certes it is not ocintie to sée muckie corne in manie of our great markets of England, which these great occupiers bring forth when they can kéepe it no longer. But as they are inforced oftentimes vpon this one occasion somwhat to abate the price, so a plague is not seldome ingendred thereby among the poore sort that of necessitie must buie the same, wherby manie thousands of all degrees are consumed, of whose deaths (in mine opinion) these farmers are not vnguiltie. But to proceed. If they laie not vp their graine or wheat in this maner, they haue yet another policie, whereby they will séeme to haue but small store left in their barnes: for else they will gird their sheues by the band, and stacke it vp of new in lesse rome, to the end it may not onlie séeme lesse in quantitie, but also giue place to the corne that is yet to come into the barne, or growing in the field. If there happen to be such plentie in the market on anie market date, that they cannot sell at their own price, then will they set it vp in some frends house, against an other or the third date, & not bring it forth till they like of the sale. If they sell anie at home, beside harder measure, it shall be dérer to the poore man that bieth it by two pence or a groat in a bushell than they may sell it in the market. But as these things are worthie redresse, so I wish that God would once open their eies that deale thus, to see their owne errours: for as yet some of them little care how manie poore men suffer extremitie, so that they may fill their purses, and carie awaie the gaine.

Suborned bodgers.

Bodgers le conced.

It is a world also to sée how most places of the realme are pestered with purueiours, who take vp egs, butter, chéese, pigs, capons, hens, chickens, hogs, bakon, &c: in one market, vnder pretense of their commissions, & suffer their wiues to sell the same in another, or to pulters of London. If these chapmen be absent but two or three market daies, then we may perfectlie see these wares to be more reasonablie sold, and therevnto the crosses sufficientlie furnished of all things. In like sort, since the number of buttermen haue so much increased, and since they trauell in such wise, that they come to mens houses for their butter faster than they can make it; it is almost incredible to see how the price of butter is augmented: whereas when the owners were inforced to bring it to the market townes, & fewer of these butter buiers were stirring, our butter was scarslie worth eightéene pence the gallon, that now is worth three shillings foure pence, & perhaps fiue shillings. Wherby also I gather that the maintenance of a superfluous number of dealers in most trades, tillage alwaies excepted, is one of the greatest causes why the prices of things become excessiue: for one of them do cómonlie vse to out bid another. And whilest our countrie commodities are commonlie bought and sold at our priuate houses, I never loke to sée this enormitie redressed, or the markets well furnished.

I could saie more, but this is euen inough, & more peraduenture than I shall be well thanked for: yet true it is though some thinke it no trespasse. This moreouer is to be lamented, that one generall measure is not in vse throughout all England, but euerie market towne hath in maner a seuerall bushell, and the lesser it be, the more sellers it draweth to resort vnto the same. Such also is the couetousnesse of manie clearkes of the market, that in taking view of measures, they will alwaie so prouide, that one and the same bushell shall be either to big or to little at their next comming, and yet not depart without a fee at the first: so that what by their mending at one time and empairing the same at another, the countrie is greatlie charged, and few iust measures to be had in anie séed. It is oft found likewise, that diuerse vnconscionable dealers haue one measure to sell by, & another to buie withall, the like is also in weights and yet all sealed and bronded. Wherefore it were verie good that these two were reduced vnto one standard, that is, one bushell, one pound, one quarter, one hundred, one tale, one number: so should things in time fall into better order, and fewer causes of contention be moued in this land. Of the complaint of such poore tenants as paie rent corne vnto their landlords, I speake not, who are often dealt withall very hardlie. For beside that in the measuring of ten quarters, for the most part they lose one through the iniquitie of the bushell (such is the grédinesse of the appointed receiuers thereof) fault is found also with the goodnesse and cleannesse of the graine. Wherby some péece of monie must néeds passe vnto their purses to stop their mouths withall, or else my lord will not like of the corne; Thou art worthie to lose thy lease, &c. Or if it be cheaper in the market, than the rate allowed for it is in their rents, then must they paie monie and no corne, which is no small extremitie. And thereby we may see how each one of vs indeuoureth to fléece and eat vp another.

Another thing there is in our markets worthie to be loked vnto, and that is the recariage of graine from the same into lofts and sollars, of which before I gaue some intimation: wherefore if it were ordered, that euerie seller should make his market by an houre, or else the bailie or clearke of the said market to make ſale therof according to his diſcretion, without libertie to the farmer to ſet vp their corne in houſes and chambers, I am perſuaded that the prices of our graine would ſone be abated. Againe, if it were enacted that each one ſhould kéepe his next market with his graine, and not to run ſir, eight, ten, fourteéne, or twentie miles from home to ſell his corne, where he doth find the higheſt price, and therby leaueth his neighbours vnfurniſhed, I do not thinke but that our markets would be farre better ſerued than at this preſent they are. Finallie if mens barns might be indifferentlie viewed immediatlie after harueſt, and a note gathered by an eſtimat, and kept by ſome appointed & truſtie perſon for that purpoſe, we ſhould haue much more plentie of corne in our townes croſſes than as yet is commonlie ſéene: becauſe each one hideth and hordeth what he may vpon purpoſe either that it will be dérer, or that he ſhall haue ſome priuie veine by bodgers, who do accuſtomablie ſo deale, that the ſea doth load awaie no ſmall part thereof into other countries & our enimies, to the great hinderance of our common-wealth at home, and more likelie yet to be, except ſome remedie be found. But what do I talke of theſe things, or deſire the ſuppreſſion of bodgers being a miniſter? Certes I may ſpeake of them right well, as féeling the harme in that I am a buier, neuertheleſſe I ſpeake generallie in ech of them.

To conclude therefore, in our markets all things are to be ſold neceſſarie for mans vſe, and there is our prouiſion made commonlie for all the wéeke inſuing. Therefore as there are no great townes without one wéekelie market at the leaſt, ſo there are verie few of them that haue not one or two faires or more within the compaſſe of the yeare aſſigned vnto them by the prince. And albeit that ſome of them are not much better than Lowſe faire or the common kirkemeſſes beyond the ſea, yet there are diuerſe not inferiour to the greateſt marts in Europe, as Sturbridge faire nére to Cambridge, Briſtow faire, Bartholomew faire at London, Lin mart, Cold faire at Newport pond for cattell, and diuerſe other, all which or at leaſt wiſe the greateſt part of them (to the end I may with the more eaſe to the reader and leſſe trauell to my ſelfe fulfill my taſke in their rectall) I haue ſet downe, according to the names of the moneths wherein they are holden, at the end of this booke, where you ſhall find them at large, as I borrowed the ſame from I. Stow, and the reports of others.

Of Parkes and Warrens.

Chap. 19.

IN euerie ſhire of England there is great plentie of parkes, whereof ſome here and there, to wit, welnere to the number of two hundred for hir daily prouiſion of that flеſh apperteine to the prince, the reſt to ſuch of the nobilitie and gentlemen as haue their lands and patrimonies lieng in or nére vnto the ſame. I would gladlie haue ſet downe the iuſt number of theſe incloſures to be found in euerie countie: but ſith I cannot ſo do, it ſhall ſuffice to ſaie, that in Kent and Eſſex onelie are to the number of an hundred, and twentie in the biſhoprike of Durham, wherein great plentie of fallow dеere is cheriſhed and kept. As for warrens of conies, I iudge them almoſt innumerable, and dailie like to increaſe, by reaſon that the blacke ſkins of thoſe beaſts are thought to counteruaile the prices of their naked carcaſes, and this is the onelie cauſe whie the graie are leſſe eſtéemed. Méere vnto London their quickeſt merchandize is of the yong rabbets, wherfore the older conies are brought from further off, where there is no ſuch ſpeedie vtterance of rabbets and ſucklings in their ſeaſon, nor ſo great loſſe by their ſkins, ſith they are ſuffered to growe vp to their full greatneſſe with their owners. Our parkes are generallie incloſed with ſtrong pale made of oke, of which kind of wood there is great ſtore cheriſhed in the woodland countries from time to time in ech of them, onelie for the maintenance of the ſaid defenſe, and ſafekéeping of the fallow déere from ranging about the countrie. Howbeit in times paſt diuerſe haue bén fenſed in with ſtone walles (eſpeciallie in the times of the Romans, who firſt brought fallow déere into this land (as ſome coniecture) albeit thoſe incloſures were ouerthrowne againe by the Saxons & Danes, as Cauiſham, Towner, and Woodſtocke, beſide other in the weſt countrie, and one alſo at Bolton. Among other things alſo to be ſéene in that towne, there is one of the faireſt clockes in Europe. Where no wood is, they are alſo incloſed with piles of ſlate; and therto it is douted of manie whether our bucke or doe are to be reckoned in wild or tame beaſts or not. Plinie dœmeth them to be wild, Martial is alſo of the ſame opinion, where he ſaith, Imbelles damæ quid niſi præda ſumus? And ſo in time paſt the like controuerſie was about bées, which the lawiers call Feras, tit. de acquirendo rerum dominio, & lib. 2. inſtit. But Plinie attempting to decide the quarell calleth them Medias inter feras & placidas aues. But whither am I ſo ſuddenlie digreſſed? In returning therefore vnto our parks, I find alſo the circuit of theſe incloſures in like manner conteine often times a walke of foure or fiue miles, and ſometimes more or leſſe. Wherby it is to be ſéene what ſtore of ground is emploied vpon that vaine commoditie, which bringeth no manner of gaine or profit to the owner, ſith they commonlie giue awaie their flеſh, neuer taking penie for the ſame, except the ordinarie fée and parts of the déere giuen vnto the kéeper by a cuſtome, who beſide three ſhillings foure pence, or fiue ſhillings in monie, hath the ſkin, head, vmbles, chine, and ſhoulders: whereby he that hath the warrant for an whole bucke, hath in the end little more than halfe, which in my iudgement is ſcarſelie equall dealing; for veniſon in England is neither bought nor ſold, as in other countries, but mainteined onelie for the pleaſure of the owner and his friends. Albeit I heard of late of one ancient ladie, which maketh a great gaine by ſelling yearelie hir huſbands veniſon to the cookes (as another of no leſſe name will not ſticke to ride to the market to ſée hir butter ſold) but not performed without infinite ſcoffes and mockes, euen of the pooreſt peaſants of the countrie, who thinke them as odious matters in ladies and women of ſuch countenance to ſell their veniſon and their butter, as for an earle to feéle his oxen, ſheepe, and lambs, whether they be readie for the butcher or not, or to ſell his woll vnto the clothier, or to kéepe a tan-houſe, or deale with ſuch like affaires as belong not to men of honor, but rather to farmers, or graſiers; for which ſuch, if there be anie may well be noted (and not vniuſtlie) to degenerate from true nobilitie, and betake themſelues to huſbandrie. And euen the ſame enormitie take place ſometime among the Romans, and entred ſo farre as into the verie ſenate, of whome ſome one had two or three ſhips going vpon the ſea, pretending prouiſion for their houſes; but in truth following the trades of merchandize, till a law was made which did inhibit and reſtraine them. Liuie alſo telleth of another ther law which paſſed likewiſe againſt the ſenators by Claudius the tribune, and helpe onelie of C. Flaminius, that no ſenator, or he that had bæne father to anie ſenator ſhould poſſeſſe anie ſhip or veſſell aboue the capacitie of thrée hundred amphoras, which was ſuppoſed ſufficient for the cariage and recariage of ſuch neceſſities as ſhould apperteine vnto his houſe: ſith further trading with merchandizes and commodities doth declare but a baſe and couetous mind, not altogither void of enuie, that anie man ſhould liue but he; or that if anie gaine were to be had, he onelie would haue it himſelfe: which is a wonderfull dealing, and muſt nèeds proue in time the confuſion of that countrie wherein ſuch enormities are exerciſed. Where in times paſt, manie large and wealthie occupiers were dwelling within the compaſſe of ſome one parke, and thereby great plentie of corne and cattell ſæne, and to be had among them, beſide a more copious procreation of humane iſſue, whereby the realme was alwaies better furniſhed with able men to ſerue the prince in his affaires: now there is almoſt nothing kept but a ſort of wild and ſauage beaſts, cheriſhed for pleaſure and delight; and yet ſome owners ſtill deſirous to inlarge thoſe grounds, as either for the brèed and feeding of cattell, do not let dailie to take in more, not ſparing the verie commons whereupon manie townſhips now and then do liue, affirming that we haue alreadie too great ſtore of people in England; and that youth by marrieng too ſoone do nothing profit the countrie, but fill it full of beggars, to the hurt and vtter vndoing (they ſaie) of the common wealth.

Tillage and mankind diminiſhed by parkes.

Certes if it be not one curſe of the Lord, to haue our countrie conuerted in ſuch ſort from the furniture of mankind, into the walks and ſhrowds of wild beaſts, I know not what is anie. How manie families alſo theſe great and ſmall games (for ſo moſt kèepers call them) haue eaten vp and are likelie hereafter to deuoure, ſome men may conſecture, but manie more lament, ſith there is no hope of reſtraint to be loked for in this behalfe, becauſe the corruption is ſo generall. But if a man may preſentlie giue a gheſſe at the vniuerſalitie of this euill by contemplation of the circumſtance, he ſhall ſaie at the laſt, that the twentith part of the realme is imploied vpon dèere and conies alreadie, which ſeemeth verie much if it be not dulie conſidered of.

The decaie of the people is the deſtruction of a kingdome.

King Henrie the eight, one of the nobleſt princes that euer reigned in this land, lamented oft that he was conſtreined to hire forren aid, for want of competent ſtore of ſouldiors here at home, perceiuing (as it is indeed) that ſuch ſupplies are oftentimes more hurtfull than profitable vnto thoſe that interteine them, as may chéeſlie be ſeene in Valens the emperor, our Vortiger, and no ſmall number of others. He would oft maruell in priuate talke, how that when ſeauen or eight princes ruled here at once, one of them could lead thirtie or fortie thouſand men to the field againſt another, or two of them 100000 againſt the third, and thoſe taken out onelie of their owne dominions. But as he found the want, ſo he ſaw not the cauſe of this decaie, which grew beſide this occaſion now mentioned, alſo by laieng houſe to houſe, and land to land, whereby manie mens occupiengs were conuerted into one, and the brèed of people not a little thereby diminiſhed. The auarice of landlords by increaſing of rents and fines alſo did ſo wearie the people, that they were readie to rebell with him that would ariſe, ſuppoſing a ſhort end in the warres to be better than a long and miſerable life in peace.

Priuileges and faculties alſo are another great cauſe of the ruine of a common wealth, and diminution of mankind: for whereas law and nature doth permit all men to liue in their beſt maner, and whatſoeuer trade they be exerciſed in, there commeth ſome priuilege or other in the waie, which cutteth them off from this or that trade, wherby they muſt nèeds ſhift ſoile, and ſèeke vnto other countries. By theſe alſo the greateſt commodities are brought into the hands of few, who imbaſe, corrupt, and yet raiſe the prices of things at their owne pleaſures. Example of this laſt I can giue alſo in bookes, which (after the firſt impreſſion of anie one booke) are for the moſt part verie negligentlie handled: whereas if another might print it ſo well as the firſt, then would men ſtriue which of them ſhould do it beſt; and ſo it falleth out in all other trades. It is an eaſie matter to proue that England was neuer leſſe furniſhed with people than at this preſent; for if the old records of euerie manour be ſought, and ſearch made to find what tenements are fallen, either downe, or into the lords hands, or brought and vnited togither by other men: it will ſoone appéere, that in ſome one manour ſeuentéen, eightéene, or twentie houſes are ſhrunke. I know what I ſaie by mine owne experience: notwithſtanding that ſome one cotage be here and there erected of late, which is to little purpoſe. Of cities and townes either vtterlie decaied, or more than a quarter or halfe diminiſhed, though ſome one be a little increaſed here and there; of townes pulled downe for ſhéepe-walks, and no more but the lordſhips now ſtanding in them, beſide thoſe that William Rufus pulled downe in his time; I could ſaie ſomewhat: but then I ſhould ſwarue yet further from my purpoſe, whereunto I now returne.

Wée had no parkes left in England at the comming of the Normans, who added this calamitie alſo to the ſeruitude of our nation, making men of the beſt ſort further more to become kèepers of their game, whileſt they liued in the meane time vpon the ſpoile of their reuenues, and dailie ouerthrew townes, villages, and an infinit ſort of families, for the maintenance of their venerie. Neither was anie parke ſuppoſed in theſe times to be ſtatelie enough, that conteined not at the leaſt eight or ten hidelands, that is, ſo manie hundred acres or families (or as they haue bæne alwaies called in ſome places of the realme carrucats or cartwares) of which one was ſufficient in old time to mainteine an honeſt yeoman.

King John trauelling on a time northwards, to wit 1209 to warre vpon the king of Scots, becauſe he had married his daughter to the earle of Bullen without his conſent: in his returne ouerthrew a great number of parkes and warrens, of which ſome belonged to his barons, but the greateſt part to the abbats and prelats of the cleargie. For hearing (as he trauelled) by complaint of the countrie, how theſe incloſures were the chéefe decaie of men, and of tillage in the land, he ſware with an oth that he would not ſuffer wild beaſts to feed vpon the fat of his ſoile, and ſée the people periſh for want of abilitie to procure and buie them food that ſhould defend the realme. Howbeit, this act of his was ſo ill taken by the religious and their adherents, that they inuerted his intent herein to another end; affirming moſt ſlanderouſlie how he did it rather of purpoſe to ſpoile the corne and graſſe of the commons and catholikes that held againſt him of both eſtates, and by ſo doing to impouriſh and bring the north part of the realme to deſtruction, becauſe they refuſed to go with him into Scotland. If the ſaid prince were aliue in theſe daies, wherein Andrew Boord ſaith there are more parks in England than in all Europe (ouer which he trauelled in his owne perſon) and ſaw how much ground they conſume,

I thinke he would either double his othes, or laie the most of them open that tillage might be better looked vnto. But this I hope shall not need in time, for the owners of a great sort of them begin now to smell out, that such parcels might be employed to their more gaine, and therefore some of them dow grow to be disparked.

Next of all we haue the franke chase, which taketh something both of parke and forrest, and is giuen either by the kings grant or prescription. Certes it differeth not much from a parke; nay, it is in maner the selfe same thing that a parke is, sauing that a parke is inuironed with pale, wall, or such like: the chase alwaie open and nothing at all inclosed, as we see in Enuield & Maluerne chases. And as it is the cause of the seisure of the franchise of a parke not to keepe the same inclosed, so it is the like in a chase if at anie time it be imparked. It is trespasse, and against the law also, for anie man to haue or make a chase, parke, or free warren without good warrantie of the king by his charter or perfect title of prescription: for it is not lawfull for anie subiect either to carnilate, that is, build stone houses, imbattell, haue the querke of the sea, or keepe the assise of bread, ale, or wine, or set vp furels, tumbrell, thew, or pillorie, or inclose anie ground to the aforesaid purposes within his owne soile, without his warrant and grant. The beasts of the chase were commonlie the bucke, the roe, the fox, and the marterne. But those of venerie in old time were the hart, the hare, the bore and the woolfe; but as this held not in the time of Canutus, so in steed of the woolfe the beare is now crept in, which is a beast cõmonlie hunted in the east countries, and fed vpon as excellent venison, although with vs I know not anie that feed thereon or care for it at all. Certes it should seeme, that forrests and franke chases haue alwaies bene had, and religiouslie preserued in this Iland for the solace of the prince, and recreation of his nobilitie: howbeit I read not that euer they were inclosed more than at this present, or otherwise fensed than by vsuall notes of limitation, whereby their bounds were remembred from time to time, for the better preseruation of such venerie and vert of all sorts as were nourished in the same. Neither are anie of the ancient laws prescribed for their maintenance, before the daies of Canutus, now to be had; sith time hath so dealt with them that they are perished and lost. Canutus therefore seeing the dailie spoile that was made almost in all places of his game, did at the last make sundrie sanctions and decrees, whereby from thenceforth the red and fallow deere were better looked to throughout his whole dominions. We haue in these daies diuerse forrests in England and Wales, of which, some belong to the king, and some to his subiects, as Waltham forrest, Windlesor, Pickering, Feckenam, Delamore, Gillingham, Kingswod, Wencedale, Clun, Rath, Brecon, Weire, Charlie, Leircester, Lee, Rokingham, Selwod, New forrest, Wichwod, Hatfeld, Sauernake, Westbirie, Blacamore Peke, Deane, Penrise, & manie other now cleane out of my remembrance: and which although they are far greater in circuit than manie parkes and warrens, yet are they in this our time lesse deuourers of the people than these latter, sith beside much tillage, & manie townes are found in each of them, whereas in parks and warrens we haue nothing else than either the keepers & wareners lodge, or at least the manor place of the chefe lord & owner of the soile. I find also by good record, that all Esser hath in time past wholie bene forrest ground, except one cantred or hundred; but how long it is since it lost the said denomination in good soth I do not read. This neuerthelesse remaineth yet in memorie, that the towne of Walden in Essex standing in the limits of the aforesaid countie doth take his name thereof. For in the Celtike tong, wherewith the Saxon or Scithian speech doth not a little participate, huge woods and forrests were called Walds, and likewise their Druides were named Walie or Waldie, because they frequented the woods, and there made sacrifice among the okes and thickets. So that if my coniecture in this behalfe be anie thing at all, the aforesaid towne taketh denomination of ef Wald and end, as if I should say, The end of the woddie soile; for being once out of that parish, the champaine is at hand. Or it may be that it is so called of Wald and dene: for I haue read it written in old euidences Waldæne, with a diphthong. And to saie truth, Dene is the old Saxon word for a vale or lowe bottome, as Dune or Don is for an hill or hillie soile. Certes if it be so, then Walden taketh his name of the woddie vale, in which it sometime stood. But the first deriuation liketh me better, and the highest part of the towne is called also Chipping Walden, of the Saxon word Chipping, which signifieth Leaning or hanging, and may verie well be applied thereunto, sith the whole towne hangeth as it were vpon the sides of two hils, whereof the lesser runneth quite through the middest of the same. I might here for further confirmation of these things bring in mention of the Wald of Kent: but this may suffice for the vse of the word Wald, which now differeth much from Wold. For as that signifieth a woddie soile, so this betokeneth a soile without wood, or plaine champaine countrie, without anie store of trees, as may be seene in Cotswold, Porkewold, &c. Beside this I could saie more of our forrests, and the aforesaid inclosures also, & therein to proue by the booke of forrest law, that the whole countie of Lancaster hath likewise bene forrest heretofore. Also how William the Bastard made a law, that whosoeuer did take anie wild beast within the kings forrest should lose an eare; as Henrie the first did punish them either by life or lim: which ordinance was confirmed by Henrie the second and his peeres at Woodstocke, whereupon great trouble insued vnder king John and Henrie the third, as appeareth by the chronicles: but it shall suffice to haue said so much as is set downe alreadie.

Chipping, of going by to anie place.

Howbeit, that I may restore one antiquitie to light, which hath hitherto lien as it were raked vp in the embers of oblivion, I will giue out those laws that Canutus made for his forrest: whereby manie things shall be disclosed concerning the same (whereof peraduenture some lawiers haue no knowlege) and diuerse other notes gathered touching the ancient estate of the realme not to be found in other. But before I deale with the great charter (which as you may perceiue, is in manie places vnperfect by reason of corruption, and want also of congruitie, crept in by length of time, not by me to be restored) I will note another breefe law, which he made in the first yeare of his reigne at Winchester, afterward inserted into these his later constitutions, canon 32, & beginneth thus in his owne Saxon tong; Ic will that elc one, &c: I will and grant that ech one shall be worthie of such venerie as he by hunting can take either in the plaines or in the woods, within his owne fee or dominion; but ech man shall abstaine from my venerie in euerie place, where I will that my beasts shall haue firme peace and quietnesse, vpon paine to forfet so much as a man may forfet. Hitherto the statute made by the aforesaid Canutus, which was afterward confirmed by king Edward surnamed the Confessor; & ratified by the Bastard in the fourth yeare of his reigne. Now followeth the great charter it selfe in such rude order and stile as I find it word for word, and which I would gladlie haue turned into English, if it might haue founded to anie benefit of the vnskilfull and vnlearned.

Incipiunt constitutiones Canuti regis de foresta.

HAec sunt sanctiones de foresta, quas ego Canutus rex cum consilio primariorum hominum meorum condo & facio, vt cunctis regni nostri Angliæ ecclesijs & pax & iustitia fiat, & vt omnis delinquens secundum modum delicti, & delinquentis fortunam patiatur.

Pegened. 1 Sint iam deinceps quatuor ex liberalioribus hominibus, qui habent saluas suas debitas consuetudines (quos Angli Pegened appellant) in qualibet regni mei prouincia constituti, ad iustitiam distribuendam, vna cum pœna merita & materijs forestæ cuncto populo meo, tam Anglis quàm Danis per totum regnum meum Angliæ, quos quatuor primarios forestæ appellandos censemus.

Lespegend. Nunc forte Fringald. 2 Sint sub quolibet horum, quatuor ex mediocribus hominibus (quos Angli Lespegend nuncupant, Dani verò yoong men vocant) locati, qui curam & onus tum viridis tum veneris suscipiant.

3 In administranda autem iustitia nullatenus volo vt tales se intromittant: mediocrésq; tales post ferarum curam susceptam, pro liberalibus semper habeantur, quos Dani Ealdermen appellant.

Ealdermen. Tineman. 4 Sub horum iterum quolibet sint duo minutorum hominum, quos Tineman Angli dicunt, hi nocturnam curam & veneris & viridis tum seruilia opera subibunt.

5 Si talis minutus seruus fuerit, tam citò quàm in foresta nostra locabitur, liber esto, omnésq; hos ex sumptibus nostris manutenebimus.

Michni. 6 Habeat etiam quilibet primariorum quolibet anno de nostra warda, quam Michni Angli appellant, duos equos, vnum cum sella, alterum sine sella, vnum gladium, quinque lanceas, vnum cuspidem, vnum scutum, & ducentos solidos argenti.

7 Mediocrium quilibet vnum equum, vnam lanceam, vnum scutum, & 60 solidos argenti.

8 Minutorum quilibet, vnum lanceam, vnam arcubalistam, & 15 solidos argenti.

9 Sint omnes tam primarij, quàm mediocres, & minuti, immunes, liberi, & quieti ab omnibus prouincialibus summonitionibus, & popularibus placitis, quæ Hundred laghe Angli dicunt, & ab omnibus armorum oneribus, quod Warscot Angli dicunt, & forinsecis querelis.

Hundredlaw. Warscot.

10 Sint mediocrium & minutorum causæ, & earum correctiones, tam criminalium quàm ciuilium per prouidam sapientiam & rationem primariorum iudicatæ & decisæ: primariorum verò enormia si quæ fuerint (ne scelus aliquod remaneat inultum) nosmet in ira nostra regali puniemus.

Muchehunt. 11 Habeant hi quatuor vnam regalem potestatem (salua semper nobis nostra præsentia) quatérq; in anno generales forestæ demonstrationes & viridis & veneris forisfactiones, quas Muchehunt dicunt, vbi teneant omnes calumniam de materia aliqua tangente forestam, eántque ad triplex iudicium, quod Angli Ofgangfordell dicunt. Ita autem acquiratur illud triplex iudicium. Accipiat secum quinque, & sit ipse sextus, & sic iurando acquirat triplex iudicium, aut triplex iuramentum. Sed purgatio ignis nullatenus admittatur, nisi vbi nuda veritas nequit aliter inuestigari.

Ofgangfordell. Purgatio ignis, triplex ordalia.

12 Liberalis autem homo. 1. Pegen, modo crimen suum non sit inter maiora, habeat fidelem hominem qui possit pro eo iurare iuramentum. 1. Forathe: si autem non habet, ipsemet iuret, nec pardonetur ei aliquod iuramentum. Pegen. Fozathe.

13 Si aduena vel peregrinus qui de longinquo venerit sit calumniatus de foresta, & talis est sua inopia vt non possit habere plegium ad primam calumniam, qualem * nullus Anglus iudicare potest: tunc subeat captionem regis, & ibi expectet quousque vadat ad iudicium ferri & aquæ: attamen si quis extraneo aut peregrino de longè venienti * *sibi ipsi nocet, si aliquod iudicium iudicauerint.

14 Quicúng, coram primarios homines meos forestæ in falso testimonio steterit & victus fuerit, non sit dignus imposterum stare aut portare testimonium, quia legalitatem suam perdidit, & pro culpa soluat regi decem solidos, quos Dani vocant Halsehang, alias Halsehang. Halsehang.

15 Si quis vim aliquam primarijs forestæ meæ intulerit, si liberalis sit amittat libertatem & omnia sua, si villanus abscindatur dextra.

16 Si alteruter iterum peccauerit, reus sit mortis.

17 Si quis autem contra primarium pugnauerit, in plito emendet secundum pretium sui ipsius, quod Angli Pere & pite dicunt, & soluat primario quadraginta solidos. Pere & Pite.

18 Si pacem quis fregerit ante mediocres forestæ, quod dicunt Gethbrech, emendet regi decem solidis. Gethbzech.

19 Si quis mediocrium aliquem cum ira percusserit, emendetur prout interfectio feræ regalis mihi emendari solet.

20 Si quis delinquens in foresta nostra capietur, pœnas luet secundum modum & genus delicti.

21 Pœna & forisfactio non vna eadémq; erit liberalis (quem Dani Ealderman vocant) & illiberalis: domini & serui: noti & ignoti: nec vna eadémq; erit causarum tum ciuilium tum criminalium, ferarum forestæ, & ferarum regalium: viridis & veneris tractatio: nam crimen veneris ab antiquo inter maiora & non immeritò numerabatur: viridis verò (fractione chaceæ nostræ regalis excepta) ita pusillum & exiguum est, quòd vix ea respicit nostra constitutio: qui in hoc tamen deliquerit, sit criminis forestæ reus. Ealderman.

22 Si liber aliquis feram forestæ ad cursum impulerit, siue casu, siue præhabita voluntate, ita vt cursu celeri cogatur fera anhelare, decem solidis regi emendet, si illiberalis dupliciter emendet, si seruus careat corio.

23 Si verò harum aliquot interfecerit, soluat dupliciter & persoluat, sitque pretij sui reus contra regem.

24 Sed si regalem feram, quam Angli Staggon appellant, alteruter coegerit anhelare, alter per vnum annum, alter per duos careat libertate naturali: si verò seruus, pro vtlegato habeatur, quem Angli Frendlesman vocant. Staggon or Stagge. Frendlesman.

25 Si verò occiderit, amittat liber scutum libertatis, si sit illiberalis careat libertate, si seruus vita.

26 Episcopi, abbates, & barones mei non calumniabuntur pro venatione, si non regales feras occiderint: & si regales, restabunt rei regi pro libito suo, sine certa emendatione.

27 Sunt aliæ (præter feras forestæ) bestiæ, quæ dum inter ſepta & ſepes foreſtæ continentur, emendationi ſubiacent: quales ſunt capreoli, lepores, & cuniculi. Sunt & alia quàm plurima animalia, quæ quãquam infra ſepta foreſtæ viuunt, &

Bubali olim in Anglia. oneri & curæ mediocrium ſubiacent foreſtæ, tamen nequaquã cenſeri poſſunt, qualia ſunt bubali, vaccæ, & ſimilia. Vulpes & lupi, nec foreſtæ nec veneris habentur, & proinde eorum interfectio nulli emendationi ſubiacet. Si tamen infra limites occiduntur, fractio ſit regalis chaceæ, & mitiùs emendetur. Aper verò quanquam foreſtæ ſit, nullatenus tamen animal veneris haberi eſt aſſuetus.

28 Boſco nec ſubboſco noſtro ſine licentia primariorum foreſtæ nemo manum apponat, quòd ſi quis fecerit reus ſit fractionis regalis chaceæ.

Ilices aliquando in Britãnia niſi intelligatur de quercu. 29 Si quis verò ilicem aut arborẽ aliquam, quæ victum feris ſuppeditat ſciderit, præter fractionem regalis chaceæ, emendet regi viginti ſolidis.

30 Volo vt omnis liber homo pro libito ſuo habeat venerem ſiue viridem in planis ſuis ſuper terras ſuas, ſine chacea tamen; & deuitent omnes meam, vbicũq; eam habere voluero.

Greihounds. 31 Nullus mediocris habebit nec cuſtodiet canes, quos Angli Greihounds appellant. Liberali verò, dum genuiſciſtio eorum facta fuerit coram primario foreſtæ licebit, aut ſine genuiſciſtione dum remoti ſunt à limitibus foreſtæ per decem miliaria: quando verò propius venerint, emendet quodlibet miliare vno ſolido. Si verò infra ſepta foreſtæ reperiatur, dominus canis foriſfaciet & decem ſolidos regi.

Uelter Langeran. 32 Velteres verò quos Langeran appellant, quia manifeſtè conſtat in ijs nihil eſſe periculi, cuilibet licebit ſine genuiſciſtione eos cuſtodire.

Ramhundt. Idem de canibus quos Ramhundt vocant.

33 Quòdſi caſu inauſpicato huiuſmodi canes rabidi fiant & vbiq; vagãtur, negligentia dominorum, redduntur illiciti, & emendetur regi pro illicitis, &c. Quòdſi intra ſepta foreſtæ reperiantur, talis exquiratur herus, & emendet ſecundum Pretium hominis mediocris. pretium hominis mediocris, quòd ſecundum legem Werinorum. 1. Churingorum, eſt ducentorum ſolidorum.

34 Si canis rabidus momorderit feram, tunc emendet ſecundum pretiũ hominis liberalis, quod

Pretium liberi hominis. eſt duodecies ſolidis centum. Si verò fera regalis morſa fuerit, reus ſit maximi criminis.

And theſe are the conſtitutions of Canutus concerning the foreſt, verie barbarouſlie tranſlated by thoſe that tolke the ſame in hand. Howbeit as I find it ſo I ſet it downe, without anie alteration of my copie in anie iot or tittle.

Of gardens and orchards.

Chap. 19.

After ſuch time as Calis was wone from the French, and that our countriemen had learned to trade into diuerſe countries (wherby they grew rich) they began to war idle alſo, and there vpon not onlie left off their former painfulneſſe and frugalitie, but in like ſort gaue themſelues to liue in exceſſe and vanitie, whereby manie godlie commodities failed, and in ſhort time were not to be had amongſt vs. Such ſtrangers alſo as dwelled here with vs, perceiuing our sluggiſhneſſe, and eſpieng that this idleneſſe of ours might redound to their great profit, forthwith imploied their endeuours to bring in the ſupplie of ſuch things as we lacked, continuallie from forren countries; which yet more augmented our idlenes. For hauing all things at reaſonable prices as we ſuppoſed, by ſuch means from them, we thought it meere madneſſe to ſpend either time or coſt about the ſame here at home. And thus we became enimies to our owne welfare, as men that in thoſe daies repoſed our felicitie in following the wars, wherewith we were often exerciſed both at home and other places. Beſides this, the naturall deſire that mankind hath to eſteeme of things farre ſought, bicauſe they be rare and coſtlie, and the irkeſome contempt of things neere hand, for that they are common and plentifull, hath borne no ſmall ſwaie alſo in this behalfe amongſt vs. For hereby we haue neglected our owne good gifts of God, growing here at home as vile and of no valure, and had euerie trifle and toie in admiration that is brought hither from far countries, aſcribing I wot not what great force and ſolemne eſtimation vnto them, vntill they alſo haue waren old, after which they haue béene ſo little regarded, if not more deſpiſed amongſt vs than our owne. Examples hereof I could ſet downe manie, & in manie things, but ſith my purpoſe is to deale at this time with gardens and orchards, it ſhall ſuffice that I touch them onelie, and ſhew our inconſtancie in the ſame, ſo farre as ſhall ſeeme & be conuenient for my turne. I comprehend therefore vnder the word garden, all ſuch grounds as are wrought with the ſpade by mans hand, for ſo the caſe requireth. Of wine I haue written alreadie elſe-where ſufficientlie, which commoditie (as I haue learned further ſince the penning of that booke) hath béene verie plentifull in this Iland, not onlie in the time of the Romans, but alſo ſince the conqueſt, as I haue ſeene by record: yet at this preſent haue we none at all or elſe verie little to ſpeake of growing in this Iland: which I impute not vnto the ſoile, but the negligence of my countrimen. Such herbes, fruits, and roots alſo as grow yéerelie out of the ground, of ſeed, haue béene verie plentifull in this land, in the time of the firſt Edward, and after his daies: but in proceſſe of time they grew alſo to be neglected, ſo that from Henrie the fourth till the latter end of Henrie the ſeuenth, & beginning of Henrie the eight, there was litle or no vſe of them in England, but they remained either vnknowne, or ſuppoſed as food more meet for hogs & ſauage beaſts to feed vpon than mankind. Whereas in my time their vſe is not onelie reſumed among the poore commons, I meane of melons, pompions, gourds, cucumbers, radiſhes, ſkirets, parſneps, carrets, cabbages, nauewes, turneps, and all kinds of ſalad herbes, but alſo fed vpon as deintie diſhes at the tables of delicate merchants, gentlemen, and the nobilitie, who make their proviſion yearelie for new ſeeds out of ſtrange countries, from whence they haue them aboundantlie. Neither do they now ſtaie with ſuch of theſe fruits as are wholeſome in their kinds, but aduenture further vpon ſuch as are verie dangerous and hurtfull, as the berangenes, mushroms, &c: as if nature had ordeined all for the belli, or that all things were to be eaten, for whoſe miſchiefous operation the Lord in ſome meaſure hath giuen and prouided a remedie.

Hops in time paſt were plentifull in this land, afterwards alſo their maintenance did ceaſe, and now being reuiued, where are anie better to be found: where anie greater commoditie to be raiſed by them: onelie poles are accounted to be their greateſt charge. But ſith men haue learned of late to ſow aſhen keies in aſhyards by themſelues, that inconuenience uenience in ſhort time will be redreſſed. Madder hath growne abundantlie in this Iland, but of long time neglected, and now a little reuiued, and offereth it ſelfe to proue no ſmall benefit vnto our countrie, as manie other things elſe, which are now fetched from vs; as we before time when we gaue our ſelues to idleneſſe, were glad to haue them other. If you loke into our gardens annered to our houſes, how wonderfullie is their beautie increaſed, not onelie with floures, which Colmella calleth Terrena ſydera, ſaieng;

Pingit & in varios terreſtria ſydera flores, and varietie of curious and coſtlie workmanſhip, but alſo with rare and medicinable hearbes ſought vp in the land within theſe fortie yeares: ſo that in compariſon of this preſent, the ancient gardens were but dunghils and laiſtowes to ſuch as did poſſeſſe them. How art alſo helpeth nature in the dailie colouring, dubling and inlarging the proportion of our floures, it is incredible to report: for ſo curious and cunning are our gardeners now in theſe daies, that they preſume to do in maner what they liſt with nature, and moderate hir courſe in things as if they were hir ſuperiours. It is a world alſo to ſée, how manie ſtrange hearbs, plants, and annuall fruits, are dailie brought vnto vs from the Indies, Americans, Taprobane, Canarie Iles, and all parts of the world: the which albeit that in reſpect of the conſtitutions of our bodies they do not grow for vs, bicauſe that God hath beſtowed ſufficient commodities vpon euerie countrie for hir owne neceſſitie; yet for delectation ſake vnto the eie, and their odoriferous ſauours vnto the noſe, they are to be cherished, and God to be glorified alſo in them, bicauſe they are his good gifts, and created to do man helpe and ſeruice. There is not almoſt one noble man, gentleman, or merchant, that hath not great ſtore of theſe floures, which now alſo do begin to war ſo well acquainted with our ſoiles, that we may almoſt accompt of them as parcell of our owne commodities. They haue no leſſe regard in like ſort to cherish medicinable hearbs fetched out of other regions nérer hand: inſomuch that I haue ſéene in ſome one garden to the number of three hundred or foure hundred of them, if not more; of the halfe of whoſe names within fortie yéeres paſſed we had no maner knowledge. But herein I find ſome cauſe of juſt complaint, for that we extoll their vſes ſo farre that we fall into contempt of our owne, which are in truth more beneficiall and apt for vs than ſuch as grow elſewhere, ſith (as I ſaid before) euerie region hath abundantlie within hir owne limits whatſoeuer is néedfull and moſt conuenient for them that dwell therein. How do men extoll the vſe of Tabacco in my time, whereas in truth (whether the cauſe be in the repugnancie of our conſtitution vnto the operation thereof, or that the ground doth alter hir force, I cannot tell) it is not found of ſo great efficacie as they write. And beſide this, our common germander or thiſtle benet is found & knowne to bée ſo wholeſome and of ſo great power in medicine, as anie other hearbe, if they be vſed accordinglie. I could exemplifie after the like maner in ſundrie other, as the Salſa parilla, Mechoacan, &c.: but I forbeare ſo to do, becauſe I couet to be briéfe. And trulie the eſtimation and credit that we yéeld and giue vnto compound medicines made with forren drugs, is one great cauſe wherefore the full knowledge and vſe of our owne ſimples hath bene ſo long raked vp in the timbers. And as this may be verified, ſo to be one ſound concluſion, for the greater number of ſimples that go vnto anie compound medicine, the greater confuſion is found therein, becauſe the qualities and operations of verie few of the particulars are throughlie knowne. And euen ſo our continuall deſire of ſtrange drugs, whereby the phyſician and apothecarie onlie hath the benefit, is no ſmall cauſe that the vſe of our ſimples here at home doth go to looſe, and that we tread thoſe herbes vnder our fét, whoſe forces if we knew, & could aplie them to our neceſſities, we wold honor & haue in reuerence as to their eaſe behoueth. Alas what haue we to do with ſuch Arabian & Grecian ſtuffe as is dailie brought from thoſe parties, which lie in another clime? And therefore the bodies of ſuch as dwell there, are of another conſtitution, than ours are here at home. Certes they grow not for vs, but for the Arabians and Grecians. And albeit that they maie by ſkill be aplied vnto our benefit, yet to be more ſkilfull in them than in our owne, is follie; and to vſe forren wares when our owne maie ſerue the turne is more follie; but to deſpiſe our owne and magnifie aboue meaſure the vſe of them that are ſought and brought from farre, is moſt follie of all: for it ſauoureth of ignorance, or at the leaſtwiſe of negligence, and therefore worthie of reproch.

Among the Indians, who haue the moſt preſent cures for euerie diſeaſe, of their owne nation, there is ſmall regard of compound medicins, & leſſe of forren drugs, becauſe they neither know them nor can vſe them, but worke wonders euen with their owne ſimples. With them alſo the difference of the clime doth ſhew hir full effect, for whereas they will heale one another in ſhort time with application of one ſimple, &c: if a Spaniard or Engliſh man ſtand in néed of their helpe, they are driuen to haue a longer ſpace in their cures, and now and then alſo to vſe ſome addition of two or three ſimples at the moſt, whoſe forces vnto them are throughlie knowne, becauſe their exerciſe is onelie in their owne, as men that neuer ſought or heard what vertue was in thoſe that came from other countries. And euen ſo did Marcus Cato the learned Roman indeuor to deale in his cures of ſundrie diſeaſes, wherein he not onelie vſed ſuch ſimples as were to be had in his owne countrie, but alſo examined and learned the forces of each of them, wherewith he dealt ſo diligentlie, that in all his life time, he could atteine to the exact knowledge but of a few, and thereto wrote of thoſe moſt learnedlie, as would eaſilie be ſeene, if thoſe his bookes were extant. For the ſpace alſo of 600 yéeres, the colewort onelie was a medicine in Rome for all diſeaſes, ſo that his vertues were thoroughlie knowne in thoſe parts.

In Plinies time the like affection to forren drugs did rage among the Romans, whereby their owne did grow in contempt. Crieng out therefore of this extreame follie, lib. 22. cap. 24, he ſpeaketh after this maner: Non placent remedia tam longè naſcentia, non enim nobis gignuntur, immò ne illis quidem, alioquin non venderent; ſi placet etiam ſuperſtitionis gratiâ emantur, quoniam ſupplicamus, &c. Salutem quidem ſine his poſſe conſtare, vel ob id probabimus, vt tanto magis ſui tandem pudeat. For my part I doubt not, if the vſe of outlandiſh drugs had not blinded our phyſicians of England in times paſſed, but that the vertues of our ſimples here at home would haue béene far better knowne, and ſo well vnto vs, as thoſe of India are to the practiſioners of thoſe partes, and thereunto be found more profitable for vs than the forren either are or maie be. This alſo will I add, that euen thoſe which are moſt common by reaſon of their plentie, and moſt vile bicauſe of their abundance, are not without ſome vniuerſall and eſpeciall efficacie, if it were knowne, for our benefit: ſith God in nature hath ſo diſpoſed his creatures, that the moſt néedfull are the moſt plentifull, and ſeruing for ſuch generall diſeaſes as our conſtitution moſt commonlie is affected withall. Great thanks therefore be giuen vnto the phyſicians of our age and countrie, who not onelie indeuour to ſearch out the vſe of ſuch ſimples as our ſoile doth yéeld and bring forth, but alſo to procure ſuch as grow elſewhere, vpō purpoſe ſo to acquaint them with our clime, that they in time through ſome alteration receiued from the nature of the earth, maie likewiſe turne to our benefit and commoditie, and be vſed as our owne.

The chiefe workeman, or as I maie call him the founder of this deuiſe, is Carolus Cluſius, the noble herbariſt, whoſe induſtrie hath wonderfullie ſtirred them vp vnto this good act. For albeit that Matthiolus, Rembert, Lobell, and other haue trauelled verie farre in this behalfe, yet none hath come néere to Cluſius, much leſſe gone further in the finding and true deſcriptions of ſuch herbes as of late are brought to light. I doubt not but if this man were in England but one ſeuen yéeres, he would reueale a number of herbes growing with vs, whereof neither our phyſicians nor apothecaries as yet haue anie knowledge. And euen like thankes be giuen vnto our nobilitie, gentlemen, and others, for their continuall nutriture and cheriſhing of ſuch homeborne and forren ſimples in their gardens, for hereby they ſhall not onlie be had at hand and preſerued, but alſo their formes made more familiar to be diſcerned, and their vſes better knowne than hitherto they haue béene.

And euen as it fareth with our gardens, ſo doth it with our orchards, which were neuer furniſhed with ſo good fruit, nor with ſuch varietie as at this preſent. For beſide that we haue moſt delicate apples, plummes, peares, walnuts, filberds, &c. and thoſe of ſundrie ſorts, planted within fortie yéeres paſſed, in compariſon of which moſt of the old trées are nothing worth: ſo haue we no leſſe ſtore of ſtrange fruit, as abricotes, almonds, peaches, figges, cornetrées in noble mens orchards. I haue ſeene capers, orenges, and lemmons, and heard of wild oliues growing here, beſide other ſtrange trées, brought from far, whoſe names I know not. So that England for theſe commodities was neuer better furniſhed, neither anie nation vnder their clime more plentifullie indued with theſe and other bleſſings from the moſt high God, who grant vs grace withall to vſe the ſame to his honour and glorie! and not as inſtruments and prouocations vnto further exceſſe and vanitie, wherewith his diſpleaſure may be kindled, leaſt theſe his benefits do turne vnto thornes and briers vnto vs for our annoiance and puniſhment, which he hath beſtowed vpon vs for our conſolation and comfort.

We haue in like ſort ſuch workemen as are not onelie excellent in graffing the naturall fruits, but alſo in their artificiall mixtures, whereby one trée bringeth forth ſundrie fruits, and one and the ſame fruit of diuers colours and taſts, dallieng as it were with nature and hir courſe, as if hir whole trade were perfectlie knowne vnto them: of hard fruits they will make tender, of ſowre ſweet, of ſweet yet more delicate, béereuing alſo ſome of their kernels, other of their cores, and finallie induing them with the ſauour of muſke, ambre, or ſweet ſpices at their pleaſures. Diuerſe alſo haue written at large of theſe ſeuerall practiſes, and ſome of them how to conuert the kernels of peaches into almonds, of ſmall fruit to make farre greater, and to remoue or add ſuperfluous or neceſſarie moiſture to the trées, with other things belonging to their preſeruation, and with no leſſe diligence than our phyſicians do commonlie ſhew vpon our owne diſeaſed bodies, which to me doth ſeeme right ſtrange. And euen ſo do our gardeners with their herbes, whereby they are ſtrengthened againſt noiſome blaſts, and preſerued from putrifaction and hinderance, whereby ſome ſuch as were annuall, are now made perpetuall, being yéerelie taken vp, and either reſerued in the houſe, or hauing the roſſe pulled from their rotes, laid againe into the earth, where they remaine in ſafetie. What choiſe they make alſo in their waters, and therewith ſome of them do now and then kéepe them moiſt, it is a world to ſée; inſomuch that the apothecaries ſhops maie ſéeme to be néedfull alſo to our gardens and orchards, and that in ſundrie wiſe: naie the kitchin it ſelfe is ſo farre from being able to be miſſed among them, that euen the verie diſhwater is not without ſome vſe amongeſt our fineſt plants. Whereby and ſundrie other circumſtances not here to bée remembred, I am perſuaded, that albeit the gardens of the Heſperides were in times paſt ſo greatlie accounted of becauſe of their delicacie: yet if it were poſſible to haue ſuch an equall iudge, as by certeine knowledge of both were able to pronounce vpon them, I doubt not but he would giue the price vnto the gardens of our daies, and generallie ouer all Europe, in compariſon of thoſe times, wherein the old exceeded. Plinie and other ſpeake of a roſe that had thrée ſcore leaues growing vpon one button: but if I ſhould tell of one which bare a triple number vnto that proportion, I know I ſhall not be beléeued, and no great matter though I were not, howbeit, ſuch a one was to be ſéene in Antwarpe 1585, as I haue heard, and I know who might haue had a ſlip or ſtalon thereof, if he would haue ventured ten pounds vpon the growth of the ſame, which ſhould haue bene but a tickle hazard, and therefore better bndone, as I did alwaies imagine. For mine owne part, good reader, let me boaſt a litle of my garden, which is but ſmall, and the whole Area thereof little aboue 300 foot of ground, and yet, ſuch hath béene my good lucke in purchaſe of the varietie of ſimples, that notwithſtanding my ſmall abilitie, there are verie néere thrée hundred of one ſort and other conteined therein, no one of them being common or vſuallie to bée had. If therefore my little plot, void of all coſt in kéeping be ſo well furniſhed, what ſhall we thinke of thoſe of Hampton court, Noneſuch, Tibaults, Cobham garden, and ſundrie other apperteining to diuerſe citizens of London, whom I could particularlie name, if I ſhould not ſéeme to offend them by ſuch my demeanour and dealing?

Of waters generallie.

Chap. 21.

THere is no one commoditie in England, whereof I can make leſſe report than of our waters. For albeit our ſoile abound with water in all places, and that in the moſt ample maner: yet can I not find by ſome experience that almoſt anie one of our riuers hath ſuch odd and rare qualities as diuers of the maine are ſaid to be indued withall. Vitruuius writeth of a well in Paphlagonia, whoſe water ſéemeth as it were mixed with wine, & addeth thereto that diuerſe become drunke by ſuperfluous taking of the ſame. The like force is found In amne Liceſio, a riuer of Thracia, vpon whoſe bankes a man ſhall hardlie miſſe to find ſome traueller or other ſléeping for drunkennelle, by drinking of that liquor. Néere alſo vnto Epheſus are certeine welles, which taſte like charpe vineger, and therefore therefore are much esteemed of by such as are sicke and euill at ease in those parts. At Hieropolis is a spring of such force (as Strabo saith) that the water thereof mixed with certaine herbes of choise, doth colour woll with such a glosse, that the die thereof contendeth with skarlet, murreie, and purple, and oft ouercommeth the same. The Cydnus in Tarsus of Cilicia, is of such vertue, that who so batheth himselfe therein, shall find great ease of the gowt that runneth ouer all his ioints. In one of the fortunate Iles (saith Pomponius the Cosmographer) are two springs, one of the which bringeth immoderate laughter to him that drinketh thereof, the other sadnesse and restraint of that effect, whereby the last is taken to be a souereigne medicine against the other, to the great admiration of such as haue beholden it. At Susis in Persia there is a spring, which maketh him that drinketh downe anie of the water, to cast all his teeth: but if he onlie wash his mouth withall, it maketh them fast, & his mouth to be verie healthfull. So there is a riuer among the Gadarens, whereof if a beast drinke, he forthwith casteth hoofe, haire, and hornes, if he haue anie. Also a lake in Assyria, neere vnto the which there is a kind of glewie matter to be found, which holdeth such birds as by hap do light thereon so fast as birdlime, by means whereof verie manie do perish and are taken that light vpon the same: howbeit if anie portion hereof happen to be set on fire by casualtie or otherwise, it will neuer be quenched but by casting on of dust, as Caietanus doth report. Another at Halicarnassus called Salmacis, which is noted to make such men effeminate as drinke of the water of the same. Certes it maie be (saith Strabo) that the water and aire of a region maie qualifie the courage of some men, but none can make them effeminate, nor anie other thing because of such corruption in them, sooner than superfluous wealth, and inconstancie of liuing and behauiour, which is a bane vnto all natures, lib. 4. All which, with manie other not now comming to memorie, as the Letheus, Styx, Phlegeton, Cocitus, &c: haue strange & incredible reports made of them by the new and ancient writers, the like whereof are not to be found in England, which I impute wholie to the blessing of God, who hath ordeined nothing amongst vs in this our temperate region, but that which is good, wholesome, and most commodious for our nation. We haue therefore no hurtfull waters amongst vs, but all wholesome and profitable for the benefit of the people. Neuertheles as none of them is to be found without hir fish: so we know by experience, that diuerse turne ash, some other elme, and eken stakes or poles that lie or are throwne into them into hard stone, in long continuance of time, which is the strangest thing that I can learne at this present whereupon to rest for a certentie. Yet I read of diuerse welles, whereunto ourold writers ascribe either wonderfull vertues, or rare courses, as of one vpon the shore, beyond the which the sea floweth euerie daie twise a large mile and more; and yet is the surge of that water alwaies seuen foot from the salt sea: whereby it should seeme that the head of the spring is moueable. But alas I do not easilie beleeue it, more than that which is written of the Llingwan lake in Wales, which is neere to the Seuerne, and receiueth the flowing sea into hir chanell as it were a gulfe, and yet is neuer full: but when the sea goeth awaie by reason of the ebbe, it casteth vp the water with such violence, that hir banks are ouerflowne and drowned, which is an absurd report. They adde also, that if all the people of the countrie stood neere to the same, with their faces toward the lake, in such maner that the dashing of the water might touch and wet their clothes, they should haue no power to go from thence, but maugre their resistance be drawne into that gulfe and perish; whereas if they turned their backs vnto the same, they should suffer no such inconuenience though they stood neuer so neere. Manie other such like toies I could set downe of other welles and waters of our countrie. But whie should I write that for other men to read, whereto I giue no credit my selfe, more than to the report which Iohannes du Choul doth make in his description of Pilats lake, In monte Pilati in Gallia, or Boccatius of the Scaphigiolo in the Appenine hils, or Felix Malliolus of Pilats lake In monte fracto (where Iacobus de Voragino bishop of Gene, & Ioachimus Vadianus in Pompon. Melam do also make mention) sith I take them but for fables, & far vnworthie that anie good man should staine his paper with such friuolous matters as are reported of them, being deuised at the first by Satanas the father of lies, for the holding of the ignorant & credulous in their superstitions and errors. Such also is the tale that goeth of Wenefrids well, & nothing inferior to that of Mercurie neere to port Capena in Rome, wherein such as went by would dip branches of baie, and sprinkle the same vpon themselues: and so manie as stood about them, calling vpon Mercurie, and craving pardon for their sinnes, as if that ceremonie had bene of force vnto forgiuenesse and remission of their trespasses. And so it appeareth partlie by Cicero, who (being a man neither thinking well of their owne gods nor liking of the augures) doth write in his first De legibus (except my memorie faile me) aspersione aquæ labem tolli corpoream, & castimoniam corporis præstari, which maketh me to thinke further, that they thought it equall with our late holie-water, wherewith it maie be compared. I might further also (if I would) make relation of diuerse welles, which haue wrought manie miracles in time of superstition, as S. Butolphs well in Hadstocke, S. Germans well at Falkeburne, Holie well at S. Albones and London, and sundrie other in other places: but as their vertues are now found out to be but baits to draw men and women vnto them, either for gaine vnto the places where they were, or satisfaction of the lewd disposition of such as hunted after other gaine, so it shall suffice to haue touched them far off. Onlie this will I ad, that we haue no hurtfull waters, no not vnto our sheepe, though it please Cardan to auouch otherwise; for our waters are not the causes, but the signes of their infections when they drinke, as I elsewhere haue noted in the chapter of cattell, as also that we haue a spring neere Saffron Walden, and not farre from the house of the lord Audleie, which is of such force, that it loseth the bodie of him that drinketh therof in verie gentle maner, and beside that is verie delectable & pleasant to be taken, as I haue found by experience. I heare also of two welles neere London, of which the one is verie excellent water, the other will beare no sope; and yet so situat that the one is hard by the other. And thus much of waters.

Of woods and marishes.

Chap. 22.

Great abundance of wood sometime in England.

IT should seeme by ancient records, and the testimonie of sundrie authors, that the whole countries of Lhoegres and Cambria, now England and Wales, haue sometimes béene verie well replenished with great woods & groues, although at this time the said commoditie be not a little decaied in both, and in such wise that a man ſhall oft ride ten or twentie miles in ech of them, and find verie little or rather none at all, except it be nére vnto townes, gentlemens houſes, & villages, where the inhabitants haue planted a few elmes, okes, haſels, or aſhes about their dwellings for their defenſe from the rough winds, and keeping of the ſtormie weather from annoiance of the ſame. This ſcarſitie at the firſt grew (as it is thought) either by the induſtrie of man, for maintenance of tillage (as we vnderſtand the like to be done of late by the Spaniards in the weſt Indies, where they fired whole woods of verie great compaſſe therby to come by ground whereon to ſow their graines) or elſe thorough the couetouſneſſe of ſuch, as in preferring of paſture for their ſheepe and greater cattell, doo make ſmall account of firebote and timber: or finallie by the crueltie of the enimies, whereof we haue ſundrie examples declared in our hiſtories. Howbeit where the rocks and quarrie grounds are, I take the ſwart of the earth to be ſo thin, that no trée of anie greatneſſe, other than ſhrubs and buſhes, is able to grow or proſper long therein for want of ſufficient moiſture wherewith to feed them with freſh humour, or at the leaſtwiſe of mould, to ſhrowd, ſtaie vpright, and cheriſh the ſame in the bluſtering winters weather, till they may grow vnto anie greatneſſe, and ſpread or yéeld their rotes downe right into the ſoile about them: and this either is or may be one other cauſe, wherefore ſome places are naturallie void of wood. But to proceed. Although I muſt needs confeſſe that there is good ſtore of great wood or timber here and there, euen now in ſome places of England, yet in our daies it is far vnlike to that plentie, which our anceſtors haue ſéene heretofore, when ſtatelie building was leſſe in vſe. For albeit that there were then greater number of meſuages and manſions almoſt in euery place; yet were their frames ſo ſlight and ſlender, that one meane dwelling houſe in our time is able to counteruaile verie manie of them, if you conſider the preſent charge with the plentie of timber that we beſtow vpon them. In times paſt men were contented to dwell in houſes, builded of ſallow, willow, plumtrée, hardbeame, and elme, ſo that the vſe of oke was in maner dedicated wholie vnto churches, religious houſes, princes palaces, noblemens lodgings, & nauigation: but now all theſe are reiected, and nothing but oke anie whit regarded. And yet ſée the change, for when our houſes were builded of willow, then had we oken men; but now that our houſes are come to be made of oke, our men are not onlie become willow, but a great manie through Perſian delicacie crept in among vs altogither of ſtraw, which is a ſore alteration. In thoſe the courage of the owner was a ſufficient defenſe to keepe the houſe in ſafetie, but now the aſſurance of the timber, double doores, lockes and bolts muſt defend the man from robbing. Now haue we manie chimnies and yet our tenderlings complaine of rheumes, catarhs and poſes. Then had we none but rere dolles, and our heads did neuer ake. For as the ſmoke in thoſe daies was ſuppoſed to be a ſufficient hardning for the timber of the houſe; ſo it was reputed a far better medicine to keepe the goodman and his familie from the quacke or poſe, wherewith as then verie few were oft acquainted.

Deſire of much wealth and eaſe abateth manhood, & ouerthroweth a manlie courage.

Of the curiouſneſſe of theſe tiles I ſpeake not, ſith our workemen are growne generallie to ſuch an excellencie of deuiſe in the frames now made, that they far paſſe the fineſt of the old. And ſuch is their huſbandrie in dealing with their timber, that the ſame ſtuffe which in time paſt was reiected as crooked, vnprofitable, and to no vſe but the fire, doth now come in the fronts and beſt part of the worke. Whereby the common ſaieng is likewiſe in theſe daies verified in our manſion houſes, which earſt was ſaid onelie of the timber for ſhips, that no oke can grow ſo crooked but it falleth out to ſome vſe, & that neceſſarie in the naule. It is a world to ſée moreouer how diuerſe men being bent to building, and hauing a delectable veine in ſpending of their goods by that trade, doo dailie imagine new deuiſes of their owne to guide their workemen withall, and thoſe more curious and excellent alwaies than the former. In the proceeding alſo of their workes, how they ſet vp, how they pull downe, how they inlarge, how they reſtreine, how they ad to, how they take from, whereby their heads are neuer idle, their purſes neuer ſhut, nor their bookes of account neuer made perfect.

Deſtruunt, ædificant, mutant quadrata rotundis ſaith the poet. So that if a man ſhould well conſider of all the odd crotchets in ſuch a builders braine, he would thinke his head to haue euen inough of thoſe affaires onelie, & therefore iudge that he ſhould not well be able to deale in anie other. But ſuch commonlie are our workemaſters, that they haue beſide this veine afore mentioned, either great charge of merchandizes, little leſſe buſineſſe in the commonwealth, or finallie no ſmall dealings otherwiſe incident vnto them, whereby gaine ariſeth, and ſome trouble oft among withall. Which cauſeth me to wonder not a little how they can plaie the parts ſo well of ſo manie ſundrie men, whereas diuerſe other of greater forecaſt in apparance can ſeldome ſhift well or thriue in anie one of them. But to our purpoſe.

We haue manie woods, forreſts, and parks, which cheriſh trées abundantlie, although in the woodland countries there is almoſt no hedge that hath not ſome ſtore of the greateſt ſort, beſide infinit numbers of hedgerowes, groues, and ſpringes, that are mainteined of purpoſe for the building and proviſion of ſuch owners as doo poſſeſſe the ſame. Howbeit as euerie ſoile doth not beare all kinds of wood, ſo there is not anie wood, parke, hedgerow, groue, or forreſt, that is not mixed with diuerſe, as oke, aſh, haſell, hawthorne, birch, beech, hardbeame, hull, ſorſe, quicken aſpe, roſiers, wild cherie, and ſuch like, whereof oke hath alwaies the preheminence, as moſt méet for building and the naule, whervnto it is reſerued. This trée bringeth forth alſo a profitable kind of maſt, whereby ſuch as dwell nére vnto the aforeſaid places doo cheriſh and bring vp innumerable heards of ſwine. In time of plentie of this maſt, our red and fallow déere will not let to participat thereof with our hogs, more than our nete: yea our common poultrie alſo if they may come vnto them. But as this abundance doth proue verie pernicious vnto the firſt, ſo theſe egs which theſe latter doo bring forth (beſide blackeneſſe in colour and bitterneſſe of taſt) haue not ſeldome béene found to breed diuerſe diſeaſes vnto ſuch perſons as haue eaten of the ſame. I might ad in like ſort the profit inſuing by the barke of this wood, whereof our tanners haue great vſe in dreſſing of leather, and which they buie yearelie in Maie by the ſadame, as I haue oft ſéene: but it ſhall not néed at this time to enter into anie ſuch diſcourſe, onlie this I wiſh, that our ſole and vpper leathering may haue their due time, and not be haſted on by extraordinarie ſlights, as with aſh, barke, &c. Whereby as I grant that it ſéemeth outwardlie to be verie thicke & well done: ſo if you reſpect the ſadnes therof, it doth proue in the end to be verie hollow & not able to hold out water. Neuertheleſſe we haue good lawes for redreſſe of this enormitie, but it cõmeth to paſſe in theſe as in the execution of moſt penall ſtatutes. For the gaines to be gotten by the ſame being giuen to one or two hungrie and vnthriftie perſons, they make a ſhew of great reformation at the firſt, & for a litle while, till they find that following of ſute in law against the offendors is somwhat too chargeable and tedious. This therefore perceiued, they giue ouer the law, and fall to the admission of gifts and rewards to winke at things past, and when they haue once gone ouer their ground with this kind of tillage, then do they tender licences, and offer large dispensations vnto him that shall aske the same, thereby to do what him listeth in his trade for an pearelie pension, whereby the bribour now groweth to some certeine reuenues, & the tanner to so great libertie that his lether is much worse than before. But is not this a mockerie of our lawes, & manifest illusion of the good subiect whom they thus pill & poll? Of all oke growing in England the parke oke is the softest, and far more spalt and brickle than the hedge oke. And of all in Essex, that growing in Wardfield parke is the finest for ioiners craft: for oftentimes haue I seene of their workes made of that oke so fine and faire, as most of the wainescot that is brought hither out of Danske, for our wainescot is not made in England. Yet diuerse haue assaied to deale without okes to that end, but not with so good successe as they haue hoped, because the ab or iuice will not so soone be removed and cleane drawne out, which some attribute to want of time in the salt water. Neuerthelesse in building, so well the hedge as the parke oke go all one waie, and neuer so much hath beene spent in a hundred yeares before, as is in ten yeare of our time; for euerie man almost is a builder, and he that hath bought any small parcell of ground, be it neuer so little, will not be quiet till he haue pulled downe the old house (if anie were there standing) and set vp a new after his owne deuise. But whereunto will this curiositie come?

Of elme we haue great store in euerie high waie and elsewhere, yet haue I not seene thereof anie together in woods or forrests, but where they haue beene first planted and then suffered to spread at their owne willes. Yet haue I knowen great woods of beech and hasell in manie places, especiallie in Barkeshire, Oxfordshire, and Buckinghamshire, where they are greatlie cherished, & conuerted to sundrie vses by such as dwell about them. Of all the elms that euer I saw, those in the south side of Douer court, in Essex neere Harwich are the most notable, for they grow (I meane) in crooked maner, that they are almost apt for nothing else but nauie timber, great ordinance, and beetels: and such thereto is their naturall qualitie, that being vsed in the said behalfe, they continue longer, and more long than anie the like trees in whatsoeuer parcell else of this land, without cuphar, shaking, or cleauing, as I find.

Ash commeth vp euerie where of it selfe, and with euerie kind of wood. And as we haue verie great plentie and no lesse vse of these in our husbandrie, so are we not without the plane, the vgh, the sorse, the chestnut, the line, the blacke cherrie, and such like. And although that we inioy them not in so great plentie now in most places, as in times past, or the other afore remembred: yet haue we sufficient of them all for our necessarie turnes and vses, especiallie of vgh; as may be seene betwixt Rotheram and Sheffield, and some sreds of Kent also, as I haue beene informed.

The firre, frankincense, and pine, we do not altogither want, especiallie the firre, whereof we haue some store in Chatlete more in Darbishire, Shropshire, Andernelle, and a mosse neere Manchester, not far from Leircesters house: although that in time past not onelie all Lancastershire, but a great part of the coast betweene Chester and the Solme were well stored. As for the frankincense and pine, they haue beene planted onelie in colleges and cloisters, by the cleargie and religious heretofore. Wherefore (in mine opinion) we may rather saie that we want them altogither; for except they grew naturallie, and not by force, I see no cause whie they should be accounted for parcell of our commodities. We haue also the aspe, whereof our fletchers make their arrowes. The seuerall kinds of poplars of our turners haue great vse for bolles, treies, troughs, dishes, &c. Also the alder, whose barke is not vnprofitable to die blacke withall, and therfore much vsed by our countrie wiues in colouring their knit hosen. I might here take occasion to speake of the great sales yeerlie made of wood, whereby an infinit quantitie hath bin destroied within these few yeers: but I giue ouer to trauell in this behalfe. Howbeit thus much I dare affirme, that if woods go so fast to decaie in the next hundred yeere of Grace, as they haue done and are like to do in this, sometimes for increase of sheepwalks, and some maintenance of prodigalitie and pompe (for I haue knowne a well burnished gentleman * that hath borne threescore at once in one paire of galigascons to shew his strength and braurie) it is to be feared that the fennie bote, brome, turffe, gall, heath, firze, brakes, whinnes, ling, dies, hallacks, flags, straw, sedge, reed, rush, and also sea cole will be good merchandize euen in the citie of London, whereunto some of them euen now haue gotten readie passage, and taken vp their innes in the greatest merchants parlours. A man would thinke that our lawes were able inough to make sufficient prouision for the redresse of this error & enormitie likelie to insue. But such is the nature of our countriemen, that as manie lawes are made, so they will keepe none; or if they be vrged to make answer, they will rather seeke some crooked construction of them to the increase of their priuat gaine, than yeeld themselues to be guided by the same for a common wealth and profit to their countrie. So that in the end whatsoeuer the law saith we will haue our willes, whereby the wholesome ordinances of the prince are contemned, the trauell of the nobilitie & councellors as it were derided, the common wealth impouerished, & a few onelie inriched by this peruerse dealing. Thus manie thousand persons do suffer hinderance by this their lewd behauior. Hereby the wholesome laws of the prince are oft defrauded, and the good meaning magistrate in consultation about the common wealth vtterlie neglected. I would with that I might liue no longer than to see foure things in this land reformed, that is: the want of discipline in the church: the couetous dealing of most of our merchants in the preferment of the commodities of other countries, and hinderance of their owne: the holding of faires and markets vpon the sundaie to be abolished and referred to the wednesdaies: and that euerie man, in whatsoeuer part of the champaine solle enioieth fortie acres of land, and vpwards, after that rate, either by free deed, copie hold, or fee farme, might plant one acre of wood, or sowe the same with oke mast, hasell, beech, and sufficient prouision be made that it may be cherished and kept. But I feare me that I should then liue to long, and so long, that I should either be wearie of the world, or the world of me; and yet they are not such things but they may easilie be brought to passe.

Certes euerie small occasion in my time is enough to cut downe a great wood, and euerie trifle sufficeth to laie infinit acres of corne ground vnto pasture. As for the taking downe of houses, a small fine will beare out a great matter. Would to God we might once take example of the Romans, who in refreint of superfluous grasing, made an exact limitation, how manie head of cattell ech estate might keepe, and what numbers of acres should suffice for that and other purposes. Neither was wood euer better cherished or mansion houses maintained, than by their lawes and statutes. Such also was their care in the maintenance of nauigation, that it was a great part of the charge of their consuls, yerelie to viewe and looke vnto the hilles whereon great timber did growe, least their vnnecessarie faults for the satisfaction of the priuat owner, and his couetous mind might proue a preiudice vnto the common wealth, in the hinderance of sufficient stuffe for the furniture of their nauie. Certes the like hereof is yet obserued in Venice. Read also I praie you what Suetonius writeth of the consulship of Bibulus and Cesar. As for the wood that Ancus Martius dedicated toward the maintenance of the common naule, I passe it ouer, as hauing elsewhere remembred it vnto another end. But what do I meane to speake of these, sith my purpose is onlie to talke of our owne woods? Well, take this then for a finall conclusion in woods, that beside some countries are alreadie driuen to sell their wood by the pound, which is an hraue report: within these fortie yéres we shall haue little great timber growing aboue fortie yéres old; for it is commonlie séene that those yong staddles which we leaue standing at one & twentie yéres fall, are vsuallie at the nert sale cut downe without any danger of the statute, and serue for fire bote, if it please the owner to burne them.

Marises and fennes.

Marises and fennie bogges we haue many in England, though not now so many as some of the old Roman writers do specifie, but more in Wales, if you haue respect vnto the seuerall quantities of the countries. Howbeit as they are verie profitable in the summer halfe of the yere, so are a number of them which lie lowe and nére to great riuers, to small commoditie in the winter part, as common experience doth teach. Yet this I find of manie mores, that in times past they haue béene harder ground, and sundrie of them well replenished with great woods, that now are void of bushes. And for example hereof, we may sée the triall (beside the rots that are dailie found in the déps of Monmouth, where turfe is digged, also in Wales, Aburgauennie, and Pertoneth) in sundrie parts of Lancashire, where great store of firre hath growen in times past, as I said, and the people go vnto this daie into their fens and marisses with long spits, which they dash hers and there vp to the verie cronge into the ground. In which practise, (a thing commonlie done in winter) if they happen to smite vpon anie firre trées which lie there at their whole lengths, or other blocks, they note the place, and about haruest time, when the ground is at the driest, they come againe and get them vp, and afterward carieng them home, aplie them to their vses. The like do they in Shropshire with the like, which hath béene felled in old time, within 7 miles of Salop. Some of them foolishlie suppose the same to haue lien there since Noies flood: and other more fond than the rest, imagine them to growe euen in the places where they find them, without all consideration that in times past, the most part, if not all Loegres and Cambria was generallie replenished with wood, which being felled or ouerthrowne vpon sundrie occasions, was left lieng in some places still on the ground, and in processe of time became to be quite ouergrowne with earth and moulds, which moulds wanting their due fadnesse, are now turned into more plots. Wherby it commeth to passe also, that great plentie of water commeth betweene the new lose swart and the old hard earth, that being drawen awaie by ditching and dreanes (a thing some done if our countrie-men were painfull in that behalfe) might some leaue a drie soile to the great lucre and aduantage of the owner. We find in our histories, that Lincolne was somtime builded by Lud brother to Cassibelan, who called it Caer Ludcoit, of the great store of woods that inuironed the same: but now the commoditie is vtterlie decaied there, so that if Lud were aliue againe, he would not call it his citie in the wood, but rather his towne in the plaines: for the wood (as I heare) is wasted altogither about the same. The hilles called the Peke were in like sort named Pennith and Mycoit, that is, the woodie hilles and forrests. But how much wood is now to be séene in those places, let him that hath béene there testifie, if he list; for I heare of no such store there as hath béene in time past by those that trauell that waie. And thus much of woods and marises, and so far as I can deale with the same.

Of baths and hot welles.

Chap. 23.

AS almightie GOD hath in most plentifull maner bestowed infinit, and those verie notable benefits vpon this Ile of Britaine, whereby it is not a little inriched: so in hot and naturall baths (whereof we haue diuerse in sundrie places) it manifestlie appeareth that he hath not forgotten England. There are sundrie baths therefore to be found in this realme, of which the first is called saint Vincents, the second Hallielwell; both being places (in my opinion) more obscure than the other two, and yet not seldome sought vnto by such as stand in néed. For albeit the fame of their forces be not so generallie spread, yet in some cases they are thought to be nothing inferior to the other, as diuerse haue often affirmed by their owne experience and triall. The third place wherein hot baths are to be found is nére vnto Buxton, a towne in Darbishire, situat in the high Peke, not passing fiftéene miles from Manchester, or Marlechesterford, and twentie from Darbie, where, about eight or nine seuerall welles are to be séene; of which thrée are counted to be most excellent: but of all, the greatest is the hotest, void of corruption, and compared (as Iones saith) with those of Summersetshire, so cold indéed, as a quart of boiling water would be made if fiue quartes of running water were added therevnto; whereas on the other side, those of Bath likened vnto these, haue such heat appropriated vnto them, as a gallon of hot water hath when a quart of cold is mired with the same. Herevpon the effect of this bath worketh more temperatlie and pleasantlie (as he writeth) than the other. And albeit that it maketh not so great spéd in cure of such as resort vnto it for helpe: yet it dealeth more effectuallie and commodiouslie than those in Summersetshire, and infer withall lesse grieuous accidents in the restreining of naturall issues, strengthening the affebled members, assisting the liuelie forces, dispersing annoious oppilations, and qualifieng of sundrie griefes, as his experience hath oft confirmed. The like vertues haue the other two, but not in such measure: and therefore their operation is not so spedilie perceiued. The fourth place where baths are, is kings Newnam, and within certeine miles of Couentrie, the water whereof (as it is thought) proceedeth from some rocke of allume, and this I vnderstand by diuerse glouers which haue béene there, and also by mine owne experience, that it hath a tast much like to allume liquor, and yet nothing vnpleasant nor vnsauorie in the drinking. There are thrée welles in all, but the chiefest and best of them riseth out of an hill, and runneth toward the south, from thence infinit plentie of water without any notable diminution of the ſpring is dailie caried into ſundrie parties of the realme, & drunke by ſuch as haue need to occupie the ſame. Of the other two, one is reſerued for ſuch as be comelie perſonages and void of lothſome diſeaſes: the other is left common for tag and rag; but clenſed dailie as the other is, whereby it becommeth the wholeſomer. Manie diſeaſes alſo are cured in the ſame, as the palſie, dimneſſe of ſight, dulneſſe of hearing, but eſpeciallie the collike and the ſtone, old ſores and greene wounds; ſo that I ſuppoſe there was neuer anie compound medicine of greater and more ſpedie force in theſe behalfes, than the vſe of this ſimple liquor is to ſuch as dw frequent it. The ſaid water hath a naturall propertie alſo following it which is rare, for if a leafe, or ſticke of aſh, oke, &c: dw fall into the ſame, within a ſhort ſpace, ſuch ſtore of fine ſand (comming no doubt out of the earth with the water) will congeale and gather about it, that the forme being reſerued, and the inner part not lightlie altered, it will ſeeme to become an hard ſtone, and much like vnto that which is ingendred in the kidneis of a man, as I haue ſeene by experience. At the firſt entrance it is verie cold, but after a ſeaſon it warmeth the goer in, cauſing him into an indifferent heat. And this is furthermore remembred of it, that no man hath yet ſuſteined anie manner of impeachment through the coldneſſe of the ſame. The vertue thereof was found 1579 about Whitſuntide, by a man who had wounded himſelfe, & comming by the ſame water, thought onelie to waſh the blod from his hand therewith, and ſo to go home and ſeeke for helpe by ſurgerie: finallie finding the paine well aſſwaged, & the wound faire clenſed, he departed, and miſliking his vſuall medicins, he eſſsones came againe, and ſo often indeed vnto the ſaid water till his hand was healed outright without anie other practiſe. By this meanes alſo he became a counſellor to other being hurt or in paine, that they ſhould trie the vertue of this ſpring, who finding eaſe alſo, gaue out ſuch commendation of the ſaid water, that now at this preſent their fame is fullie equall, and the reſort vnto them nothing inferior to that of the old baths. Beſide this, the cures of ſuch diſeaſes as their forces do extend vnto, is much more ſpeedie than we may haue at the other; and this is one commoditie alſo not ſmallie to be conſidered of. The fift place of baths or medicinable welles is at an hamlet called Newton, a little from ſaint Neots, or (as we pronounce it) ſaint Needs, which is ten or twelue miles from Cambridge, where two ſprings are knowne to be, of which the one is verie ſweet and freſh, the other brackiſh & ſalt; this is good for ſcabs and leaperie (as it is ſaid) the other for dimneſſe of ſight. Merie manie alſo dw make their repaire vnto them for ſundrie diſeaſes, ſome returning whole, and ſome nothing at all amended, bicauſe their cure is without the reach and working of thoſe waters. Neuer went people ſo faſt from the church, either vnto a faire or market, as they go to theſe wels, and thoſe neere Rugbie, both places being diſcouered in this 1579 of Grace. I heare of another well to be found alſo about Ratcliffe neere London, euen at the ſame ſeaſon. But ſith rumors are now ſpred almoſt of euerie ſpring, & vaine tales flie about in maner of euerie water, I ſurceaſe to ſpeake at all of anie other, till further experience dw trie whether they be medicinable or not: and yet I doubt not but moſt of theſe alreadie mentioned haue heretofore bin knowne & remembred alſo, though confuſedlie by the writers of old time; & yet in proceſſe of time either neglected or forgotten, by meanes of ſundrie troubles and turmoiles made in this realme by Danes, and other outward enimies, whereby their manifold benefit hath wonderfullie beene miſſed.

The laſt place of our baths, is a citie in Sommerſetſhire, which taketh his name of the hot waters there to be ſeene and vſed. At the firſt it was called Caer Bledud, and not Caer Bledune, as ſome would haue it, for that is the old name of the ancient caſtell at Malmeſburie, which the Saxons named Ingleburne. Ptolomie afterward called it Thermæ, other Aquæ ſolis, or Scamannia, or Acmanceſter, but now it hight generallie Bath in Engliſh, and vnder that name it is likelie to continue. The citie of it ſelfe is a verie ancient thing, no doubt, as may yet appeare by diuerſe notable antiquities ingraued in ſtone, to be ſeene in the wals thereof; and firſt of all betweene the ſouth gate and the weſt, and betwixt the weſt gate and the north.

The firſt is the antike head of a man, made all flat, with great locks of haire, much like to the coine that I haue ſeene of Antius the Romane. The ſecond betweene the ſouth and the north gate is an image, as I take it, of Hercules, for he held in each hand a ſerpent, and ſo doth this. Thirdlie there ſtandeth a man on foot with a ſword in his one hand, and a buckler ſtretched out in the other. There is alſo a branch that lieth folded and weathed into circles, like to the weath of Alcimedon. There are moreouer two naked images, whereof the one imbraceth the other, beſide ſundrie antike heads, with ruffeled haire, a greiehound running, and at his taile certeine Romane letters, but ſo defaced that no man liuing can read them at this preſent. There is moreouer the image of Lacaon, inuironed with two ſerpents, and an other inſcription, and all theſe betweene the ſouth and the weſt gates, as I haue ſaid before.

Now, betweene the weſt and north gate are two inſcriptions, of which ſome words are euident to be read, the reſidue are cleane defaced. There is alſo the image of a naked man, and a ſtone in like ſort, which hath Cupidines & labruſcas intercurrentes, and a table hauing at each hand an image vined and finelie floriſhed both aboue and beneath. Finallie (ſauing that I ſaw afterward the image of a naked man graſping a ſerpent in each hand) there was an inſcription of a tome or buriall, wherein theſe words did plainelie appeare, Vixit annos xxx: but ſo defuſedlie written, that letters ſtood for whole words, and two or three letters combined into one. Certes I will not ſaie whether theſe were ſet into the places where they now ſtand by the gentiles, or brought thither from other ruines of the towne it ſelfe, and placed afterward in thoſe wals, in their neceſſarie reparations. But howſoeuer the matter ſtandeth, this is to be gathered by our hiſtories, that Bladud firſt builded that citie there, and peraduenture might alſo kindle the ſulphurous veines, of purpoſe to burne continuallie there in the honour of Minerua: by which occaſion the ſprings thereabout did in proceſſe of time become hot & not vnprofitable, for ſundrie kinds of diſeaſes. Indeed the later pagans dreamed, that Minerua was the cheefe goddeſſe and gouerneſſe of theſe waters, bicauſe of the nereneſſe of hir temple vnto the ſame. Solinus addeth furthermore, how that in hir ſaid temple, the fire which was continuallie kept, did neuer conſume into dead ſparkles; but ſo ſone as the embers thereof were cold, they congealed into clots of hard ſtone: all which I take to be nothing elſe than the effect of the aforeſaid fire, of the ſulphurous veine kindled in the earth, from whence the waters dw come. That theſe baths or waters are deriued from ſuch, the marchaſites, which the Grecians call Pyritis, per antonomaſiam (for being ſmit with the iron, it yeeldeth more ſparkes than anie flint or calcedonie, and therefore ſeemeth to deſerue the name aboue the reſt) and beſides theſe other ſtones mixed with ſome copper, and dailie found vpon the mountains feins thereabouts will beare sufficient witnesse, though I would write the contrarie. Doctor Turner also the father of English physicke, and an excellent diuine, supposeth that these springs do draw their forces from sulphur: or if there be anie other thing mingled withall, he gesseth that it should be salt peter, because he found an obscure likelihood of the same, euen in the crosse bath. But that they participate with anie allume at all, he could neuer till his dieng date be induced to beléeue. I might here (if I thought it necessarie) intreat of the notable situation of the citie, which standeth in a pleasant bottome, inuironed on euerie side with great hils, out of the which come so manie springs of pure water by sundrie waies vnto the citie, and in such abundance, as that euerie house is serued with the same by pipes of lead, the said mettall being the more plentious and lesse of value vnto them, because it is not had far off from those quarters. It should not be amisse also to speake of the foure gates, number of parish churches, bridges, religious houses dissolued, and their founders, if place did serue therefore: but for so much as my purpose is not to deale in this behalfe, I will omit the mention of these things, and go in hand with the baths themselues, wherof in the title of this chapiter I protested to intreat.

Chap. 25.

The Pyritis is found almoſt in euerie veine of metall in great plentie, diuerſities and colour, and ſometimes mixed with that mettall of whoſe excrements it conſiſteth.

Crosse bath. There are two springs of water (as Leland saith) in the west south west part of the towne, whereof the biggest is called the crosse bath, of a certeine crosse that was erected sometime in the middest thereof. This bath is much frequented by such as are diseased with leaprie, pockes, scabs, and great aches: yet of it selfe it is verie temperate and pleasant, hauing eleuen or twelue arches of stone in the sides thereof, for men to stand vnder, when raine doth ought annoie them.

Common bath. The common bath, or as some call it, the hot bath, is two hundred foot, or thereabout from the crosse bath, lesse in compasse within the wall than the other, and with onelie seauen arches, wrought out of the maine inclosure. It is worthilie called the hot bath, for at the first comming into it, men thinke that it would scald their flesh, and lose it from the bone: but after a season, and that the bodies of the commers thereto be warmed throughlie in the same, it is more tollerable and easie to be borne. Both these baths be in the middle of a little street, and ioine to S. Thomas hospitall, so that it may be thought that Reginald bishop of Bath made his house néere vnto these common baths, onelie to succour such poore people as should resort vnto them.

Kings bath. The kings bath is verie faire and large, standing almost in the middle of the towne, at the west end of the cathedrall church. It is compassed about with a verie high stone wall, and the brims thereof are mured round about, wherein be two and thirtie arches for men and women to stand in separatlie, who being of the gentrie for the most part, do resort thither indifferentlie, but not in such lasciuious sort as vnto other baths and hot houses of the maine, whereof some write more a great deale than modestie should reueale, and honestie performe. There went a sluce out of this bath, which serued in times past the priorie with water, which was deriued out of it vnto two places, and commonlie vsed for baths, but now I do not thinke that they remaine in vsage.

Hot houses in some countries little better than brodels.

Colour of the water of the baths. As for the colour of the water of all the bathes, it is most like to a déepe blew, and réeketh much after the maner of a séething pot, commonlie yéelding somwhat a sulpherous taste, and verie vnpleasant sauour. The water also that runneth from the two small baths, goeth by a dike into the Auon by west, and beneath the bridge: but the same that goeth from the kings bath turneth a mill, and after goeth into Auon aboue Bath bridge, where it loseth both force and tast, and is like vnto the rest. In all the three baths a man maie euidentlie see how the water bubbleth vp from the springs. This is also to be noted, that at certeine times all entrances into them is vtterlie prohibited, that is to saie, at high noone, and midnight: for at those two seasons, and a while before and after, they boile verie feruentlie, and become so hot that no man is able to indure their heat, or anie while sustéeine their force and vehement working. They purge themselues furthermore from all such filth as the diseased do leaue in each of them, wherfore we do forbeare the rash entrance into them at that time: and so much the rather, for that we would not by contraction of anie new diseases, depart more gréeuouslie affected than we came vnto the citie, which is in déed a thing that each one should regard. For these causes therefore they are commonlie shut vp from halfe an houre after ten of the clocke in the forenoone, to halfe an houre after one in the afternoone, and likewise at midnight: at which times the kéeper of them resorteth to his charge, openeth the gates, and leaueth (or should leaue) frée passage vnto such as come vnto them. Hitherto Leland.

Fall or issue of the water.

Not good to enter into baths at all seasons.

What cost of late hath béene bestowed vpon these baths by diuerse of the nobilitie, gentrie, communaltie, and cleargie, it lieth not in me to declare: yet as I heare, they are not onelie verie much repared and garnished with sundrie curious péeces of workemanship, partlie touching their commendation, and partlie for the ease and benefit of such as resort vnto them; but also better ordered, clenlier kept, & more friendlie prouision made for such pouertie as dailie repaireth thither. But notwithstanding all this, such is the generall estate of things in Bath, that the rich men maie spend while they will, and the poore beg whilest they list for their maintenance and diet so long as they remaine there: and yet I denie not but that there is verie good order in that citie for all degrées. But where shall a man find anie equall regard of poore and rich, though God doth giue these his good gifts fréelie, & vnto both alike? I would here intreat further of the customs vsed in these baths, what number of physicians dailie attend vpon those waters, for no man (especiallie such as be able to interteine them) doth enter into these baths before he consult with the physician; also, what diet is to be obserued, what particular diseases are healed there, and to what end the commers thither do drinke oftimes of that medicinable liquor: but then I should excéed the limits of a description. Wherefore I passe it ouer to others, hoping that some man yer long will vouchsafe to performe that at large, which the famous clearke Doctor Turner hath brieflie yet happilie begun, touching the effects & working of the same. For hitherto I do not know of manie that haue trauelled in the natures of those baths of our countrie, with anie great commendation; much lesse of anie that hath reuealed them at the full for the benefit of our nation, or commoditie of strangers that resort vnto the same.

Of antiquities found.

Chap. 24.

HAuing taken some occasion to speake here and there in this treatise of antiquities, it shall not be amis to deale yet more in this chapter, with some of them apart, & by themselues, whereby the secure authoritie of the Romans ouer this Iland land maie in ſome caſes moꝛe manifeſtlie appeare. Foꝛ ſuch was their poſſeſſion of this Iland on this ſide of the Tine, that they held not one oꝛ two, oꝛ a few places onelie vnder their ſubiection, but all the whole countrie from eaſt to weſt, from the Tine to the Britiſh ſea, ſo that there was no regi-on void of their gouernance: notwithſtanding that vntill the death of Lucius, and extinction of his iſſue, they did permit the ſucceſſoꝛs of Lud and Cimbaline to reigne and rule amongeſt them, though vnder a certeine tribute, as elſe-where I haue declared. The cheefe cauſe that bꝛigeth me to ſpeake of antiquities, is the paines that I haue taken to gather great numbers of them togither, intending (if euer my Chꝛonologie ſhall happen to come abꝛoad) to ſet downe the liuelie poꝛtraitures of euerie emperour ingrauen in the ſame: alſo the faces of Pompeie, Craſſus, the ſeuen kings of the Romans, Cicero, and diuerſe other, which I haue pꝛouided readie foꝛ the purpoſe, beſide the monuments and liuelie images of ſundꝛie philoſophers, and kings of this Iland, ſince the time of Edward the Confeſſoꝛ. Wheꝛof although pꝛeſentlie I want a few, yet I doo not doubt but to obteine them all, if friendſhip at the leaſt wiſe pꝛocured foꝛ monie ſhall be able to pꝛeuaile. But as it hath doone hitherto, ſo the charges to be emploied vpon theſe bꝛaſen oꝛ copper images, will hereafter put by the impꝛeſſion of that treatiſe: whereby it maie come to paſſe, that long trauell ſhall ſoone pꝛoue to be ſpent in vaine, and much coſt come to verie ſmall ſucceſſe. Wheꝛeof yet I foꝛce not greatlie, ſith by this means I haue reaped ſome commoditie vnto my ſelfe, by ſearching of the hiſtoꝛies, which often miniſter ſtoꝛe of examples readie to be vſed in my function, as occaſion ſhall moue me. But to pꝛocéed with my purpoſe.

Befoꝛe the comming of the Romans, there was a kind of copper monie currant here in Bꝛitaine, as Cæſar confeſſeth in the fift booke of his Commentaries, but I find not of what maner it was. Hereto he addeth a repoꝛt of certeine rings, of a pꝛopoꝛtionate weight, which they vſed in his time, in ſtead likewiſe of monie. But as hitherto it hath not bene my lucke (I ſaie) to haue the certeine view of anie of theſe, ſo after the comming of the Romans, they inforced vs to abandon our owne, and receiue ſuch imperiall monies oꝛ coines, as foꝛ the paiment of their legions was dailie bꝛought ouer vnto them. What coines the Romans had, it is eaſie to be knowne, and from time to time much of it is found in manie places of this Iland, as well of gold and ſiluer, as of copper, bꝛaſſe, and other mettall, much like ſteele, almoſt of euerie emperour. So that I account it no rare thing to haue of the Roman coine, albeit that it ſtill repꝛeſent an image of our captiuitie, and maie be a good admonition foꝛ vs, to take hæd how we yéeld our ſelues to the regiment of ſtrangers. Of the ſtoꝛe of theſe monies, found vpon the Kentiſh coaſt, I haue alreadie made mention in the deſcription of Richboꝛow, and chapter of Iles adiacent vnto the Britiſh Albion, and there ſhewed alſo how ſimple fiſhermen haue had plentie of them, and that the conies in making pꝛofers and holes to bꝛéed in, haue ſcraped them out of the ground in verie great abundance. In ſpeaking alſo of S. Albans, in the chapter of townes and villages, I haue not omitted to tell what plentie of theſe coines haue bene gathered there: wheꝛfoꝛe I ſhall not néed here to repeat the ſame againe. Howbeit this is certeine, that the moſt part of all theſe antiquities, to be found within the land, & diſtant from the ſhoꝛe, are to be gotten either in the ruines of ancient cities and townes decaied, oꝛ in incloſed buꝛrowes, where their legions accuſtomed ſometime to winter, as by experience is dailie confirmed. What ſtoꝛe hath bene ſeene of them in the citie of London, which they called Auguſta, of the legion that ſoiourned there, & likewiſe in Yoꝛke named alſo Victrix, of the legion Victoria, oꝛ Altera Roma (becauſe of the beautie and fine building of the ſame) I my ſelfe can partlie witneſſe, that haue ſeene, & often had of them, if better teſtimonie were wanting. The like I maie affirme of Colcheſter, where thoſe of Claudius, Adrian, Traian, Veſpaſian, and other, are often-times plowed vp, oꝛ found by other means: alſo of Caiſtoꝛburie, Andꝛedeſcheſter (now decaied) Rocheſter, then called Duꝛobꝛeuum, Wincheſter, and diuerſe other beyond the Thames, which foꝛ bꝛeuitie ſake I doo paſſe ouer in ſilence. Onlie the cheefe of all and where moſt are found in deed, is néere vnto Carleon and Caiꝛgwent in Southwales, about Rencheſter, thꝛée miles aboue Herefoꝛd, Aldboꝛow, Ancaſter, Bꝛamdon, Dodington, where a ſpuꝛre and péece of a chaine of gold were found in king Henrie the eight his daies, beſides much of the ſaid Roman coine, Wincheſter, Camalet, Lacocke vpon Auon, and Lincolne, Doꝛcheſter, Warwike, and Cheſter, where they are often had in verie great abundance. It ſéemeth that Ancaſter hath bœne a great thing, foꝛ manie ſquare & colоꝛed pauements, vaults, and arches are yet found, and often laid open by ſuch as dig and plow in the fields about the ſame. And amongſt theſe, one Ureſbie oꝛ Roſebie, a plowman, did eꝛe vp not long ſince a ſtone like a trough, couered with another ſtone, wherein was great foiſon of the afoꝛeſaid coines. The like alſo was ſéene not yet foꝛtie yeares agone about Grantham. But in king Henrie the eight his daies, an husbandman had far better lucke at Harleſton, two miles from the afoꝛeſaid place, where he found not onelie great plentie of this coine, but alſo an huge bꝛaſſe pot, and therein a large helmet of pure gold, richlie fretted with pearle, and ſet with all kind of coſtlie ſtones: he toke vp alſo chaines much like vnto beads of ſiluer, all which, as being (if a man might gheſſe anie certeintie by their beautie) not likelie to be long hidden, he pꝛeſented to quéene Katharine then lieng at Peterboꝛow, and therewithall a few ancient rolles of parchment written long agone, though ſo defaced with mouldineſſe, and rotten foꝛ age, that no man could well hold them in his hand without falling into péeces, much leſſe read them by reaſon of their blindneſſe.

In the beginning of the ſame kings daies alſo at Killeie a man found as he eared, an arming girdle, harneſſed with pure gold, and a great maſſie pomell with a croſſe hilt foꝛ a ſwoꝛd of the ſame mettall, beſide ſtuds and harneſſe foꝛ ſpuꝛs, and the huge long ſpuꝛs of like ſtuffe, wheꝛof one doctoꝛ Ruthall got a part into his hands. The boꝛoughs oꝛ buries, wheꝛof I ſpake befoꝛe, were certeine plots of ground, wherin the Romane ſouldiers did vſe to lie when they kept in the open fields as choſen places, from whence they might haue eaſie acceſſe vnto their aduerſaries, if anie outrage were wꝛought oꝛ rebellion moued againſt them. And as theſe were the vſuall aboads foꝛ thoſe able legions that ſerued dailie in the wars, ſo had they other certeine habitations foꝛ the old and foꝛwoꝛne ſouldiers, whereby diuerſe cities grew in time to be repleniſhed with Romane colonies, as Caiꝛleon, Colcheſter, Cheſter, and ſuch other, of which, Colcheſter bare the name of Colonia long time, and wherein A. Plautius builded a temple vnto the goddeſſe of Victoꝛie (after the departure of Claudius) which Tacitus calleth Aram ſempiternæ dominationis, a perpetuall monument of that our Britiſh ſeruitude. But to returne vnto our boꝛowes, they were generallie walled about with ſtone wals, and ſo large in compaſſe that ſome did conteine thirtie, fourtie, thꝛée ſcoꝛe, oꝛ eightie acres of ground within within their limits: they had alſo diuerſe gates or ports vnto each of them, and of theſe not a few remaine to be ſeene in our time, as one for example not far from great Cheſterford in Eſſex, neere to the limits of Cambridgſhire, which I haue often viewed, and wherein the compaſſe of the verie wall with the places where the gates ſtood is eaſie to be diſcerned: the like alſo is to be ſeene at a place within two miles ſouth of Burton, called the Borow hils. In theſe therefore and ſuch like, and likewiſe at Cuoiſburg, now S. Neots, or S. Needs, and ſundrie other places, eſpeciallie vpon the ſhore and coaſts of Kent, as Douer, Rie, Romnete, Lid, &c: is much of their coine alſo to be found, and ſome peeces or other are dailie taken vp, which they call Borow pence, Dwarfs monie, Hegs pence, Feirie groats, Iewes monie, & by other fooliſh names not woorthie to be remembred. At the comming of the Saxons, the Britons vſed theſe holds as refuſes for their cattell in the daie and night, when their enimies were abroad; the like alſo did the Saxons againſt the Danes, by which occaſions (and now and then by carieng of their ſtones to helpe forward other buildings neere at hand) manie of them were throwne downe and defaced, which otherwiſe might haue continued for a longer time, and ſo your honour would ſaie, if you ſhould happen to peruſe the thickeneſſe and maner of building of thoſe ſaid wals and borowes. It is not long ſince a ſiluer ſaucer of verie ancient making was found neere to Saffron Walden, in the open field among the Hyerbirie hils, and eared vp by a plough, but of ſuch maſſie greatneſſe, that it weighed better than twentie ounces, as I haue heard reported. But if I ſhould ſtand in theſe things vntill I had ſaid all that might be ſpoken of them, both by experience and teſtimonie of Leland in his Commentaries of Britaine, and the report of diuerſe yet liuing, I might make a greater chapter than would be either conuenient or profitable to the reader: wherefore ſo much onelie ſhall ſerue the turne for this time as I haue ſaid alreadie of antiquities found within our Iland, eſpeciallie of coine, whereof I purpoſed chiefelie to intreat.

Of the coines of England.

Chap. 25.

THe Saxon coine before the conqueſt is in maner vtterlie vnknowne to me: howbeit if my coniecture be anie thing, I ſuppoſe that one ſhilling of ſiluer in thoſe daies did counterpeiſe our common ounce, though afterward it came to paſſe that it aroſe to twentie pence, and ſo continued vntill the time of king Henrie the eight, who firſt brought it to three ſhillings and foure pence, & afterward our ſiluer coine vnto braſſe & copper monies, by reaſon of thoſe inceſſimable charges, which diuerſe waies oppreſſed him. And as I gather ſuch obſcure notice of the ſhilling which is called in Latine ſolidus, ſo I read more manifeſtlie of another which is the 48 part of a pound, and this alſo currant among the Saxons of our Ile, ſo well in gold as in ſiluer, at ſuch time as 240 of their pennies made vp a iuſt pound, fiue pence went to the ſhilling, and foure ſhillings to the ounce. But to proceed with my purpoſe. After the death of K. Henrie, Edward his ſonne began to reſtore the aforeſaid coine againe vnto fine ſiluer: ſo queene Marie his ſucceſſour did continue his good purpoſe, notwithſtanding that in hir time the Spaniſh monie was verie common in England, by reaſon of hir mariage with Philip king of Spaine.

Copper monie.

After hir deceaſe the ladie Elizabeth hir ſiſter, and now our moſt gratious queene, ſouereigne and princeſſe, did finiſh the matter wholie, vtterlie aboliſhing the vſe of copper and braſen coine, and converting the ſame into guns and great ordinance, reſtored ſundrie coines of fine ſiluer, as peeces of halfepenie farding, of a penie, of three halfe pence, peeces of two pence, of three pence, of foure pence (called the groat) of ſix pence vſuallie named the teſtone, and ſhilling of twelue pence, whereon ſhe hath imprinted hir owne image, and emphaticall ſuperſcription. Siluer reſtored.

Our gold is either old or new. The old is that which hath remained ſince the time of king Edward the third, or beene coined by ſuch other princes as haue reigned ſince his deceaſſe, without anie abaſing or diminution of the fineſſe of that mettall. Therof alſo we haue yet remaining, the riall, the George noble, the Henrie riall, the ſalut, the angell, and their ſmaller peeces, as halfes or quarters, though theſe in my time are not ſo common to be ſeene. I haue alſo beheld the ſouereigne of twentie ſhillings, and the peece of thirtie ſhillings, I haue heard likewiſe of peeces of fortie ſhillings, three pounds, fiue pounds, and ten pounds. But ſith there were few of them coined, and thoſe onelie at the commandement of kings, pearlie to beſtow where their maieſties thought good in lieu of new yeares gifts and rewards: it is not requiſit that I ſhould remember them here amongſt our currant monies. Old gold.

The new gold is taken for ſuch as began to be coined in the latter daies of king Henrie the eight, at which time the fineſſe of the mettall began to be verie much alaied, & is not likelie to be reſtored for ought that I can ſee: and yet is it ſuch as hath beene coined ſince by his ſucceſſors princes of this realme, in value and goodneſſe equall and not inferiour to the coine and currant gold of other nations, where each one doth couet chiefelie to gather vp our old finer gold: ſo that the angels, rials, and nobles, are more plentifullie ſeene in France, Italie, and Flanders, than they be by a great deale within the realme of England, if you regard the paiments which they dailie make in thoſe kinds of our coine. Our peeces now currant are of ten ſhillings, fiue ſhillings, and two ſhillings and ſix pence onelie: and thoſe of ſundrie ſtamps and names, as halfe ſouereigns (equall in weight with our currant ſhilling, whereby that gold is valued at ten times ſo much ſiluer) quarters of ſouereigns (otherwiſe called crownes) and halfe crownes: likewiſe angels, halfe angels, and quarters of angels, or if there be anie other, in good ſooth I know them not, as one ſcarſelie acquainted with anie ſiluer at all, much leſſe then (God it wot) with anie ſtore of gold. New gold.

The firſt currant ſhilling or ſiluer peeces of twelue pence ſtamped within memorie, were coined by K. Henrie the eight in the twentith yeare of his reigne, & thoſe of fiue ſhillings, and of two ſhillings and ſix pence, & the halfe ſhilling by king Edward the firſt: but the od peeces aboue remembred vnder the groat by our high and mightie princeſſe queene Elizabeth, the name of the groat, penie, two pence, halfe penie, and farding, in old time the greateſt ſiluer monies if you reſpect their denominations onelie, being more ancient than that I can well diſcuſſe of the time of their beginnings. Yet thus much I read, that king Edward the firſt in the eight yeare of his reigne, did firſt coine the penie and ſmalleſt peeces of ſiluer roundwiſe, which before were ſquare, and wont to beare a double croſſe with a creſt, in ſuch ſort that the penie might eaſilie be broken, either into halfes or quarters: by which ſhift onelie the people came came by ſmall monies, as halfe pence and fardings, that otherwiſe were not ſtamped nor coined of ſet purpoſe.

Of forren coines we haue all the ducats, the ſingle, double, and the double double, the cruſadoes, with the long croſſe and the ſhort: the portigue, a péece verie ſolemnelie kept of diuerſe, & yet oft times abaſed with waſhing, or abſolutelie counterfeited: and finallie the French and Flemiſh crownes, onlie currant among vs, ſo long as they hold weight. But of ſiluer coines, as the ſoules turnois, whereof ten make a ſhilling, as the franke doth two ſhillings, and three franks the French crowne, &c: we haue none at all: yet are the dalders, and ſuch often times brought ouer, but neuertheleſſe exchanged as bullion, according to their fineneſſe and weight, and afterward conuerted into coine, by ſuch as haue authoritie.

In old time we had ſundrie mints in England, and thoſe commonlie kept in abbaies and religious houſes before the conqueſt, where true dealing was commonlie ſuppoſed moſt of all to dwell: as at Ramſeie, S. Edmundſburie, Canturburie, Glaſſenburie, Peterborow, and ſuch like, ſundrie exemplifications of the grants whereof are yet to be ſéene in writing, eſpeciallie that of Peterborow vnder the confirmation of pope Eugenius: whereunto it appéereth further by a charter of king Edgar (which I haue) that they either held it or had another in Stanford. But after the Normans had once gotten the kingdome into their fingers, they truſted themſelues beſt with the ouerſight of their mints, and therefore erected diuerſe of their owne, although they afterward permitted ſome for ſmall péeces of ſiluer vnto ſundrie of the houſes aforeſaid. In my time diuerſe mints are ſuppreſſed, as Southwarke, Briſtow, &c: and all coinage is brought into one place, that is to ſaie, the Tower of London, where it is continuallie holden and peruſed, but not without great gaine to ſuch as deale withall. There is alſo coinage of tin holden yearelie at two ſeuerall times, that is to ſaie, Midſummer and Michaelmas in the weſt countrie; which at the firſt hearing I ſuppoſed to haue béene of monie of the ſaid mettall, and granted by priuilege from ſome prince vnto the towns of Haileſtone, Trorie, and Loſtwithiell. Howbeit, vpon further examination of the matter, I find it to be nothing ſo, but an office onlie erected for the prince, wherin he is allowed the ordinarie cuſtomes of that mettall: and ſuch blocks of tin as haue paſſed the hands of his officers, are marked with an eſpeciall ſtampe; whereby it is knowne that the cuſtome due for the ſame hath ordinarilie béene anſwered. It ſhould ſéeme (and in my opinion is verie likelie to be true) that while the Romans reigned here, Kingſtone vpon Thames (ſometime a right noble citie and place where the Saxon kings were vſuallie crowned) was the chiefe place of their coinage for this prouince. For in caſting of the ground about that towne in times paſt, and now of late (beſides the curious foundation of manie goodlie buildings that haue béene riped vp by plowes, and diuerſe coines of braſſe, ſiluer, and gold, with Romane letters in painted pots found there) in the daies of cardinall Wolſeie, one ſuch huge pot was diſcouered full as it were of new ſiluer latelie coined; another with plates of ſiluer readie to be coined; and the third with chaines of ſiluer and ſuch broken ſtuffe redie (as it ſhould appéere) to be melted into coinage, whereof let this ſuffice to countenance out my coniecture. Of coins currant before the comming of the Romans I haue elſewhere declared, that there were none at all in Britaine: but as the Iſlanders of Scylira, the old Romans, Armenians, Scythians, Seritans, Sarmatians, Indians, and Eſſences did barter ware for ware, ſo the Britons vſed braſſe or rings of iron, brought vnto a certeine proportion, in ſtéed of monie, as the Lacedemonians & Biſantines alſo did, & the Achiui (as Homer writeth) who had (ſaith he) rough péeces of braſſe and iron in ſtéed of coine, wherewith they purchaſed their wines.

Chap. 1.

There is no kind of tame cattell vſually to be ſéene in theſe parts of the world, whereof we haue not ſome, and that great ſtore in England; as horſſes, oxen, ſhéepe, goats, ſwine, and far ſurmounting the like in other countries, as may be prooued with eaſe. For where are oxen commonlie more large of bone, horſſes more decent and pleaſant in pace, kine more commodious for the pale, ſhéepe more profitable for woll, ſwine more wholeſome of fleſh, and goates more gainefull to their keepers, than here with vs in England? But to ſpeke of them peculiarlie, I ſuppoſe that our kine are ſo abundant in yéeld of milke, wherof we make our butter & chéeſe, as the like are in where elſe, and ſo apt for the plough in diuerſe places as either our horſſes or oxen. And albeit they now and then twin, yet herein they ſéeme to come ſhort of that commoditie which is looked for in other countries, to wit, in that they bring forth moſt commonlie but one calfe at once. The gaines alſo gotten by a cow (all charges borne) hath bene valued at twentie ſhillings yearelie: but now as land is inhanced, this proportion of gaine is much abated, and likelie to decaie more and more, if ground ariſe to be yet dearer, which God forbid, if it be his will and pleaſure. I heard of late of a cow in Warwikſhire, belonging to Thomas Bruer of Studlele, which in ſix yeares had ſixteene calfes, that is, foure at once in three caluings and twiſe twins, which vnto manie may ſeeme a thing incredible. In like maner our oxen are ſuch as the like are not to be found in anie countrie of Europe, both for greatneſſe of bodie and ſweetneſſe of fleſh: or elſe would not the Romane writers haue preferred them before thoſe of Liguria. In moſt places our graſiers are now growen to be ſo cunning, that if they bow but ſee an ox or bullocke, and come to the feeling of him, they will giue a gheſſe at his weight, and how manie ſcore or ſtone of fleſh and tallow he beareth, how the butcher may liue by the ſale, and what he may haue for the ſkin and tallow; which is a point of ſkill not commonlie practiſed heretofore. Some ſuch graſiers alſo are reported to ride with veluet coats, and chaines of gold about them: and in their abſence their wiues will not let to ſupplie thoſe turnes with no leſſe ſkill than their huſbands: which is an hard worke for the poore butcher, ſith he through this means can ſeldome be rich or wealthie by his trade. In like ſort the fleſh of our oxen and kine is ſold both by hand and by weight as the buier will: but in yong ware rather by weight, eſpeciallie for the ſteere and heighfer, ſith the finer beefe is the lighteſt, whereas the fleſh of buls and old kine, &c: is of ſadder ſubſtance and therefore much heauier as it lieth in the ſcale. Their hornes alſo are knowne to be more faire and large in England than in anie other places, except thoſe which are to be ſeene among the Pæones, which quantitie albeit that it be giuen to our breed generallie by nature, yet it is now and then helped alſo by art. For when they be verie yong, manie graſiers will oftentimes annoint their budding hornes, or tender tips with honie, which mollifieth the naturall hardneſſe of that ſubſtance, and thereby maketh them to grow vnto a notable greatneſſe. Certes, it is not ſtrange in England, to ſee oxen whoſe hornes haue the length of a yard or three foot betweene the tips, and they themſelues thereto ſo tall, as the heigth of a man of meane and indifferent ſtature is ſcarſe equall vnto them. Neuertheleſſe it is much to be lamented that our generall breed of cattell is not better loked vnto: for the greateſt occupiers weane leaſt ſtore, becauſe they can buie them (as they ſaie) far better cheape than to raiſe and bring them vp. In my time a cow hath riſen from foure nobles to foure marks by this means, which notwithſtanding were no great price if they did yearelie bring forth more than one calfe a peece, as I heare they do in other countries.

Athenæus lib. 10. cap. 8.

Our horſſes moreouer are high, and although not commonlie of ſuch huge greatneſſe as in other places of the maine: yet if you reſpect the eaſineſſe of their pace, it is hard to ſaie where their like are to be had. Our land doth yeeld no aſſes, and therefore we want the generation alſo of mules and ſoumers; and therefore the moſt part of our cariage is made by theſe, which remaining ſtoned, are either reſerued for the cart, or appointed to beare ſuch burdens as are conuenient for them. Our cart or plough horſſes (for we vſe them indifferentlie) are commonlie ſo ſtrong that fiue or ſix of them (at the moſt) will draw three thouſand weight of the greateſt tale with eaſe for a long iourneie, although it be not a load of common vſage, which conſiſteth onelie of two thouſand, or ſixtie foot of timber, fortie buſhels of white ſalt, or ſix and thirtie of baie, or fiue quarters of wheat, experience dailie teacheth, and I haue elſewhere remembred. Such as are kept alſo for burden, will carie foure hundred weight commonlie, without anie hurt or hinderance. This further more is to be noted, that our princes and the nobilitie haue their cariage commonlie made by carts, whereby it commeth to paſſe, that when the queenes maieſtie doth remoue from anie one place to another, there are vſuallie 400 carewarcs, which amount to the ſumme of 2400 horſſes, appointed out of the countries adioining, whereby hir cariage is conueied ſafelie vnto the appointed place. Hereby alſo the ancient vſe of ſomers and ſumpter horſſes is in maner vtterlie relinquiſhed, which cauſeth the traines of our princes in their progreſſes to ſhew far leſſe than thoſe of the kings of other nations.

Horſſes.

Such as ſerue for the ſaddle are commonlie gelded, and now growne to be verie deere among vs, eſpeciallie if they be well coloured, iuſtlie limmed, and haue thereto an eaſie ambling pace. For our countriemen, ſeeking their eaſe in euerie corner where it is to be had, delight verie much in theſe qualities, but chieflie in their excellent paces, which beſides that it is in maner peculiar vnto horſſes of our ſoile, and not hurtfull to the rider or owner ſitting on their backes: it is moreouer verie pleaſant and delectable in his eares, in that the noiſe of their well proportioned pace doth yeeld comfortable ſound as he trauelleth by the waie. Yet is there no greater deceipt vſed anie where than among our horſſekeepers, horſſecorſers, and horſſelers: for ſuch is the ſubtill knauerie of a great ſort of them (without exception of anie of them be it ſpoken which deale for priuat gaine) that an honeſt meaning man ſhall haue verie good lucke among them, if he be not deceiued by ſome falſe tricke or other. There are certeine notable markets, wherein great plentie of horſſes and colts is bought and ſold, and wherevnto ſuch as haue need reſort yearelie to buie and make their neceſſarie prouiſion of them, as Kippon, Newport pond, Wolfpit, Yarborow, and diuerſe other. But as moſt drouers are verie diligent to bring great ſtore of theſe vnto thoſe places; ſo manie of them are too too lewd in abuſing ſuch as buie them. For they haue a cuſtome to make them loke faire to the eie, when they come within two daies iourneie of the market, to driue them till they ſweat, & for the ſpace of eight or twelue houres, which being done they turne them all ouer the backs into ſome water, where they ſtand for a ſeaſon, and then go forward with them to the place appointed, where they make ſale of their infected ware, and ſuch as by this meanes do fall into manie diſeaſes and maladies. Of ſuch outlandiſh horſſes as are dailie brought ouer vnto vs I ſpeake not, as the genet of Spaine, the courſer of Naples, the hobbie of Ireland, the Flemiſh roile, and Scotiſh nag, becauſe that further ſpeech of them commeth not within the compaſſe of this treatiſe, and for whoſe breed and maintenance (eſpeciallie of the greateſt ſort) king Henrie the eight erected a noble ſtudderie and for a time had verie good ſucceſſe with them, till the officers waxing wearie, procured a mixed brood of baſtard races, whereby his good purpoſe came to little effect. Sir Nicholas Arnold of late hath bred the beſt horſſes in England, and written of the maner of their production: would to God his compaſſe of ground were like to that of Pella in Syria, wherin the king of that nation had vſuallie a ſtudderie of 30000 mares and 300 ſtallions, as Strabo doth remember lib. 16. But to leaue this, let vs ſee what may be ſaid of ſheepe.

Geldings.

of flesh they passe all other. And so much are our woolles to be preferred before those of Milesia and other places, that if Iason had knowne the value of them that are bred, and to be had in Britaine, he would neuer haue gone to Colchis, to loke for anie there. For as Dionysius Alexandrinus saith in his De situ orbis, it may by spinning be made comparable to the spiders web. What soles then are our countri-men, in that they seeke to bereue themselues of this commoditie, by practising dailie how to transfer the same to other nations, in carieng ouer their rams & ewes to breed & increase among them? The first example hereof was giuen vnder Edward the fourth, who not vnderstanding the bottome of the sute of sundrie traitorous merchants, that sought a present gaine with the perpetuall hinderance of their coun-trie, licenced them to carie ouer certeine numbers of them into Spaine, who hauing licence but for a few shipped verie manie: a thing commonlie practised in other commodities also, whereby the prince and his land are not seldome times defrauded. But such is our nature, and so blind are we in deed, that we see no inconuenience before we feele it: and for a present gaine we regard not what damage may insue to our posteritie. Hereto some other man would ad also the desire that we haue to benefit other countries, and to impeach our owne. And it is so sure as God liueth, that euerie trifle which commeth from beyond the sea, though it be not worth three pence, is more esteé-med than a continuall commoditie at home with vs, which far exceedeth that value. In time past the vse of this commoditie consisted (for the most part) in cloth and wollfells: but now by meanes of strangers suc-coured here from domesticall persecution, the same hath béene imploied vnto sundrie other vses, as mokados, bates, vellures, grograines, &c: whereby the makers haue reaped no small commoditie. It is furthermore to be noted, for the low countries of Belgie know it, and dailie experience (notwithstanding the sharpenesse of our lawes to the contrarie) doth yet confirme it: that although our rams & wea-Shéepe with- thers do go thither from vs neuer so well headed ac-out hornes. cording to their kind: yet after they haue remained there a while, they cast there heads, and from thencefoorth they remaine polled without any hornes at all. Certes this kind of cattell is more cherished in England, than standeth well with the commoditie of the commons, or prosperitie of diuerse townes, whereof some are wholie conuerted to their féeding: yet such a profitable sweetnesse is their fléece, such ne-cessitie in their flesh, and so great a benefit in the manuring of barren soile with their dung and pisse, that their superfluous numbers are the better borne with-all. And there is neuer an husbandman (for now I speake not of our great shéepemasters of whom some one man hath 20000) but hath more or lesse of this cattell féeding on his fallowes and short grounds, which yéeld the finer fléece, as Virgil (following Varro) well espied Georg. 3. where he saith:

Si tibi lanicium curæ, primùm aspera sylua,
Lappæque tribulique absint, fuge pabula læta.

Neuertheles the shéepe of our countrie are often troubled with the rot (as are our swine with the measels though neuer so generallie) and manie men are now and then great losers by the same: but after the calamitie is ouer, if they can recouer and kéepe their new flocks sound for seauen yeares togither, the former losse will easilie be recompensed with double commoditie. Cardan writeth that our waters are hurtfull to our shéepe, howbeit this is but his coniecture: for we know that our shéepe are infected by going to the water, and take the same as a sure and cer-teine token that a rot hath gotten hold of them, their liuers and lights being alredie distempered through excessiue heat, which inforceth them the rather to séeke vnto the water. Certes there is no parcell of the maine, wherin a man shall generallie find more fine and wholesome water than in England; and therfore it is impossible that our shéepe should decaie by tasting of the same. Wherfore the hinderance by rot is rather to be ascribed to the vnseasonablenes & moisture of the weather in summer, also their licking in of mildewes, gossamire, rolvie fogs, & ranke grasse, full of superfluous iuice: but specialliè (I saie) to euer moist wether, whereby the continuall raine pearsing into their hollow felles, soketh forthwith into their flesh, which bringeth them to their baines. Being also infected their first shew of sickenesse is their desire to drinke, so that our waters are not vnto them Causa ægritudinis, but Signum morbi, what so euer Cardan do mainteine to the contrarie. There are (& peraduen-ture no small babes) which are growne to be so good husbands, that they can make account of euerie ten kine to be clérelie worth twentie pounds in cómon and indifferent yeares, if the milke of fiue shéepe be dailie added to the same. But as I wote not how true this surmise is, bicause it is no part of my trade, so I am sure hereof, that some housewiues can do ad dailie a lesse proportion of ewes milke vnto the chéese of so manie kine, whereby their chéese doth the longer abide moist, and eateth more brickle and mellow than otherwise it would.

Goats. Goats we haue plentie, and of sundrie colours in the west parts of England; especiallie in and towards Wales, and amongst the rockie hilles, by whome the owners do reape no small aduantage:
some also are cherished elsewhere in diuerse stéeds for the benefit of such as are diseased with sundrie maladies, vnto whom (as I heare) their milke, chéese, and bodies of their yong kids are iudged verie profitable, and therefore inquired for of manie farre and néere. Certes I find among the writers, that the milke of a goat is next in estimation to that of the woman; for that it helpeth the stomach, remoueth op-pilations and stoppings of the liuer, and loseth the bellie. Some place also next vnto it the milke of the ew: and thirdlie that of the cow. But hereof I can shew no reason; onelie this I know, that ewes milke is fullsome, sweet, and such in taste, as except such as are vsed vnto it no man will gladlie yéeld to liue and féed withall.

Swine. As for swine, there is no place that hath greater store, nor more wholesome in eating, than are these here in England, which neuertheles do neuer ante good till they come to the table. Of these some we eat greene for pork, and other dried vp into bakon to haue it of more continuance. Lard we make some though verie little, because it is chargeable: neither haue we such vse thereof as is to be séene in France and other countries, sith we do rather bake our meat with sweet suet of beefe or mutton, and bast all our meat with sweet or salt butter, or suffer the fattell to bast it selfe by leisure. In champaine countries they are kept by herds, and an hogherd appointed to attend and wait vpon them, who commonlie gathereth them togither by his noise and crie, and leadeth them forth to féed abroad in the fields. In some places also women do scowre and wet their cloths with their dung, as other do with hemlocks and netles: but such is the sauor of the cloths touched withall, that I cannot abide to weare them on my bodie, more than such as are scowred with the refuse sope, than the which (in mine opinion) there is none more vnkindlie sauor.

Boares. Of our tame boares we make brawne, which is a kind of meat not vsuallie knowne to strangers (as I take it) otherwise would not the swart Rutters and French cookes, at the losse of Calis (where they found great ſtore of this prouiſion almoſt in euerie houſe) haue attempted with ridiculous ſucceſſe to roſt, bake, broile, & frie the ſame for their maſters, till they were better informed. I haue heard moreouer, how a noble man of England, not long ſince, did ſend ouer an hogſhead of brawne readie ſowſed to a catholike gentleman of France, who ſuppoſing it to be fiſh, reſerued it till Lent, at which time he did eat thereof with verie great frugalitie. Thereto he ſo well liked of the prouiſion it ſelfe, that he wrote ouer verie earneſtlie & with offer of great recompenſe for more of the ſame fiſh againſt the yeare inſuing: whereas if he had knowne it to haue beene fleſh, he would not haue touched it (I dare ſaie) for a thouſand crownes without the popes diſpenſation. A friend of mine alſo dwelling ſometime in Spaine, hauing certeine Iewes at his table, did ſet brawne before them, whereof they did eat verie earneſtlie, ſuppoſing it to be a kind of fiſh not common in thoſe parties: but when the goodman of the houſe brought in the head in paſtime among them, to ſhew what they had eaten, they roſe from the table, hied them home in haſt, each of them procuring himſelfe to vomit, ſome by oile, and ſome by other meanes, till (as they ſuppoſed) they had cleanſed their ſtomachs of that prohibited food. With vs it is accounted a great peece of ſeruice at the table, from Nouember vntill Februarie be ended; but cheeflie in the Chriſtmaſſe time. With the ſame alſo we begin our dinners each daie after other: and becauſe it is ſomewhat hard of digeſtion, a draught of malueſeie, baſtard, or muſcadell, is vſuallie drunke after it, where either of them are conuenientlie to be had: otherwiſe the meaner ſort content themſelues with their owne drinke, which at that ſeaſon is generallie verie ſtrong, and ſtronger indeed than in all the yeare beſide. It is made commonlie of the fore part of a tame bore, ſet vp for the purpoſe by the ſpace of a whole yere or two, eſpecíallie in gentlemens houſes (for the huſbandmen and farmers neuer franke them for their owne vſe aboue three or foure moneths, or halfe a yeere at the moſt) in which time he is dieted with otes and peaſon, and lodged on the bare planks of an vneaſie coat, till his fat be hardened ſufficientlie for their purpoſe: afterward he is killed, ſcalded, and cut out, and then of his former parts is our brawne made, the reſt is nothing ſo fat, and therefore it beareth the name of ſowſe onelie, and is commonlie reſerued for the ſeruing man and hind, except it pleaſe the owner to haue anie part thereof baked, which are then handled of cuſtome after this manner. The hinder parts being cut off, they are firſt brawne with lard, and then ſodden; being ſodden they are ſowſed in claret wine and vineger a certeine ſpace, and afterward baked in paſties, and eaten of manie in ſtead of the wild bore, and truelie it is verie good meat: the peſtles may be hanged vp a while to drie before they be brawne with lard if you will, and thereby proue the better. But hereof inough, and therefore to come againe vnto our brawne. The necke peeces being cut off round, are called collars of brawne, the ſhoulders are named ſhilds, onelie the ribs reteine the former denomination, ſo that theſe aforeſaid peeces deſerue the name of brawne: the bowels of the beaſt are commonlie caſt awaie becauſe of their rankneſſe, and ſo were likewiſe his ſtones; till a ſwiſh fantaſie got hold of late amongſt ſome delicate dames, who haue now found the meanes to dreſſe them alſo with great coſt for a deintie diſh, and bring them to the bord as a ſeruice among other of like ſort, though not without note of their deſire to the prouocation of fleſhlie luſt, which by this their fond curioſitie is not a little reuealed. When the bore is thus cut out, each peece is wraped vp, either with bulruſhes, or oziер peeles, tape, inkle, or ſuch like, and then ſodden in a lead or caldron togither, till they be ſo tender that a man may thruſt a bruſed ruſh or ſoft ſtraw cleane through the fat: which being done, they take it vp, and laie it abroad to cole: afterward putting it into cloſe veſſels, they powre either good ſmall ale or beere mingled with veriuice and ſalt thereto till it be couered, and ſo let it lie (now and then altering and changing the ſowſing drinke leaſt it ſhould wax ſowre) till occaſion ſerue to ſpend it out of the waie. Some vſe to make brawne of great barrow hogs, and ſeeth them, and ſowſe the whole, as they do that of the bore; and in my iudgement it is the better of both, and more eaſie of digeſtion. But of brawne thus much; and ſo much may ſeeme ſufficient.

Of wild and tame foules.

Chap. 2.

READer requireth that I ſpeake ſomewhat of the foules alſo of England, which I may eaſilie diuide into the wild & tame: but alas ſuch is my ſmall ſkill in foules, that to ſay the truth, I can neither recite their numbers, nor well diſtinguiſh one kind of them from another. Yet this I haue by generall knowledge, that there is no nation vnder the ſunne, which hath alreadie in the time of the yere more plentie of wild foule than we, for ſo manie kinds as our Iland doth bring forth, and much more would haue, if thoſe of the higher ſoile might be ſpared but one yeare or two, from the greedie engins of couetous foulers, which ſet onlie for the pot & purſe. Certes this enormitie bred great trouble in K. Johns daies, inſomuch that going in progreſſe about the tenth of his reigne, he found little or no game wherewith to ſolace himſelf, or exerciſe his falcons. Wherfore being at Wiſſow in the Chriſtmas inſuing, he reſtreined all maner of hawking or taking of wild foule throughout England for a ſeaſon, whereby the land within few yeares was throughlie repleniſhed againe. But what ſtand I vpon this impertinent diſcourſe? Of ſuch therefore as are bred in our land, we haue the crane, the bitter, the wild & tame ſwan, the bullard, the herron, curlew, ſnite, wildgoſe, wind or doterell, brant, larke, plouer of both ſorts, lapwing, teele, wigeon, mallard, ſheldrake, ſhoueler, pewet, ſeamew, barnacle, quaile (who onelie with man are ſubiect to the falling ſickeneſſe) the notte, the oliet or oliſe, the dunbird, woodcocke, partrich and feaſant, beſides diuerſe other, whoſe names to me are vtterlie vnknowne, and much more the taſte of their fleſh; wherewith I was neuer acquainted. But as theſe ſerue not at all ſeaſons, ſo in their ſeuerall turnes there is no plentie of them wanting, whereby the tables of the nobilitie and gentrie ſhould ſeeme at anie time furniſht. But of all theſe the production of none is more marueilous in my mind, than that of the barnacle, whoſe place of generation we haue ſought oft times ſo farre as the Orchades, whereas peraduenture we might haue found the ſame nearer home, and not onelie vpon the coaſts of Ireland, but euen in our owne riuers. If I ſhould ſay how either theſe or ſome ſuch other foule not much vnlike vnto them haue bred of late times (for their place of generation is not perpetuall, but as opportunitie ſerueth, and the circumſtances do miniſter occaſion) in the Thames mouth, I do not thinke that manie will beleeue me: yet ſuch a thing hath there beene ſeene, where a kind of foule had his beginning vpon a ſhort tender ſhrub ſtanding neere vnto the ſhore, from whence when their time came, they fell downe, either into the ſalt water and liued, or vpon the drie land and periſhed, as Pena the French herbartan hath alſo noted in the verie end of his herball. What I for mine owne part haue ſéene here by experience, I haue alreadie ſo touched in the chapter of Ilands, that it ſhould be but time ſpent in vaine to repeat it here againe. Loke therefore in the deſcription of Man or Manaw for more of theſe barnacles, as alſo in the eleuenth chapter of the deſcription of Scotland, & I do not doubt but you ſhall in ſome reſpect be ſatiſfied in the generation of theſe foules. As for egrets, palpers, and ſuch like, they are dailie brought vnto vs from beyond the ſea, as if all the foule of our countrie could not ſuffice to ſatiſfie our delicate appetites.

Our tame foule are ſuch (for the moſt part) as are common both to vs and to other countries, as cocks, hens, géeſe, ducks, peacocks of Inde, pigeons, now an hurtfull foule by reaſon of their multitudes, and number of houſes dailie erected for their increaſe (which the bowres of the countrie call in ſcorne almes houſes, and dens of thæues, and ſuch like) wherof there is great plentie in euerie farmers yard. They are kept there alſo to be ſold either for readie monie in the open markets, or elſe to be ſpent at home in good companie amongſt their neighbors without reprehenſion or fines. Neither are we ſo miſerable in England (a thing onelie granted vnto vs by the eſpeciall grace of God, and libertie of our princes) as to dine or ſup with a quarter of a hen, or to make ſo great a repaſt with a cocks combe, as they do in ſome other countries: but if occaſion ſerue, the whole carcaſſes of manie capons, hens, pigeons, and ſuch like do oft go to wracke, beſide béefe, mutton, veale, and lambe: all which at euerie feaſt are taken for neceſſarie diſhes amongeſt the communaltie of England.

The geloing of cocks, whereby capons are made, is an ancient practiſe brought in of old time by the Romans when they dwelt here in this land: but the geloing of turkies or Indiſh peacocks is a newer deuiſe: and certeinlie not vſed amiſſe, ſith the rankeneſſe of that bird is verie much abated thereby, and the ſtrong taſte of the fleſh in ſundrie wiſe amended. If I ſhould ſay that ganders grow alſo to be geloed, I ſuppoſe that ſome will laugh me to ſcorne, neither haue I talked at anie time of ſuch a foule ſo ſerued, yet haue I heard it more than once to be vſed in the countrie, where their géeſe are driuen to the field like heards of cattell by a goſeheard, a toie alſo no leſſe to be maruelled at than the other. For as it is rare to heare of a geloed gander, ſo is it ſtrange to me to ſée or heare of géeſe to be led to the field like ſhéepe: yet ſo it is, & their goſeheard carieth a rattle of paper or parchment, with him, when he goeth about in the morning to gather his goſlings togither, the noiſe whereof commeth no ſooner to their eares, than they fall to gagling, and haſten to go with him. If it happen that the gates be not yet open, or that none of the houſe be ſtirring, it is ridiculous to ſée how they will pepe vnder the doores, and neuer leaue creaking and gagling till they be let out vnto him to ouertake their fellowes. With vs where I dwell they are not kept in this ſort, nor in manie other places, neither are they kept ſo much for their bodies as their feathers. Some hold furthermore an opinion, that in ouer ranke ſoiles their dung doth ſo qualifie the batableneſſe of the ſoile, that their cattell is thereby kept from the garget, and ſundrie other diſeaſes, although ſome of them come to their ends now and then, by licking vp of their feathers. I might here make mention of other foules procreated by the induſtrie of man, as betweene the feſant cocke and dunghill hen, or betweene the feſant and the ringdoue, the peacocke and the turkie hen, the partrich and the pigeon: but ſith I haue no more knowledge of theſe, than what I haue gotten by mine eare, I will not meddle with them. Yet Cardan ſpeaking of the ſecond ſort, doth affirme it to be a foule of excellent beautie. I would likewiſe intreat of other foules which we repute vncleane, as rauens, crowes, pies, choughes, rokes, kites, faies, ringtailes, ſtarlings, woodſpikes, woodnalwes, rauens, &c: but ſith they abound in all countries, though peraduenture moſt of all in England (by reaſon of our negligence) I ſhall not need to ſpend anie time in the rehearſall of them. Neither are our crowes and choughs cheriſhed of purpoſe to catch vp the wormes that breed in our ſoiles (as Polydor ſuppoſeth) ſith there are no vplandiſh townes but haue (or ſhould haue) nets of their owne in ſtore to catch them withall. Sundrie acts of parlement are likewiſe made for their vtter deſtruction, as alſo the ſpoile of other rauenous foules hurtfull to pultrie, conies, lambs, and kids, whoſe valuation of reward to him that killeth them is after the head: a deuiſe brought from the Goths, who had the like ordinance for the deſtruction of their white crowes, and tale made by the becke, which killed both lambs and pigs. The like order is taken with vs for our vermines, as with them alſo for the rotage out of their wild beaſts, ſauing that they ſpared their greateſt beares, eſpeciallie the white, whoſe ſkins are by cuſtome & priuilege reſerued to couer thoſe planchers whereupon their prieſts do ſtand at maſſe, leaſt he ſhould take ſome vnkind cold in ſuch a long péece of worke: and happie is the man that may prouide them for him, for he ſhall haue pardon inough for that ſo religious an act, to laſt if he will till domes day do approch; and manie thouſands after. Nothing therefore can be more vnlikelie to be true, than that theſe noiſome creatures are nouriſhed amongſt vs to deuoure our wormes, which do not abound much more in England than elſewhere in other countries of the maine. It may be that ſome loke for a diſcourſe alſo of our other foules in this place at my hand, as nightingales, thruſhes, blackebirds, mauiſes, ruddocks, redſtarts or dunocks, larkes, tiuits, kingsfiſhers, buntings, turtles white or grate, linets, bullfinches, goldfinches, waſhtailes, cheriecrackers, yellowhamers, felfares, &c: but I ſhould then ſpend more time vpon them than is conuenient. Neither will I ſpeake of our coſtlie and curious aniaries dailie made for the better hearing of their melodie, and obſeruation of their natures: but I ceaſe alſo to go anie further in theſe things, hauing (as I thinke) ſaid inough alreadie of theſe that I haue named.

Of fiſh vſuallie taken vpon our coaſts.

Cap. 3.

I Haue in my deſcription of waters, as occaſion hath ſerued, intreated of the names of ſome of the ſeuerall fiſhes which are commonlie to be found in our riuers. Neuertheleſſe as euerie water hath a ſundrie mixture, and therefore is not ſtored with euerie kind: ſo there is almoſt no houſe, euen of the meaneſt bowres, which haue not one or mo ponds or holes made for reſeruation of water vnſtored with ſome of them, as with tench, carpe, breame, roch, dace, eles, or ſuch like as will liue and breed togither. Certes it is not poſſible for me to deliuer the names of all ſuch kinds of fiſhes as our riuers are found to beare: yet leaſt I ſhould ſeeme inurious to the reader, in not deliuering ſo manie of them as haue beene brought to my knowledge, I will not let to ſet them downe as they do come to mind. Beſides the ſalmons therefore, which are not to be taken from the middeſt of September to the middeſt of Nouember, and are verie plentifull in our greateſt riuers, as their yong fore are not to be touched from mid Aprill vnto Midſummer, we haue the trout, barbell, graile, powt, cheuin, pike, gud-geon, ſmelt, perch, menan, ſhrimpes, creuiſes, lam-preies, and ſuch like, whoſe preſeruation is prouided for by verie ſharpe lawes, not onelie in our riuers, but alſo in plaſhes or lakes and ponds, which other-wiſe would bring ſmall profit to the owners, and do much harme by continuall maintenance of idle per-ſons, who would ſpend their whole times vpon their bankes, not coueting to labour with their hands, nor follow anie good trade. Of all theſe there are none more preiudiciall to their neighbours that dwell in the ſame water, than the pike and eele, which com-monlie deuoure ſuch fiſh or frie and ſpawne as they may get and come by. Neuertheleſſe, the pike is friend vnto the tench, as to his leach & ſurgeon. For when the fiſhmonger hath opened his ſide and laid out his riuet and fat vnto the buier, for the better vtterance of his ware, and can not make him away at that preſent, he laieth the ſame againe into the proper place, and ſowing vp the wound, he reſtoreth him to the pond where tenches are, who neuer ceaſe to ſucke and licke his greeued place, till they haue re-ſtored him to health, and made him readie to come a-gaine to the ſtall, when his turne ſhall come about. I might here make report how the pike, carpe, and ſome other of our riuer fiſhes are ſold by inches of cleane fiſh, from the eies or gilles to the crotch of the tailes, but it is needleſſe: alſo how the pike as he a-geth, receiueth diuerſe names, as from a frie to a gilthed, from a gilthed to a pod, from a pod to a iacke, from a iacke to a pickerell, from a pickerell to a pike, and laſt of all to a luce; alſo that a ſalmon is the firſt yeare a grauellin, and commonlie ſo big as an her-ring, the ſecond a ſalmon peale, the third a pug, and the fourth a ſalmon: but this is in like ſort vnneceſ-ſarie.

I might finallie tell you, how that in fennie ri-uers ſiues if you cut a turfe, and laie it with the graſſe downewards, vpon the earth, in ſuch ſort as the water may touch it as it paſſeth by, you ſhall haue a brood of eeles, it would ſeeme a wonder; and yet it is beleeued with no leſſe aſſurance of ſome, than that an horſe haire laid in a pale full of the like water will in ſhort time ſtirre and become a liuing crea-ture. But ſith the certeintie of theſe things is rather proued by few than the certeintie of them knowne vnto manie, I let it paſſe at this time. Neuerthe-leſſe this is generallie obſerued in the maintenance of frie ſo well in riuers as in ponds, that in the time of ſpawne we vſe to throw in faggots made of wil-low and ſallow, and now and then of buſhes for want of the other, whereby ſuch ſpawne as falleth into the ſame is preſerued and kept from the pike, perch, eele and other fiſh, of which the carpe alſo will feed vpon his owne, and thereby hinder the ſtore and increaſe of proper kind. Some vſe in euerie fift or ſeauenth yeere to laie their great ponds drie for all the ſum-mer time, to the end they may gather graſſe, and a thin ſwart for the fiſh to feed vpon; and afterwards ſtore them with breeders, after the water be let of new againe into them: finallie, when they haue ſpawned, they draw out the breeders, leauing not aboue foure or fiue behind, euen in the greateſt ponds, by meanes whereof the reſt do proſper the better: and this obſeruation is moſt vſed in carpe and breame; as for perch (a delicate fiſh) it proſpereth euerie where, I meane ſo well in ponds as riuers, and alſo in motes and pittes, as I do know by experience, though their bottoms be but claie. More would I write of our freſh fiſh, if anie more were needfull; wherefore I will now turne ouer vnto ſuch of the ſalt water as are taken vpon our coaſts. As our foules therefore haue their ſeaſons, ſo likewiſe haue all our ſorts of ſea fiſh: whereby it commeth to paſſe that none, or at the leaſt wiſe verie few of them are to be had at all times. Neuertheleſſe, the ſeas that inui-ron our coaſts, are of all other moſt plentifull: for as by reaſon of their depth they are a great ſuccour, ſo our low ſhores miniſter great plentie of food vnto the fiſh that come thereto, no place being void or bar-ren, either through want of food for them, or the falles of filthie riuers, which naturallie annoie them. In December therefore and Januarie we commonlie abound in herring and red fiſh, as rochet, and gur-nard. In Februarie and March we feed on plaice, trowts, turbut, muſkles, &c. In Aprill and Maie, with makrell, and cockles. In June and Julie, with conger. In Auguſt and September, with haddocke and herring: and the two moneths inſuing with the ſame, as alſo thornbacke and reigh of all ſorts; all which are the moſt vſuall, and wherewith our com-mon ſort are beſt of all refreſhed.

For mine owne part I am greatlie acquainted neither with the ſeaſons, nor yet with the fiſh it ſelfe: and therefore if I ſhould take vpon me to deſcribe or ſpeake of either of them abſolutelie, I ſhould enter-priſe more than I am able to performe, and go in hand with a greater matter than I can well bring about. It ſhall ſuffice therefore to declare what ſorts of fiſhes I haue moſt often ſeene, to the end I may not altogither paſſe ouer this chapter without the re-herſall of ſomething, although the whole ſumme of that which I haue to ſaie be nothing indeed, if the performance of a full diſcourſe hereof be anie thing hardlie required.

Of fiſhes therefore as I find fiue ſorts, the flat, the round, the long, the legged and ſhelled: ſo the flat are diuided into the ſmoth, ſcaled and tailed. Of the firſt are the plaice, the but, the turbut, birt, floke or ſea flounder, dorree, dab, &c. Of the ſecond the ſoles, &c. Of the third, our chaits, maidens, king-ſons, flath and thornbacke, whereof the greater be for the moſt part either dried and carried into other countries, or ſodden, ſowſed, & eaten here at home, whileſt the leſſer be fried or buttered; ſome after they be taken as prouiſion not to be kept long for feare of putrifaction. Under the round kinds are common-lie comprehended lumps, an vglie fiſh to fight, and yet verie delicat in eating, if it be kindlie dreſſed: the whiting (an old waiter or ſeruitor in the court) the rochet, ſea breame, pirle, hake, ſea trowt, gurnard, haddocke, cod, herring, pilchard, ſprat, and ſuch like. And theſe are they whereof I haue beſt knowledge, and be commonlie to be had in their times vpon our coaſts. Under this kind alſo are all the great fiſh conteined, as the ſcale, the dolphin, the porpoiſe, the thirlepole, whale, and whatſoeuer is round of bodie be it neuer ſo great and huge. Of the long ſort are congers, eeles, garefiſh, and ſuch other of that forme. Finallie, of the legged kind we haue not manie, nei-ther haue I ſeene anie more of this ſort than the Po-lypus called in Engliſh the lobſter, craſiſh or creuis, and the crab. As for the little craſiſhes they are not taken in the ſea, but plentifullie in our freſh riuers in banks, and vnder ſtones, where they keepe them-ſelues in moſt ſecret maner; and oft by likeneſſe of colour with the ſtones among which they lie, deceiue euen the ſkilfull takers of them, except they vſe great diligence. ruſtique, doubted whether theſe lobſtars be fiſh or not; and in the end concludeth them to grow of the purgation of the water as doth the frog, and theſe alſo not to be eaten, for that they be ſtrong and verie hard of digeſtion. But hereof let other determine further.

I might here ſpeake of ſundrie other fiſhes now and then taken alſo vpon our coaſts; but ſith my mind is onelie to touch either all ſuch as are vſuallie gotten, or ſo manie of them onelie as I can well reherſe vpon certeine knowledge, I thinke it good at this time to forbeare the further intreatie of them. As touching the ſhellie ſort, we haue plentie of oiſters, whoſe value in old time for their ſweetneſſe was not vnknowne in Rome (although Mutianus as Plinie noteth lib. 32, cap. 6. preferre the Cyzicene before them) and theſe we haue in like maner of diuerſe quantities, and no leſſe varietie alſo of our muſkles and cockles. We haue in like ſort no ſmall ſtore of great whelkes, ſcalops and perewinkles, and each of them brought farre into the land from the ſea coaſt in their ſeuerall ſeaſons. And albeit our oiſters are generallie forborne in the foure hot moneths of the yeare, that is to ſaie, Maie, June, Julie, and Auguſt, which are void of the letter R: yet in ſome places they be continuallie eaten, where they be kept in pits as I haue knowne by experience. And thus much of our ſea fiſh, as a man in maner vtterlie vnacquainted with their diuerſitie of kinds: yet ſo much haue I pelded to doo, hoping hereafter to ſaie ſomewhat more, and more orderlie of them, if it ſhall pleaſe God that I may liue and haue leaſure once againe to peruſe this treatiſe, and ſo make vp a perfect peece of worke, of that which as you now ſee is verie ſlenderlie attempted and begun.

Of ſauage beaſts and vermines.

Chap. 4.

IT is none of the leaſt bleſſings wherewith God hath indued this Iland, that it is void of noiſome beaſts, as lions, beares, tigers, pardes, wolfes, & ſuch like, by means whereof our countrimen may trauell in ſafetie, & our herds and flocks remaine for the moſt part abroad in the field without anie herdman or keeper.

Flat fiſh.

Round fiſh.

This is cheerfelie ſpoken of the ſouth and ſouthweſt parts of the Iland. For whereas we that dwell on this ſide of the Twed, may ſafelie boaſt of our ſecuritie in this behalfe: yet cannot the Scots doo the like in euerie point within their kingdome, ſith they haue greeuous wolfes and cruell fores, beſide ſome other of like diſpoſition continuallie conuerſant among them, to the generall hinderance of their husbandmen, and no ſmall damage vnto the inhabiters of thoſe quarters. The happie and fortunate want of theſe beaſts in England is vniuerſallie aſcribed to the politike gouernement of king Edgar, who to the intent the whole countrie might once be cleanſed and clearelie rid of them, charged the conquered Welſhmen (who were then peſtered with theſe rauenous creatures aboue meaſure) to paie him a yearelie tribute of wolfes ſkinnes, to be gathered within the land. He appointed them thereto a certeine number of three hundred, with free libertie for their prince to hunt & purſue them ouer all quarters of the realme; as our chronicles doo report. Some there be which write how Ludwall prince of Wales paid yearelie to king Edgar this tribute of three hundred wolfes, whoſe carcaſes being brought into Lhoegres, were buried at Wolfpit in Cambridgeſhire, and that by means thereof within the compaſſe and terme of foure yeares, none of thoſe noiſome creatures were left to be heard of within Wales and England. Since this time alſo we read not that anie wolfe hath beene ſeene here that hath beene bred within the bounds and limits of our countrie: howbeit there haue beene diuerſe brought ouer from beyond the ſeas for greedineſſe of gaine, and to make monie onlie by the gaſing and gaping of our people vpon them, who couet oft to ſee them being ſtrange beaſts in their eies, and ſildome knowne (as I haue ſaid) in England.

Tribute of wolfes ſkins.

Lions we haue had verie manie in the north parts of Scotland, and thoſe with maines of no leſſe force than they of Mauritania were ſometimes reported to be; but how and when they were deſtroied as yet I doo not read. They had in like ſort no leſſe plentie of wild and cruell buls, which the princes and their nobilitie in the frugall time of the land did hunt, and follow for the triall of their manhood, and by purſute either on horſſeback or foot in armor; notwithſtanding that manie times they were dangerouſlie aſſailed by them. But both theſe ſauage creatures are now not heard of, or at the leaſt wiſe the later ſcarſelie known in the ſouth parts. Howbeit this I gather by their being here, that our Iland was not cut from the maine by the great deluge or flood of Noah: but long after, otherwiſe the generation of thoſe & other like creatures could not haue extended into our Ilands. For, thar: anie man would of ſet purpoſe repleniſh the countrie with them for his pleaſure and paſtime in hunting, I can in no wiſe beleeue.

Of fores we haue ſome but no great ſtore, and alſo badgers in our ſandie & light grounds, where woods, firzes, brome, and plentie of ſhrubs are to ſhrowd them in, when they be from their borrowes, and thereto warrens of conies at hand to feed vpon at will. Otherwiſe in claie, which we call the cledgie mould, we ſildom heare of anie, becauſe the moiſture and toughneſſe of the ſoile is ſuch, as will not ſuffer them to draw and make their borrowes deepe. Certes if I may freelie ſaie what I thinke, I ſuppoſe that theſe two kinds (I meane fores and badgers) are rather preſerued by gentlemen to hunt and haue paſtime withall at their owne pleaſures, than otherwiſe ſuffered to liue, as not able to be deſtroied becauſe of their great numbers. For ſuch is the ſcantie of them here in England, in compariſon of the plentie that is to be ſeene in other countries, and ſo earneſtlie are the inhabitants bent to rot them out, that except it had beene to beare thus with the recreations of their ſuperiors in this behalfe, it could not otherwiſe haue beene choſen, but that they ſhould haue beene vtterlie deſtroied by manie yeares agone.

Badgers.

I might here intreat largelie of other vermine, as the polcat, the miniuer, the weaſell, ſtote, fulmart, ſquirrill, fitchew, and ſuch like, which Cardan includeth vnder the word Muſtela: alſo of the otter, and likewiſe of the beuer, whoſe hinder feet and taile onlie are ſuppoſed to be fiſh. Certes the taile of this beaſt is like vnto a thin whetſtone, as the bodie vnto a monſterous rat: the beaſt alſo it ſelfe is of ſuch force in the teeth, that it will gnaw an hole through a thicke planke, or there thorough a dubble billet in a night; it loueth alſo the ſtilleſt riuers: & it is giuen to them by nature, to go by flockes vnto the woods at hand, where they gather ſticks wherewith to build their neſts, wherein their bodies lie drie aboue the water, although they ſo prouide moſt commonlie, that their tailes may hang within the ſame. It is alſo reported that their ſaid tailes are a delicate diſh, and their ſtones of ſuch medicinable force, that (as Beuers.

Verto-

Vertomannus saith) foure men smelling vnto them each after other did bleed at the nose through their attractiue force, proceeding from a vehement sauour wherewith they are indued: there is greatest plentie of them in Persia, chéefelie about Balaschám, from whence they and their dried cods are brought into all quarters of the world, though not without some forgerie by such as prouide them. And of all these here remembred, as the first sorts are plentifull in euerie wood and hedgerow: so these latter, especiallie the otter (for to saie the truth we haue not manie beuers, but onelie in the Deffie in Wales) is not wanting or to séeke in manie, but most streams and riuers of this Ile: but it shall suffice in this sort to haue named them as I doo finallie the marterne, a beast of the chase, although for number I worthilie doubt whether that of our beuers or marterns may be thought to be the lesse.

Marterns.

Other pernicious beasts we haue not, except you repute the great plentie of red & fallow déere, whose colours are oft garled white and blacke, all white or all blacke, and store of conies amongst the hurtfull sort. Which although that of themselues they are not offensiue at all, yet their great numbers are thought to be verie preiudiciall, and therfore iustlie reproued of many; as are in like sort our huge flocks of shéepe, whereon the greatest part of our soile is employed almost in euerie place, and yet our mutton, woll, and felles neuer the better cheape. The yong males which our fallow déere doo bring forth, are commonlie named according to their seuerall ages: for the first yéere it is a fawne, the second a pucket, the third a sorell, the fourth a soare, the fift a bucke of the first head; not bearing the name of a bucke till he be fiue yéers old: and from henceforth his age is commonlie knowne by his head or horns. Howbeit this notice of his yéers is not so certeine, but that the best woodman may now and then be deceiued in that account: for in some grounds a bucke of the first head will be so well headed as another in a high rowtie soile will be in the fourth. It is also much to be maruelled at, that whereas they doo yéerelie mew and cast their horns: yet in fighting they neuer breake off where they doo grise or mew. Furthermore, in examining the condition of our red déere, I find that the yong male is called in the first yéere a calfe, in the second a broket, the third a spaie, the fourth a stagon or stag, the fift a great stag, the sixt an hart, and so forth vnto his death. And with him in degrée of venerie are accounted the hare, bore, and woolfe. The fallow déere as bucks and does, are nourished in parkes, and conies in warrens and burrowes. As for hares, they run at their owne aduenture, except some gentleman or other (for his pleasure) doo make an inclosure for them. Of these also the stag is accounted for the most noble game, the fallow déere is the next, then the roe, whereof we haue indifferent store; and last of all the hare, not the least in estimation, because the hunting of that séelie beast is mother to all the terms, blasts, and artificiall deuises that hunters doo vse. All which (notwithstanding our custome) are passimes more meet for ladies and gentlewomen to exercise (whatsoeuer Franciscus Patritius saith to the contrarie in his institution of a prince) than for men of courage to follow, whose hunting should practise their armes in talking of their manhood, and dealing with such beasts as eftsoones will turne againe, and offer them the hardest rather than their horsses fét, which manie times may carrie them with dishonour from the field. Surelie this noble kind of hunting onelie did great princes frequent in times past, as it may yet appéere by the histories of their times, especiallie of Alexander, who at vacant times hunted the tiger, the pard, the bore, and the beare, but most willinglie lions, because of the honorable estimation of that beast; insomuch that at one time he caused an od or chosen lion (for force and beautie) to be let forth vnto him hand to hand, with whome he had much businesse, albeit that in the end he ouerthrew and killed the beast. Hereunto beside that which we read of the vsuall hunting of the princes and kings of Scotland, of the wild bull, woolfe, &c: the example of king Henrie the first of England, who disdaining (as he termed them) to follow or pursue cowards, cherished of set purpose sundrie kinds of wild beasts, as bears, libards, ounces, lions at Woodstocke, & one or two other places in England, which he walled about with hard stone, An. 1120, and where he would often fight with some one of them hand to hand, when they did turne againe and make anie raise vpon him: but chéeflie he loued to hunt the lion and the bore, which are both verie dangerous exercises, especiallie that with the lion, except some policie be found wherwith to trouble his eiesight in anie manner of wise. For though the bore be fierce, and hath learned by nature to harden his flesh and skin against the trées, to sharpen his téeth, and defile himselfe with earth, thereby to prohibit the entrance of the weapons: yet is the sport somewhat more easie, especiallie where two stand so nere togither, that the one (if néed be) may helpe and be a succour to the other. Neither would he cease for all this to follow his passime, either on horssebacke or on foot, as occasion serued, much like the yonger Cyrus. I haue read of wild bores and bulles to haue béene about Blackleie nére Manchester, whither the said prince would now and then resort also for his solace in that behalfe, as also to come by those excellent falcons then bred thereabouts; but now they are gone, especiallie the bulles, as I haue said alreadie.

Stags.

King Henrie the fift in his beginning thought it a mere scotterie to pursue anie fallow déere with hounds or greihounds, but supposed himselfe al waies to haue donne a sufficient act when he had tired them by his owne trauell on foot, and so killed them with his hands in the vplhot of that exercise and end of his recreation. Certes herein he resembled Polymnestor Milesius, of whome it is written, how he ran so swiftlie, that he would and did verie often ouertake hares for his pleasure, which I can hardlie beléeue: and therefore much lesse that one Lidas did run so lightlie and swiftlie after like game, that as he passed ouer the sand, he left not so much as the prints of his feet behind him. And thus did verie manie in like sort with the hart (as I doo read) but this I thinke was verie long agone, when men were farre higher and swifter than they are now: and yet I denie not, but rather grant willinglie that the hunting of the red déere is a right princelie passime. In diuerse forren countries they cause their red and fallow déere to draw the plough, as we doo our oxen and horsses. In some places also they milke their hinds as we doo here our kine and goats. And the experience of this latter is noted by Giraldus Cambrensis to haue béene séene and vsed in Wales, where he did eat chéese made of hinds milke, at such time as Baldwine archbishop of Canturburie preached the croisad there, when they were both lodged in a gentlemans house, whose wife of purpose kept a deirie of the same. As for the plowing with oxes (which I suppose to be vnlikelie) because they are (in mine opinion) vntameable and alkes a thing commonlie vsed in the east countries; here is no place to speake of it, since we want these kind of beasts, neither is it my purpose to intreat at large of other things than are to be séene in England. Wherfore I will omit to saie anie more of wild and sauage beasts at this time, thinking my selfe to haue spoken alreadie sufficientlie

Hinds haue béene milked sufficientlie of this matter, if not too much in the iudgement of the curious.

Of hawkes and rauenous foules.

Chap. 5.

I Can not make (as yet) anie iust report how manie sorts of hawkes are bred within this realme. Howbeit which of those that are vsuallie had among vs are disclosed within this land, I thinke it more easie and lesse difficult to set downe. First of all therefore that we haue the egle, common experience doth euidentlie confirme, and diuerse of our rockes whereon they breed, if speach did serue, could well declare the same. But the most excellent aierie of all is not much from Chester, at a castell called Dinas Bren, sometime builded by Brennus, as our writers do remember. Certes this castell is no great thing, but yet a pile sometime verie strong and inaccessible for enimies, though now all ruinous as manie other are. It standeth vpon an hard rocke, in the side whereof an eagle breedeth euerie yeare. This also is notable in the ouerthrow of hir nest (a thing oft attempted) that he which goeth thither must be sure of two large baskets, and so prouide to be let downe thereto, that he may sit in the one and be couered with the other: for otherwise the eagle would kill him, and teare the flesh from his bones with hir sharpe talons though his apparell were neuer so good. The common people call this foule an erne, but as I am ignorant whither the word eagle and erne do shew anie difference of sex, I meane betweene the male and female, so we haue great store of them. And neere to the places where they breed, the commons complaine of great harme to be done by them in their fields: for they are able to beare a yong lambe or kid vnto their neasts, therwith to feed their yong and come againe for more. I was once of the opinion that there was a diuersitie of kind betweene the eagle and the erne, till I perceiued that our nation vsed the word erne in most places for the eagle. We haue also the lanner and the lanneret: the tersell and the gosehawke: the musket and the sparhawke: the iacke and the hobbie: and finallie some (though verie few) marlions. And these are all the hawkes that I do heare as yet to be bred within this Iland. Howbeit as these are not wanting with vs, so are they not verie plentifull: wherefore such as delite in hawking do make their chiefe puruiance & prouision for the same out of Danske, Germanie, and the Eastcountries, from whence we haue them in great abundance, and at excessiue prices, whereas at home and where they be bred they are sold for almost right naught, and vsuallie brought to the markets as chickins, pullets and pigeons are with vs, and there bought vp to be eaten (as we do the aforesaid foules) almost of euerie man. It is said that the sparhawke preieth not vpon the foule in the morning that she taketh ouer euen, but as loth to haue double benefit by one silie foule, doth let it go to make some shift for it selfe. But hereof as I stand in some doubt, so this I find among the writers worthie the noting, that the sparhawke is enimie to yong children, as is also the ape; but of the pecocke she is maruellouslie afraid & so appalled, that all courage & stomach for a time is taken from hir vpon the sight thereof. But to proceed with the rest. Of other rauenous birds we haue also verie great plentie, as the bullard, the kite, the ringtaile, dunkite, & such as often annoie our countrie dames by spoiling of their yong breeds of chickens, duckes and goslings, wherevnto our verie rauens and crowes haue learned also the waie: and so much are our rauens giuen to this kind of spoils, that some idle and curious heads of set purpose haue manned, reclaimed, and vsed them in steed of hawkes, when other could not be had. Some do imagine that the rauen should be the vulture, and I was almost persuaded in times past to beleeue the same: but finding of late a description of the vulture, which better agreeth with the forme of a second kind of eagle, I freelie surcease to be longer of that opinion: for as it hath after a sort the shape, colour, and quantitie of an eagle, so are the legs and feet more hairie and rough, their sides vnder their wings better couered with thicke downe (wherewith also their gorge or a part of their breast vnder their throtes is armed, and not with fethers) than are the like parts of the eagle, and vnto which portraiture there is no member of the rauen (who is also verie blacke of colour) that can haue anie resemblance: we haue none of them in England to my knowledge, if we haue, they go generallie vnder the name of eagle or erne. Neither haue we the pygargus or gripe, wherefore I haue no occasion to intreat further. I haue seene the carren crowes so cunning also by their owne industrie of late, that they haue vsed to soare ouer great riuers (as the Thames for example) & suddenlie comming downe haue caught a small fish in their feet & gone awaie withall without wetting of their wings. And euen at this present the aforesaid riuer is not without some of them, a thing (in my opinion) not a little to be wondered at. We haue also ospraies which breed with vs in parks and woods, wherby the keepers of the same do reape in breeding time no small commoditie: for so soone almost as the yong are hatched, they tie them to the but ends or ground ends of sundrie trees, where the old ones finding them, do neuer cease to bring fish vnto them, which the keepers take & eat from them, and commonlie is such as is well fed, or not of the worst sort. It hath not beene my hap hitherto to see anie of these foules, & partlie through mine owne negligence: but I heare that it hath one foot like an hawke to catch hold withall, and another resembling a goose wherewith to swim; but whether it be so or not so, I refer the further search and triall thereof vnto some other. This neuertheles is certeine that both aliue and dead, yea euen hir verie oile is a deadlie terrour to such fish as come within the wind of it. There is no cause wherefore I should describe the cormorant amongst hawkes, of which some be blacke and manie pied chiefelie about the Ile of Elie, where they are taken for the night rauen, except I should call him a water hawke. But sith such dealing is not conuenient, let vs now see what may be said of our venemous wormes, and how manie kinds we haue of them within our realme and countrie.

Of venemous beasts.

Chap. 6.

IF I should go about to make anie long discourse of venemous beasts or wormes bred in England, I should attempt more than occasion it selfe would readilie offer, sith we haue verie few worms, but no beasts at all, that are thought by their naturall qualities to be either venemous or hurtfull. First of all therefore we haue the adder (in our old Saxon tong called an atter) which

ſome men do not raſhlie take to be the viper. Certes if it be ſo, then is it not the viper author of the death of hir * parents, as ſome hiſtories affirme; and thereto Encelius a late writer in his De re metallica, lib.3.cap.38. where he maketh mention of a ſhe adder which he ſaw in Sala, whoſe wombe (as he ſaith) was eaten out after a like faſhion, hir yong ones lieng by hir in the ſunne ſhine, as if they had béene earth worms. Neuertheleſſe as he nameth them Viperas, ſo he calleth the male Echis, and the female Echidna, concluding in the end that Echis is the ſame ſerpent which his countrimen to this daie call Ein atter, as I haue alſo noted before out of a Saxon dictionarie. For my part I am perſuaded that the ſlaughter of their parents is either not true at all, or not alwaies (although I doubt not but that nature hath right well prouided to inhibit their ſuperfluous increaſe by ſome meanes or other) and ſo much the rather am I led hereunto, for that I gather by Nicander, that of all venemous worms the viper onelie bringeth out hir yong aliue, and therefore is called in Latine Vipera quaſi viuipara: but of hir owne death he doth not (to my remembrance) ſaie any thing. It is teſtified alſo by other in other words, & to the like ſenſe, that Echis id eſt vipera ſola ex ſerpentibus non ouaſed animalia parit. And it may well be, for I remember that I haue read in Philoſtratus De vita Appollonij, how he ſaw a viper licking hir yong. I did ſee an adder once my ſelfe that laie (as I thought) ſléeping on a moule hill, out of whoſe mouth came eleuen yong adders of twelue or thirtéene inches in length a péece, which plaied to and fro in the graſſe one with another, till ſome of them eſpied me. So ſone therefore as they ſaw my face, they ran againe into the mouth of their dam, whome I killed, and then found each of them ſhrowded in a diſtinct cell or pannicle in hir bellie, much like vnto a ſoft white iellie, which maketh me to be of the opinion that our adder is the viper indéed. The colour of their ſkin is for the moſt part like ruſtie iron or iron graie: but ſuch as be verie old reſemble a ruddie blew, & as once in the yeare, to wit, in Aprill or about the beginning of Maie they caſt their old ſkins (whereby as it is thought their age reneweth) ſo their ſtinging bringeth death without preſent remedie be at hand, the wounded neuer ceaſing to ſwell, neither the venem to worke till the ſkin of the one breake, and the other aſcend vpward to the hart, where it finiſheth the naturall effect, except the iuice of dragons (in Latine called Dracunculus minor) be ſpéedilie miniſtred and dronke in ſtrong ale, or elſe ſome other medicine taken of like force, that may counteruaile and ouercome the venem of the ſame. The length of them is moſt commonlie two foot and ſomwhat more, but ſeldome doth it extend vnto two foot ſix inches, except it be in ſome rare and monſtrous one: whereas our ſnakes are much longer, and ſéene ſometimes to ſurmount a yard, or three foot, although their poiſon be nothing ſo grieuous and deadlie as the others. Our adders lie in winter vnder ſtones, as Ariſtotle alſo ſaith of the viper Lib.8.cap.15. and in holes of the earth, rotten ſtubs of trées, and amongſt the dead leaues: but in the heat of the ſummer they come abroad, and lie either round on heapes, or at length vpon ſome hillocke, or elſewhere in the graſſe. They are found onelie in our woodland countries and higheſt grounds, where ſometimes (though ſeldome) a ſpeckled ſtone called Echites, in dutch Ein atter ſtein, is gotten out of their dried carcaſes, which diuers report to be good againſt their poiſon. As for our ſnakes, which in Latine are properlie named Angues, they commonlie are ſéene in mores, fens, lomie vales, and low bottoms.

And as we haue great ſtore of todes where adders commonlie are found, ſo do frogs abound where ſnakes do kéepe their reſidence. We haue alſo the ſloworme, which is blacke and graieth of colour, and ſomewhat ſhorter than an adder. I was at the killing once of one of them, and thereby perceiued that the was not ſo called of anie want of nimble motion, but rather of the contrarie. Neuertheleſſe we haue a blind worme to be found vnder logs in woods, and timber that hath lien long in a place, which ſome alſo do call (and vpon better ground) by the name of ſlow worms, and they are knowen eaſilie by their more or leſſe varietie of ſtriped colours, drawen long waies from their heads, their whole bodies little exceéding a foot in length, & yet is there venem deadlie. This alſo is not to be omitted, that now and then in our fennie countries, other kinds of ſerpents are found of greater quantitie than either our adder or our ſnake: but as theſe are not ordinarie and oft to be ſéene, ſo I meane not to intreat of them among our common annoiances. Neither haue we the ſcorpion, a plague of God ſent not long ſince into Italie, and whoſe poiſon (as Apollodorus ſaith) is white, neither the tarantula or Neopolitane ſpider, whoſe poiſon bringeth death, except muſike be at hand. Wherefore I ſuppoſe our countrie to be the more happie (I meane in part) for that it is void of theſe two grieuous annoiances, wherewith other nations are plagued.

We haue alſo eéts, both of the land and water, and likewiſe the noiſome ſwifts, whereof to ſais anie more it ſhould be but loſſe of time, ſith they are well knowne; and no region to my knowledge found to be void of manie of them. As for flies (ſith it ſhall not be amiſſe a little to touch them alſo) we haue none that can do hurt or hinderance naturallie vnto anie: for whether they be cut waſted, or whole bodied, they are void of poiſon and all venemous inclination. The cut or girt waſted (for ſo I Engliſh the word Inſecta) are the hornets, waſpes, bées, and ſuch like, whereof we haue great ſtore, and of which an opinion is conceiued, that the firſt do bréed of the corruption of dead horſſes, the ſecond of peares and apples corrupted, and the laſt of kine and oxen; which may be true, eſpecallie the firſt and latter in ſome parts of the beaſt, and not their whole ſubſtances, as alſo in the ſecond, ſith we haue neuer waſpes, but when our fruit beginneth to warripe. In déed Virgil and others ſpeake of a generation of bées, by killing or ſmothering of a bruſed bullocke or calfe, and laieng his bowels or his fleſh wrapped vp in his hide in a cloſe houſe for a certeine ſeaſon; but how true it is hitherto I haue not tried. Yet ſure I am of this, that no one liuing creature corrupteth without the production of another; as we may ſée by our ſelues, whoſe fleſh doth alter into lice; and alſo in ſhéepe for exceſſiue numbers of fleſh flies, if they be ſuffered to lie vnburied or vneaten by the dogs and ſwine, who often and happilie preuent ſuch needleſſe generations.

As concerning bées, I thinke it good to remember, that whereas ſome ancient writers affirme it to be a commoditie wanting in our Iland, it is now found to be nothing ſo. In old time peraduenture we had none in déed, but in my daies there is ſuch plentie of them in maner euerie where, that in ſome vplandiſh townes, there are one hundred, or two hundred hiues of them, although the ſaid hiues are not ſo huge as thoſe of the eaſt countrie, but far leſſe, as not able to conteine aboue one buſhell of corne, or fiue pecks at the moſt. Plinie (a man that of ſet purpoſe deliteth to write of wonders) ſpeaking of honie noteth that in the north regions the hiues in his time were of ſuch quantitie, that ſome one combe conteined eight foot in length, & yet (as it ſhould ſéeme) he ſpeketh not of the greateſt. For in Podolia, which is now ſubiect to the king of Poland, their hiues are ſo great, great and combes ſo abundant, that huge boxes ouerturning and falling into them, are drowned in the honie, before they can recouer & find the meanes to come out. Slowworme.

Our honie alſo is taken and reputed to be the beſt, bicauſe it is harder, better wrought, and clenlier veſſelled vp, than that which commeth from beyond the ſea, where they ſtampe and ſtreine their combs, bées, and yong blowings altogither into the ſtuffe, as I haue béene informed. In vſe alſo of medicine our phyſicians and apothecaries eſchew the forren, eſpeciallie that of Spaine and Ponthus, by reaſon of a venemous qualitie naturallie planted in the ſame, as ſome write, and chooſe the home made: not onelie by reaſon of our ſoile, which hath no leſſe plentie of wild thime growing therein than in Sicilia, & about Athens, and maketh the beſt ſtuffe; as alſo for that it bréedeth (being gotten in harueſt time) leſſe choler, and which is oftentimes (as I haue ſéene by experience) ſo white as ſugar, and corned as if it were ſalt. Our hiues are made commonlie of rie ſtraw, and wadled about with bramble quarters: but ſome make the ſame of wicker, and call them ouer with claie. Wée cheriſh none in trées, but ſet our hiues ſomewhere on the warmeſt ſide of the houſe, prouiding that they may ſtand drie and without danger both of the mouſe and moth. This furthermore is to be noted, that whereas in veſſels of oile, that which is néereſt the top is counted the fineſt, and of wine that in the middeſt: ſo of honie the beſt which is beauieſt and moiſteſt is alwaies next the bottome, and euermore caſteth and driueth his dregs vpward toward the verie top, contrarie to the nature of other liquid ſubſtances, whoſe grounds and lées do generallie ſettle downewards. And thus much as by the waie of our bées and Engliſh honie. honie. Eftes. Swifts. Flies. Cutwalled. Whole bodied. Hornets. Waſpes.

As for the whole bodied, as the cantharides, and ſuch venemous creatures of the ſame kind, to be abundantlie found in other countries, we heare not of them: yet haue we béetles, horſeflies, turdbugs or dorres (called in Latine Scarabei) the locuſt or the graſhopper (which to me doo ſéeme to be one thing, as I will anon declare) and ſuch like, whereof let other intreat that make an exerciſe in catching of flies, but a far greater ſport in offering them to ſpiders. As did Domitian ſometime, and an other prince yet liuing, who delited ſo much to ſée the follie combats betwixt a ſtout flie and an old ſpider, that diuerſe men haue had great rewards giuen them for their painfull prouiſion of flies made onelie for this purpoſe. Some paraſites alſo in the time of the aforeſaid emperour, (when they were diſpoſed to laugh at his follie, and yet would ſéeme in appearance to gratifie his fantaſticall head with ſome ſhew of dutifull demenour) could deuiſe to ſet their lord on worke, by letting a fleſh flie priuilie into his chamber, which he forthwith would egerlie haue hunted (all other buſineſſe ſet apart) and neuer ceaſed till he had caught hir into his fingers: whereupon aroſe the prouerbe, Ne muſca quidem, vttered firſt by Vibius Priſcus, who being aſked whether anie bodie was with Domitian, anſwered, Ne muſca quidem, whereby he noted his follie. There are ſome cockeſcombs here and there in England, learning it abroad as men tranſregionate, which make account alſo of this paſtime, as of a notable matter, telling what a fight is ſéene betwene them, if either of them be luſtie and couragious in his kind. One alſo hath made a booke of the ſpider and the flie, wherein he dealeth ſo profoundlie, and beyond all meaſure of ſkill, that neither he himſelfe that made it, neither anie one that readeth it, can reach vnto the meaning therof. But if thoſe follie fellows in ſtéed of the ſtraw that they thruſt into the flies tale (a great iniurie no doubt to ſuch a noble champion) would beſtow the coſt to ſet a foles cap vpon their owne heads: then might they with more ſecuritie and leſſe reprehenſion behold theſe notable battels.

Now as concerning the locuſt, I am led by diuerſe of my countrie, who (as they ſay) were either in Germanie, Italie, or Pannonia, 1542, when thoſe nations were greatlie annoied with that kind of flie, and affirme verie conſtantlie, that they ſaw none other creature than the graſhopper, during the time of that annoiance, which was ſaid to come to them from the Meotides. In moſt of our tranſlations alſo of the bible, the word Locuſta is Engliſhed a graſhopper, and therevnto Leuit. 11. it is reputed among the cleane food, otherwiſe John the Baptiſt would neuer haue liued with them in the wilderneſſe. In Barbarie, Numidia, and ſundrie other places of Affrica, as they haue bæne, ſo are they eaten to this date powdred in barels, and therefore the people of thoſe parts are called Acedophagi: neuertheles they ſhorten the life of the eaters by the production at the laſt of an irkeſome and filthie diſeaſe. In India they are three ſpot long, in Ethiopia much ſhorter, but in England ſeldome aboue an inch. As for the cricket called in Latin Cicada, he hath ſome likelihood, but not verie great, with the graſhopper, and therefore he is not to be brought in as an vmpier in this caſe. Finallie Matthiolus, and ſo manie as deſcribe the locuſt, doo ſet downe none other forme than that of our graſhopper, which maketh me ſo much the more to reſt vpon my former imagination, which is, that the locuſt and graſhopper are one. Of our Engliſh dogs and their qualities.

Chap. 7.

THere is no countrie that maie (as I take it) compare with ours, in number, excellencie, and diuerſitie of dogs. And therefore if Polycrates of Samia were now aliue, he would not ſend to Epyro for ſuch merchandize: but to his further coſt prouide them out of Britaine, as an ornament to his countrie, and péece of huſbandrie for his common wealth, which he furniſhed of ſet purpoſe with Molollian and Lacaonian dogs, as he did the ſame alſo with ſhéepe out of Attica and Miletum, gotes from Scyro and Parus, ſwine out of Sicilia, and artificers out of other places. Howbeit the learned doctor Caius in his Latine treatiſe vnto Geſner De canibus Anglicis, bringeth them all into three ſorts: that is, the gentle kind ſeruing for game: the homelie kind apt for ſundrie vſes: and the curriſh kind méet for many toies. For my part I can ſay no more of them than he hath done alredie. Wherefore I will here ſet downe onelie a ſumme of that which he hath written of their names and natures, with the addition of an example or two now latelie had in experience, whereby the courages of our maſtiffes ſhall yet more largelie appeare. As for thoſe of other countries I haue not to deale with them: neither care I to report out of Plinie, that dogs were ſometime killed in ſacrifice, and ſometime their whelps eaten as a delicate diſh, Lib. 29. cap. 4. Wherefore if anie man be diſpoſed to read of them, let him reſort to Plinie lib. 8. cap. 40. who (among other wonders) telleth of an armie of two hundred dogs, which fetched a king of the Garamantes out of captiuitie, mawgre the reſiſtance of his aduerſaries: alſo to Cardan, lib. 10. De animalibus, Ariſtotle, &c: who write maruels of them, but none further from credit than Cardan, who who is not afraid to compare ſome of them for greatneſſe with oxen, and ſome alſo for ſmalneſſe vnto the little field mouſe. Neither doo I find anie far writer of great antiquitie, that maketh mention of our dogs, Strabo excepted, who ſaith that the Galles did ſomtime buy vp all our maſtiffes, to ſerue in the forewards of their battels, wherein they reſembled the Colophonians, Caſkabalenſes of Calicute and Phenicia, of whom Plinie alſo ſpeaketh, but they had them not from vs.

The firſt ſort therefore he diuideth either into ſuch as rouſe the beaſt, and continue the chaſe, or ſpringeth the bird, and bewraieth hir flight by purſute. And as theſe are commonlie called ſpaniels, ſo the other are named hounds, whereof he maketh eight ſorts, of which the formoſt excelleth in perfect ſmelling, the ſecond in quicke eſpieng, the third in ſwiftneſſe and quickeneſſe, the fourth in ſmelling and nimbleneſſe, &c: and the laſt in ſubtiltie and deceitfulneſſe. Theſe (ſaith Strabo) are moſt apt for game, and called Sagaces by a generall name, not onelie becauſe of their ſkill in hunting, but alſo for that they know their owne and the names of their fellowes moſt exactlie. For if the hunter ſee anie one to follow ſkilfullie, and with likelihood of good ſucceſſe, he biddeth the reſt to harke and follow ſuch a dog, and they eftſoones obeie ſo ſone as they heare his name. The firſt kind of theſe are alſo commonlie called harriers, whoſe game is the fox, the hare, the woolfe (if we hap anie) hart, bucke, badger, otter, polcat, lopkart, weſell, conie, &c: the ſecond hight a terrer, and it hunteth the badger and graie onelie: the third a bloudhound, whoſe office is to follow the fierce, and now and then to purſue a theefe or beaſt by his dole foot: the fourth hight a gaſehound, who hunteth by the eie: the fift a greihound, cherished for his ſtrength, ſwiftnes, and ſtature, commended by Bratius in his De venatione, and not vnremembred by Hercules Stroza in a like treatiſe, but aboue all other thoſe of Britaine, where he ſaith:

——& magna ſpectandi male Britanni, alſo by Nemeſianus, libro Cynegetico, where he ſaith:

Diuiſa Britannia mittit
Veloces noſtrig, orbis venatibus aptos, of which ſort alſo ſome be ſmooth, of ſundrie colours, and ſome ſhake haired: the firſt a liemer, that excelleth in ſmelling and ſwift running: the ſeuenth a tumbler: and the eight a theefe, whoſe offices (I meane of the latter two) incline onelie to deceit, wherein they are oft ſo ſkilfull, that few men would thinke ſo miſchiefous a wit to remaine in ſuch fillie creatures. Hauing made this enumeration of dogs, which are apt for the chaſe and hunting, he commeth next to ſuch as ſerue the falcons in their times, whereof he maketh alſo two ſorts. One that findeth his game on the land, an other that putteth vp ſuch foule as keepeth in the water: and of theſe this is commonlie moſt vſuall for the net or traine, the other for the hawke, as he doth ſhew at large. Of the firſt he ſaith, that they haue no peculiar names aſſigned to them ſeuerallie, but each of them is called after the bird which by naturall appointment he is allotted to hunt or ſeeke, for which conſideration ſome be named dogs for the feaſant, ſome for the falcon, and ſome for the partrich. Howbeit, the common name for all is ſpaniell (ſaith he) and therevpon alludeth, as if theſe kinds of dogs had bin brought hither out of Spaine. In like ſort we haue of water ſpaniels in their kind. The third ſort of dogs of the gentle kind, is the ſpaniell gentle, or comforter, or (as the common terme is) the ſitting hound, and thoſe are called Melitei, of the Iland Malta, from whence they were brought hither. Theſe are little and prettie, proper and fine, and ſought out far and neere to ſatiſfie the nice delicacie of daintie dames, and wanton womens wils; inſtruments of follie to plaie and dallie withall, in trifling away the treaſure of time, to withdraw their minds from more commendable exerciſes, and to content their corrupt concupiſcences with vaine diſport, a fillie poore ſhift to ſhun their irkeſome idleneſs. Theſe Sybariticall puppies, the ſmaller they be (and thereto if they haue an hole in the foreparts of their heads) the better they are accepted, the more pleaſure alſo they prouoke, as meet plaiefellowes for minſing miſtreſſes to beare in their boſoms, to keepe companie withall in their chambers, to ſuccour with ſleepe in bed, and nourish with meat at boord, to lie in their laps, and licke their lips as they lie (like yong Dianaes) in their wagons and coches. And good reaſon it ſhould be ſo, for courſeneſſe with fineneſſe hath no fellowſhip, but featneſſe with neatneſſe hath neighbourhead inough. That plauſible prouerbe therefore verefied ſometime vpon a tyrant, namelie that he loued his ſow better than his ſonne, may well be applied to ſome of this kind of people, who delight more in their dogs, that are depriued of all poſſibilitie of reaſon, than they doo in children that are capable of wiſedome & iudgement. Yea, they oft feed them of the beſt, where the poore mans child at their doores can hardlie come by the worſt. But the former abuſe peraduenture reigneth where there hath beene long want of iſſue, elſe where barrenneſſe is the beſt bloſſome of beautie: or finallie, where poore mens children for want of their owne iſſue are not readie to be had. It is thought of ſome that it is verie wholeſome for a weake ſtomach to beare ſuch a dog in the boſome, as it is for him that hath the palſie to feele the dailie ſmell and ſauour of a for. But how truelie this is affirmed let the learned iudge: onelie it ſhall ſuffice for Doctor Caius to haue ſaid thus much of ſpaniels and dogs of the gentle kind.

Some barke and bite not.

Some bite and barke not

Dogs of the homelie kind, are either ſhepheards curs, or maſtiffes. The firſt are ſo common, that it needeth me not to ſpeake of them. Their vſe alſo is ſo well knowne in keeping the heard together (either when they graſe or go before the ſhepheard) that it ſhould be but in vaine to ſpend anie time about them. Wherefore I will leaue this curre vnto his owne kind, and go in hand with the maſtiffe, tie dog, or bandog, ſo called becauſe manie of them are tied vp in chaines and ſtrong bonds, in the daie time, for doing hurt abroad, which is an huge dog, ſtubborne, ouglie, eager, burthenous of bodie (& therefore but of little ſwiftneſſe) terrible and fearfull to behold, and oftentimes more fierce and fell than anie Archadian or Coꝛſican cur. Our Engliſhmen to the intent that theſe dogs may be more cruell and fierce, aſſiſt nature with ſome art, vſe and cuſtome. For although this kind of dog be capable of courage, violent, valiant, ſtout and bold: yet will they increaſe theſe their ſtomachs by teaching them to bait the beare, the bull, the lion, and other ſuch like cruell and bloudie beaſts, (either brought ouer or kept vp at home, for the ſame purpoſe) without anie collar to defend their throats, and oftentimes thereto they traine them vp in fighting and wreſtling with a man (hauing for the ſafegard of his life either a pike ſtaffe, club, ſword, priuie coate) wherby they become the more fierce and cruell vnto ſtrangers. The Caſpians made ſo much account ſometime of ſuch great dogs, that euerie able man would nourish ſundrie of them in his houſe of ſet purpoſe, to the end they ſhould deuoure their carcaſes after their deaths, thinking the dogs bellies to be the moſt honourable ſepulchers. The common people alſo followed the ſame rate, and therfore there were tie dogs kept vp by publike ordinance, to deuoure them after their deaths: by means whereof theſe beaſts became the more eger, and with great difficultie

difficultie after a while restreined from falling vpon the liuing. But whither am I digressed? In returning therefore to our owne, I saie that of mastiffes, some barke onelie with fierce and open mouth but will not bite, some do both barke and bite, but the cruellest do either not barke at all, or bite before they barke, and therefore are more to be feared than anie of the other. They take also their name of the word male and theele (or master theele if you will) bicause they often stound and put such persons to their shifts in townes and villages, and are the principall causes of their apprehension and taking. The force which is in them surmounteth all beleefe, and the fast hold which they take with their teeth exceedeth all credit: for three of them against a beare, foure against a lion are sufficient to trie maistries with them. King Henrie the seauenth, as the report goeth, commanded all such curres to be hanged, bicause they durst presume to fight against the lion, who is their king and souereigne. The like he did with an excellent falcon, as some saie, bicause he feared not hand to hand to match with an eagle, willing his falconers in his owne presence to pluck off his head after he was taken downe, saieng that it was not meet for anie subiect to offer such wrong vnto his lord and superiour, wherein he had a further meaning. But if king Henrie the seauenth had liued in our time, what would he haue done to one English mastiffe, which alone and without anie helpe at all pulled downe first an huge beare, then a pard, and last of all a lion, each after other before the French king in one date, when the lord Buckhurst was ambassador vnto him, and whereof if I should write the circumstances, that is, how he toke his aduantage being let lose vnto them, and finallie draue them into such exceeding feare, that they were all glad to run awaie when he was taken from them, I should take much paines, and yet reape but small credit: wherefore it shall suffice to haue said thus much thereof. Some of our mastiffes will rage onelie in the night, some are to be tied vp both daie and night. Such also as are suffered to go lose about the house and yard, are so gentle in the daie time, that children may ride on their backs, & plaie with them at their pleasures. Diuerse of them likewise are of such gelousie ouer their maister and whosoeuer of his household, that if a stranger do imbrace or touch anie of them, they will fall fiercelie vpon them, vnto their extreame mischeefe if their furie be not preuented. Such an one was the dog of Nichomedes king sometime of Bithinia, who seeing Consigne the queene to imbrace and kisse hir husband as they walked togither in a garden, did teare hir all to peeces, mauger his resistance, and the present aid of such as attended on them. Some of them moreouer will suffer a stranger to come in and walke about the house or yard where him listeth, without giuing ouer to follow him: but if he put forth his hand to touch anie thing, then will they flie vpon him and kill him if they may. I had one my selfe once, which would not suffer anie man to bring in his weapon further than my gate: neither those that were of my house to be touched in his presence. Or if I had beaten anie of my children, he would gentlie haue assaied to catch the rod in his teeth and take it out of my hand, or else pluck downe their clothes to saue them from the stripes: which in my opinion is not vnworthie to be noted. And thus much of our mastiffes, creatures of no lesse faith and loue towards their maisters than horsses; as may appeare euen by the confidence that Masinissa reposed in them, in so much that mistrusting his household seruants he made him a gard of dogs, which manie a time deliuered him from their treasons and conspiracies, euen by their barking and biting, nor of lesse force than the Molossian race, brought from Epiro into some countries, which the poets feigne to haue originall from the brasen dog that Vulcan made, and gaue to Iupiter, who also deliuered the same to Europa, she to Pasiphris, and Pasiphris to Cephalus, as Iulius Pollux noteth, lib. 5. cap. 5: neither vnequall in carefulnesse to the mastiffe of Alexander Phereus, who by his onelie courage and attendance kept his maister long time from slaughter, till at the last he was remooued by policie, and the tyrant killed sleeping: the storie goeth thus. Thebe the wife of the said Phereus and hir three brethren conspired the death of hir husband, who fearing the dog onelie, she found the means to allure him from his chamber doore by faire means, vnto another house hard by, whilest they should execute their purpose. Neuertheless, when they came to the bed where he laie sleeping, they ware faint harted, till she did put them in choise, either that they should dispatch him at once, or else that she hir selfe would wake hir husband, and giue him warning of his enimies, or at the least wise bring in the dog vpon them, which they feared most of all: and therefore quicklie dispatched him.

Some bite and barke not.

Homelie kind of dogs.

Tie dogs.

The last sort of dogs consisteth of the currish kind meet for manie toies: of which the whappet or prickeard curre is one. Some men call them warners, bicause they are good for nothing else but to barke and giue warning when anie bodie doth stirre or lie in wait about the house in the night season. Certes it is vnpossible to describe these curs in anie order, bicause they haue no anie one kind proper vnto themselues, but are a confused companie mixt of all the rest. The second sort of them are called turne spits, whose office is not vnknowne to anie. And as these are onelie reserued for this purpose, so in manie places our mastiffes (beside the vse which tinkers haue of them in carieng their heauie budgets) are made to draw water in great wheeles out of deepe wels, going much like vnto those which are framed for our turne spits, as is to be seene at Rotsson, where this feat is often practised. Besides these also we haue holts or curs dailie brought out of Iseland, and much made of among vs, bicause of their sawcinesse and quarrelling. Moreouer they bite verie sore, and loue candles exceedinglie, as do the men and women of their countrie: but I may saie no more of them, bicause they are not bred with vs. Yet this will I make report of by the waie, for pastimes sake, that when a great man of those parts came of late into one of our ships which went thither for fish, to see the forme and fashion of the same, his wife apparelled in fine sables, abiding on the decke whilest hir husband was vnder the hatches with the mariners, espied a pound or two of candles hanging at the mast, and being loth to stand there idle alone, she fell to and eat them vp euerie one, supposing hir selfe to haue beene at a iollie banket, and shewing verie pleasant gesture when hir husband came vp againe vnto hir.

The last kind of toiesh curs are named dansers, and those being of a mongrell sort also, are taught & exercised to danse in measure at the musicall sound of an instrument, as at the iust stroke of a drum, sweet accent of the citharne, and pleasant harmonie of the harpe, shewing manie trickes by the gesture of their bodies: as to stand bolt vpright, to lie flat vpon the ground, to turne round as a ring, holding their tailes in their teeth, to saw and beg for meat, to take a mans cap from his head, and sundrie such properties, which they learne of their idle rogish maisters whose instruments they are to gather gaine, as old apes clothed in motleie, and coloured short wasted iackets are for the like vagabunds, who seeke no better liuing, than that which they may get by fond pastime and idlenesse. I might here intreat of other dogs, as of those which are bred betweene a bitch and a woolfe, and called Lycisca: a thing verie often seene in France saith Franciscus Patricius in his common wealth, as procured of set purpose, and learned as I thinke of the Indians, who tie these sault bitches often in woods, that they might be lotted by tigers: also betweene a bitch and a fox, or a beare and a mastiffe. But as we reherse want the first that, except they be brought vnto vs: so it happeneth sometime, that the other two are ingendred and seene at home amongst vs. But all the rest heretofore remembred in this chapter, there is none more ougly and odious in sight, cruell and fierce in deed, nor vntractable in hand, than that which is begotten betweene the beare and the bandog. For what soeuer he catcheth hold of, he taketh it so fast, that a man may sooner teare and rend his bodie in sunder, than get open his mouth to separate his chaps. Certes he regardeth neither woolfe, beare, nor lion, and therefore may well be compared with those two dogs which were sent to Alexander out of India (& procreated as it is thought betweene a mastiffe and male tiger, as be those also of Hyrcania) or to them that are bred in Archadia, where copulation is oft seene betweene lions and bitches, as the like is in France (as I said) betweene shee woolfes and dogs, whereof let this suffice; sith the further tractation of them doth not concerne my purpose, more than the constitution of Cardans talke, De subt. lib. 10. who saith, that after manie generations, dogs do become woolfes, and contrariwise; which if it were true, than could not England be without manie woolfes: but nature hath set a difference betweene them, not onelie in outward forme, but also in inward disposition of their bones, wherefore it is impossible that his assertion can be sound.

Of our saffron, and the dressing thereof.

Chap. 8.

AS the saffron of England, which Platina reckneth among spices, is the most excellent of all other: for it giueth place neither to that of Cilicia, whereof Solinus speaketh, neither to anie that commeth from Cilicia, where it groweth vpon the mount Taurus, Tmolus, Italie, Ætolia, Sicilia, or Licia, in sweetnesse, tincture, and continuance; so of that which is to be had amongst vs, the same that grows about Saffron Walden, sometime called Waldenburg, in the edge of Esser, first of all planted there in the time of Edward the third, and that of Glocester shire and those westerlie parts, which some thinke to be better than that of Walden, surmounteth all the rest, and therefore beareth worthilie the higher price, by six pence or twelue pence most commonlie in the pound. The rot of the herbe that beareth this commoditie is round, much like vnto an indifferent chestnut, & yet it is not cloued as the lillie, nor flaked as the scallion, but hath a sad substance Inter bulbosa, as Orchis, hyacinthus orientalis, and Statyrion. The colour of the rind is not much differing from the innermost shell of a chestnut, although it be not altogither so brickle as is the pill of an onion. So long as the leafe florisheth the rot is litle & small; but when the grasse is withered, the head increaseth and multiplieth, the fillets also or small rots die, so that when the time doth come to take them vp, they haue no rots at all, but so continue vntill September that they do grow againe: and before the chiue be grounded the smallest heads are also most esteemed; but whether they be great or small, if sheepe or neat may come to the air on the heape, as they lie in the field, they will deuoure them as if they were haie or stuble, some also will worke for them in verie eger maner. The leafe or rather the blade thereof is long and narrow as grasse, which come vp alwaies in October after the flowres be gathered and gone, pointed on a little fuft much like vnto our cines. Sometimes our carroll will feed vpon the same; neuertheles, if it be bitten whilest it is greene, the head dieth, and therefore our crokers are carefull to keepe it from such attendance vntill it begin to wither, and then also will the carter be neet fast thereof: for vntill that time the iuice thereof is bitter. In euerie flowre we find commonlie three chiues, and three yellowes, and double the number of leaues. Of twisted flowres I speake not; yet is it found, that two flowres grow together, which being both fiue chiues, so that alwaies there is an od chiue and od yellow, though three or foure flowres should come out of one rot. The whole herbe is named in Greeke Crocos, but of some (as Dioscorides saith) Castor, Cynomorphos, or Hercules blood: yet in the Arabian speech, (from whence we borow the name which we giue thereunto) I find that it is called Zahafaran, as Rembert doth beare witnesse. The cause wherefore it was called Crocus was this (as the poets feigne) specially those from whome Galen hath borowed the historie, which he noteth in his ninth booke De medicamentis secundum loca, where he writeth after this maner (although I take Crocus to be the first that vsed this commoditie.) A certeine yong gentleman called Crocus went to plaie at coits in the field with Mercurie, and being heedlesse of himselfe, Mercuries coit happened by mishap to hit him on the head, whereby he receiued a wound that yer long killed him altogither, to the great discomfort of his frends. Finallie, in the place where he bled, saffron was after found to grow, whereupon the people seeing the colour of the chiue as it stood (although I doubt not but it grew there long before) adiudged it to come of the blood of Crocus, and therefore they gaue it his name. And thus farre Rembert, who with Galen, &c: differ very much from Ouids Metamorphos. 4. who writeth also thereof. Indeed the chiue, while it remaineth whole & vnbruised, resembleth a darke red, but being broken and conuerted into vse, it yeeldeth a yellow tincture. But what haue we to do with fables?

Occasion of the name.

Raising.

The heads of saffron are raised in Julie, either with plough, raising, or tined hooke; and being scowred from their rosse or filth, and seuered from such heads as are ingendred of them since the last setting, they are interred againe in Julie and August by ranks or rowes, and being couered with moulds, they rest in the earth, where they cast forth litle fillets and small rots like vnto a scallion, vntill September, in the beginning of which moneth the ground is pared, and all weeds and grasse that groweth vpon the same removed, to the intent that nothing may annoie the flowre when as his time doth come to rise.

Paring.

These things being thus ordered in the latter end of the aforesaid moneth of September, the flowre beginneth to appeare of a whitish blew, resse or skie colour, and in the end shewing it selfe in the owne kind, it resembleth almost the Leucotion of Theophrast, sauing that it is longer, and hath in the middest thereof three chiues verie red and pleasant to behold. These flowres are gathered in the morning before the rising of the sunne, which otherwise would cause them to welke or flitter. And the chiues being picked from the flowres, these are throwne into the downehill; the other dried vpon little kells couered with skreined canuasses vpon a soft fire: wherby, and by the weight that is laied vpon them, they are dried and pressed into cakes, and then bagged vp for the benefit of their owners. In good yeres we gather foure score or an hundred pounds of wet saffron of an acre, which being dried doth yeld twentie pounds of drie and more. Whereby, and sith the price of saffron is commonlie about twentie shillings in monie, or not so little, it is easie to see what benefit is reaped by an acre of this commoditie, towards the charges of the setter, which indeed are great, but yet not so great as he shall be thereby a loser, if he be a nie thing diligent. For admit that the triple tillage of an acre doth cost 13 shillings foure pence before the saffron be set, the clodding sixteene pence, the taking of euerie load of stones from the same foure pence, the raising of euerie quarter of heads six pence, and so much for clensing of them, besides the rent of ten shillings for euerie acre, thirtie load of dung which is worth six pence the load to be laid on the first yeere, for the setting three and twentie shillings and foure pence, for the paring fiue shillings, six pence for the picking of a pound wet, &c: yea though he hire it readie set, and paie ten pounds for the same, yet shall he sustaine no damage, if warme weather and open season do happen at the gathering. This also is to be noted, that euerie acre asketh twentie quarters of heads, placed in ranks two inches one from an other in long beds, which conteine eight or ten foot in breadth. And after three yeres that ground will serue well; and without compest for barleie by the space of eightéene or twentie yéeres togither, as experience doth confirme. The heads also of euerie acre at the raising will store an acre and an halfe of new ground, which is a great aduantage, and it will floure eight or ten daies togither. But the best saffron is gathered at the first; at which time foure pounds of wet saffron will go verie neere to make one of drie; but in the middest fiue pounds of the one will make but one of the other, because the chiue wareth smaller, as six at the last will do no more but yéeld one of the dried, by reason of the chiue which is now verie leane and hungrie. After twentie yeeres also the same ground may be set with saffron againe. And in lieu of a conclusion, take this for a perpetuall rule, that heads comming out of a good ground will prosper best in a lighter soile; and contrariwise: which is one note that our crokers do carefullie obserue.

Occasion of the name.

Raising.

The heads are raised euerie third yeare about vs, to wit, after Midsummer, when the rosse commeth drie from the heads; and commonlie in the first yéere after they be set they yéeld verie little increase: yet that which then commeth is counted the finest and greatest chiue, & best for medicine, and called saffron Du hort. The next crop is much greater; but the third exceedeth, and then they raise againe about Walden and in Cambridge shire. In this period of time also the heads are said to child, that is, to yéeld out of some parts of them diuerse other headlets, whereby it hath béene séene, that some one head hath béene increased (though with his owne detriment) to three, or foure, or fiue, or six, which augmentation is the onlie cause wherby they are sold so good cheape. For to my remembrance I haue not knowne foure bushels or a come of them to be valued much aboue two shillings eight pence, except in some od yéeres that they arise to eight or ten shillings the quarter, and that is when ouer great store of winters water hath rotted the most of them as they stood within the ground, or heat in summer parched and burnt them vp.

Paring.

Gathering.

See Rember.

In Norfolke and Suffolke they raise but once in seuen yéeres: but as their saffron is not so fine as that of Cambridgeshire and about Walden, so it will not cake, ting, nor hold colour withall, wherein lieth a great part of the value of this stuffe. Some craftie iackes vse to mix it with scraped brazell or with the floure of Sonchus, which commeth somewhat neere indeed to the hue of our good saffron (if it be late gathered) but it is soone bewraied both by the depth of the colour and hardnesse. Such also was the plentie of saffron about twentie yeeres passed, that some of the townesmen of Walden gaue the one halfe of the floures for picking of the other, and sent them fro or twelue miles abroad into the countrie, whilest the rest, not thankfull for the abundance of Gods blessing bestowed vpon them (as wishing rather more scarsitie thereof because of the keeping vp of the price) in most contemptuous maner murmured against him, saieng that he did thite saffron therewith to choake the market. But as they shewed themselues no lesse than ingrat infidels in this behalfe, so the Lord considered their vnthankfulnesse, & gaue them euer since such scarsitie, as the greatest murmurers haue now the least store; and most of them are either worne out of occupieng, or remaine scarse able to mainteine their grounds without the helpe of other men. Certes it hath generallie decaied about Saffron Walden since the said time, vntill now of late within these two yeares, that men began againe to plant and renew the same, because of the great commoditie. But to proceed. When the heads be raised and taken vp, they will remaine sixteene or twentie daies out of the earth or more: yea peraduenture a full moneth. Howbeit they are commonlie in the earth againe by saint Iames tide, or verie shortlie after. For as if they be taken vp before Midsummer, or beginning of Iulie, the heads will shrinke like a rosted warden: so after August they will war drie, become vnfruitfull, and decaie. And I know it by experience, in that I haue carried some of them to London with me; and notwithstanding that they haue remained there vnset by the space of forie daies and more: yet some of them haue brought forth two or three floures a peece, and some floures three or fiue chiues, to the greeat admiration of such as haue gathered the same, and not béene acquainted with their nature and countrie where they grew. The crokers or saffron men do vse an obseruation a little before the comming vp of the floure, and sometime in the taking vp at Midsummer tide, by opening of the heads to iudge of plentie and scarsitie of this commoditie to come. For if they sée as it were many small hairie veines of saffron to be in the middest of the bulbe, they pronounce a fruitfull yeare. And to saie truth, at the cleauing of ech head, a man shall discerne the saffron by the colour, and sée where about the chiue will issue out of the rot. Warme darke nights, sweet dews, fat grounds (chéefle the chalkie) and milkie mornings are verie good for saffron; but frost and cold do kill and kéepe backe the floure, or else shrinke vp the chiue. And thus much haue I thought good to speake of English saffron, which is hot in the second and drie in the first degrée, and most plentifull as our crokers hold, in that yéere wherein ewes twin most. But as I can make no warrantize hereof, so I am otherwise sure, that there is no more deceit vsed in anie trade than in saffron. For in the making they will grease the papers on the kell with a little candle grease, to make the worst saffron haue so good a colour as the best: afterwards also they will sprinkle butter thereon to make the weight better. But both these are bewraied, either by a quantitie thereof holden ouer the fire in a siluer spoone, or by the softnesse thereof betweene the fore finger and the thumbe; or shirtlie, by the colour thereof in age: for if you laie it by farre worſe ſaffron of other countries, the colour will bewraie the forgerie by the ſwartneſſe of the chiue, which otherwiſe would excell it, and therevnto being ſound, remaine criſpe, brickle, and drie: and finallie, if it be holden neere the face, will ſtrike a certeine biting heat vpon the ſkin and eies, whereby it is adiudged good and merchant ware indeed among the ſkilfull crokers.

Now if it pleaſe you to heare of anie of the vertues thereof, I will note theſe inſuing at the requeſt of one, who required me to touch a few of them with whatſoeuer breuitie I liſted. Therefore our ſaffron (beſide the manifold vſe that it hath in the kitchin and paſtrie, alſo in our cakes at bridals, and thankſgiuings of women) is verie profitably mingled with thoſe medicins which we take for the diſeaſes of the breaſt, of the lungs, of the liuer, and of the bladder: it is good alſo for the ſtomach if you take it in meat, for it comforteth the ſame and maketh good digeſtion: being ſodden alſo in wine, it not onelie keepeth a man from drunkenneſſe, but incourageth alſo vnto procreation of iſſue. If you drinke it in ſweet wine, it inlargeth the breath, and is good for thoſe that are troubled with the tiſike and ſhortneſſe of the wind: mingled with the milke of a woman, and laied vpon the eies, it ſtaieth ſuch humors as deſcend into the ſame, and taketh awaie the red wheales and pearles that oft grow about them: it killeth moths if it be ſowed in paper bags verie thin, and laid vp in preſſes amongſt tapiſtrie or apparell: alſo it is verie profitable laid vnto all inflammations, painefull apoſthumes, and the chingles; and doth no ſmall eaſe vnto deafnes, if it be mingled with ſuch medicins as are beneficiall vnto the eares: it is of great vſe alſo in ripening of botches and all ſwellings proceeding of raw humors. Or if it ſhall pleaſe you to drinke the root thereof with maluaſie, it will marueilouſlie prouoke vrine, diſſolue and expell grauell, and yeeld no ſmall eaſe to them that make their water by dropmeales. Finallie, three drams thereof taken at once, which is about the weight of one ſhilling nine pence halfepenie, is deadlie poiſon; as Dioſcorides doth affirme: and drunke in wine (ſaith Platina) lib. 3. cap. 13. De honeſta voluptate, doth haſt on drunkenneſſe, which is verie true. And I haue knowne ſome, that by eating onelie of bread more than of cuſtome ſtreined with ſaffron, haue become like drunken men, & yet otherwiſe well known to be but competent drinkers. For further confirmation of this alſo, if a man doo but open and ranſake a bag of one hundred or two hundred weight, as merchants doo when they buie it of the crokers, it will ſtrike ſuch an aire into their heads which deale withall, that for a time they ſhall be giddie and ſicke (I meane for two or three houres ſpace) their noſes and eies in like ſort will yeeld ſuch plentie of rheumatike water, that they ſhall be the better for it long after, eſpeciallie their eieſight, which is wonderfullie clarified by this meanes: howbeit ſome merchants not liking of this phyſike, muffle themſelues as women doo when they ride, and put on ſpectacles ſet in leather, which doth in ſome meaſure (but not for altogither) put by the force thereof. There groweth ſome ſaffron in manie places of Almaine, and alſo about Vienna in Auſtria, which later is taken for the beſt that ſpringeth in thoſe quarters. In ſtead of this ſome doo vſe the Carthamus, called amongſt vs baſtard ſaffron, but neither is this of anie value, nor the other in anie wiſe comparable vnto ours. Whereof let this ſuffice as of a commoditie brought into this Iland in the time of Edward 3. and not commonlie planted till Richard 2. did reigne. It would grow verie well (as I take it) about the Chiltern hils, & in all the valle of the White horſſe ſo well as in Walden and Cambridgeſhire, if they were carefull of it. I heare of ſome alſo to be cheriſhed alreadie in Glocеſterſhire, and certeine other places weſtward. But of the fineneſſe and tincture of the chiue, I heare not as yet of anie triall. Would to God that my countriemen had beene heretofore (or were now) more carefull of this commoditie! then would it no doubt haue prouided more beneficiall to our Iland than our cloth or woll. But alas! ſo idle are we; and heretofore ſo much giuen to eaſe, by reaſon of the ſmalneſſe of our rents, that few men regard to ſearch out which are their beſt commodities. But if landlords hold on to raiſe the rents of their farms as they begin, they will inforce their tenants to looke better vnto their gains, and ſcratch out their rent from vnder euerie clod that may be turned aſide. The greateſt mart for ſaffron is at Aquila in Abruzo, where they haue an eſpeciall weight for the ſame of ten pounds leſſe in the hundred than that of Florens and Venice: but how it agreeth with ours it ſhall appeare hereafter.

Of quarries of ſtone for building.

Chap. 9.

Quarries with vs are pits or mines, out of which we dig our ſtone to build withall, & of theſe as we haue great plentie in England, ſo are they of diuerſe ſorts, and thoſe verie profitable for ſundrie neceſſarie vſes. In times paſt the vſe of ſtone was in maner dedicated to the building of churches, religious houſes, princely palaces, biſhops manours, and holds onlie: but now that ſcrupulous obſeruation is altogither infringed, and building with ſtone ſo commonlie taken vp, that amongſt noble men & gentlemen, the timber frames are ſuppoſed to be not much better than paper worke, of little continuance, and leaſt continuance of all. It farre paſſeth my cunning to ſet downe how manie ſorts of ſtone for building are to be found in England, but much further to call each of them by their proper names. Howbeit, ſuch is the curioſitie of our countrimen, that notwithſtanding almightie God hath ſo bleſſed our realme in moſt plentifull maner, with ſuch and ſo manie quarries apt and meet for piles of longeſt continuance, yet we as lothſome of this abundance, or not liking of the plentie, doo commonlie leaue theſe naturall gifts to mould and cinder in the ground, and take vp an artificiall bricke, in burning whereof a great part of the wood of this land is dailie conſumed and ſpent, to the no ſmall decaie of that commoditie, and hinderance of the poore that periſh oft for cold.

Our elders haue from time to time, following our naturall vice in miſliking of our owne commodities at home, and deſiring thoſe of other countries abroad, moſt eſteemed the cane ſtone that is brought hither out of Normandie: and manie euen in theſe our daies following the ſame veine, doo couet in their works almoſt to vſe none other. Howbeit experience on the one ſide, and our ſkilfull maſons on the other (whoſe iudgement is nothing inferiour to thoſe of other countries) doo affirme, that in the north and ſouth parts of England, and certeine other places, there are ſome quarries, which for hardneſſe and beautie are equall to the outlandiſh greet. This maie alſo be confirmed by the kings chappell at Cambridge, the greateſt part of the ſquare ſtone wherof was brought thither out of the north. Some commend the veine of white free ſtone, ſlate, and more ſtone, which is betweene twéne Pentowen, and the blacke head in Cornewall, for verie fine ſtuffe. Other doo ſpeake much of the quarries at Hamden, nine miles from Milberie, and paving ſtone of Burbecke. For toph ſtone, not a few allow of the quarrie that is at Dzeſleie, diuerſe miſlike not of the veines of hard ſtone that are at Drford, and Burford. One praiſeth the free ſtone at Hanchelter, & Peſtburie in Glocelterſhire; another the quarries of the like in Richmont. The third liketh well of the hard ſtone in Cloe hill in Shropſhire; the fourth of that of Thorowbridge, Welden, and Terrinton. Whereby it appeareth that we haue quarries inow, and good inough in England, ſufficient for vs to build withall, if the peeuiſh contempt of our owne commodities, and delectations to inrich other countries, did not catch ſuch foliſh hold vpon vs. It is alſo verified (as anie other waie) that all nations haue rather need of England, than England of anie other. And this I thinke may ſuffice for the ſubſtance of our works. Now if you haue regard to their ornature, how manie mines of ſundrie kinds of courſe & fine marble are there to be had in England? But chiefflie one in Staffordſhire, an other neere to the Peke, the third at Vauldrie, the fourth at Snothill (longing to the lord Chaindois) the fift at Egleſtone, which is of blacke marble, ſpotted with graie or white ſpots, the firſt not farre from Durham. Of white marble alſo we haue ſtore, and ſo faire as the Parpelian of Paris Ile. But what meane I to go about to recite all, or the moſt excellent? ſith theſe which I haue named alredie are not altogither of the beſt, nor ſcarſelie of anie value in compariſon of thoſe, whoſe places of growth are vtterlie vnknowne vnto me, and whereof the blacke marble ſpotted with greene is none of the vileſt ſort, as maie appeare by parcell of the pauement of the lower part of the quire of Paules in London, and alſo in Weſtminſter, where ſome peeces thereof are yet to be ſeene and marked, if anie will looke for them. If marble will not ſerue, then haue we the fineſt alabaſter that maie elſewhere bee had, as about ſaint Dauids of Wales; alſo neere to Beau manour, which is about foure or fiue miles from Leiceſter, & taken to be the beſt, although there are diuerſe other quarries hereof beyond the Trent, as in Yorkeſhire, &c: and ſullie ſo good as that, whoſe names at this time are out of my remembrance. What ſhould I talke of the plaiſter of Arholme (for of that which they dig out of the earth in ſundrie places of Lincolne and Darbiſhires, wherewith they blanch their houſes in ſtead of lime, I ſpeake not) certes it is a fine kind of alabaſter. But ſith it is ſold commonlie but after twelue pence the load, we iudge it to be but vile and courſe. For my part I cannot skill of ſtone, yet in my opinion it is not without great vſe for plaiſter of paris, and ſuch is the nature of it, that the ſtones thereof lie in flakes one vpon an other like plankes or tables, and vnder the ſame is an exceeding hard ſtone verie profitable for building, as hath often times beene proued. This is alſo to be marked further of our plaiſter white and graie, that not contented with the ſame, as God by the quarrie doth ſend and yéeld it forth, we haue now deuiſed to caſt it in moulds for windowes and pillers of what forme and faſhion we liſt, euen as alabaſter it ſelfe: and with ſuch ſtuffe ſundrie houſes in Yorkſhire are furniſhed of late. But of what continuance this deuiſe is like to proue, the time to come ſhall eaſilie bewraie. In the meane time ſir Rafe Burcher knight hath put the deuiſe in practiſe, and affirmeth that ſir men in ſir moneths ſhall trauell in that trade to ſée greater profit to the owner, than twelue men in ſix yeares could before this tricke was inuented.

If neither alabaſter nor marble doth ſuffice, we haue the touchſtone, called in Latine Lydius lapis, ſhining as glaſſe, either to match in ſockets with our pillers of alabaſter, or contrariwiſe: or if it pleaſe the workeman to ioine pillers of alabaſter or touch with ſockets of braſſe, pewter, or copper, we want not alſo theſe mettals. So that I think no nation can haue more excellent & greater diuerſitie of ſtuffe for building, than we maie haue in England, if our ſelues could ſo like of it. But ſuch alas is our nature, that not our own but other mens do moſt of all delite vs; & for deſire of noueltie, we oft exchange our fineſt cloth, corne, tin, and woolles, for halfe penie cockhorſſes for children, dogs of wax or of cheſs, two pennie tabers, leaden ſwords, painted feathers, gewgaws for fooles, dogtricks for diſards, hawkeſwhoods, and ſuch like trumperie, whereby we reape ſuſt mockage and reproch in other countries. I might remember here our pits for millſtones, that are to be had in diuerſe places of our countrie, as in Angleſeie, Kent, alſo at Queene hope of blew greet, of no leſſe value than the Colaine, yea than the French ſtones: our grindſtones for hardware men. Our whetſtones are no leſſe laudable than thoſe of Creta & Lacedemonia, albeit we vſe no oile with them, as they did in thoſe parties, but onelie water, as the Italians and Marians do with theirs: whereas they that grow in Cilicia muſt haue both oile and water laid vpon them, or elſe they make no edge. Theſe alſo are diuided either into the hard greet, as the common that ſhomakers vſe, or the ſoft greet called hones, to be had among the barbars, and thoſe either blacke or white, and the rub or brickle ſtone which huſbandmen do occupie in the whetting of their ſithes.

In like maner ſlate of ſundrie colours is euerie where in maner to be had, as is the flint and chalke, the ſhalder and the peble. Howbeit for all this wee muſt fetch them ſtill from farre, as did the Hull men their ſtones out of Iſeland, wherewith they paued their towne for want of the like in England: or as ſir Thomas Greſham did, when he bought the ſtones in Flanders, wherwith he paued the Burſe. But as he will anſwer peraduenture, that he bargained for the whole mould and ſubſtance of his workemanſhip in Flanders: ſo the Hullanders or Hull men will ſaie, how that ſtockefiſh is light loding, and therfore they did balaſſe their veſſels with theſe Iſeland ſtones, to keepe them from turning ouer in their ſo tedious a voiage. And thus much briefflie of our quarries of ſtone for building, wherein oftentimes the workemen haue found ſtrange things incloſed, I meane liuelie creatures ſhut vp in the hard ſtones, and liuing there without reſpiration or breathing, as frogs, todes, &c: whereof you ſhall read more in the chronologie following: alſo in Caius Langius, William of Newburie, Agricola, Cornelius of Amſterdam, Bellogius de aquatilibus, Albert the great, lib. 19. cap. 9. De rebus metallicis, and Goropius in Niloſcopio, pag. 237, &c. Sometime alſo they find pretious ſtones (though ſeldome) and ſome of them perfectlie ſquared by nature, and much like vnto the diamond, found of late in a quarrie of marble at Naples, which was ſo perfectlie pointed, as if all the workemen in the world had cõſulted about the performance of that workemanſhip. I know that theſe reports vnto ſome will ſéeme incredible, and therefore I ſtand the longer vpon them; neuertheleſſe omitting to ſpeake particularlie of ſuch things as happen amongſt vs, and rather ſéeking to confirme the ſame by the like in other countries, I will deliuer a few more examples, whereby the truth hereof ſhall ſo much the better appeare. For in the middeſt of a ſtone not long ſince found at Chius, vpon the breaking vp thereof, there was ſeene Caput paniſci incloſed therin, very perfectlie formed as the beholders do remember. How come the grains of gold to be ſo faſt incloſed in the ſtones that are & haue bœne found in the Spaniſh Batis? But this is moſt maruellous, that a moſt delectable and ſweet oile, comparable to the fineſt balme, or oile of ſpike in ſmell, was found naturallie included in a ſtone, which could not otherwiſe be broken but with a ſmiths hammer. Goropius doth tell of a pearch perfectlie formed to be found in Britaine: but as then committed into hard ſtone, vpon the top of a crag. Ariſtotle and Theophraſt ſpeake of fiſhes digged out of the earth, farre from the ſea in Græece, which Seneca alſo confirmeth, but with addition that they are perillous to be eaten. In pope Martins time, a ſerpent was found faſt incloſed in a rocke, as the kernell is within the nut, ſo that no aire could come to it: and in my time another in a coffin of ſtone at Auignion, wherein a man had bœne buried, which ſo filled the rome, and laie ſo cloſe from aire, that all men wondered how it was poſſible for the ſame to liue and continue ſo long time there. Finallie I my ſelfe haue ſœns ſtones opened, and within them the ſubſtances of corrupted wormes like vnto adders (but far ſhorter) whoſe creſts and wrinkles of bodie appeared alſo therein, as if they had bene ingraued in the ſtones by art and induſtrie of man. Wherefore to affirme, that as well liuing creatures, as pretious ſtones, gold, &c: are now and then found in our quarries, ſhall not hereafter be a thing ſo incredible as manie talking philoſophers, void of all experience, do affirme, and wilfullie mainteine againſt ſuch as hold the contrarie.

Of ſundrie minerals.

Chap. 10.

WIth how great benefits this Iland of ours hath bœne indued from the beginning, I hope there is no godlie man but will readilie confeſſe, and yeeld vnto the Lord God his due honour for the ſame. For we are bleſſed euerie waie, & there is no temporall commoditie neceſſarie to be had or craued by anie nation at Gods hand, that he hath not in moſt aboundant maner beſtowed vpon vs Engliſhmen, if we could ſee to vſe it, & be thankefull for the ſame. But alas (as I ſaid in the chapter precedent) we loue to inrich them that care not for vs, but for our great commodities: and one trifling toie not worth the cariage, cõming (as the prouerbe ſaith) in three ſhips from beyond the ſea is more worth with vs, than a right good iewell, eaſie to be had at home. They haue alſo the caſt to teach vs to neglect our owne things, for if they ſee that we begin to make anie account of our commodities (if it be ſo that they haue alſo the like in their owne countries) they will ſuddenlie abaſe the ſame to ſo low a price, that our gaine not being worthie our trauell, and the ſame commoditie with leſſe coſt readie to be had at home from other countries (though but for a while) it cauſeth vs to giue ouer our indeuours, and as it were by and by to forget the matter wherabout we went before, to obteine them at their hands. And this is the onelie cauſe wherefore our commodities are oft ſo little eſteemed of. Some of them can ſaie without anie teacher, that they will buie the caſe of a fox of an Engliſhman for a groat, and make him afterward giue twelue pence for the taile. Would to God we might once wax wiſer, and each one indeuor that the common-wealth of England may flouriſh againe in hir old rate, and that our commodities may be fullie wrought at home (as cloth if you will for an example) and not caried out to be ſhorne and dreſſed abroad, while our clothworkers here do ſtarue and beg their bread, and for lacke of dailie practiſe vtterlie neglect to be ſkilfull in this ſcience! But to my purpoſe.

We haue in England great plentie of quicke ſiluer, antimonie, ſulphur, blacke lead, and orpiment red and yellow. We haue alſo the fineſt alume (wherein the diligence of one of the greateſt fauourers of the common-wealth of England of a ſubiect hath bœne of late egregiouſlie abuſed, and euen almoſt with barbarous inciuilitie) & of no leſſe force againſt fire, if it were vſed in our parietings than that of Lipara, which onlie was in vſe ſomtime amongſt the Aſians & Romans, & wherof Sylla had ſuch triall that when he meant to haue burned a tower of wood erected by Archelaus the lieutenant of Mithridates, he could by no meanes ſet it on fire in a long time, becauſe it was waſhed ouer with alume, as were alſo the gates of the temple of Jeruſalem with like effect, and perceiued when Titus commanded fire to be put vnto the ſame. Beſide this we haue alſo the naturall cinnabarum or vermilion, the ſulphurous glebe called bitumen in old time for morter, and yet burned in lamps where oile is ſcant and geaſon: the chryſocolla, coperis, and minerall ſtone, whereof petriolum is made, and that which is moſt ſtrange the minerall pearle, which as they are for greatneſſe and colour moſt excellent of all other, ſo are they digged out of the maine land, and in ſundrie places far diſtant from the ſhore. Certes the weſterne part of the land hath in times paſt greatlie abounded with theſe and manie other rare and excellent commodities, but now they are waſhed awaie by the violence of the ſea, which hath deuoured the greateſt part of Cornewall and Deuonſhire on either ſide: and it doth appeare yet by good record, that whereas now there is a great diſtance betweene the Sylian Iles and point of the lands end, there was of late yeares to ſpeke of ſcarſelie a broke or draine of one fadam water betweene them, if ſo much, as by thoſe euidences appeareth, and are yet to be ſeene in the hands of the lord and chiefe owner of thoſe Iles. But to proceed.

The lord Wynning.

Of colemines we haue ſuch plentie in the north and weſterne parts of our Iland, as may ſuffice for all the realme of England: and ſo muſt they do hereafter in deed, if wood be not better cherriſhed than it is at this preſent. And to ſaie the truth, notwithſtanding that verie manie of them are caried into other countries of the maine, yet their greateſt trade beginneth now to grow from the forge into the kitchin and hall, as may appeare alreadie in moſt cities and townes that lie about the coaſt, where they haue but little other fewell, except it be turffe and haſſocke. I maruell not a little that there is no trade of theſe into Suſſex and Southhampton ſhire, for want whereof the ſmiths do worke their iron with charcoale. I thinke that far carriage be the onelie cauſe, which is but a ſlender excuſe to inforce vs to carrie them vnto the maine from hence.

Gold. Siluer.

Beſide our colemines we haue pits in like ſort of white plaſter, and of fat and white and other coloured marle, wherewith in manie places the inhabitors do compoſt their ſoile, and which doth benefit their land in ample maner for manie yeares to come. We haue ſaltpeter for our ordinance, and ſalt ſoda for our glaſſe, & thereto in one place a kind of earth (in Southerie as I weene hard by Codington, and ſometime in the tenure of one Croxton of London) which is ſo fine to make moulds for goldſmiths and caſters of mettall, that a load of it was worth fiue ſhillings thirtie yeares agone: none ſuch againe they ſaie in England. But whether there be or not, let vs not be vnthankefull to God for theſe and other his benefits

beſtowed

beſtowed vpon vs, whereby he ſheweth himſelfe a louing and mercifull father vnto vs, which contrariewiſe returne vnto him in lieu of humilitie and obedience, nothing but wickednelle, auarice, mere contempt of his will, pride, exceſſe, atheiſme, and no leſſe than Iewiſh ingratitude.

Of mettals to be had in our land.

Chap. 11.

ALl mettals receiue their beginning of quickſiluer and ſulphur, which are as mother and father to them. And ſuch is the purpoſe of nature in their generations: that ſhe tendeth alwaies to the procreation of gold, neuertheleſſe ſhe ſildome reacheth vnto that hir end, becauſe of the vnequall mixture and proportion of theſe two in the ſubſtance ingendered, whereby impediment and corruption is induced, which as it is more or leſſe, doth ſhew it ſelfe in the mettall that is produced. Firſt of all therefore the ſubſtance of ſulphur and quickſiluer being mixed in due proportion, after long and temperate decoction in the bowels of the earth, orderlie ingroſſed and fired, becommeth gold, which Encelius doth call the ſunne and right heire of nature: but if it ſwarue but a little (ſaith he) in the commixtion and other circumſtances, then doth it product ſiluer the daughter, not ſo noble a child as gold hir brother, which among mettall is worthilie called the chæſe. Contrariwiſe, the ſubſtances of the aforeſaid parents mixed without proportion, and leſſe digeſted and fired in the entrailes of the earth, whereby the radicall moiſture becommeth combuſtible and not of force to indure heat and hammer, doth either turne into tin, lead, copper, or iron, which were the firſt mettals knowne in time paſt vnto antiquitie, although that in theſe daies there are diuerſe other, whereof neither they nor our alchumiſts had euer ante knowledge. Of theſe therfore which are reputed among the third ſort, we here in England haue our parts, and as I call them to mind, ſo will I intreat of them, and with ſuch breuitie as may ſerue the turne, and yet not altogither omit to ſaie ſomewhat of gold and ſiluer alſo, becauſe I find by good experience how it was not ſaid of old time without great reaſon, that all countries haue need of Britaine, and Britaine it ſelfe of none. For truelie if a man regard ſuch neceſſities as nature onelie requireth, there is no nation vnder the ſunne, that can ſaie ſo much as ours: ſith we do want none that are conuenient for vs. Wherefore if it be a benefit to haue anie gold at all, we are not void of ſome, neither likewiſe of ſiluer: what ſoeuer Cicero affirmeth to the contrarie, Lib. 4. ad Atticum epi. 16. in whoſe time they were not found, Britannici belli exitus (ſaith he) expectatur; conſtat enim aditus inſulæ eſſe munitos mirificis molibus: etiam illud iam cognitum eſt, neque argenti ſcrupulum eſſe vllum in illa inſula, neque vllam ſpem prædæ niſi ex mancipijs, ex quibus nullos puto te litteris aut muſicis eruditos expectare. And albeit that we haue no ſuch abundance of theſe (as ſome other countries do yeeld) yet haue my rich countrimen ſtore inough of both in their purſſes, where in time paſt they were wont to haue leaſt, becauſe the garniſhing of our churches, tabernacles, images, ſhrines and apparell of the prieſts conſumed the greateſt part, as experience hath confirmed.

Of late my countriemen haue found out I wot not what voiage into the weſt Indies, from whence they haue brought ſome gold, whereby our countrie is inriched: but of all that euer aduentured into thoſe parts, none haue ſped better than ſir Francis Drake whoſe ſucceſſe 1582 hath far paſſed euen his owne expectation. One Iohn Frobiſher in like maner attempting to ſeeke out a ſhorter cut by the northerlie regions into the peaceable ſea and kingdome of Cathaie, happened 1577 vpon certeine Ilands by the waie, wherein great plentie of much gold appeared, and ſo much that ſome letted not to giue out for certeintie, that Salomon had his gold from thence, wherewith he builded the temple. This golden ſhew made him ſo deſirous alſo of like ſucceſſe, that he left off his former voiage, & returned home to bring newes of ſuch things as he had ſeene. But when after another voiage it was found to be but droſſe, he gaue ouer both the enterprizes, and now keepeth home without anie deſire at all to ſeeke into farre countries. In truth, ſuch was the plentie of ore there ſeene and to be had, that if it had holden perfect, might haue furniſhed all the world with abundance of that mettall; the forneie alſo was ſhort and performed in foure or fiue moneths, which was a notable incouragement. But to proceed.

Tin and lead, mettals which Strabo noteth in his time to be carried vnto Marſilis from hence, as Diodorus alſo confirmeth, are verie plentifull with vs, the one in Cornewall, Deuonſhire (& elſe-where in in the north) the other in Darbiſhire, Weredale, and ſundrie places of this Iland; whereby my countriemen do reape no ſmall commoditie, but eſpeciallie our pewterers, who in time paſt imploied the vſe of pewter onelie vpon diſhes, pots, and a few other trifles for ſeruice here at home, whereas now they are growne vnto ſuch exquiſit cunning, that they can in maner imitate by infuſion ante forme or faſhion of cup, diſh, ſalt, bowle, or goblet, which is made by goldſmiths craft, though they be neuer ſo curious, exquiſite, and artificiallie forged. Such furniture of houſhold of this mettall, as we commonlie call by the name of veſſell, is ſold vſuallie by the garniſh, which doth conteine twelue platters, twelue diſhes, twelue ſaucers, and thoſe are either of ſiluer faſhion, or elſe with brode or narrow brims, and bought by the pound, which is now valued at ſix or ſeuen pence, or peraduenture at eight pence. Of porringers, pots, and other like I ſpeake not, albeit that in the making of all theſe things there is ſuch exquiſite diligence vſed, I meane for the mixture of the mettall and true making of this commoditie (by reaſon of ſharpe laws prouided in that behalfe) as the like is not to be found in any other trade. I haue beene alſo informed that it conſiſteth of a compoſition, which hath thirtie pounds of kettle braſſe to a thouſand pounds of tin, whervnto they ad three or foure pounds of tinglaſſe: but as too much of this doth make the ſtuffe brickle, ſo the more the braſſe be, the better is the pewter, and more profitable vnto him that doth buie and purchaſe the ſame. But to proceed.

In ſome places beyond the ſea a garniſh of good flat Engliſh pewter of an ordinarie making (I ſaie flat, becauſe diſhes and platters in my time begin to be made deepe like baſons, and are indeed more conuenient both for ſawce, broth, and keeping the meat warme) is eſteemed almoſt ſo pretious, as the like number of veſſels that are made of fine ſiluer, and in maner no leſſe deſired amongſt the great eſtates, whoſe workmen are nothing ſo ſkilfull in that trade as ours, neither their mettall ſo good, nor plentie ſo great, as we haue here in England. The Romans made excellent looking glaſſes of our Engliſh tin, howbeit our workemen were not then ſo equiſite in that feat as the Brunduſiens: wherefore the wrought mettall was carried ouer vnto them by waie of merchandize, and verie highlie were thoſe glaſſes eſteemed of till ſiluer came generallie in place, which in the end brought the tin into ſuch contempt, that in manner euerie diſhwaſher refuſed to looke in other than ſiluer glaſſes for the attiring of hir head. Howbeit the making of ſiluer glaſſes had beene in vſe before Britaine was knowne vnto the Romans, for I read that one Pyrrikles deuiſed them in the yong time of Pompeie, which was before the comming of Cæſar into this Iland.

There were mines of lead ſometimes alſo in Wales, which indured ſo long till the people had conſumed all their wood by melting of the ſame (as they did alſo at Comerill with ſir miles from Stradfleur) and I ſuppoſe that in Plinies time the abundance of lead (whereof he ſpeaketh) was to be found in thoſe parts, in the ſeauenteenth of his thirtie fourth booke: alſo he affirmeth that it laie in the verie ſwart of the earth, and dailie gotten in ſuch plentie, that the Romans made a reſtraint of the cariage thereof to Rome, limiting how much ſhould yearelie be wrought and tranſported ouer the ſea. And here by the waie it is worthie to be noted, of a crow which a miner of tin, dwelling neere Comerill with (as Leland ſaith) had made ſo tame, that it would dailie flie and follow him to his worke and other places where ſoeuer he happened to trauell. This labourer working on a time in the bottome or vallie, where the firſt mine was knowne to be, did laie his purſſe and girdle by him, as men commonlie doo that addreſſe themſelues to aplie their buſineſſe earneſtlie, and he himſelfe alſo had vſed from time to time before. The crow likewiſe was verie buſie flittering about him, and ſo much moleſted him, that he waxed angrie with the bird, & in his furie threatened to wring off his necke, if he might once get him into his hands; to be ſhort, in the end the crow haſtilie caught vp his girdle and purſſe, and made awaie withall ſo faſt as hir wings could carrie hir. Heere vpon the poore man falling into great agonie (for he feared to loſe peraduenture all his monie) threw downe his mattocke at aduenture and ran after the bird, curſſing and menacing that he ſhould loſe his life if euer he got him againe: but as it fell out, the crow was the meanes whereby his life was ſaued, for he had not beene long out of the mine, yer it fell downe and killed all his fellowes. If I ſhould take vpon me to diſcourſe and ſearch out the cauſe of the thus dealing of this bird at large, I ſhould peraduenture ſet my ſelfe further into the briers than well find which waie to come out againe: yet am I perſuaded, that the crow was Gods inſtrument herein, whereby the life of this poore labourer was preſerued. It was done alſo in an other order than that which I read of another tame crow, kept vp by a ſhomaker of Dutch land in his ſhop or ſtoue: who ſeeing the ſame to ſit vpon the pearch among his ſhone, verie beautie and drouſie, ſaid vnto the bird: What aileth my iacke, thie art thou ſad and penſiue? The crow hearing his maiſter ſpeake after this ſort vnto him, anſwered (or elſe the diuell within him) out of the pſalter: Cogitaui dies antiquos & æternos in mente habui. But whither am I digreſſed, from lead vnto crowes, & from crowes vnto diuels? Certes it is now high time to returne vnto our mettals, and reſume the tractation of ſuch things as I had earſt in hand.

Iron. Iron is found in manie places, as in Suſſex, Kent, Weredale, Mendip, Walchall, as alſo in Shropſhire, but cheeflie in the woods betwixt Welnos and Willocke or Wicberie neere Manchester, and elſewhere in Wales. Of which mines diuerſe doo bring forth ſo fine and good ſtuffe, as anie that commeth from beyond the ſea, beſide the infinit gaines to the owners, if we would ſo accept it, or beſtow a little more coſt in the refining of it. It is alſo of ſuch toughneſſe, that it yeeldeth to the making of clericord wire in ſome places of the realme. Neuertheleſſe, it was better cheape with vs when ſtrangers onelie brought it hither: for it is our qualitie when we get anie commoditie, to vſe it with extremitie towards our owne nation, after we haue once found the meanes to ſhut out forreners from the bringing in of the like. It breedeth in like manner great expenſe and waſte of wood, as doth the making of our pots and table veſſell of glaſſe, wherein is much loſſe ſith it is ſo quicklie broken; and yet (as I thinke) ceaſſe to be made tougher, if our alchumiſts could once find the true birth or production of the red man, whoſe mixture would indure a metallicall toughneſſe vnto it, whereby it ſhould abide the hammer.

Copper is latelie not found, but rather reſtored againe to light. For I haue read of copper to haue beene heretofore gotten in our Iland; howbeit as ſtrangers haue moſt commonly the gouernance of our mines, ſo they hitherto make ſmall gaines of this in hand in the north parts: for (as I am informed) the profit doth verie hardlie countervaile the charges; whereat wiſe men doo not a little marueil, conſidering the abundance which that mine doth ſeeme to offer, and as it were at hand. Leland our countrieman noteth ſundrie great likelihoods of naturall copper mines to be eaſtwards, as betweene Dudman and Trewardth in the ſea cliffes, beſide other places, whereof diuerſe are noted here and there in ſundrie places of this booke alreadie, and therefore it ſhall be but in vaine to repeat them here againe: as for that which is gotten out of the marchaſite, I ſpeake not of it, ſith it is not incident to my purpoſe. In Dorſetſhire alſo a copper mine latelie found is brought to good perfection.

Steele. As for our ſteele, it is not ſo good for edge-tooles as that of Colaine, and yet the one is often ſold for the other, and like tale vſed in both, that is to ſaie, thirtie gads to the ſheffe, and twelue ſheffes to the burden. Our alchumie is artificiall, and thereof our ſpoones and ſome ſalts are commonlie made, and preferred before our pewter with ſome, albeit in truth it be much ſubiect to corruption, putrifaction, more heauie and foule to handle than our pewter; yet ſome ignorant perſons affirme it to be a mettall more naturall, and the verie ſame which Encelius calleth Plumbum cinereum, the Germans, wiſemute, mithan, & counterfeie, adding, that where it groweth, ſiluer can not be farre off. Neuertheleſſe it is knowne to be a mixture of braſſe, lead, and tin (of which this latter occupieth the one halfe) but after another proportion than is vſed in pewter. But alas I am perſuaded that neither the old Arabians, nor new alchumiſts of our time did euer heare of it, albeit that the name thereof doo ſeeme to come out of their forge. For the common ſort indeed doo call it alchumie, an vnwholſome mettall (God wot) and worthie to be baniſhed and driuen out of the land. And thus I conclude with this diſcourſe, as hauing no more to ſaie of the mettals of my countrie, except I ſhould talke of braſſe, bell mettall, and ſuch as are brought ouer for merchandize from other countries: and yet I can not but ſaie that there is ſome braſſe found alſo in England, but ſo ſmall is the quantitie, that it is not greatlie to be eſteemed or accounted of.

Of

Of pretious stones.

Chap. 12.

THe old writers remember few other stones of estimation to be found in this Iland than that which we call geat, and they in Latine Gagates: whereunto furthermore they ascribe sundrie properties, as vsuallie practised here in times past, whereof none of our writers do make anie mention at all. Howbeit what soeuer it hath pleased a number of strangers (vpon false surmise) to write of the vsages of this our countrie, about the triall of the virginitie of our maidens by drinking the powder hereof against the time of their bestowing in marriage: certeine it is that euen to this daie there is some plentie to be had of this commoditie in Darbishire and about Barwike, whereof rings, salts, small cups, and sundrie trifling toies are made, although that in manie mens opinions nothing so fine as that which is brought ouer by merchants dailie from the maine. But as these men are drowned with the common errour conceiued of our nation, so I am sure that in discerning the price and value of things, no man now liuing can go beyond the iudgement of the old Romans, who preferred the geat of Britaine before the like stones bred about Luke and all other countries whersoeuer. Marbodeus Gallus also writing of the same among other of estimation, saith thus:

Nascitur in Lycia lapis & prope gemma Gagates,
Sed genus eximium fœcunda Britannia mittit,
Lucidus & niger est, leuis & leuissimus idem,
Vicinas paleas trahit attritu calefactus,
Ardet aqua lotus, restinguitur vnctus olivo.

The Germane writers confound it with amber as if it were a kind therof: but as I regard not their iudgement in this point, so I read that it taketh name of Gagas a citie and riuer in Silicia, where it groweth in plentifull maner, as Dioscorides saith. Nicander in Theriaca calleth it Engangin and Gangitin, of the plentie thereof that is found in the place aforesaid, which he calleth Ganges, and where they haue great vse of it in driuing away of serpents by the onelie perfume thereof. Charles the fourth emperour of that name glased the church withall that standeth at the fall of Tangra, but I cannot imagine what light should enter therby. The writers also diuide this stone into fiue kinds, of which the one is in colour like vnto lion tawnie, another straked with white veines, the third with yellow lines, the fourth is garled with diuerse colours, among which some are like drops of blood (but those come out of Inde) and the fift shining blacke as anie rauens feather.

Moreouer, as geat was one of the first stones of this Ile, whereof anie forren account was made, so our pearles also did match with it in renowme: in so much that the onelie desire of them caused Cæsar to aduenture hither, after he had seene the quantities and heard of our plentie of them, while he abode in France, and whereof he made a taberd which he offered vp in Rome to Venus, where it hong long after as a rich and notable oblation and testimonie of the riches of our countrie. Certes they are to be found in these our daies, and thereto of diuerse colours, in no lesse numbers than euer they were in old time. Yet are they not now so much desired bicause of their smalnesse, and also for other causes, but especiallie sith church worke, as copes, vestments, albes, tunicles, altarclothes, canopies, and such trash, are worthilie abolished; vpon which our countrimen superstitiously bestowed no small quantities of them. For I thinke there were few churches or religious houses, besides bishops miters, bookes and other pontificall vestures, but wore either throughlie fretted, or notablie garnished with huge numbers of them. Marbodeus likewise speaking of pearles, commendeth them after this maner:

Gignit & insignes antiqua Britannia baccas, &c.

Marcellinus also Lib. 23, in ipso fine, speaketh of our pearls and their generation, but he preferreth greatlie those of Persia before them, which to me doth seeme vnequallie done. But as the British geat or orient pearle were in old time esteemed aboue those of other countries; so time hath since the conquest of the Romans reuealed manie other: insomuch that at this season there are found in England the Aetites (in English called the ernestone, but for erne some pronounce eagle) and the hematite or bloodstone, and these verie pure and excellent: also the calcedonie, the porphyrite, the chrisall, and those other which we call calaminares and speculares, besides a kind of diamond or adamant, which although it be verie faire to sight, is yet much softer (as most are that are found & bred toward the north) than those that are brought hither out of other countries. We haue also vpon our coast the white coral, nothing inferiour to that which is found beyond the sea in the albe, nere to the fall of Tangra, or to the red and blacke, whereof Dioscorides intreateth, Lib. 5. cap. 8. We haue in like sort sundrie other stones dailie found in cliffes and rocks (beside the loadstone which is oftentimes taken vp out of our mines of iron) whereof such as find them haue either no knowledge at all, or else do make but small account, being seduced by outlandish lapidaries, whereof the most part discourage vs from the searching and seeking out of our owne commodities, to the end that they maie haue the more free vtterance of their naturall and artificiall wares, whereby they get great gaines amongst such as haue no skill.

I haue heard that the best triall of a stone is to laie it on the naile of the thombe, and so to go abroad into the cleare light, where if the colour hold in all places a like, the stone is thought to be naturall and good: but if it alter, especiallie toward the naile, then is it not sound, but rather to be taken for an artificiall peece of practise. If this be true it is an experiment worthie the noting. Cardan also hath it in his De subtilitate; if not, I haue read more lies than this, as one for example out of Cato, who saieth, that a cup of iuie will hold no wine at all. I haue made some vessels of the same wood, which refuse no kind of liquor, and therefore I suppose that there is no such Antipathia betweene wine and our iuie, as some of our reading philosophers (without all maner of practise) will seeme to infer amongst vs: and yet I denie not but the iuie of Greece or Italie may haue such a propertie; but why should not the iuie then of France somewhat participat withall in the like effect, which groweth in an hotter soile than ours is? For as Baptista porta saith, it holdeth not also in the French iuie, wherfore I can not beleeue that it hath anie such qualitie at all as Cato ascribeth vnto it. What should I say more of stones? Trulie I can not tell, sith I haue said what I may alreadie, and peraduenture more than I thinke necessarie: and that causeth me to passe ouer those that are now & then taken out of our oisters, todes, muskels, snailes and adders, and likewise such as are found vpon sundrie hils in Glocestershire, which haue naturallie such sundrie proportions, formes & colours in them, as passe all humane possibilitie to imitate, be the workeman neuer so skilfull ſkilfull and cunning, alſo thoſe that are found in the heads of our perches and carps much deſired of ſuch as haue the ſtone, & yet of themſelues are no ſtones but rather ſhels or grilles, which in time conſume to nothing. This yet will I ad, that if thoſe which are found in muſkels (for I am vtterlie ignorant of the generation of pearls) be good pearle in deed, I haue at ſundrie times gathered more than an ounce of them, of which diuerſe haue holes alreadie entered by nature, ſome of them not much inferiour to great peaſon in quantitie, and thereto of ſundrie colours, as it happeneth amongſt ſuch as are brought from the eaſterlie coaſt to Saffron Walden in Lent, when for want of flesh, ſcale fiſhing fiſh and welked muſkels are thought to be good meat; for other fiſh is to deere amongſt vs when law doth bind vs to vſe it. See more for the generation of pearls in the deſcription of Scotland, for there you ſhall be further informed out of Boetius in that behalfe. They are called orient, becauſe of the cleerenelle, which reſembleth the colour of the cleere aire before the riſing of the ſun. They are alſo ſought for in the later end of Auguſt, a little before which time the ſweetneſſe of the dew is moſt conuenient for that kind of fiſh, which doth ingender and conceiue them, whoſe forme is flat, and much like vnto a lempet. The further north alſo that they be found the brighter is their colour, & their ſubſtances of better valure, as lapidaries do giue out.

liquor, as both the other. Some ſaie (or rather fable) that this ſalt ſpring did faile in the time of Richard de la Wich biſhop of Chicheſter, and that afterwards by his interceſſion it was reſtored to the profit of the old courſe (ſuch is the ſuperſtition of the people) in remembrance whereof, or peradventure for the zeale which the Wich men and ſalters did beare vnto Richard de la Wich their countriman, they vſed of late times on his date (which commeth once in the yeare) to hang this ſalt ſpring or well about with tapiſtrie, and to haue ſundrie games, drinkings, and ſolliſh reuels at it. But to proceed. There be a great number of ſalt cotes about this well, wherein the ſalt water is ſodden in leads, and brought to the perfection of pure white ſalt. The other two ſalt ſprings be on the left ſide of the riuer a prettie waie lower than the firſt, and (as I found) at the verie end of the towne. At theſe alſo be diuerſe fornaces to make ſalt, but the profit and plentie of theſe two are nothing comparable to the gaine that riſeth by the greateſt. I asked of a ſalter how manie fornaces they had at all the three ſprings, and he vnderſtood them to eight ſcore, that is, three hundred and fortie, ſaieng how euerie one of them paied pearelie ſix ſhillings and eight pence to the king. The truth is that of old they had liberties giuen vnto them for three hundred fornaces or more, and thereupon they giue a certaine farme (or Vectigal) of one hundred pounds pearelie. Sithes the penſion is as it was, but the number of fornaces is now increaſed to foure hundred. There was of late ſearch made for another ſalt ſpring there abouts, by the meanes of one Newport a gentleman dwelling at the Wich, and the place where it was appeereth, as doth alſo the wood and timber which was ſet about it, to keepe vp the earth from falling into the ſame. But this pit was not ſince occupied, whether it were for lacke of plentie of the ſalt ſpring, or for letting or hindering of the profit of the other three. We thinke that if wood and ſale of ſalt would ſerue, they might dig and find more ſalt ſprings about the Wich than three, but there is ſomewhat elſe in the wind. For I heard that of late yeares a ſalt ſpring was found in another quarter of Worceſterſhire, but it grew to be without anie vſe, ſith the Wich men haue ſuch a priuilege, that they alone in thoſe quarters ſhall haue the making of ſalt. The pits be ſo ſet about with gutters, that the ſalt water is eaſilie turned to euerie mans houſe, and at Nantwich verie manie troughs go ouer the riuer for the commoditie of ſuch as dwell on the other ſide of the ſame. They ſeeth alſo their ſalt water in fornaces of lead, and lade out the ſalt ſome in caſes of wicker, through which the water drayneth, and the ſalt remaineth. There be alſo two or three but verie little ſalt ſprings at Dertwitch, in a low bottome, where ſalt is ſometime made.

other cattle eth the bines as we marke in baſſowles.

Priuileges doo ſometimes harme.

Of late alſo a mile from Combremere abbaie a peece of an hill did ſinke, and in the ſame pit roſe a ſpring of ſalt water, where the abbat began to make ſalt; but the men of the citie compounded with the abbat & couent that there ſhould be none made there, whereby the pit was ſuffered to go to loſſe. And although it yelded ſalt water ſtill of it ſelfe, yet it was ſpoiled at the laſt and filled vp with filth. The Wich men vſe the commoditie of their ſalt ſprings in drawing and decocting the water of them onlie by ſix moneths in the yeare, that is, from Midſummer to Chriſtmas, as (I gelle) to mainteine the price of ſalt, or for ſauing of wood, which I thinke to be their principall reaſon. For making of ſalt is a great and notable deſtruction of wood, and ſhall be greater hereafter, except ſome prouiſion be made for the better increaſe of firing. The lacke of wood alſo is alreadie perceiued in places neere the Wich, for whereas they vſed to buie and take their wood neere vnto their occupi-

Of ſalt made in England.

Chap. 13.

THere are in England certein welles where ſalt is made, whereof Leland hath written abundantlie in his cõmentaries of Britaine, and whoſe words onlie I will ſet downe in Engliſh as he wrote them, becauſe he ſeemeth to haue had diligent conſideration of the ſame, without adding anie thing of mine owne to him, except it be where neceſſitie doth inforce me for the meere aid of the reader, in the vnderſtanding of his mind. Directing therefore his iournie from Worceſter in his peregrination and laborious trauell ouer England, he ſaith thus: From Worceſter I road to the Wich by incloſed ſoile, hauing meetlie good corne ground, ſufficient wood and good paſture, about a ſir miles off. Wich ſtandeth ſomewhat in a vallie or low ground, betwixt two ſmall hils on the left ripe (for ſo he calleth the banke of euerie brooke through out all his Engliſh treatiſes) of a prettie riuer which not far beneath the Wich is called Salope brooke. The beautie of the towne in maner ſtandeth in one ſtreet, yet be there manie lanes in the towne beſides. There is alſo a meane church in the maine ſtreet, and once in the weeke an indifferent round market. The towne of it ſelfe is ſomewhat ſoule and durtie when anie raine falleth by reaſon of much cartage through the ſtreets, which are verie ill paued or rather not paued at all. The great aduancement alſo hereof is by making of ſalt. And though the commodities thereof be ſingular great, yet the burgeſſes be poore generallie, becauſe gentlemen haue for the moſt part gotten the great gaine of it into their hands, whileſt the poore burgeſſes yeeld vnto all the labour. There are at this preſent time three hundred ſalters, and three ſalt ſprings in the towne of Wich, whereof the principall is within a butſhot of the right ripe (or banke) of the riuer that there commeth downe: and this ſpring is double ſo profitable in yelding of ſalt

A common plague in all things of anie great commoditie, for one beateth the buſh but an-occupiengs, those wonted spzings are now decaied, and they be inforced to seeke their wood so far as Worcester towne, and all the parts about Brenisgraue, Aichirch, and Alcester. I asked a salter how much wood he supposed pearelie to be spent at these fornaces: and he answered that by estimation there was consumed about six thousand load, and it was round pole wood for the most, which is easie to be cleft, and handsomelie riuen in peeces. The people that are about the fornaces are verie ill coloured, and the inst rate of eueric fornace is to make foure loads of salt pearelie, and to euerie load goeth fiue or six quarters as they make their accounts. If the fornace men make more in one fornace than foure loads, it is (as it is said) imploied to their owne auaile. And thus much hath Leland left in memozie of our white salt, who in an other booke, not now in my hands, hath touched the making also of baie salt in some part of our countrie. But sith that booke is deliuered againe to the owner, the tractation of baie salt can not be framed in ante ozder, because my memozie will not serue to shew the true maner and the place. It shall suffice therfore to haue giuen such notice of it, to the end the reader may know that as well the baie as white are wzought and made in England, and more white also vpon the west coast toward Scotland, in Eller and else where, out of the salt water betweene Wilre and Cokermouth, which commonlie is of like price with our wheat. Finallie, hauing thus intermedled our artificiall salt with our minerals, let vs giue ouer, and go in hand with such mettals as are growing here in England.

Of our accompt of time & hir parts.

Chap. 14.

AS Libra is As or Assis to the Romans for their weight, and the foot in standard measure: so in our accompt of the parts of time, we take the daie consisting of foure and twentie houres, to be the greatest of the least, and least of the greatest, whereby we keepe our reckoning: for of the houre (to saie the truth) the most ancient Romans, Greeks, nor Hebzues had anie vse; sith they reckoned by watches: and whereof also Censorinus cap. 19. sheweth a reason wherefore they were neglected. For my part I doo not see anie great difference vsed in the obseruation of time & hir parts, betweene our owne & any other forren nation, wherfore I shall not need to stand long on this matter. Howbeit to the end our exact ozder herein shall appeere vnto all men, I will set downe some short rehearsall thereof, and that in so briefe manner as vnto me is possible. As for our astronomicall practises, I meane not to meddle with them, sith their course is vniformelie obserued ouer all. Our common ozder therefore is to begin at the minut, which conteineth $\frac{1}{60}$ part of an houre, as at the smallest part of time knowne vnto the people, notwithstanding that in most places they descend no lower than the halfe quarter or quarter of the houre; and from thence they proceed vnto the houre, to wit, the foure and twentith part of that which we call the common and naturall daie, which doth begin at midnight, and is obserued continuallie by clockes, dialles, and astronomicall instruments of all sozts. The artificiall varietie of which kind of ware is so great here in England, as no place else (in mine opinion) can be comparable therein to this Ile. I will not speake of the cost bestowed vpon them in perls and stone, neither of the value of mettall, whereof they haue beene made, as gold, siluer, &c: and almost no abbeis or religious house without some of them. This onelie shall suffice to note here (as by the waie) that as antiquitie hath delighted in these things, so in our time pompe and excesse spendeth all, and nothing is regarded that bzingeth in no bread. Of vnequall or temporall houres or daies, our nation hath no regard, and therefore to shew their quantities, diuersities, and diuisions, into the greater and the lesser, (whereof the later conteineth one vnequall houre, or the rising of halfe a signe, the other of a whole signe, which is in two houres space, wherof Marke seemeth to speake cap. 15 c 25, as the rest of the euangelists (yea and he also ibid. vers. 33) doo of the other, Matth. 27 e 45 Luke 23 e 44, John 19 b 14) it should be but in vaine. In like sozt, whereas the elder Aegyptians, Italians, Bohemians, latter Athenians, and Iews begin their daie at the sun set ouer night; the Persians, Babylonians, Greecians, and Nozbergians, at the sun rising (each of them accompting their daies and nights by vnequall houres) also the elder Athenians, Arabians, Dutchmen, Umbers, Hetrurians, and Astronomers at high none, and so reckon from none to none: we after Hipparchus and the latter Aegyptians, or to speake more properlie, imitating the Roman maner vsed in the church there of long time, chose the verie point of midnight; from whence we accompt twelue equall houres vnto middaie insuing, and other twelue againe vnto the aforesaid point, according to these verses;

Manè diem Græca gens incipit astra sequentes
In medio lucis Iudæus vespere sancta, Inchoat ecclesia media sua tempora nocte.

And this is our generall ozder for the naturall daie. Of the artificiall we make so farre accompt, as that we reckon it daie when the sun is vp, and night when the sun leaueth our horizon. Otherwise also we diuide it into two parts, that is to saie, fore none and after none, not regarding the ruddie, shining, burning and warming seasons (of the which vnequall houres a peece, which others seeme to diuide into spzing time, summer, autumne, and winter, in like curious manner) and whereof I read these verses:

Solis equi lucis dicuntur quatuor horæ,
Hæc rubet, hæc splendet, hæc calet, illa tepet.

Indeed our physicians haue another partition of the daie, as men of no lesse learning no doubt than the best of forren countries, if we could so conceiue of them. And herein they concurre also with those of other nations, who for distinction in regiment of our humozs, diuide the artificiall daie and night in such wise as these verses doo import, and are indeed a generall rule which each of them doth follow:

Tres lucis primas, noctis tres sanguinis imas,
Vis choleræ medias lucis sex vendicat horas,
Dátque melam primas noctis, tres lucis & imas,
Centrales ponas sex noctis phlegmatis horas.

Or thus, as Tansteter hath giuen them forth in his prolections:

A nona noctis donec sit tertia lucis,
Est dominus sanguis, sex inde sequentibus horis
Est dominans cholera, dum lucis nona sit hora
Post niger humid inest donec sit tertia noctis, Post hæc phlegma venit, donec sit nona quietis.

In English thus in effect:

Three houres yer sun doo rise, and so manie after, blud,
From nine to three at after noone, hot choler beares the swaie, Euen so to nine at night, swart choler hath to rule,
As phlegme from thence to three at morne;

Night. In like ſort for the night we haue none other parts than the twilight, darkenight, midnight, and cocks crowing: wher as the Latins diuide the ſame into 7 parts, as Veſper or Veſperugo, as Plautus calleth it, as Virgil vſeth the word Heſper the euening, which is immediatlie after the ſetting of the ſun. Veſper. Crepuſculum. Crepuſculum the twilight (which ſome call Prima fax, becauſe men begin then to light candles) when it is betweene daie and night, light and darkeneſſe, or properlie neither daie nor night. Concubium. Concubium the ſtill of the night, when euerie one is laid to reſt. Intempeſtum. Intempeſtum, the dull or dead of the night, which is midnight, when men be in their firſt or dead ſléepe. Gallicinium. Gallicinium, the cocks crowing. Conticinium. Conticinium, when the cocks haue left crowing. Matutinum. Matutinum, the breach of the daie, and Diluculum. Diluculum ſiue aurora, the ruddie, orenge, golden or ſhining colour, ſéene immediatlie before the riſing of the ſun, and is oppoſite to the euening, as Matutinum is to the twilight.

Watches. Other there are which do reckon by watches, diuiding the night after ſun ſetting into foure equall parts. Of which the firſt beginneth at euening called the firſt watch, and continueth by three vnequall houres, and ſo forth vntill the end of the ninth houre, whereat the fourth watch entreth, which is called the morning watch, becauſe it concurreth partlie with the darke night, and partlie with the morning and breach of the daie before the riſing of the ſun.

Houre. As for the originall of the word houre, it is verie ancient; but yet not ſo old as that of the watch, whereof we ſhall read abundantlie in the ſcriptures, which was deuiſed firſt among ſouldiors for their better ſafegard and change of watchmen in their camps; the like whereof is almoſt vſed among our ſeafaring men, which they call clearing of the glaſſe, and performed from time to time with great héed and ſome ſolemnitie. Herevnto the word Hora among the Greciáns ſignified ſo well the foure quarters of the yéere, as the foure and twentith part of the daie, and limits of anie ſorme. But what ſtand I vpon theſe things to let my purpoſe ſtaie? To proceed therefore.

Wéeke. Of naturall daies is the wéeke coinpaced, which conſiſteth of ſeauen of them, the fridaie being commonlie called among the vulgar ſort either king or worſling, becauſe it is either the faireſt or foulеſt of the ſeauen: albeit that I cannot ghéſſe of anie reaſon whie they ſhould ſo imagine. The firſt of theſe entreth with mondaie, whereby it commeth to paſſe, that we reſt vpon the ſundaie, which is the ſeauenth in number, as almightie God hath commanded in his word. The Iews begin their wéeke vpon our ſaturdaie at the ſetting of the ſun: and the Turks in theſe daies with the ſaturdaie, whereby it commeth to paſſe, that as the Iews make our laſt daie the firſt of their wéeke, ſo the Turks make the Iewiſh ſabaoth the beginning of their Hebdoma: becauſe Mahomet their prophet (as they ſaie) was borne and dead vpon the fridaie, and ſo he was indéed, except their Alcharon deceiue them. The Iews do reckon their daies by their diſtance from their ſabaoth, ſo that the firſt daie of their wéeke is the firſt daie of the ſabaoth, and ſo forth vnto the ſixt. The Latins and Aegyptians accompted their daies after the ſeauen planets, chooſing the ſame for the denominator of the daie, that entreth his regiment with the firſt vnequall houre of the ſame after the ſun be riſen. Howbeit, as this order is not wholie reteined with vs, ſo the vſe of the ſame is not yet altogither aboliſhed, as may appéere by our ſunday, mondaie, and ſaturdaie. The reſt were changed by the Saxons, who in remembrance of Theut ſometime their prince, called the ſecond day of the week Theutdach, the third Woden, Mthin, Mthon, or Edon, or Wodenſdach. Alſo of Thor they named the fourth daie Thorſdach, and of Frea wife to Woden the firſt was called Freadach. Albeit there are (and not amiſſe as I thinke) that ſuppoſe them to meane by Thor, Iupiter, by Woden, Mercurie, by Frea (or Frigga as Saxo calleth hir) Uenus, and finallie by Theut, Mars: which if it be ſo, then it is an eaſie matter to find out the german Mars, Uenus, Mercurie, and Iupiter, whereof you may read more hereafter in my chronologie. The truth is, that Frea albeit that Saxo giueth hir ſcant a good report, for that ſhe loued one of hir husbands men better than himſelfe, had ſeauen ſonnes by Woden; the firſt, father to Wecca, of whome deſcended thoſe that were afterwards kings of Kent. Fethelgeta was the ſecond, and of him came the kings of Mercia. Baldaie the third, father to the kings of the weſt Saxons. Beldagius the fourth, parent to the kings of Bzenicia or Northumberland. Weogodach the fift, author of the kings of Deira. Caſer the firſt race of the eaſt Angle race, & Naſcad originall burgeant of the kings of Eſſex. As for the kings of Suſſex, although they were of the ſame people, yet were they not of the ſame ſtreine, as our old monuments do expreſſe. But to proceed.

As certeine of our daies ſuffered this alteration by the Saxons, ſo in our churches we reteined for a long time the number of daies or of *feries from the ſabaoth, after the manner of the Iews, I meane vntill the ſeruice after the Romane vſe was aboliſhed, which cuſtome was firſt receiued (as ſome thinke) by pope Syluеſter, though other ſaie by Conſtantine; albeit another ſort do affirme, that Syluеſter cauſed the ſundaie onelie to be called the Lords day, and dealt not with the reſt. Feriæ.

Moneth. In like maner of wéekes our moneths are made, which are ſo called of the moone, each one conteining eight and twentie daies, or foure wéekes, without anie further curioſitie. For we reckon not our time by the yeare of the moone, as the Iews, Grecians, or Romans did at the firſt; or as the Turks, Arabians and Perſians do now: neither ante parcell thereof by the ſaid planet, as in ſome part of the weſt Indies, where they haue neither wéeke, moneth, nor yéere, but onlie a generall accompt of hundreds and thouſands of moones. Therefore if we ſaie or write a moneth, it is to be expounded of eight and twentie daies, or foure wéeks onelie, and not of hir vſuall period of nine and twentie daies and one and thirtie minuts. Or (if you take it at large) for a moneth of the common calender, which neuertheleſſe in plées and ſuits is nothing at all allowed of, ſith the moone maketh hir full reuolution in eight and twentie daies or foure wéeks, that is, vnto the place where ſhe left the ſun: notwithſtanding that he be now gone, and at hir returne not to be found verie often in that ſigne wherin ſhe before had left him. Plutarch writeth of diuers barbarous nations which reckoned a more or leſſe number of theſe moneths for whole yeares: and that of theſe ſome accompted but three, as the Archadians did foure, the Acarnans ſix, and the Aegyptians but one for a whole yeare, which cauſeth them to make ſuch a large accompt of their antiquitie and originall. But forſomuch as we are not troubled with anie ſuch diſorder, it ſhall ſuffice that I haue generallie ſaid of moneths and their quantities at this time. Now a word or two of the ancient Romane calender. Trimethus in Antarico.

In old time each moneth of the Romane calender was reckoned after the courſe of the moone, and their enterances were vncerteine, as were alſo the changes of that planet: whereby it came to paſſe, that the daie of the change was the firſt of the moneth, howſoeuer it fell out. But after Julius Ceſar had once corrected the ſame, the ſeuerall beginnings of euerie one of them did not onelie remaine ſtred,

but alſo the old order in the diuiſion of their parts continued ſtill vnaltered: ſo that the moneth is yet diuided as before, into calends, ides and nones, albeit that in my daies, the vſe of the ſame bée but ſmall, and their order reteined onelie in our calenders, for the better vnderſtanding of ſuch times, as the hiſtoriographers and old authors do remember. The reckoning alſo of each of theſe goeth (as you ſée) after a prepoſterous order, whereby the Romans did rather note how many daies were to the next change from the precedent, than contrariwiſe, as by peruſall of the ſame you ſhall more eaſilie perceiue.

The daies alſo of the change of the moneth of the mone, are called Calendæ, which in time of paganiſme were conſecrated to Juno, and ſacrifice made to that goddeſſe on the ſame. On theſe daies alſo, and on the ides and nones they would not marie. Likewiſe the morow after each of them were called Dies atri, blacke daies, as were alſo diuerſe other, and thoſe either by reaſon of ſome notable ouerthrow or miſhap that befell vnto the Romans vpon thoſe daies, or in reſpect of ſome ſuperſtitious imagination conceiued of euill ſucceſſe likelie to fall out vpon the ſame. Of ſome they were called Dies Ægyptiaci. Wherby it appeareth that this peuiſh eſtimation of theſe daies came from that nation. And as we do note our holie and feſtiuall daies with red letters in our calenders, ſo did the Romans their principall feaſts & circle of the mone, either in red or golden letters, and their victories in white, in their publike or conſularie tables. This alſo is more to be added, that if anie good ſucceſſe happened afterward vpon ſuch day as was alreadie blacke in their calender, they would ſolemnlie enter it in white letters by racing out of the blacke, whereby the blacke date was turned into white, and therein they not a little reioiſed.

Ferias.

Moneth.

The word Calendæ (in Greéke Neomenia) is deriued of Calo, to call: for vpon the firſt day of euerie moneth, the prieſt vſed to call the people of the citie and countrie togither in Calabria, for ſo the place was called where they met, and ſhew them by a cuſtome how manie daies were from the ſaid calends to the nones, & what feaſts were to be celebrated betweéne that and the next change. Their order is retrograde, becauſe that after the moneth was halfe expired, or the mone paſt the full, they reckoned by the daies to come vntill the next change, as ſeuenteéne daies, ſixteéne daies, fourteéne daies, &c: as the Greékes did in the latter decad onelie, for they had no vſe of calends. The verie day therefore of the change is called Calendæ, dedicated to Juno, who thereof was alſo called Calendaris. At the firſt alſo the faſts or feaſt daies were knowne by none other meanes vnto the people but by the denunciation of the prieſts (as I ſaid) vpon this date, till Flauius Scriba cauſed them to be written & publiſhed in their common calenders, contrarie to the will and meaning of the ſenat, for the eaſe and benefit of the people, as he pretended.

Trinoctium in Antartico.

The nones commonlie are not aboue foure or fiue in euerie moneth: and ſo long as the nones laſted, ſo long did the markets continue, and therefore they were called Nonæ quaſi Nundinæ. In them alſo were neither holie daies more than is at this preſent (except the day of the purification of our ladie) no ſacrifice offered to the gods, but each one applied his buſineſſe, and kept his market, reckoning the firſt day after the calends or change, to be the fourth or fift date before the faire ended. Some thinke that they were called Nonæ, of the word Non quia in iſdem dij non coluntur. For as Ouid ſaith, Nonarum tutela deo caret, or for that the nones were alwaies on the ninth date before the ides: other becauſe Nundina dea was honored the ninth day before the ides, albeit I ſuppoſe rather that Nundina dea (a goddeſſe far yonger than the name of Nonæ) toke hir name of the nones, whereon it was a cuſtome among the Romans, Luſtrare infantes ac nomina maribus imponere, as they did with their maid children vpon the eight: but howſoeuer this be, ſure it is that they were the mart daies of euerie moneth, wherin the people bought, ſold, exchanged or bartered, and did nothing elſe.

The ides are ſo named of the Hethruſcan word, Iduare, to diuide: and before that Ceſar altered the calender, they diuided the moneth commonlie by the middeſt. But afterward when he had added certeine daies thereto, therby to make it agrée to the yéere of the ſunne (which he intruded about the end of euerie moneth, becauſe he would not alter the celebration of their vſuall feaſts, whereof the chiefe were holden alwaies vpon the day of the ides) then came they ſhort of the middeſt, ſometime by two or thrée daies. In theſe therefore (which alwaies are eight) the merchants had leiſure to packe vp and conueie their merchandize, to pay their creditors, and make merie with their friends.

After the ides do the calends follow, but in a decreaſing order (as I noted) as the mone doth in light when he is paſt the full. But herein lieth all the myſterie, if you can ſay ſo manie daies before the next change or new mone, as the number there expreſſed doth betoken, as for 16 calends ſo manie daies before the next coniunction, &c: (as is aboue remembred.) Of theſe calends, I meane touching their number in euerie moneth, I find theſe verſes inſuing:

Ianus & Auguſtus denas notémq; December,
Iunius Aprilis September & ipſe Nouember
Ter ſenas retinent, Februs bis octo calendas, Iulius October Mars Maius Epta decemq;.

In English thus.

December Iune and Auguſt month full nineteene calends haue, Septemb Aprill Nouemb and Iune twiſe nine they doo deſire, Sixteene foule Februarie hath,
no more can he well craue.
October Maie and Iulie hot but ſeuenteene doo require.

In like maner do the nones and ides.

Sex Maius nonas, October, Iulius, & Mars,
Quatuor at reliqui, dabit idus quilibet octo.

To Iulie, Mars, October, Maie, ſix nones I hight,
The reſt but foure, and as for ides they keepe ſtill eight.

Againe touching the number of daies in euerie moneth:

Iunius, Aprilis, Septémq;, Nouémq; tricenos,
Vnum plus reliqui, Februs tenet octo vicenos,
At ſi biſſextus fuerit ſuper additur vnus.

Thirtie daies hath Nouember, Aprill, Iune, and September,
Twentie and eight hath Februarie alone, and all the reſt thirtie and one,
but in the leape you muſt ad one.

Our yeare is counted after the courſe of the ſunne, and although the church hath ſome vſe of that of the mone for obſeruation of certeine moueable feaſts, yet it is reducible to that of the ſunne, which in our ciuill dealings is chieflie had in vſe. Herein onelie I find a ſcruple, that the beginning thereof is not vniforme and certeine, for moſt of our records beare date the 25 of March, and our calenders the firſt of Januarie; ſo that with vs Chriſt is borne before he be conceiued. Our ſundrie officers alſo haue ſundrie entrances into their charges of cuſtome, which breédeth great confuſion, whereas if all theſe might be referred to one originall (and that to be the firſt of Januarie) I do not thinke but that there would be more certeintie, and leſſe trouble for our hiſtoriographers, notaries, & other officers in their account of the yere. In old time the Athenians began their yeare with the change of the moone that fell nereſt to the entrance of the ſunne into the crab, the Latines at the winter ſolſtice, or his going into the goat, the Jewes in ciuill caſe at the latter equinoctiall, and in eccleſiaſticall with the firſt. They of Calecute begin their yeare ſomewhere in September, but vpon no daie certeine, ſith they firſt conſult with their wiſards, who pronounce one day or other thereof to be moſt happie (as the yeare goeth about) and therewith they make their entrance, as Oſorius doth remember, who addeth that vpon the eleuenth calends of September, they haue ſolemne plaies, much like to the idoll games, & that they write in leaues of tree with a pencill, in ſtead of paper, which is not found among them. Some of the old Grecians began their yere alſo in September: but ſith we ſeeke herein but for the cuſtome of our countrie onelie, it ſhall be enough to affirme that we make our account from the calends or firſt of Januarie, and from the middeſt of the night which is Limes betweens that and the laſt of December, whereof this maie ſuffice. I might ſpeake of the Cynike yeare alſo in this place (for the eaſe of our Engliſh readers) ſometime in vſe amongſt the Egyptians, which conteineth 1460 common yeares, whoſe beginning is alwaies reckoned from the riſing of the leſſer dog. The firſt vſe thereof entered the ſelfe yeare wherin the Olimpiads were reſtored. And forſomuch as this nation hath no vſe of intercalation, at the end of euerie 1460 yeares, they added an whole yeare of intercalation, becauſe there are 365 leape yeers in the period, ſo that 1460 Julian yeers do conteine 1461 after the Egyptians account, wherby their common yeare is found to be leſſe than ours. Furthermore, whereas our intercalation for the leape yere is ſomewhat too much by certeine minuts, which in 115 yeares amount vnto about an whole day, if one intercalation in ſo manie were omitted, our calender would be the more perfect: and I would wiſh that the ſame yeare wherein the ſaid intercalation truelie found out ſhould be ouerpaſſed, might be obſerued and called Annus magnus Elizabethæ, in perpetuall remembrance of our noble and ſouereigne princeſſe now reigning amongſt vs.

I might here ſaie ſomewhat alſo of the prime and his alteration, which is riſen higher by fiue daies in our common calender than it was placed by Iulius Cæſar: and in ſeuen thouſand yeares ſome writer would grow to an error of an whole, if the world ſhould laſt ſo long. But forſomuch as in ſome calenders of ours it is reduced againe to the daie of euerie change, it ſhall ſuffice to ſaie no more therof. The pope alſo hath made a generall correction of the calender, wherein he hath reduced it to the ſame that it was or ſhould haue beene at the councell of Nice. Howbeit as he hath aboliſhed the vſe of the golden number, ſo hath he continued the epact, applieng it vnto ſuch generall vſe, as doth now ſerue both the turnes, whoſe reformation had alſo per this time beene admitted into England, if it had not proceeded from him, againſt whom and all whoſe ordinances we haue ſo faithfullie ſworne and ſet our hands.

Certes the next omiſſion is to be performed if all princes would agree thereto in the leape yeare that ſhall be about the yeare of Grace 1668: if it ſhall pleaſe God that the world may laſt ſo long, and then may our calender alſo ſtand without anie alteration as it doth alreadie. By this alſo it appeareth how the defect of our calender may be ſupplied from the creation, wherein the firſt equinoctiall is ſeene higher toward the beginning of March than Cæſars calender now extant doth yeld vnto by ſeauen daies. For as in Cæſars time the true equinoctiall was pointed out to happen (as Stadius alſo noteth) either vpon or about the ſixteenth or ſeauentéenth of March, albeit the manifeſt apperance thereof was not found vntill the fiue and twentith of that moneth in their dials or by eie-ſight: ſo at the beginning of the world the ſaid entrance of the ſunne into the ram, muſt néeds fall out to be about the twentith or one & twentith of Aprill, as the calender now ſtandeth, if I faile not in my numbers. Aboue the yeare we haue no more parts of time, that carie anie ſeuerall names with them, except you will affirme the world age to be one, which is taken for a hundred yeares, and ſignifieth in Engliſh ſo much as Seculum or Æuum doth in Latine; neither is it néedfull to remember that ſome of my countrimen do reckon their times not by years but by ſummers and winters, which is verie common among vs. Wherefore to ſhut vp this chapiter withall, you ſhall haue a table of the names of the daies of the weeke, after the old Saxon and Scotiſh maner, which I haue borowed from amongſt our ancient writers, as I haue peruſed their volumes.

Of our principall faires and markets.

Chap. 15.

I Haue heretofore ſaid ſufficientlie of our faires, in the chapter of fairs and markets; and now to performe my promiſe there made, I ſet downe here ſo manie of our faires as I haue found out by mine owne obſeruation, and helpe of others in this behalfe. Certes it is impoſſible for me to come by all, ſith there is almoſt no towne in England, but hath one or more ſuch marts holden yearelie in the ſame, although ſome of them (I muſt néeds confeſſe) be ſcarſe comparable to Lowſe faire, and little elſe bought or ſold in them more than good drinke, pies, and ſome pedlerie traſh: wherefore it were no loſſe if diuerſe of them were aboliſhed. Neither do I ſee whereunto this number of paltrie fairs tendeth, ſo much as to the corruption of youth, who (all other buſineſſe ſet apart) muſt néeds repaire vnto them, whereby they often ſpend not onelie the weeke daies, but alſo the Lords ſabbaoth in great vanitie and riot. But ſuch hath béene the iniquitie of ancient times. God grant therefore that ignorance being now aboliſhed, and a further inſight into things growne into the minds of magiſtrates, theſe old errors

rors may be conſidered of, and ſo farre reformed, as that thereby neither God may be diſhonored, nor the common wealth of our countrie anie thing diminiſhed. In the meane time, take this table here inſuing in ſtead of a calender of the greateſt, ſith that I cannot, or at the leaſt wiſe care not to come by the names of the leſſe, whoſe knowledge cannot be ſo profitable to them that be farre off, as they are oft preiudiciall to ſuch as dwell neere hand to the places where they be holden and kept, by pilferers that reſort vnto the ſame.

Faires in Ianuarie.

The firſt day being Twelfe day at Saliſburie, the fiue and twentith being ſaint Paules day, at Braiſtow, at Grauelend, at Churchingford, at Northalerton in Yorkeſhire, where is kept a faire euerie wedneſday from Chriſtmaſſe vntill June.

Faires in Februarie.

The firſt day at Bromleie. The ſecond at Lin, at Bath, at Paldſtone, at Bickleſworth, at Budworth. The fourteenth at Feuerſham. On Aſhwedneſday at Lichfield, at Tamworth, at Roiſton, at Exceſter, at Abington, at Ciceſter. The foure and twentith at Henlie vpon Thames, at Tewkeſburie.

Faires in March.

On the twelfth day, at Stamford, Sapeſford, and at Sudburie. The thirteenth day at Wie, at the Mount, & at Bodmin in Cornewall. The firſt ſunday in Lent, at Grantham, at Saliſburie. Of our innes and thorowfaires.

Chap. 16.

Thoſe townes that we call thorowfaires haue great and ſumptuous innes builded in them, for the receiuing of ſuch trauellers and ſtrangers as paſſe to and fro. The manner of harbouring wherein, is not like to that of ſome other countries, in which the hoſt or goodman of the houſe doth chalenge a lordlie authoritie ouer his gheſts, but cleane otherwiſe, ſith euerie man may vſe his inne as his owne houſe in England, and haue for his monie how great or little varietie of vittels, and what other ſeruice himſelfe ſhall thinke expedient to call for. Our innes are alſo verie well furniſhed with naperie, bedding, and tapiſſerie, eſpeciallie with naperie: for beſide the linnen vſed at the tables, which is commonlie waſhed dailie, is ſuch and ſo much as belongeth vnto the eſtate and calling of the gheſt. Euerie commer is ſure to lie in cleane ſheets, wherein no man hath béene lodged ſince they came from the landreſſe, or out of the water wherein they were laſt waſhed. If the traueller haue an horſe, his bed doth coſt him nothing, but if he go on foot he is ſure to paie a penie for the ſame: but whether he be horſeman or footman if his chamber be once appointed he may carie the kaie with him, as of his owne houſe ſo long as he lodgeth there. If he loſe oughts whileſt he abideth in the inne, the hoſt is bound by a generall cuſtome to reſtore the damage, ſo that there is no greater ſecuritie anie where for trauellers than in the greteſt inns of England. Their horſſes in like ſort are walked, dreſſed and loked vnto by certeine hoſtelers or hired ſeruants, appointed at the charges of the goodman of the houſe, who in hope of extraordinarie reward will deale verie diligentlie after outward appearance in this their function and calling. Herein neuertheleſſe are manie of them blameworthie, in that they do not onelie deceiue the beaſt oftentimes of his allowance by ſundrie meanes, except their owners loke well to them; but alſo make ſuch packs with ſlipper merchants which hunt after preie (for what place is ſure from euill & wicked perſons) that manie an honeſt man is ſpoiled of his goods as he trauelleth to and fro, in which feat alſo the counſell of the tapſters or drawers of drinke, and chamberleins is not ſeldome behind or wanting. Certes I beléeue not that chapman or traueller in England is robbed by the waie without the knowledge of ſome of them, for when he commeth into the inne, & alighteth from his horſſe, the hoſtler forthwith is verie buſſe to take downe his budget or capcaſe in the yard from his ſadle bow, which he peiſeth ſtille in his hand to féele the weight thereof: or if he miſſe of this pitch, when the gheſt hath taken vp his chamber, the chamberleine that loketh to the making of the beds, will be ſure to remoue it from the place where the owner hath ſet it as if it were to ſet it more conuenientlie ſome where elſe, whereby he getteth an inkling whether it be monie or other short wares, & therof giueth warning to ſuch od gheſts as haut the houſe and are of his confederacie, to the vtter vndoing of manie an honeſt yeoman as he iourneieth by the waie. The tapſter in like ſort for his part doth marke his behauiour, and what plentie of monie he draweth when he paieth the ſhot, to the like end: ſo that it ſhall be an hard matter to eſcape all their ſubtile practiſes. Some thinke it a gay matter to commit their budgets at their comming to the goodman of the houſe: but thereby they oft bewraie themſelues. For albeit their monie be ſafe for the time that it is in his hands (for you ſhall not heare that a man is robbed in his inne) yet after their departure the hoſt can make no warrantiſe of the ſame, ſith his protection extendeth no further than the gate of his owne houſe: and there cannot be a ſurer token vnto ſuch as prie and watch for thoſe booties, than to ſee anie gheſt deliuer his capcaſe in ſuch maner. In all our innes we haue plentie of ale, beere, and ſundrie kinds of wine, and ſuch is the capacitie of ſome of them that they are able to lodge two hundred or three hundred perſons, and their horſſes at eaſe, & therto with a verie ſhort warning make ſuch proviſion for their diet, as to him that is vnacquainted withall may ſeeme to be incredible. Howbeit of all in England there are no worſe ins than in London, and yet manie are there far better than the beſt that I haue heard of in anie forren countrie, if all circumſtances be dulie conſidered. But to leaue this & go in hand with my purpoſe. I will here ſet downe a table of the beſt thoroughfaires and townes of greateſt trauell of England, in ſome of which there are twelue or ſixteene ſuch innes at the leaſt, as I before did ſpeake of. And it is a world to ſee how ech owner of them contendeth with other for gudneſſe of interteinement of their gheſts, as about fineſſe & change of linnen, furniture of bedding, beautie of roomes, ſeruice at the table, coſtlineſſe of plate, ſtrength of drinke, varietie of wines, or well vſing of horſſes. Finallie there is not ſo much omitted among them as the gorgeouſnes of their verie ſignes at their doores, wherein ſome do conſume thirtie or fortie pounds, a meere vanitie in mine opinion, but ſo vaine will they needs be, and that not onelie to giue ſome outward token of the inne keepers welth, but alſo to procure gud gheſts to the frequenting of their houſes in hope there to be well vſed. Lo here the table now at hand, for more of our innes I ſhall not need to ſpeake.

Hitherto of the common waies of England and Scotland, whereunto I will adioine the old thozowfaires ascribed to Antoninus, to the end that by their conference the diligent reader may haue further consideration of the same than my leisure will permit me. In setting forth also thereof, I haue noted such diuersitie of reading, as hath happened in the sight of such written and printed copies, as I haue seene in my time. Notwithstanding I must confesse the same to be much corrupted in the rehearsall of the miles.

To the Readers ſtudious in hiſtories.

THe order obſerued in the deſcription of Britaine, by reaſon of the neceſſarie diuiſion thereof into bookes and chapters growing out of the varietie of matters therein conteined, ſeemed (in my iudgement) ſo conuenient a courſe deuiſed by the writer, as I was eaſilie induced thereby to digeſt the hiſtorie of England immediatlie following into the like method: ſo that as in the one, ſo likewiſe in the other, by ſummarie contents foregoing euerie chapter, as alſo by certeine materiall titles added at the head of euerie page of the ſaid hiſtorie, it is a thing of no difficultie to comprehend what is diſcourſed and diſcuſſed in the ſame.

Wherein (ſith hiſtories are ſaid to be the regiſters of memorie and the monuments of veritie) all louers of knowlege, ſpeciallie hiſtoricall, are aduiſedlie to marke (among other points) the ſeuerall and ſucceſsiue alterations of regiments in this land: whereof it was my meaning to haue made an abſtract, but that the ſame is ſufficientlie handled in the firſt booke and fourth chapter of the deſcription of Britaine; whereto if the ſeuenth chapter of the ſame booke be alſo annexed, there is litle or no defect at all in that caſe wherof iuſtlie to make complaint.

Pag. 5, 6, 7, 8, 15, 16, 28, 29, of the deſcription: and pag. 202 of the hiſtorie of England.

Wherfore by remitting the readers to thoſe, I reape this aduantage, namelie a diſcharge of a forethought & purpoſed labour, which as to reduce into ſome plauſible forme was a worke both of time, paine and ſtudie: ſo ſeeming vnlikelie to be compriſed in few words (being a matter of neceſſarie and important obſeruation) occaſion of tediouſnes is to and fro auoided; ſpeciallie to the reader, who is further to be aduertiſed, that the computations of yeares here and there expreſſed, according to the indirect direction of the copies whenſe they were deriued and drawne, is not ſo abſolute (in ſome mens opinion) as it might haue beene: howbeit iuſtifiable by their originals.

Wherin hereafter (God prolonging peace in the church and common-welth that the vſe of bookes may not be abridged) ſuch diligent care ſhall be had, that in whatſoeuer the helpe of bookes will doo good, or conference with antiquaries auaile, there ſhall want no will to vſe the one and the other. And yet it is not a worke for euerie common capacitie, naie it is a toile without head or taile euen for extraordinarie wits, to correct the accounts of former ages ſo many hundred yeares receiued, out of vncerteinties to raiſe certeinties, and to reconcile writers diſſenting in opinion and report. But as this is vnpoſſible, ſo is no more to be looked for than may be performed: and further to inquire as it is againſt reaſon, ſo to vndertake more than may commendablie be atchiued, were fowle follie.

Who inhabited this Iland be-fore the comming of Brute: of Noah & his three ſonnes, among *whom the whole earth was di-*uided: and to which of their *portions this Ile of Bri-*taine befell.

The firſt Chapter.

WHat manner of people did firſt inhabite this our country, which hath moſt generallie and of longeſt continuance béene knowne among all nations by the name of Britaine as yet is not certeinly knowne; neither can it be decided frō whence the firſt inhabitants there of came, by reaſon of ſuch diuerſitie in iudgements as haue riſen amongſt the learned in this behalfe. But ſith the originall in manner of all nations is doubtfull, and euen the ſame for the more part fabulous (that alwaies excepted which we find in the holie ſcriptures) I wiſh not any man to leane to that which ſhall be here ſet downe as to an infallible truth, ſith I do but onlie ſhew other mens coniectures, grounded neuertheleſſe vpon likelie reaſons, concerning that matter whereof there is now left but little other certeintie, or rather none at all.

The originall of nations for the moſt part vncerteine.

No Ilands at the firſt, as ſome coniecture.

To fetch therefore the matter from the fartheſt, and ſo to ſtretch it forward, it ſéemeth by the report of Dominicus Marius Niger that in the beginning, when God framed the world, and diuided the waters apart from the earth, this Ile was then a parcell of the continent, and ioined without any ſeparation of ſea to the maine land. But this opinion (as all other the like vncerteinties) I leaue to be diſcuſſed of by the learned; howbeit for the firſt inhabitation of this Ile with people, I haue thought good to ſet downe in part, what may be gathered out of ſuch writers as haue touched that matter, and may ſéeme to giue ſome light vnto the knowledge thereof.

In the firſt part of the acts of the Engliſh votaries. Britaine inhabited before the flood. Geneſis. 6.

Firſt therefore Iohn Bale our countrieman, who in his time greatlie trauelled in the ſearch of ſuch antiquities, doth probablie coniecture, that this land was inhabited and replenished with people long before the flood, at that time in the which the generation of mankind (as Moſes writeth) began to multiplie vpon the vniuerſall face of the earth: and therfore it followeth, that as well this land was inhabited with people long before the daies of Noah, as any the other countries and parts of the world beſide. But when they had once forſaken the ordinances appointed them by God, and betaken them to new waies inuented of themſelues, ſuch looſeneſſe of life enſued euerie where, as brought vpon them the great deluge and vniuerſall flood, in the which periſhed as well the inhabitants of theſe quarters, as the reſidue of the race of mankind, generallie diſperſed in euerie other part of the whole world, onelie Noah & his familie excepted, who by the prouidence and pleaſure of almightie God was preſerued from the rage of thoſe waters, to recontinue and repaire the new generation of man vpon earth. Beroſus ant. lib. 1

Noah.

In comment. ſuper 4. lib. Beroſus de antiquit. lib. 1. Annius vt ſupr.

AFter the flood (as Annius de Viterbo recordeth) and reaſon alſo enforceth, Noah was the onlie monarch of all the world, and as the ſame Annius gathereth by the account of Moſes in the 100. yeare after the flood, Noah diuided the earth among his three ſonnes; aſſigning to the poſſeſſion of his eldeſt ſonne all that portion of land which now is knowne by the name of Aſia; to his ſecond ſonne Cham, he appointed all that part of the world which now is called Affrica: and to his third ſonne Japhet was allotted all Europa, with all the Iles therto belonging, wherin among other was conteined this our Ile of Britaine, with the other Iles thereto perteining.

Japhet and his ſonnes.

Iohannes Bodinus ad fac. hiſt. cogn. Franciſcus Tarapha.

IAphet the third ſon of Noah, of ſome called Iapetus, and of others, Atlas Maurus (becauſe he departed this life in Mauritania) was the firſt (as Bodinus affirmeth by the authoritie and conſent of the Hebrue, Greéke & Latine writers) that peopled the countries of Europe, which afterward he diuided among his ſonnes: of whom Tuball (as Tarapha affirmeth) obteined the kingdome of Spaine. Gomer had dominion ouer the Italians, and (as Beroſus and diuers other authors agrée) Samothes was the founder of Celtica, which conteined in it (as Bale witneſſeth) a great part of Europe, but ſpecíallie thoſe countries which now are called by the names of Gallia and Britannia.

Britaine inhabited ſhortlie after the flood.

Thus was this Iland inhabited and peopled within 200 yéeres after the flood by the children of Japhet the ſonne of Noah: & this is not onlie proued by Annius, writing vpon Beroſus, but alſo confirmed by Moſes in the ſcripture, where he writeth, that of the offſpring of Japhet, the Iles of the Gentiles (wherof Britain is one) were ſorted into regions in the time of Phaleg the ſonne of Hiber, who was borne at the time of the diuiſion of languages. Herevpon Theophilus hath theſe words: Cum priſcis temporibus pauci forent homines in Arabia & Chaldæa, poſt linguarum diuiſionem aucti & multiplicati paulatim ſunt: hinc quidam abierunt verſus orientem, quidam conceſſere ad partes maioris continentis, alij porrò profecti ſunt ad ſeptentrionem ſedes quæſituri, nec priùs deſierunt terram vbiq; occupare, quàm etiam Britannos in Arctois climatibus acceſſerint, &c. That is; Theophilus epiſcop. Antioch. ad Antol. lib. 2. The words of Theophilus a doctor of the church, who liued an. Dom. 160.

When at the first there were not manie men in Arabia and Chaldæa, it came to passe, that after the diuision of toongs, they began somewhat better to increase and multiplie, by which occasion some of them went toward the east, and some toward the parts of the great maine land: diuers went also northwards to seeke them dwelling places, neither staid they to repleniſh the earth as they went, till they came vnto the Iles of Britaine, lieng vnder the north pole. Thus far Theophilus.

These things considered, Gildas the Britaine had great reason to thinke, that this countrie had bene inhabited from the beginning. And Polydor Virgil was with no lesse consideration hereby induced to confesse, that the Ile of Britaine had receiued inhabitants forthwith after the floud.

Of Samothes, Magus, Sarron, Druis, and Bardus, fiue kings succeeding each other in regiment ouer the Celts and Samotheans, and how manie hundred yeeres the Celts inhabited this Iland.

The second Chapter.

Gen.2. SAmothes the first begotten sonne of Japhet called by Moses Mesech, by others Dis, receiued for his portion (according to the report of Wolfgangus Lazius) all the countrie lieng betweene the riuer of Rhene and the Pyrenian mountains, where he founded the kingdome of Celtica ouer his people called Celtæ. Which name Bale affirmeth to haue bene indifferent to the inhabitants both of the countrie of Gallia, and the Ile of Britaine, & that he planted colonies of men (brought forth of the east parts) in either of them, first in the maine land, and after in the Iland. He is reported by Berosus to haue excelled all men of that age in learning and knowledge: and also is thought by Bale to haue imparted the same among his people; namelie, the vnderstanding of the sundrie courses of the starres, the order of inferiour things, with manie other matters incident to the morall and politike gouernment of mans life: and to haue deliuered the same in the Phenician letters: out of which the Greekes (according to the opinion of Archilochus) deuised & deriued the Greeke characters, insomuch that Xenophon and Iosephus doo constantlie report (although Diogenes Laertius be against it) that both the Greekes and other nations receiued their letters and learning first from these countries. Of this king and his learning arose a sect of philosophers (saith Annius) first in Britaine, and after in Gallia, the which of his name were called Samothei. They (as Aristotle and Secion write) were passing skilfull both in the law of God and man: and for that cause exceedinglie giuen to religion, especiallie the inhabitants of this Ile of Britaine, insomuch that the whole nation did not onelie take the name of them, but the Iland it selfe (as Bale and doctor Caius agree) came to be called Samothea, which was the first peculiar name that euer it had, and by the which it was especiallie knowne before the arriuall of Albion.

Magus the son of Samothes

MAgus the sonne of Samothes, after the death of his father, was the second king of Celtica, by whome (as Berosus writeth) there were manie townes builded among the Celts, which by the witnesse of Annius did beare the addition of their founder Magus: of which townes diuers are to be found in Ptolomie. And Antoninus a painfull surueior of the world and searcher of cities, maketh mention of foure of them here in Britaine, Sitomagus, Neomagus, Noiomagus, and Nouiomagus. Neomagus sir Thomas Eliot writeth to haue stood where the citie of Chester now standeth; Noiomagus, George Lillie placeth where the towne of Buckingham is now remaining. Beside this, Bale doth so highlie commend the foresaid Magus for his learning renowmed ouer all the world, that he would haue the Persians, and other nations of the south and west parts, to deriue the name of their diuines called Magi from him. In deed Rauisius Textor, and sir John Prise affirme, that in the daies of Plinie, the Britons were so expert in art magike, that they might be thought to haue first deliuered the same to the Persians. What the name of Magus importeth, and of what profession the Magi were, Tullie declareth at large, and Mantuan in briefe, after this maner:

Annius in comment. super nouam. Geogr. De diui. lib.1. De fastis li.5.

Ille penes Persis Magus est, qui sidera norit,
Qui sciat herbarum vires cultumq; deorum,
Persepoli facit ista Magos prudentia triplex.

The Persians terme him Magus, that the course of starres dooth knowe,
The power of herbs, and worship due to God that man dooth owe,
By threefold knowledge thus the name of Magus then dooth growe.

Sarron the sonne of Magus, De ant.Cant. lib.1. Bale script. Brit.cent.1.

SArron the third king of the Celts succeeded his father Magus in gouernement of the countrie of Gallia, and the Ile Samothea, wherein as (D. Caius writeth) he founded certaine publike places for them that professed learning, which Berosus affirmeth to be done, to the intent to restraine the wilfull outrage of men, being as then but raw and void of all ciuilitie. Also it is thought by Annius, that he was the first author of those kind of philosophers, which were called Sarronides, of whom Diodorus Siculus writeth in this sort: There are (saith he) among the Celts certaine diuines and philosophers called Sarronides, whom aboue all other they haue in great estimation. For it is the manner among them, not without a philosopher to make anie sacrifice: sith they are of beleefe, that sacrifices ought onelie to be made by such as are skilfull in the diuine mysteries, as of those who are nearest vnto God, by whose intercession they thinke all good things are to be required of God, and whose aduise they vse and follow, as well in warre as in peace.

Lib.6. ,, ,, ,, ,, ,, ,, ,, ,,

Druis the son of Sarron.

DRuis, whom Seneca calleth Dzyus, being the sonne of Sarron, was after his father established the fourth king of Celtica, indifferentlie reigning as wel ouer the Celts as Britons, or rather (as the inhabitants of this Ile were then called) Samotheans. This prince is commended by Berosus to be so plentifullie indued with wisedome and learning, that Annius taketh him to be the vndoubted author of the begining and name of the philosophers called Druides, whome Cæsar and all other ancient Greeke and Latine writers do affirme to haue had their begining in Britaine, and to haue bin brought from thence into Gallia, insomuch that when there arose any doubt in that countrie touching any point of their discipline, they did repaire to be resolued therein into Britaine, where, speciallie in the Ile of Angleſey (as Humfrey Llhoyd witnesseth) they made their principall abode. Touching their vsages manie things are written by Aristotle, Secion, Plinie, Laertius, Bodinus, and others: which I will gather in briefe, and set downe as followeth. They had (as Cæsar saith) the charge of common & priuate sacrifices, the the disculling of points of religion, the bringing vp of youth, the determining of matters in variance, with full power to interdict so manie from the sacrifice of their gods and the companie of men, as disobeied their award. Polydore affirmeth, how they taught, that mens soules could not die, but departed from one bodie to another, and that to the intent to make men valiant and dreadlesse of death. Tullie writeth, that partlie by tokens, and partlie by surmises, they would foretell things to come. And by the report of Hector Boetius, some of them were not ignorant of the immortalitie of the one and euerlasting God. All these things they had written in the Greeke tong, insomuch that Wolf. Lazius (vpon the report of Marcellinus) declareth how the Greeke letters were first brought to Athens by Timagenes from the Druides. And herevpon it commeth also to passe, that the British tong hath in it remaining at this day some smacke of the Greeke. Among other abuses of the Druides, they had (according to Diodorus) one custome to kill men, and by the falling, bleeding, and dismembring of them, to diuine of things to come: for the which and other wicked practises, their sect was first condemned for abhominable (as some haue written) and dissolued in Gallia (as Auentinus witnesseth) by Tiberius and Claudius the emperours; and lastlie abolished here in Britaine (by the report of Caius) when the gospell of Christ by the preaching of Fugatius and Damianus was receiued among the Britaines, vnder Lucius king of Britaine, about the yeare of our sauior, 179.

Bardus the sonne of Druis.

BArdus the sonne of Druis succeeded his father in the kingdome of Celtica, and was the fift king ouer the Celtes and Samotheans, amongst whom he was highlie renoumed (as appeareth by Berosus) for inuention of ities and musicke, wherein Annius of Viterbo writeth, that he trained his people: and of such as excelled in this knowledge, he made an order of philosophicall poets or heraulds, calling them by his owne name Bardi. And it should seeme by doctor Caius and maister Bale, that Cæsar found some of them here at his arriuall in this Ile, and reported that they had also their first begining in the same. The profession and vsages of these Bardi, Nonnius, Strabo, Diodorus, Stephanus, Bale, and sir John Prise, are in effect reported after this sort. They did vse to record the noble exploits of the ancient capteins, and to drawe the pedegrées and genealogies of such as were liuing. They would frame pleasant ities and songs, learne the same by heart, and sing them to instruments at solemne feasts and assemblies of noble men and gentlemen. Wherefore they were had in so high estimation, that if two hosts had bene readie ranged to ioine in battell, and that any of them had fortuned to enter among them, both the hosts (as well the enimies as the friends) would haue holden their hands, giuen eare vnto them, and ceassed from fight, vntill these Bards had gone out of the battell. Of these Bards Lucane saith,

And make their lasting praise to time of later age rebound.

H. F.

Because the names of these poets were neither discrepant from the ciuilitie of the Romans, nor repugnant to the religion of the Christians, they (of all the other sects before specified) were suffered onlie to continue vnabolished in all ages, insomuch that there flourished of them among the Britains (according to Bale) before the birth of Christ, Plenidius and Dronius: after Christ (as Prise recounteth) Thalesine, and the two Merlins, Melkin, Elaskirion, and others: and of late dates among the Welshmen, Dauid Die, Jollo Gough, Dauid ap William, with an infinite number more. And in Wales there are sundrie of them (as Caius reporteth) remaining vnto this day; where they are in their language called (as Leland writeth) Barthes. Also by the witnes of Humfrey Llhoyd, there is an Iland neere vnto Wales, called Insula Bardorum, and Bardsey, whereof the one name in Latine, and the other in Saxon or old English, signifieth the Iland of the Bardes or Barthes.

Thus farre the gouernement of the Celts in this Ile.

An appendix to the former chapter.

AFter Bardus, the Celts (as Bale saith) loathing the streict ordinances of their ancient kings, and betaking themselues to pleasure and idlenesse, were in short time, and with small labour brought vnder the subiection of the giant Albion, the sonne of Neptune, who altering the state of things in this Iland, streicted the name of Celtica and the Celts within the bounds of Gallia, from whence they came first to inhabit this land vnder the conduct of Samothes, as before ye haue heard, accordinglie as Annius hath gathered out of Berosus the Chaldean, who therein agreeth also with the scripture, the saieng of Theophilus the doctor, and the generall consent of all writers, which fullie consent, that the first inhabitants of this Ile came out of the parties of Gallia, although some of them dissent about the time and maner of their comming. Sir Brian Tuke thinketh it to be ment of the arriuall of Brute, when he came out of those countries into this Ile. Cæsar and Tacitus séeme to be of opinion, that those Celts which first inhabited here, came ouer to view the countrie for trade of merchandize. Bodinus would haue them to come in (a Gods name) from Languedoc, and so to name this land Albion, of a citie in Languedoc named Albie. Beda, and likewise Polydore (who followeth him) affirme that they came from the coasts of Armorica, which is now called little Britaine.

Bale. Annius. Theophilus. Sir Brian Tuke Cæsar. Tacitus. Bodinus. Beda. Polydor.

But that the authorities afore recited are sufficient to proue the time that this Iland was first inhabited by the Celts, the old possessors of Gallia; not onelie the neerneesse of the regions, but the congruence of languages, two great arguments of originels do fullie confirme the same. Bodinus writeth vpon report, that the British and Celtike language was all one. But whether that be true or not, I am not able to affirme, bicause the Celtike tong is long sithens growne wholie out of vse. Howbeit some such Celtike words as remaine in the writings of old authours may be perceiued to agrée with the Welsh tong, being the vncorrupted speech of the ancient Britains. In déed Pausanias the Grecian maketh mention how the Celts in their language called a horsse Marc: and by that name do the Welshmen call a horsse to this day: and the word Trimarc in Pausanias, signifieth in the Celtike tong, three horsses.

Bodinus. Pausanias.

Thus it appeareth by the authoritie of writers, by situation of place, and by affinitie of language, that this Iland was first found and inhabited by the Celts, that there name from Samothes to Albion continued here the space of 310 yeares or there abouts. And finallie it is likelie, that aswell the progenie as the speech of them is partlie remaining in this Ile among the inhabitants, and speciallie the British, euen vnto this day.

The third Chapter.

Bale.

NEptunus called by Moses (as some take it) Nephthuim, the first sonne of Misris, after the account of Annius, and the brother of Hercules, had appointed him of his father (as Diodorus writeth) the gouernement of the ocean sea: wherefore he furnished himselfe of sundrie light ships for the more redie passage by water, which in the end grew to the number of a full naute: & so by continuall exercise he became so skilfull, and therewith so mightie vpon the waters (as Higinus & Pictonius do write) that he was not onelie called the king, but also esteemed the god of the seas. He had to wife a ladie called Amphitrita, who was also honored as goddesse of the seas, of whose bodie he begat sundrie children: and (as Bale reporteth) he made euerie one of them king of an Iland. In the Ile of Britaine he landed his fourth son called Albion the giant, who brought the same vnder his subiection. And herevpon it resteth, that Iohn Textor, and Polydor Virgil made mention, that light shippes were first inuented in the Britith seas, and that the same were couered round with the hides of beasts, for defending them from the surges and waues of the water.

This Albion being put by his father in possession of this Ile of Britaine, within short time subdued the Samotheans, the first inhabitantes thereof, without finding any great resistance, for that (as before ye haue heard) they had giuen ouer the practise of all warlike and other painefull exercises, and through vse of effeminate pleasures, whereunto they had giuen themselues ouer, they were become now vnapt to withstand the force of their enimies: and so (by the testimonie of Nicholaus Perottus, Rigmanus Philesius, Aristotle, and Humfrey Llhoyd, with diuers other, both forraine & home-writers) this Iland was first called by the name of Albion, hauing at one time both the name and inhabitants changed from the line of Japhet vnto the accursed race of Cham.

Nichol. Perot. Rigmanus Philesius. Aristotle. Hum. Lhoyd.

This Albion (that thus changed the name of this Ile) and his companie, are called giants, which signifieth none other than a tall kind of men, of that vncorrupt stature and highnesse naturallie incident to the first age (which Berosus also seemeth to allow, where he writeth, that Noah was one of the giants) and were not so called only of their monstrous greatnesse, as the common people thinke (although in deed they exceeded the vsuall stature of men now in these daies) but also for that they toke their name of the soile where they were borne: for Gigantes signifieth the sons of the earth: the Aborigines, or (as Cesar calleth them) Indigenæ) that is, borne and bred out of the earth where they inhabited.

Berosus.

what Gigantes signifie.

Thus some thinke, but verelie although that their opinion is not to be allowed in any condition, which maintaine that there should be any Aborigines, or other kind of men than those of Adams line; yet that there haue been men of far greater stature than are now to be found, is sufficientlie proued by the huge bones of those that haue been found in our time, or lately before: whereof here to make further relation it shall not need, sith in the description of Britaine ye shall find it sufficientlie declared.

Against the opinion of the Aborigines.

But now to our purpose. As Albion held Britaine in subiection, so his brother Bergion kept Ireland and the Orkenies vnder his rule and dominion, and hearing that their cosine Hercules Lybicus hauing finished his conquests in Spaine, meant to passe through Gallia into Italie, against their brother Lotharigo that oppressed Italie, vnder subiection of him & other of his brethren the sons also of Neptune; as well Albion as Bergion assembling their powers togither, passed ouer into Gallia, to stoppe the passage of Hercules, whose intention was to vanquish and destroie those tyrants the sonnes of Neptune, & their complices that kept diuers countries and regions vnder the painefull yoke of their heauie thraldome.

Bale. Bergion brother to Albion. Hercules Lybicus.

The cause that moued Hercules thus to pursue vpon those tyrants now reigning thus in the world, was, for that not long before, the greatest part of them had conspired togither and slaine his father Misris, not withstanding that they were nephues to the same Misris, as sonnes to his brother Neptune, and not contented with his slaughter, they diuided his carcase also amongst them, so that each of them got a peece in token of reioising at their murtherous atchiued enterprise.

The cause why Hercules pursued his cosins.

For this cause Hercules (whome Moses calleth Laabin) proclamed warres against them all in reuenge of his fathers death: and first he killed Trispon and Busiris in Aegypt, then Anteus in Mauritania, & the Gerions in Spaine, which enterprise atchiued, he led his armie towardes Italie, and by the way passed through a part of Gallia, where Albion and Bergion hauing vnited their powers togither, were readie to receiue him with battell: and so neere to the mouth of the riuer called Rhosne, in Latine Rhodanus, they met & fought. At the first there was a right terrible and cruell conflict betwixt them. And albeit that Hercules had the greatest number of men, yet was it verie doubtfull a great while, to whether part the glorie of that daies worke would bend. Whereupon when the victorie began outright to turne vnto Albion, and to his brother Bergion, Hercules perceiuing the danger and likelihood of vtter losse of that battell, spectallie for that his men had wasted their weapons, he caused those that stood still and were not otherwise occupied, to stoppe downe, and to gather vp stones, whereof in that place there was great plentie, which by his commandement they bestowed so freelie vpon their enimies, that in the end hee obteined the victorie, and did not only put his aduersaries to flight, but also slue Albion there in the field, togither with his brother Bergion, and the most part of all their whole armie. This was the end of Albion, and his brother Bergion, by the valiant prowesse of Hercules, who as one appointed by Gods prouidence to subdue the cruell & vnmercifull tyrants, spent his time to the benefit of mankind, deliuering the oppressed from the heauie yoke of miserable thraldome, in euerie place where he came.

Hercules discomfiteth his enimies.

Albion is slaine.

And by the order of this battell wee maye learne whereof the poets had their inuention, when they faine in their writings, that Iupiter holpe his sonne Hercules, by throwing downe stones from heauen in this battell against Albion and Bergion. Moreouer, from henceforth was this Ile of Britaine called Albion (as before we haue said) after the name of the said Albion: because he was established chiefe ruler and king thereof both by his grandfather Misris, and his father Neptune that cunning sailour reigning therein (as Bale saith) by the space of 44. yeares, yeares, till finally he was ſlaine in maner afore remembred by his vncle Hercules Libicus.

After that Hercules had thus vanquiſhed and deſtroied his enimies, hée paſſed to and fro thorough Gallia, ſuppreſſing the tyrants in euerie part where he came, and reſtoring the people vnto a reaſonable kinde of libertie, vnder lawfull gouernours. This Hercules (as we find) builded the citie Alexia in Burgongne, nowe called Alize. Moreouer, by Lilius Giraldus in the life of Hercules it is auouched, that the ſame Hercules came ouer hither into Britaine. And this doth Giraldus write by warrant of ſuch Britons as (ſaith he) haue ſo written themſelues, which thing peraduenture he hath read in Gildas the ancient Briton poet: a booke that (as he confeſſeth in the 5. dialog of his hiſtories of poets) he hath ſeene. The ſame thing alſo is confirmed by the name of an head of land in Britaine called Promontorium Herculis, as in Ptolomie ye may read, which is thought to take name of his arriuall at that place. Thus much for Albion and Hercules.

Diuers opinions why this Ile was called Albion. See more hereof in the deſcription.

But now, whereas it is not denied of anie, that this Ile was called anciently by the name of Albion: yet there be diuers opinions how it came by that name: for manie do not allow of this hiſtorie of Albion the giant. But for ſo much as it appertaineth rather to the deſcription than to the hiſtorie of this Ile, to rip vp and lay forth the ſecret myſteries of ſuch matters: and becauſe I thinke that this opinion which is here auouched, how it toke that name of the forſaid Albion, ſonne to Neptune, may be confirmed with as good authoritie as ſome of the other, I here paſſe ouer the reſt, & procéd with the hiſtorie.

When Albion chiefe capteine of the giants was ſlaine, the reſidue that remained at home in the Ile, continued without any rule or reſtraint of law, in ſo much that they fell to ſuch a diſſolute order of life, that they ſéemed little or nothing to differ from brute beaſts: and thoſe are they which our ancient chronicles call the giants, who were ſo named, as well for the huge proportion of their ſtature (ſithens as before is ſaid, that age brought forth far greater men than are now liuing) as alſo for that they were the firſt, or at the leaſt the furtheſt in remembrance of any that had inhabited this countrie. For this word Gigines, or Gegines, from whence our word giant (as ſome take it) is deriued, is a Gréeke word, and ſignifieth, Borne or bred of or in the earth, for our fore-elders, ſpecially the Gentiles, being ignorant of the true beginning of mankind, were perſuaded, that the firſt inhabitants of any countrie were bred out of the earth, and therefore when they could go no higher, reckoning the deſcents of their predeceſſours, they would name him Terræ filius, The ſonne of the earth: and ſo the giants whom the poets faine to haue ſought to make battell againſt heauen are called the ſonnes of the earth: and the firſt inhabitants generally of euery countrie were of the Gréekes called Gigines, or Gegines, and of the Latines Aborigines, and Indigenæ, that is, People borne of the earth from the beginning, and comming from no other countrie, but bred within the ſame.

Terræ filius what it ſignifieth.

Aborigines, Indigenæ.

These giants and firſt inhabitants of this Ile continued in their beaſtlie kind of life vnto the arriuall of the ladies, which ſome of our chronicles ignorantly write to be the daughters of Diocleſian the king of Aſſyria, whereas in déed they haue béene deceiued, in taking the word Danaus to be short written for Diocleſianus: and by the ſame meanes haue diuers words and names béene miſtaken, both in our chronicles, and in diuers other ancient written works. But this is a fault that learned men ſhould not ſo much trouble themſelues about, conſidering the ſame hath bin alreadie found by ſundrie authors ling ſithens, as Hugh the Italian, John Harding, John Rouſe of Warwike, and others, ſpeciallie by the helpe of Dauid Pencair a Britiſh hiſtorie, who recite the hiſtorie vnder the name of Danaus and his daughters. And becauſe we would not any man to thinke, that the hiſtorie of theſe daughters of Danaus is onelie of purpoſe deuiſed, and brought in place of Diocleſianus, to excuſe the imperfection of our writers, whereas there was either no ſuch hiſtorie (or at the leaſt no ſuch women that arriued in this Ile) the authoritie of Nennius a Briton writer may be auouched, who wrote aboue 900. yeares paſt, and maketh mention of the arriuall of ſuch ladies.

The miſtaking of the name of Diocleſianus for Danaus.

Nennius.

To be ſhort, the hiſtorie is thus. Belus the ſonne of Epaphus, or (as ſome writers haue) of Neptune and Libies (whome Iſis after the death of Apis married) had iſſue two ſonnes: the firſt Danaus, called alſo Armeus; and Aegyptus called alſo Rameſes: theſe two were kings among the Aegyptians. Danaus the elder of the two, hauing in his rule the vpper region of Aegypt, had by ſundrie wiues 50. daughters, with whome his brother Aegyptus, gaping for the dominion of the whole, did inſtantlie labour, that his ſonnes being alſo 50. in number, might match. But Danaus hauing knowledge by ſome propheſie or oracle, that a ſonne in law of his ſhould be his death, refuſed ſo to beſtow his daughters. Hereupon grew warre betwixt the brethren, in the end whereof, Danaus being the weaker, was inforced to flée his countrie, and ſo prepared a nauie, imbarked himſelfe and his daughters, and with them paſſed ouer into Gréece, where he found meanes to diſpoſſeſſe Geleno (ſonne to Stenelas king of Argos) of his rightfull inheritance, driuing him out of his countrie, and reigned in his place by the aſſiſtance of the Argiues that had conceiued an hatred towardes Geleno, and a great liking towardes Danaus, who in verie déed did ſo farre excell the kings that had reigned there before him, that the Gréekes in remembrance of him were after called Danai.

Danaus. Aegyptus. Higinus.

But his brother Aegyptus, taking great diſdaine for that he and his ſonnes were in ſuch ſort deſpiſed of Danaus, ſent his ſonnes with a great armie to make warre againſt their vncle, giuing them in charge not to returne, till they had either ſlaine Danaus, or obteined his daughters in mariage. The yong gentlemen according to their fathers commandement, being arriued in Greece, made ſuch warre againſt Danaus, that in the end he was conſtrained to giue vnto thoſe his 50. nephues his 50. daughters, to ioine with them in mariage, and ſo they were. But as the prouerbe ſaith, In truſt appeared treacherie. For on the firſt night of the mariage, Danaus deliuered to ech of his daughters a ſword, charging them that when their huſbands after their bankets and paſtimes were once brought into a ſound ſléepe, ech of them ſhould ſlea hir huſband, menacing them with death vnleſſe they fulfilled his commandement. They all therefore obeied the will of their father, Hypermneſtra onely excepted, with whom preuailed more the loue of kinred and wedlocke, than the feare of hir fathers diſpleaſure: for ſhee alone ſpared the life of hir huſband Lynceus, waking him out of his ſléepe, and warning him to depart and flée into Aegypt to his father. He therefore hauing all the wicked practiſes reuealed to him by his wife, followed hir aduice, and ſo eſcaped.

Now when Danaus perceiued how all his daughters had accompliſhed his commandement, ſauing onelie Hypermneſtra, he cauſed hir to be brought forth into iudgement, for diſobeieng him in a matter wherein both the ſafetie and loſſe of his life reſted: but ſhe was acquitted by the Argiues, & discharged. Howbeit his father kept hir in prison, and seeking to find out other husbands for his other daughters that had obeied his pleasure in sleaing their first husbands, long it was yer he could find any to match with them: for the heinous offense committed in the slaughter of their late husbands, was yet too fresh in memorie, and their bloud not wiped out of mind. Neuertheless, to bring his purpose the better to passe, he made proclamation, that his daughters should demand no iointures, and euerie suter should take his choise without respect to the age of the ladie, or abilitie of him that came to make his choise, but so as first come best serued, according to their owne phantasies and likings. Howbeit when this policie also failed, & would not serue his turne, he deuised a game of running, ordeining therewith, that whosoeuer got the best price should haue the first choise among all the sisters; and he that got the second, should chose next to the first; and so forth, eche one after an other, according to the triall of their swiftnesse of foote.

How much this practise auailed, I know not: but certeine it is, diuers of them were bestowed, either by this or some other meanes, for we find that Autonomes was maried to Architeles, Chrysanta or (as Pausanias saith) Scea was matched with Archandrus, Amaome with Neptunus Equestris, on whome he begat Nauplius.

Higinus. But now to returne vnto Lynceus, whome his wife Hypermnestra preserued, as before ye haue heard. After he was once got out of the reach and danger of his father in law king Danaus, he gaue Pausanias. knowledge thereof to his wife, in raising a fire on heigth beaconwise, accordingly as she had requested him to do at his departure from hir: and this was at a place which afterwards toke name of him, and was called Lyncea. Upon his returne into Aegypt, he gaue his father to vnderstand the whole circumstance of the trecherous crueltie vsed by his vncle and his daughters in the murder of his brethren, and how hardly he himselfe had escaped death out of his vncles handes. Whereupon at time conuenient he was furnished forth with men and ships by his father, for the spedie reuenge of that heinous, vnnaturall and most disloiall murder, in which enterprise he sped him forth with such diligence, that in short time he found meanes to dispatch his vncle Danaus, set his wife Hypermnestra at libertie, and subdued the whole kingdome of the Argiues.

This done, he caused the daughters of Danaus (so many as remained within the limits of his dominion) to be sent for, whome he thought not worthie to liue, because of the cruell murther which they had committed on his brethren: but yet for that they were his wiues sisters, he would not put them to death, but commanded them to be thrust into a ship, without maister, mate or mariner, and so to be turned into the maine ocean sea, and to take and abide such fortune as should chance vnto them. These ladies thus imbarked and left to the mercy of the seas, Harding and Iohn Rous out of Dauid Pencair. by hap were brought to the coasts of this Ile then called Albion, where they toke land, and in seeking to prouide themselues of victuals by pursute of wilde beasts, met with no other inhabitants, than the rude and sauage giants mentioned before, whome our historiens for their beastlie kind of life do call diuells. With these monsters did these ladies (finding none other to satisfie the motions of their sensuall lust) ioine in the act of venerie, and ingendred a race of people in proportion nothing differing from their fathers that begat them, nor in conditions from their mothers that bare them.

But now peraduenture ye will thinke that I haue forgotten my selfe, in rehearsing this historie of the ladies arriuall here, bicause I make no mention of Albina, which should be the eldest of the sisters, of whome this land should also take the name of Albion. To this we answer, that as the name of their father hath bene mistaken, so likewise hath the whole course of the historie in this behalfe. For though we shall admit that to be true which is rehearsed (in maner as before ye haue heard) of the arriuall here of those ladies; yet certeine it is that none of them bare the name of Albina, from whome this land might be called Albion. For further assurance whereof, if any Higinus. man be desirous to know all their names, we haue (The names of the daughters of Danaus. thought good here to rehearse them as they be found in Higinus, Pausanias, and others. 1 Idea, 2 Philomela, 3 Scillo, 4 Phicomene, 5 Euippe, 6 Demodites, 7 Hyale, 8 Crite, 9 Damone, 10 Hipothoe, 11 Mirmidone, 12 Euridice, 13 Chleo, 14 Arania, 15 Cleopatra, 16 Phylea, 17 Hyppareta, 18 Chrysothemis, 19 Heranta, 20 Armoaste, 21 Danaes, 22 Scea, 23 Glaucippe, 24 Demophile, 25 Autodice, 26 Polyrena, 27 Hecate, 28 Achamantis, 29 Arsalte, 30 Monuste, 31 Aminone, 32 Helice, 33 Amaome, 34 Polybe, 35 Helicte, 36 Electra, 37 Eubule, 38 Daphilice, 39 Hero, 40 Europomene, 41 Critomedia, 42 Pyrene, 43 Eupheno, 44 Themistagora, 45 Paleno, 46 Erato, 47 Autonomes, 48 Itea, 49 Chrysanta, 50 Hypermnestra. These were the names of those ladies the daughters of Danaus: howbeit, which they were that should arriue in this Ile, we can not say: but it sufficeth to vnderstand, that none of them hight Albina. So that, whether the historie of their landing here should be true or not, it is all one for the matter concerning the name of this Ile, which vndoubtedlie was called Albion, either of Albion the giant (as before I haue See more in the description. said) or by some other occasion.

And thus much for the ladies, whose strange aduenture of their arriuall here, as it may seeme to manie (with good cause) incredible, so without further auouching it for truth, I leaue it to the consideration of the reader, to thinke thereof as reason shall moue him; sith I see not how either in this, or in other things of such antiquitie, we cannot haue sufficient warrant otherwise than by likelie coniectures. Which as in this historie of the ladies they are not most probable, yet haue we shewed the likeliest, that (as we thinke) may be deemed to agree with those authors that haue written of their comming into this Ile. But as for an assured proofe that this Ile was inhabited with people before the comming of Brute, I trust it may suffice which before is recited out of Annius de Viterbo, Theophilus, Gildas, and other, although much more might be said: as of the comming hither of Diuris, as well as in the other parties of the world: and likewise of Ulysses his being here, Ulysses in Britaine. who in performing some vow which he either then did make, or before had made, erected an altar in that part of Scotland which was ancientlie called Caledonia, as Iulius Solinus Polyhistor in plaine words Iulius Solinus. doth record.

¶ Upon these considerations I haue no doubt to deliuer vnto the reader, the opinion of those that thinke this land to haue bene inhabited before the arriuall here of Brute, trusting it may be taken in good part, sith we haue but shewed the coniectures of others, till time that some sufficient learned man shall take vpon him to decipher the doubts of all these matters. Neuertheless, I thinke good to aduertise the reader that these stories of Samothes, Magus, Sarron, Druis, and Bardus, do relie onelie vpon the authoritie of Berosus, whom most diligent antiquaries do reiect as a fabulous and counterfet author, and Vacerius hath laboured to proue the same by a speciall treatise latelie published at Rome.

THE SECOND BOOKE of the Hiſtorie of England.

Of Brute and his deſcent, how he ſlue his father in hunting, his baniſhment, his letter to king Pan*draſus, againſt whom he wageth* battell, taketh him priſoner, and concludeth peace vpon conditions.

The firſt Chapter.

HItherto haue we ſpoken of the inhabitants of this Ile before the comming of Brute, although ſome will needs haue it, that he was the firſt which inhabited the ſame with his people deſcended of the Troians, ſome few giants onelie excepted whom he vtterlie deſtroied, and left not one of them aliue through the whole Ile. But as we ſhall not doubt of Brutes comming hither, ſo may we aſſuredly thinke, that he found the Ile peopled either with the generation of thoſe which Albion the giant had placed here, or ſome other kind of people whom he did ſubdue, and ſo reigned as well ouer them as ouer thoſe which he brought with him. Humfr. Lhoyd.

This Brutus, or Bryttus [for this letter (Y) hath of ancient time had the ſounds both of V and I] (as the author of the booke which Geffrey of Monmouth tranſlated doth affirme) was the ſonne of Siluius, the ſonne of Aſcanius, the ſonne of Aeneas the Troian, begotten of his wife Creuſa, ſometime borne in Troie, before the citie was deſtroied. But as other doo take it, the author of that booke (whatſoeuer he was) and ſuch other as follow him, are deceiued onelie in this point, miſtaking the matter, in that Poſthumus the ſonne of Aeneas (begotten of his wife Lauinia, and borne after his fathers deceaſſe in Italie) was called Aſcanius, who had iſſue a ſonne named Julius, who (as theſe other doo coniecture) was the father of Brute, that noble chieftaine and aduenturous leader of thoſe people, which being deſcended (for the more part in the fourth generation) from thoſe Troians that eſcaped with life, when that roiall citie was deſtroied by the Grekes, got poſſeſſion of this worthie and moſt famous Ile. Harding. Alex. Neuil. W. Har.

To this opinion Giouan Villani a Florentine in his vniuerſall hiſtorie, ſpeaking of Aeneas and his offſpring kings in Italie, ſeemeth to agree, where he ſaith: Siluius (the ſonne of Aeneas by his wife Lauinia) fell in loue with a neece of his mother Lauinia, and by hir had a ſonne, of whom ſhe died in trauell, and therefore was called Brutus, who after as he grew in ſome ſtature, and hunting in a forreſt ſlue his father vnwares, and thereupon for feare of his grandfather Siluius Poſthumus he fled the countrie, and with a retinue of ſuch as followed him, paſſing through diuers ſeas, at length he arriued in the Ile of Britaine.

Concerning therefore our Brute, whether his father Julius was ſonne to Aſcanius the ſonne of Aeneas by his wife Creuſa, or ſonne to Poſthumus called alſo Aſcanius, and ſonne to Aeneas by his wife Lauinia, we will not further ſtand. But this, we find, that when he came to the age of 15. yeeres, ſo that he was now able to ride abrode with his father into the forreſts and chaſes, he fortuned (either by miſhap, or by Gods prouidence) to ſtrike his father with an arrow, in ſhooting at a deere, of which wound he alſo died. His grandfather (whether the ſame was Poſthumus, or his elder brother) hearing of this great miſfortune that had chanced to his ſonne Siluius, liued not long after, but died for verie greefe and ſorow (as is ſuppoſed) which he conceiued thereof. And the yong gentleman, immediatlie after he had ſlaine his father (in maner before alledged) was baniſhed his countrie, and thereupon got him into Grecia, where trauelling the countrie, he lighted by chance among ſome of the Troian offſpring, and aſſociating himſelfe with them, grew by meanes of the linage (whereof he was deſcended) in proces of time into great reputation among them: chiefflie by reaſon there were yet diuers of the Troian race, and that of great authoritie in that countrie. For Pyrrhus the ſonne of Achilles, hauing no iſſue by his wife Hermione, maried Andromache, late wife vnto Hector: and by hir had three ſonnes, Poloſſus, Pileus, and Pergamus, who in their time grew to be of great power in thoſe places and countries, and their offſpring likewiſe: whereby Brutus or Bryttus wanted no friendſhip. For euen at his firſt comming thither, diuers of the Troians that remained in ſeruitude, being deſirous of libertie, by flocks reſorted vnto him. And amongſt other, Aſſaracus was one, whom Brute intertained, receiuing at his hands the poſſeſſion of ſundrie forts and places of defenſe, before that the king of thoſe parties could haue vnderſtanding or knowledge of any ſuch thing. Herewith alſo ſuch as were readie to make the aduenture with him, repaired to him on eth ſide, whereupon he firſt placed gariſons in thoſe townes which had bene thus deliuered vnto him, and afterwards with Aſſaracus and the reſidue of the multitude he withdrew into the mountains neere adioining. And thus being made ſtrong with ſuch aſſiſtance, by conſultation had with them that were of moſt authoritie about him, Brute killeth his father. Pauſanias.

him, wrote vnto the king of that countrie called Pandraſus, in forme as followeth.

A letter of Brute to Pandraſus, as I find it ſet downe in Galfride Monumetenſis.

BRute leader of the remnant of the Troian people, to Pandraſus king of the Greekes, ſendeth greeting. Bicauſe it hath beene thought a thing vnworthie, that the people deſcended of the noble linage of Dardanus ſhould be otherwiſe dealt with than the honour of their nobilitie dooth require: they haue withdrawne themſelues within the cloſe couert of the woods. For they haue choſen rather (after the maner of wild beaſts) to liue on fleſh and herbs in libertie, than furniſhed with all the riches in the world to continue vnder the yoke of ſeruile thraldome. But if this their dooing offend thy mightie highneſſe, they are not to be blamed, but rather in this behalfe to be pardoned, ſith euerie captiue priſoner is deſirous to be reſtored vnto his former eſtate and dignitie. You therefore pitieng their caſe, vouchſafe to grant them their abridged libertie, and ſuffer them to remaine in quiet within theſe woods which they haue got into their poſſeſſion: if not ſo, yet giue them licence to depart forth of this countrie into ſome other parts.

The ſight of theſe letters, and requeſt in them conteined, made Pandraſus at the firſt ſomewhat amazed, howbeit deliberating further of the matter, and conſidering their ſmall number, he made no great account of them, but determined out of hand to ſuppreſſe them by force, before they ſhould grow to a greater multitude. And to bring his intention the better to paſſe, he paſſed by a towne called Sparatinum, & marching toward the woods where he thought to haue found his enimies, he was ſuddenlie aſſalted by Brute, who with three thouſand men came forth of the woods, and fiercelie ſetting vpon his enimies, made great ſlaughter of them, ſo that they were vtterlie diſcomfited, & ſought by flight to ſaue themſelues in paſſing a riuer neere hand called Akalon. Brute with his men following faſt vpon the aduerſaries, cauſed them to plunge into the water at aduenture, ſo that manie of them were drowned. Howbeit Antigonus the brother of Pandraſus did what he could to ſtay the Grecians from fleeing, and calling them backe againe did get ſome of them togither, placed them in order, and began a new field: but it nothing auailed, for the Troians preaſing vpon him, tooke him priſoner, ſlue and ſcattred his companie, and ceaſed not till they had rid the fields of all their aduerſaries.

This donne, Brute entering the towne, furniſhed it with ſix hundred able ſouldiours, and afterwards went backe to the reſidue of his people that were incamped in the woods, where he was receiued with vnſpeakeable ioy for this proſperous atchiued enterpriſe. But although this euill ſucceſſe at the firſt beginning ſore troubled Pandraſus, as well for the loſſe of the field, as for the taking of his brother, yet was he rather kindled in deſire to ſeeke reuenge, than otherwiſe diſcouraged. And therefore aſſembling his people againe togither that were ſcattered here and there, he came the next day before the towne of Sparatinum, where he thought to haue found Brute incloſed togither with the priſoners, and therfore he ſhewed his whole endeuour by hard ſiege and fierce aſſaults to force them within to yeeld.

To conclude, ſo long he continued the ſiege, till victuals began to waxe ſcant within, ſo that there was no way but to yeeld, if preſent ſuccour came not to remoue the ſiege: whereupon they ſignified their neceſſitie vnto Brute, who for that he had not power ſufficient to fight with the enimies in open field, he ment to giue them a camiſado in the night ſeaſon, and ſo ordered his buſineſſe, that inforſing a priſoner (named Anacletus whome he had taken in the laſt battell) to ſerue his turne, by conſtreining him to take an oth (which he durſt not for conſcience ſake breake) he found means to encounter with his enimies vpon the aduantage, that he did not onelie ouerthrowe their whole power, but alſo tooke Pandraſus priſoner, whereby all the trouble was ended: and ſhortlie after a perfect peace concluded, vpon theſe conditions following.

First, that Pandraſus ſhould giue his daughter Innogen vnto Brute in mariage, with a competent ſumme of gold and ſiluer for hir dowrie.

Secondlie, to furniſh him and his people with a nauie of ſhips, and to store the ſame with victuals and all other neceſſaries.

Thirdlie, that Brute with his people ſhould haue licence to depart the countrie, to ſeeke aduentures whither ſo euer it ſhould pleaſe them to direct their courſe, without let, impeachment, or trouble to be offered anie waies by the Greeks.

To all theſe conditions (bicauſe they touched not the prerogatiue of his kingdome) Pandraſus did willinglie agree, and likewiſe performed.

The ſecond Chapter.

ALl things being thus brought to paſſe according to Brutes deſire, wind alſo and wether ſeruing the purpoſe, he with his wife Innogen and his people imbarked, and hoiſing vp ſailes departed from the coaſts of Grecia. Now after two daies and a nights ſailing, they arriued at Leogitia (in ſome old written bookes of the Britiſh hiſtorie noted downe Lergetia) an Iland, where they conſulted with an oracle. Brute himſelfe kneeling before the idoll, and holding in his right hand a boll prepared for ſacrifice full of wine, and the bloud of a white hinde, ſpake in this maner as here followeth:

Diua potens nemorum, terror ſylueſtribus apris,
Cui licet anfractus ire per æthereos,
Infernáſq; domos, terreſtria iura reſolue,
Et dic quas terras nos habitare velis:
Dic certam ſedem qua te venerabor in æuum,
Qua tibi virgineis templa dicabo choris.

These verſes (as Ponticus Virunnius and others alſo do geſſe) were written by Gildas Cambrius in his booke intituled Cambreidos, and may thus be Engliſhed:

Thou goddeſſe that dooſt rule the woods and forreſts greene,
And chaſeſt foming boares that flee thine awfull ſight, Thou that maiſt paſſe aloft in airie skies ſo sheene,

And

And walke eke vnder earth in places void of light, Diſcouer earthlie ſtates,
direct our courſe aright,
And ſhew where we ſhall dwell, according to thy will,
In ſeates of ſure abode,
where temples we may dight
For virgins that ſhall ſound thy laud with voices ſhrill.

After this praier and ceremonie done, according to the pagane rite and cuſtome, Brute abiding his anſwer, fell aſléepe: in which ſléepe appeared to him the ſaid goddeſſe vttering this anſwer in the verſes following expreſſed.

Brute, ſub occaſum ſolis trans Gallica regna, Inſula in oceano eſt, vndiq; clauſa mari,
Inſula in oceano eſt, habitata gigantibus olim,
Nunc deſerta quidem, gentibus apta tuis:
Hanc pete, námq; tibi ſedes erit illa perennis,
Hic fiet natis altera Troia tuis:
Hic de prole tua reges naſcentur, & ipſis
Totius terræ ſubditus orbis erit.

Brute, farre by-weſt beyond the Gallike land is found,
An Ile which with the ocean ſeas incloſed is about,
Where giants dwelt ſometime,
but now is deſart ground,
Moſt meet where thou maiſt plant thy ſelfe with all thy rout:
Make thitherwards with ſpeed, for there thou ſhalt find out
An euerduring ſeat, and Troie ſhall riſe anew, Vnto thy race, of whom ſhall kings be borne no dout,
That with their mightie power the world ſhall whole ſubdew.

After he awaked out of ſléepe, and had called his dreame to remembrance, he firſt doubted whether it were a verie dreame, or a true viſion, the goddes hauing ſpoken to him with liuelie voice. Whereupon calling ſuch of his companie vnto him as he thought requiſite in ſuch a caſe, he declared vnto them the whole matter with the circumſtances, whereat they greatlie reioiſing, cauſed mightie bonfires to be made, in the which they caſt wine, milke, and other liquors, with diuers gums and ſpices of moſt ſweet ſmell and ſauour, as in the pagan religion was accuſtomed. Which obſeruances and ceremonies performed and brought to end, they returned ſtreightwaies to their ſhips, and as ſoone as the wind ſerued, paſſed forward on their iournie with great ioy and gladneſſe, as men put in comfort to find out the wiſhed ſeats for their firme and ſure habitations. From hence therefore they caſt about, and making weſtward, firſt arriued in Affrica, and after keeping on their courſe, they paſſed the ſtraits of Gibzalterra, and coaſting alongſt the ſhore on the right hand, they found another companie that were likewiſe deſcended of the Troian progenie, on the coaſts nere where the Pyrenine hils ſhot downe to the ſea, whereof the ſame ſea by good reaſon (as ſome ſuppoſe) was named in thoſe daies Mare Pyrenæum, although hitherto by fault of writers & copiers of the Britiſh hiſtorie receiued, in this place Mare Tyrrhenum, was ſlightlie put downe in ſtead of Pyrenæum.

The miſtaking of thoſe that haue copied the Britiſh hiſtorie putting Mare Tyrrhenum, for Pyrenæum.

The offspring of thoſe Troians, with whom Brute and his companie thus did meet, were a remnant of them that came away with Antenor. Their capteine hight Corineus, a man of great modeſtie and approued wiſedome, and thereto of incomparable ſtrength and boldneſſe.

Brute with his companie landed in Affrike.

The third Chapter.

After that Brute and the ſaid Troians, by conference interchangeablie had, vnderſtood one anothers eſtates, and how they were deſcended from one countrie and progenie, they vnited themſelues togither, greatlie reioiſing that they were ſo fortunatlie met: and hoiſing vp their ſailes, directed their courſe forward ſtill, till they arriued within the mouth of the riuer of Loire, which diuideth Aquitaine from Gall Celtike, where they toke land within the dominion of a king called Goffarius, ſurnamed Pictus, by reaſon he was deſcended of the people Agathyrſi, otherwiſe named Picts, becauſe they vſed to paint their faces and bodies, inſomuch that the richer a man was amongſt them, the more coſt he beſtowed in painting himſelfe; and commonlie the haire of their head was red, or (as probable writers ſay) of ſkie colour. Herodotus calleth them χρυσοφόρους, becauſe they did weare much gold about them. They vſed their wiues in common, and becauſe they are all ſuppoſed to be brethren, there is no ſtrife nor diſcord among them. Of theſe Agathyrſi, it is recorded by the ſaid Herodotus, that they refuſed to ſuccour the Scythians againſt Darius, giuing this reaſon of their refuſall; becauſe they would not make warre againſt him who had done them no wrong. And of this people doth the poet make mention, ſaieng,

The countrie of Poictou (as ſome hold) where the ſaid Goffarius reigned, toke name of this people: likewiſe a part of this our Ile of Britaine now conteined within Scotland, which in ancient time was called Pightland or Pictland, as elſewhere both in this hiſtorie of England, and alſo of Scotland may further appeare. But to our purpoſe.

Pightland or Pictland.

When Goffarius the king of Poictou was aduertiſed of the landing of theſe ſtrangers within his countrie, he ſent firſt certeine of his people to vnderſtand what they ment by their comming a land within his dominion, without licence or leaue of him obteined. They that were thus ſent, came by chance to a place where Corineus with two hundred of the companie were come from the ſhips into a forreſt néere the ſea ſide, to kill ſome veneſon for their ſuſtenance:

Goffarius ſendeth vnto Brute.

nance: and being rebuked with some disdainfull speach of those Poictouins, he shaped them a round answer: insomuch that one of them whose name was Imbert, let driue an arrow at Corineus: but he auoiding the danger thereof, shot againe at Imbert, in reuenge of that iniurie offered, and claue his head in sunder. The rest of the Poictouins fled therevpon, and brought word to Goffarius what had happened: who immediatlie with a mightie armie made forward to encounter with the Troians, and comming to ioine with them in battell, after a sharpe and sore conflict, in the end Brute with his armie obteined a triumphant victorie, speciallie through the noble prowesse of Corineus.

Goffarius escaping from the field, fled into the inner parts of Gallia, making sute for assistance vnto such kings as in those daies reigned in diuers prouinces of that land, who promised to aid him with all their forces, and to expell out of the coasts of Aquitaine, such strangers as without his licence were thus entred the countrie. But Brute in the meane time passed forward, and with fire and sword made hauocke in places where he came: and gathering great spoiles, fraught his ships with plentie of riches. At length he came to the place, where afterwards he built a citie named Turonium, that is, Tours.

Brute spoileth the countrie.

Turonium or Tours built by Brute.

Here Goffarius with such Galles as were assembled to his aid, gaue battell againe vnto the Troians that were incamped to abide his comming. Where after they had fought a long time with singular manhood on both parties: the Troians in fine oppressed with multitudes of aduersaries (euen thirtie times as manie mo as the Troians) were constreined to retire into their campe, within the which the Galles kept them as besieged, lodging round about them, and purposing by famine to compell them to yéeld themselues vnto their mercie. But Corineus taking counsell with Brute, deuised to depart in the darke of the night out of the campe, to lodge himselfe with three thousand chosen souldiers secretlie in a wood, and there to remaine in couert till the morning that Brute should come forth and giue a charge vpon the enimies, wherewith Corineus should breake forth and assaile the Galles on the backes.

Goffarius hauing renewed his forces, fighteth eftsoones with Brute.

This policie was put in practise, and toke such effect as the deuisers themselues wished: for the Galles being sharplie assailed on the front by Brute and his companie, were now with the sudden comming of Corineus (who set vpon them behind on their backes) brought into such a feare, that incontinentlie they toke them to flight, whom the Troians egerlie pursued, making no small slaughter of them as they did ouertake them. In this battell Brute lost manie of his men, and amongst other one of his nephues named Turinus, after he had shewed maruellous proofe of his manhood. Of him (as some haue written) the foresaid citie of Tours toke the name, and was called Turonium, bicause the said Turinus was there buried.

Theuer.

Andrew Theuet affirmeth the contrarie, and maintaineth that one Taurus the nephue of Hanniball was the first that inclosed it about with a pale of wood (as the maner of those daies was of fensing their townes) in the yeare of the world 3374. and before the birth of our sauiour 197.

3374

But to our matter concerning Brute, who after he had obteined so famous a victorie, albeit there was good cause for him to reioise, yet it sore troubled him to consider that his numbers dailie decased, and his enimies still increased, and grew stronger: wherevpon resting doubtfull what to do, whether to proceed against the Galles, or returne to his ships to seeke the Ile that was appointed him by oracle, at length he chose the surest and best way, as he toke it, and as it proued. For whilest the greater part of his armie was yet left aliue, and that the victorie remained on his side, he drew to his naule, and lading his ships with exceeding great store of riches which his people had got abroad in the countrie, he toke the seas againe. After a few daies sailing they landed at the hauen now called Totnesse, the yeare of the world 2850, after the destruction of Troy 66, after the deliuerance of the Israelites from the captiuitie of Babylon 397, almost ended: in the 18 yeare of the reigne of Eneas king of Babylon, 13 of Pelanthus king of Athens, before the building of Rome 368, which was before the natiuitie of our Sauior Christ 1116, almost ended, and before the reigne of Alexander the great 783.

The fourth Chapter.

WHEN Brute had entred this land, immediatlie after his arriuall (as writers do record) he searched the countrie from side to side, and from end to end, finding it in most places verie fertile and plentious of wood and graile, and full of pleasant springs and faire riuers. As he thus trauelled to discouer the state and commodities of the Iland, he was encountred by diuers strong and mightie giants, whome he destroied and slue, or rather subdued, with all such other people as he found in the Iland, which were more in number than by report of some authors it should appeare there were. Among these giants (as Geffrey of Monmouth writeth) there was one of passing strength and great estimation, named Gogmagog, with whome Brute caused Corineus to wrestle at a place beside Douer, where it chanced that the giant brake a rib in the side of Corineus while they stroue to claspe, and the one to ouerthrow the other: wherewith Corineus being sore chafed and stirred to wrath, did so double his force that he got the vpper hand of the giant, and cast him downe headlong from one of the rocks there, not farre from Douer, and so dispatched him: by reason whereof the place was named long after, The fall or leape of Gogmagog, but afterward it was called The fall of Douer. For this valiant déed, and other the like seruices first and last atchiued, Brute gaue vnto Corineus the whole countrie of Cornwall. To be briefe, after that Brute had destroied such as stood against him, and brought such people vnder his subiection as he found in the Ile, and searched the land from the one end to the other: he was desirous to build a citie, that the same might be the seate roiall of his empire or kingdome. Wherevpon he chose a plot of ground lieng on the north side of the riuer of Thames, which by good consideration séemed to be most pleasant and conuenient for any great multitude of inhabitants, aswell for holsomnesse of aire, goodnesse of soile, plentie of woods, and commoditie of the riuer, serving as well to bring in as to carrie out all kinds of merchandize and things necessarie for the gaine, store, and vse of them that there should inhabit.

Here therefore he began to build and lay the foundation of a citie, in the tenth or (as other thinke) in the ſecond yeare after his arriuall, which he named (ſaith Gal. Mon.) Troinouant, or (as Hum. Lhoyd ſaith) Troinewith, that is, new Troy, in remembrance of that noble citie of Troy from whence he and his people were for the greater part deſcended.

When Brutus had builded this citie, and brought the Iland fullie vnder his ſubiection, he by the aduiſe of his nobles commanded this Ile (which before hight Albion) to be called Britaine, and the inhabitants Britons after his name, for a perpetuall memorie that he was the firſt bringer of them into the land. In this meane while alſo he had by his wife Ingonne, three ſonnes, the firſt named Locrinus or Locrine, the ſecond Cambris or Camber, and the third Albanactus or Albanact. Now when the time of his death drew néere, to the firſt he betooke the gouernment of that part of the land nowe knowne by the name of England: ſo that the ſame was long after called Loegria, or Logiers, of the ſaid Locrinus. To the ſecond he appointed the countrie of Wales, which of him was firſt named Cambria, diuided from Loegria by the riuer of Seuerne. To his third ſonne Albanact he deliuered all the north part of the Ile, afterward called Albania, after the name of the ſaid Albanact: which portion of the ſaid Ile lieth beyond the Humber northward. Thus when Brutus had diuided the Ile of Britaine (as before is mentioned) into 3. parts, and had gouerned the ſame by the ſpace of 15. yeares, he died in the 24 yeare after his arriuall (as Hariſon noteth) and was buried at Troinouant or London: although the place of his ſaid buriall there be now growne out of memorie.

The fift Chapter.

Locrine the ſecond ruler of Britain

LOcrinus or Locrine the firſt begotten ſonne of Brute began to reigne ouer the countrie called Logiers, in the yeare of the world 1874, and held to his part the countrie that reached from the ſouth ſea vnto the riuer of Humber. While this Locrinus gouerned Logiers, his brother Albanact ruled in Albania, where in fine he was ſlaine in a battell by a king of the Hunnes or Scythians, called Humber, who inuaded that part of Britaine, and got poſſeſſion thereof, till Locrinus with his brother Camber, in reuenge of their other brothers death, and for the recouerie of the kingdome, gathered their powers togither, and comming againſt the ſaid king of the Hunnes, by the valiancie of their people they diſcomfited him in battell, and chaſed him ſo egerlie, that he himſelfe and a great number of his men were drowned in the gulfe that then parted Loegria and Albania, which after tooke name of the ſaid king, and was called Humber, and ſo continueth vnto this daie.

Moreouer in this battell againſt the Hunnes were three yong damſels taken of excellent beautie, ſpecially one of them, whoſe name was Eſtrild, daughter to a certeine king of Scythia. With this Eſtrild king Locrine fell ſo farre in loue, notwithſtanding a former contract made betwixt him and the ladie Guendoloena, daughter to Cozineus duke of Cornwall, that he meant yet with all ſpéd to marie the ſame Eſtrild. But being earneſtlie called vpon, and in manner forced thereto by Cozineus, hée changed his purpoſe, and married Guendoloena, kéeping neuertheles the aforeſaid Eſtrild as paramour ſtill after a ſecret ſort, during the life of Cozineus his father in law.

Now after that Cozineus was departed this world, Locrine forſooke Guendoloena, and maried Eſtrild. Guendoloena therefore being caſt off by hir huſband, got hir into Cornewall to hir friends and kinred, and there procured them to make warre againſt the ſaid Locrine hir huſband, in the which warres hée was ſlaine, and a battell fought néere to the riuer of Sture, after he had reigned (as writers affirme) twentie yeares, & was buried by his father in the Citie of Troinouant, leauing behind him a yong ſonne (begotten of his wife Guendoloena) named Madan, as yet vnméete to gouerne. Mat. Weſt.

Guendoloena or Guendoline the wife of Locrinus, and daughter of Cozineus duke of Cornewall, for ſo much as hir ſonne Madan was not of yeares ſufficient to gouerne, was by common conſent of the Britons made ruler of the Ile, in the yéere of the world 2894, and ſo hauing the adminiſtration in hir hands, ſhe did right diſcreetlie vſe hir ſelfe therein, to the comfort of all hir ſubiects, till hir ſonne Madan came to lawfull age, and then ſhe gaue ouer the rule and dominion to him, after ſhe had gouerned by the ſpace of fiftéene yeares. Gal. Mon.

She is not numbred amongſt thoſe that reigned as rulers in this land by Mat. weſt.

Madan the third ruler.

MAdan the ſonne of Locrine and Guendoline entred into the gouernement of Britaine in the 2909. of the world. There is little left in writing of his doings, ſauing that he vſed great tyrannie amongſt his Britons: and therefore after he had ruled this land the tearme of 40. yeares, he was deuoured of wild beaſts, as he was abroad in hunting. He left behind him two ſonnes, Mempricius and Manlius. He builded (as is reported) Madancaſtre, now Dancaſtre, which reteineth ſtill the later part of his name.

Mempricius the fourth ruler.

MEmpricius the eldeſt ſonne of Madan began his reigne ouer the Britons in the yeare of the world 2949, he continued not long in peace. For his brother Manlius vpon an ambitious mind prouoked the Britons to rebell againſt him, ſo that ſore and deadly warre continued long betweene them. But finallie, vnder colour of a treatie, Manlius was ſlaine by his brother Mempricius, ſo that then he liued in more tranquillitie and reſt. Howbeit, being deliuered thus from trouble of warres, he fell into ſlouth, and ſo into vnlawfull luſt of lecherie, and thereby into the hatred of his people, by forcing of their wiues and daughters: and finallie became ſo beaſtlie, that he forſooke his lawfull wife and all his concubines, and fell into the abhominable ſinne of Sodomie. And thus from one vice he fell into another, till he became odious to God and man, and at length, going on hunting, was loſt of his people, and deſtroied of wild beaſts, when he had reigned twentie yeares, leauing behind him a noble yong ſonne named Ebranke, begotten of his lawfull wife.

Ebranke the fift ruler.

EBranke the ſonne of Mempricius began to rule ouer the Britons in the yeare of the world 2969. He had as writers do of him record, one and twentie wiues, on whom he begot 20. ſonnes and 30. daughters, of the which the eldeſt hight Gualeſ, or Gualea. Theſe daughters he ſent to Alba Syluius, which was the eleuenth king of Italie, or the firſt king of the Latines, to the end they might be married married to his noble men of the bloud of Troians, becauſe the Sabines refuſed to ioine their daughters with them in marriage. Furthermore, he was the firſt prince of his land that euer inuaded France after Bute, and is commended as author and originall builder of many cities, both in his owne kingdome, and elſe where. His ſonnes alſo vnder the conduct of Aſſaracus, one of their eldeſt brethren, returning out of Italie, after they had conducted their ſiſters thither, inuaded Germanie, being firſt moleſted by the people of that countrie in their rage, and by the helpe of the ſaid Alba ſubdued a great part of that countrie, & there planted themſelues. Our hiſtories ſay, that Ebracus their father married them in their returne, and aided them in their conqueſts, and that he builded the citie of Caerbranke, now called Yorke, about the 14. yeare of his reigne. He builded alſo in Albania now called Scotland, the caſtle of Maidens, afterward called Edenburgh of Adian one of their kings. The citie of Alclud was builded likewiſe by him (as ſome write) now decaied. After which cities thus builded, he ſailed ouer into Gallia, now called France, with a great armie, and ſubduing the Galles as is aforeſaid, he returned home with great riches and triumph. Now when he had guided the land of Britaine in noble wiſe by the tearme of fortie yeares, he died, and was buried at Yorke.

Brute Greeneſhield the ſixt ruler.

Iacobus Leſ.

BRute Greeneſhield, the ſonne of Ebranke, was made gouernor of this land in the yeare of the world 3009, Aſa reigning in Juda, and Baaſa in Iſraell. This prince bare alwaies in the field a greene ſhield, whereof he toke his ſurname, and of him ſome forraine authors affirme, that he made an attempt to bring the whole realme of France vnder his ſubiection, which he performed; becauſe his father ſuſteined ſome diſhonor and loſſe in his laſt voiage into that countrie. Howbeit they ſay, that when he came into Henaud, Brinchild a prince of that quarter gaue him alſo a great ouerthrow, and compelled him to retire home againe into his countrie. This I borrow out of William Hariſon, who in his chronologie toucheth the ſame at large, concluding in the end, that the ſaid paſſage of this prince into France is verie likelie to be true, and that he named a parcell of Armorica lieng on the ſouth, and in manner vpon the verie loine after his owne name, and alſo a citie which he builded there Britaine. For (ſaith he) it ſhould ſeeme by Strabo. lib. 4. that there was a noble citie of that name long before his time in the ſaid countrie, whereof Plinie alſo ſpeaketh lib. 4. cap. 7. albeit that he aſcribe it vnto France after a diſordered maner. More I find not of this foreſaid Brute, ſauing that he ruled the land a certeine time, his father yet liuing; and after his deceaſe the tearme of twelue yeares, and then died, and was buried at Caerbranke now called Yorke.

Leill the ſeuenth ruler.

Caerleil builded.

Cheſter repaired.

LEill the ſonne of Brute Greeneſhield, began to reigne in the yeare of the world 3021, the ſame time that Aſa was reigning in Juda, and Ambri in Iſraell. He built the citie now called Carleil, which then after his owne name was called Caerleil, that is, Leill his citie, or the citie of Leill. He repaired alſo (as Henrie Bradſhaw ſaith) the citie of Caerleon now called Cheſter, which (as in the ſame Bradſhaw appeareth) was built before Brutus entrie into this land by a giant named Leon Gauer. But what authoritie he had to auouch this, it may be doubted, for Ranulfe Higden in his worke intituled Polychronicon, ſaith in plaine wordes, that it is vnknowen who was the firſt founder of Cheſter, but that it toke the name of the ſoiourning there of ſome Romaine legions, by whome alſo it is not vnlike that it might be firſt built by P. Oſtorius Scapula, who as we find, after he had ſubdued Caratacus king of the Ordouices that inhabited the countries now called Lancaſhire, Cheſhire, and Salopſhire, built in thoſe parts, and among the Silures, certeine places of defenſe, for the better harborough of his men of warre, and keeping downe of ſuch Britaines as were ſtill readie to moue rebellion.

But now to the purpoſe concerning K. Leill. We find it recorded that he was in the beginning of his reigne verie vpright, and deſirous to ſee iuſtice executed, and aboue all thinges loued peace & quietneſſe; but as yeares increaſed with him, ſo his vertues began to diminiſh, in ſo much that abandoning the care for the bodie of the commonwealth, he ſuffered his owne bodie to welter in all vice and voluptuouſneſſe, and ſo procuring the hatred of his ſubiects, cauſed malice and diſcord to riſe amongſt them, which during his life he was neuer able to appeaſe. But leauing them ſo at variance, he departed this life, & was buried at Carleil, which as ye haue heard he had builded while he liued.

Lud or Ludhurdibras the eight ruler.

Kaerkin or Canterburie is builded.

Caerguent is builded.

Paladour is builded.

LVd or Ludhurdibras the ſonne of Leill began to gouerne in the yeare of the world 3046. In the beginning of his reigne, hee ſought to appeaſe the debate that was raiſed in his fathers daies, and bring the realme to hir former quietneſſe, and after that he had brought it to good end, he builded the towne of Kaerkin now called Canterburie: alſo the towne of Caerguent now cleped Wincheſter, and mount Paladour now called Shaftſburie. About the building of which towne of Shaftſburie, Aquila a prophet of the Britiſh nation wrote his prophecies, of which ſome fragments remaine yet to be ſeene, tranſlated into the Latine by ſome ancient writers. When this Lud had reigned 29. yeares, he died, and left a ſonne behind him named Baldud.

Baldud or Bladud the ninth ruler.

Gal. Mon.

The king was learned.

Hot bathes.

BAldud the ſonne of Ludhurdibras began to rule ouer the Britaines in the yeare of the world 3085. This man was well ſeene in the ſciences of aſtronomie and nigromancie, by which (as the common report ſaith) he made the hot bathes in the citie of Caerbran now called Bath. But William of Malmeſburie is of a contrarie opinion, affirming that Julius Ceſar made thoſe bathes, or rather repaired them when he was here in England: which is not like to be true: for Julius Ceſar, as by good coniecture we haue to thinke, neuer came ſo farre within the land that way forward. But of theſe bathes more ſhall be ſaid in the deſcription. Now to proceed. This Baldud toke ſuch pleaſure in artificiall practiſes & magike, that he taught this art throughout all his realme. And to ſhew his cunning in other points, vpon a preſumptuous pleaſure which he had therein, he toke vpon him to flie in the aire, but he fell vpon the temple of Apollo, which ſtood in the citie of Troinouant, and there was torne in peces after he had ruled the Britaines by the ſpace of 20. yeares.

Leir the 10. ruler.

Mat. Weſt. Leiceſter is builded.

LEir the ſonne of Baldud was admitted ruler ouer the Britaines, in the yeare of the world 3105, at what time Joas reigned in Juda. This Leir was a prince of right noble demeanor, gouerning his land and ſubiects in great wealth. He made the towne of Caerleir now called Leiceſter, which ſtandeth vpon the riuer of Soſe. It is written that he had by his wife three daughters without other iſſue, whoſe names were Gonorilla, Regan, and Cordeilla, which daughters he greatly loued, but ſpecially Cordeilla the youngeſt farre aboue the two elder. When this Leir therefore was come to great yeres, & began to ware vnweldie through age, he thought to vnderſtand the affections of his daughters towards him, and preferre hir whome he beſt loued, to the ſucceſſion ouer the kingdome. Wherupon he firſt asked Gonorilla the eldest, how well she loued him: who calling hir gods to record, protested that she loued him more than hir owne life, which by right and reason should be most dere vnto hir. With which answer the father being well pleased, turned to the second, and demanded of hir how well she loued him: who answered (confirming hir saiengs with great othes) that she loued him more than tong could expresse, and farre aboue all other creatures of the world.

The answer of the yongest daughter.

Then called he his yongest daughter Cordeilla before him, and asked of hir what account she made of him, vnto whome she made this answer as followeth: Knowing the great loue and fatherlie zeale that you haue alwaies borne towards me (for the which I maie not answere you otherwise than I thinke, and as my conscience leadeth me) I protest vnto you, that I haue loued you euer, and will continuallie (while I liue) loue you as my naturall father. And if you would more vnderstand of the loue that I beare you, assertaine your selfe, that so much as you haue, so much you are worth, and so much I loue you, and no more. The father being nothing content with this answer, married his two eldest daughters, the one vnto Henninus the duke of Cornewall, and the other vnto Maglanus the duke of Albania, betwixt whome he willed and ordeined that his land should be diuided after his death, and the one halfe thereof immediatlie should be assigned to them in hand: but for the third daughter Cordeilla he reserued nothing.

The two eldest daughters are maried.

The realme is promised to his two daughters.

Neuertheles it fortuned that one of the princes of Gallia (which now is called France) whose name was Aganippus, hearing of the beautie, womanhood, and good conditions of the said Cordeilla, desired to haue hir in mariage, and sent ouer to hir father, requiring that he might haue hir to wife: to whome answer was made, that he might haue his daughter, but as for anie dower he could haue none, for all was promised and assured to hir other sisters alreadie. Aganippus notwithstanding this answer of denall to receiue anie thing by way of dower with Cordeilla, toke hir to wife, onlie moued thereto (I saie) for respect of hir person and amiable vertues. This Aganippus was one of the twelue kings that ruled Gallia in those daies, as in the British historie it is recorded. But to proceed.

He gouerned the third part of Gallia as Gal. Mon. saith.

After that Leir was fallen into age, the two dukes that had married his two eldest daughters, thinking it long yer the gouernment of the land did come to their hands, arose against him in armour, and reft from him the gouernance of the land, vpon conditions to be continued for terme of life: by the which he was put to his portion, that is, to liue after a rate assigned to him for the maintenance of his estate, which in processe of time was diminished as well by Maglanus as by Henninus. But the greatest griefe that Leir toke, was to see the vnkindnesse of his daughters, which seemed to thinke that all was too much which their father had, the same being neuer so little: in so much that going from the one to the other, he was brought to that miserie, that scarslie they would allow him one seruant to wait vpon him.

In the end, such was the vnkindnesse, or (as I maie saie) the vnnaturalnesse which he found in his two daughters, notwithstanding their faire and pleasant words vttered in time past, that being constreined of necessitie, he fled the land, & sailed into Gallia, there to seeke some comfort of his yongest daughter Cordeilla, whom before time he hated. The ladie Cordeilla hearing that he was arriued in poore estate, the first sent to him priuilie a certeine summe of monie to apparell himselfe withall, and to reteine a certeine number of seruants that might attend vpon him in honorable wise, as apertained to the estate which he had borne: and then so accompanied, she appointed him to come to the court, which he did, and was so ioifullie, honorablie, and louinglie receiued, both by his sonne in law Aganippus, and also by his daughter Cordeilla, that his hart was greatlie comforted: for he was no lesse honored, than if he had beene king of the whole countrie himselfe.

Now when he had informed his sonne in law and his daughter in what sort he had beene vsed by his other daughters, Aganippus caused a mightie armie to be put in a readinesse, and likewise a great nauie of ships to be rigged, to passe ouer into Britaine with Leir his father in law, to see him againe restored to his kingdome. It was accorded, that Cordeilla should also go with him to take possession of the land, the which he promised to leaue vnto hir, as the rightfull inheritour after his decesse, notwithstanding any former grant made to his sisters or to their husbands in anie maner of wise.

Herevpon, when this armie and nauie of ships were readie, Leir and his daughter Cordeilla with hir husband tooke the sea, and arriuing in Britaine, fought with their enimies, and discomfited them in battell, in the which Maglanus and Henninus were slaine: and then was Leir restored to his kingdome, which he ruled after this by the space of two yeeres, and thereto, fortie yeeres after he first began to reigne. His bodie was buried at Leicester in a vaut vnder the chanell of the riuer of Sore beneath the towne. Matth. West.

The gunarchie of queene Cordeilla, how she was vanquished, of hir imprisonment and selfe-murther: the contention betweene Cunedag and Margan nephewes for gouernement, and the ende thereof.

The sixt Chapter.

Queene Cordeilla.

Cordeilla the yongest daughter of Leir was admitted Q. and supreme gouernesse of Britaine, in the yeere of the world 3155, before the building of Rome 54, Uzia then reigning in Juda, and Jeroboam ouer Israell. This Cordeilla after hir fathers decease ruled the land of Britaine right worthilie during the space of fiue yeeres, in which meane time hir husband died, and then about the end of those fiue yeeres, hir two nephewes Margan and Cunedag, sonnes to hir aforesaid sisters, disdaining to be vnder the gouernment of a woman, leuied warre against hir, and destroied a great part of the land, and finallie toke hir prisoner, and laid hir fast in ward, wherewith she toke such griefe, being a woman of a manlie courage, and despairing to recouer libertie, there she slue hirselfe, when she had reigned (as before is mentioned) the tearme of fiue yeeres.

Cunedag and Margan.

Cunedagius and Marganus nephewes to Cordeilla, hauing recouered the land out of hir hands, diuided the same betwixt them, that is to saie, the countrie ouer and beyond Humber fell to Margan, as it stretcheth euen to Catnesse, and the other part lieng south and by-west, was assigned to Cunedagius. This partition chanced in the yeere of the world 3170, before the building of Rome 47, Uzia as then reigning in Juda, and Jeroboam in Israell. Afterwards wards, these two cousins, Cunedag and Margan, had not reigned thus past a two yeeres, but through some seditious persons, Margan was perswaded to raise warre against Cunedag, telling him in his eare, how it was a shame for him being come of the elder sister, not to haue the rule of the whole Ile in his hand. Hereupon ouercome with pride, ambition, and couetousnesse, he raised an armie, and entring into the land of Cunedag, he burned and destroied the countrie before him in miserable maner.

Margan inuadeth his cousine Cunedag.

Cunedag in all hast to resist his aduersarie, assembled also all the power he could make, and comming with the same against Margan, gaue him battell, in the which he slue a great number of Margans people, and put the residue to flight; and furthermore pursued him from countrie to countrie, till he came into Cambria, now called Wales, where the said Margan gaue him eftsones a new battell: but being too weake in number of men, he was there ouercome and slaine in the field; by reason whereof that countrie toke name of him, being there slaine, and so is called to this daie Glau Margan, which is to meane in our English tong, Margans land. This was the end of that Margan, after he had reigned with his brother two yeeres, or thereabouts.

Margan is slaine. Matt. West.

Cunedagus alone.

AFter the death of Margan, Cunedag the sonne of Henninus and Ragaie (middlemost daughter of Leir before mentioned) became ruler of all the whole land of Britaine, in the yeare of the world 3172, before the building of Rome 45, Vzia still reigning in Juda, and Jeroboam in Israell. He gouerned this Ile well and honourablie for the tearme of 33 yeares, and then dieng, his bodie was buried at Troinouant or London. Moreouer, our writers do report, that he builded three temples, one to Mars at Perth in Scotland, another to Mercurie at Bangor, and the third to Apollo in Cornewall.

Of Riuallus, Gurgustius, Sysillius, Iago, and Kinimacus, rulers of Britaine by succession, and of the accidents coincident with their times.

The seuenth Chapter.

Riuallus the 13. ruler.

RIuallus, the sonne of Cunedag, began to reigne ouer the Britaines in the yeare of the world 3203, before the building of Rome 15, Joathan as then being king of Juda, and Phacea king of Israel. This Riuall gouerned the Ile in great welth and prosperitie. In his time it rained bloud by the space of three daies togither; after which raine ensued such an exceeding number and multitude of flies, so noisome and contagious, that much people died by reason thereof. When he had reigned 46 yeares he died, and was buried at Caerbranke now called Yorke. In the time of this Riuals reigne was the citie of Rome builded, after concordance of most part of writers. Perdix also a wizard, and a learned astrologian florished and writ his prophesies, and Herene also.

It rained bloud. Matth. West.

Rome builded

Gurgustius the 14. ruler.

GVrgustius, the son of the before named Riuall, began to gouerne the Britaines in the yeare after the creation of the world 3249, and after the first foundation of Rome 33, Ezechias reigning in Juda. This Gurgustius in the chronicle of England, is called Gorbodian the sonne of Reignold, he reigned 37 yeares, then departing this life, was buried at Caerbranke (now called Yorke) by his father.

Sysillius, or after some writers Syluius, the brother of Gurgustius, was chosen to haue the gouernance of Britaine, in the yere of the world 3287, and after the building of Rome 71, Manasses still reigning in Juda. This Sysillius in the English chronicle is named Secill. He reigned 49 yeares, and then died, and was buried at Carbadon, now called Bath.

Sysillius the 15. ruler.

IAgo or Lago, the cousin of Gurgustius, as next inheritor to Sysillius, toke vpon him the gouernement of Britaine; in the yeare of the world 3336, and after the building of Rome 120, in which time the citie of Jerusalem was taken by Nabuchodonozar, and the king of Juda, Mathania, otherwise called Zedechias, being slaine. This Iago or Lago died without issue, when he had reigned 23 yeares, and was buried at Yorke.

Iago the 16. ruler.

KInimacus or Kinmarus the sonne of Sysillius as some write, or rather the brother of Iago, began to gouerne the land of Britain, in the yere of the world 3364, and after the building of Rome 148, the Jewes as then being in the third yeare of their captiuitie of Babylon. This Kinimacus departed this life, after he had reigned 54 yeares, and was buried at Yorke.

Kinimacus the 17. ruler.

Of Gorbodug and his two sonnes Ferrex and Porrex, one brother killeth another, the mother slaieth hir sonne, and how Britaine by ciuill warres (for lacke of issue legitimate to the gouernment) of a monarchie became a pentarchie: the end of Brutes line.

The eight Chapter.

GOrbodug the sonne of Kinimacus began his reigne ouer the Britains, in the yeare after the creation of the world 3418, from the building of the citie of Rome 202, the 58 of the Jews captiuitie at Babylon. This Gorbodug by most likelihood to bring histories to accord, should reigne about the tearme of 62 yeares, and then departing this world, was buried at London, leauing after him two sonnes Ferrer and Porrer, or after some writers, Ferreus and Porreus.

Gorbodug the 18. ruler.

FErrer with Porrer his brother began iointlie to rule ouer the Britaines, in the yeare of the world 3476, after the building of Rome 260, at which time, the people of Rome forsoke their citie in their rebellious mod. These two brethren continued for a time in good friendship and amitie, till at length through couetousnesse, and desire of greater dominion, prouoked by flatterers, they fell at variance and discord, wherby Ferrer was constreined to flee into Gallia, and there purchased aid of a great duke called Gunhardus or Suardus, and so returned into Britaine, thinking to preuaile and obteine the dominion of the whole Iland. But his brother Porrer was readie to receiue him with battell after he was landed, in the which battell Ferrer was slaine, with the more part of his people. The English chronicle saith, that Porrer was he that fled into France, & at his returne, was slaine, and that Ferrer suruiued. But Geffrey of Monmouth & Polychronicon are of a contrarie opinion. Matthew Westmonasteriensis writeth, that Porrer deuising waies to kill Ferrer, atchiued his purpose and slue him. But whether of them so euer suruiued, the mother of them was so highlie offended for the death of him that was slaine, whom she most intierlie

After this followed a troublous ſeaſon, full of cruell warre, and ſeditious diſcord, whereby in the end, and for the ſpace of fiftie yeares, the monarchie or ſole gouernement of the Iland became a pentarchie, that is, it was diuided betwixt fiue kings or rulers, till Dunwallon of Cornewall ouercame them all. Thus the line of Brute (according to the report of moſt writers) tooke an end: for after the death of the two foreſaid brethren, no rightfull inheritor was left aliue to ſucceed them in the kingdome. The names of theſe fiue kings are found in certeine old pedegrees: and although the ſame be much corrupted in diuers copies, yet theſe vndernamed are the moſt agreeable.

But of theſe fiue kings or dukes, the Engliſh chronicle alloweth Cloton king of Cornewall for moſt rightfull heire. There appeareth not any time certeine by report of ancient authors, how long this variance continued amongſt the Britains: but (as ſome ſay) it laſted for the ſpace of 51 yeres, coniecturing ſo much by that which is recorded in Polychron. who ſaith, who it endured euen till the beginning of the reigne of Dulmucius Dunwallon, who began to gouerne from the time that Brute firſt entred Britaine, about the ſpace of 703 three yeares.

Of Mulmucius the firſt king of Britaine, who was crowned with a golden crowne, his lawes, his foundations, with other his acts and deeds.

The firſt Chapter.

Mulmucius. Matth. Weſt. Polyd.

NOw to proceede with the aforeſaid authors, Mulmucius Dunwallo, or as other ſaie Dunuallo Mulmucius, the ſonne of Cloton (as teſtifieth th' engliſh chronicle and alſo Geffrey of Monmouth) got the vpper hand of the other dukes or rulers: and after his fathers deceaſſe began his reigne ouer the whole monarchie of Britaine, in the yeere of the world 3529, after the building of Rome 314, and after the deliuerance of the Iſraelites out of captiuitie 97, and about the 26 yeere of Darius Artaxerres Longimanus, the firſt king of the Perſians. This Mulmucius Dunuallo is named in the engliſh chronicle Donebant, and prooued a right worthie prince. He builded within the citie of London then called Troinouant, a temple, and named it the temple of peace: the which (as ſome hold opinion, I wote not vpon what ground) was the ſame which now is called Blackwell hall, where the market for buieng and ſelling of cloths is kept. The chronicle of England affirmeth, that Mulmucius (whome the old booke nameth Molle) builded the two townes Malmeſburie and the Ties. He alſo made manie good lawes, which were long after vſed, called Mulmucius lawes, turned out of the Britiſh ſpeech into the Latine by Gildas Priſcus, and long time after tranſlated out of latine into engliſh by Alfred king of England, and mingled in his ſtatutes. He moreouer gaue priuileges to temples, to plowes, to cities, and to high waies leading to the ſame, ſo that whoſoeuer fled to them, ſhould be in ſafegard from bodilie harme, and from thence he might depart into what countrie he would, with indemnitie of his perſon. Some authors write, that he began to make the foure great high waies of Britaine, the which were finiſhed by his ſonne Blinus, as after ſhall be declared.

After he had established his land, and set his Britains in good and conuenient order, he ordeined him by the aduise of his lords a crowne of gold, & caused himselfe with great solemnitie to be crowned, according to the custome of the pagan lawes then in vse: & bicause he was the first that bare a crowne heere in Britaine, after the opinion of some writers, he is named the first king of Britaine, and all the other before rehearsed are named rulers, dukes, or gouernors.

The first king that was crowned with a golden crowne.

Amongst other of his ordinances, he appointed weights and measures, with the which men should buy and sell. And further he deuised sore and streight orders for the punishing of theft. Finallie, after he had guided the land by the space of fortie yeeres, he died, and was buried in the foresaid temple of peace which he had erected within the citie of Troinouant now called London, as before ye haue heard, appointing in his life time, that his kingdome should be diuided betwixt his two sonnes, Brennus and Belinus (as some men do coniecture.)

The second Chapter.

Belinus and Brennus.

BRennus and Belinus began to reigne iointlie as kings in Britaine, in the yeere of the world 3574, after the building of the citie of Rome 355, and after the deliuerance of the Israelites out of captiuitie 142, which was about the seuenth yeere of Artarerres surnamed Mnemon, the seuenth king of the Persians. Belinus held vnder his gouernment Loegria, Wales, and Cornwall: and Brennus all those countries ouer and beyond Humber. And with this partition were they contented by the tearme of sir or seuen yeeres, after which time expired, Brennus coueting to haue more than his portion came to, first thought to purchase himselfe aid in forreine parties, & therefore by the prouocation and counsell of yong vnquiet heads, sailed ouer into Norway, and there married the daughter of Elsung or Elsing, as then duke or ruler of that countrie. Beline offended with his brother, that he should thus without his aduice marrie with a stranger, now in his absence seized all his lands, townes, and fortresses into his owne hands, placing garisons of men of warre where he thought conuenient.

Brennus not content with his portion.

Elsingius.

In the meane time, Brenne aduertised hereof, assembled a great nauie of ships, well furnished with people and souldiers of the Norwegians, with the which he tooke his course homewards, but in the waie he was encountred by Guilthdacus king of Denmarke, the which had laid long in wait for him, bicause of the yong ladie which Brenne had maried, for whome he had beene a suter to hir father Elsing of long time. When these two fleetes of the Danes and Norwegians met, there was a sore battell betwixt them, but finallie the Danes ouercame them of Norway, and tooke the ship wherein the new bride was conueied, and then was she brought aboord the ship of Guilthdacus. Brenne escaped by flight as well as he might. But when Guilthdacus had thus obtained the victorie and prey, suddenlie thereupon arose a sore tempest of wind and weather, which scattered the Danish fleete, and put the king in danger to haue beene lost: but finallie within fiue daies after, being driuen by force of wind, he landed in Northumberland, with a few such ships as kept together with him.

A tempest.

Guilthdacus landed in the north.

Beline being then in that countrie, prouiding for defense against his brother, vpon knowledge of the king of Denmarks arriuall, caused him to be staied. Shortlie after, Brenne hauing recouered and gotten togither the most part of his ships that were dispersed by the discomfiture, and then newlie rigged and furnished of all things necessarie, sent word to his brother Beline, both to restore vnto him his wife wrongfullie rauished by Guilthdacus, and also his lands iniuriouslie by him seized into his possession. These requests being plainlie and shortlie denied, Brenne made no long delaie, but speedilie made toward Albania, and landing with his armie in a part thereof, incountred with his brother Beline nere vnto a wood named as then Calater, where (after cruell fight, and mortall battell betwixt them) at length the victorie abode with the Britains, and the discomfiture did light so on the Norwegians, that the most of them were wounded, slaine, and left dead vpon the ground.

Calater wood is in Scotland.

Hereby Brenne being forced to flee, made shift, and got ouer into Gallia, where after he had sued to this prince, at length he abode, and was well receiued of one Seguinus or Seginus duke of the people called then Allobrogs (as Galfrid of Monmouth saith) or rather Armorica, which now is called Britaine, as Polychronicon, and the english historie printed by Caxton, more truelie maie seeme to affirme. But Beline hauing got the vpper hand of his enimies, assembling his councell at Caerbranke, now called York, tooke aduise what he should do with the king of Denmarke: where it was ordeined, that he should be set at libertie, with condition and vnder couenant, to acknowledge himselfe by doing homage, to hold his land of the king of Britaine, and to paie him a yeerelie tribute. These couenants being agreed vpon, and hostages taken for assurance, he was set at libertie, and so returned into his countrie. The tribute that he couenanted to paie, was a thousand pounds, as the English chronicle saith.

Seguinus or Seginus duke of the Allobrogs, now the Dolphinat or Sauoy.

The Danes tributarie to the Britains.

When Beline had thus expelled his brother, and was alone possessed of all the land of Britaine, he first confirmed the lawes made by his father: and for so much as the foure waies begun by his father were not brought to perfection, he therefore caused workmen to be called forth and assembled, whom he set in hand to paue the said waies with stone, for the better passage and ease of all that should trauell through the countries from place to place, as occasion should require.

The foure high waies finished.

The first of these foure waies is named Fosse, and stretcheth from the south into the north, beginning at the corner of Totnesse in Cornewall, and so passing forth by Deuonshire, and Somersetshire, by Tutberie, on Cotteswold, and then forward beside Couentrie vnto Leicester, and from thence by wild plaines towards Newarke, and endeth at the citie of Lincolne. The second waie was named Watling stréete, the which stretcheth ouerthwart the Fosse, out of the southeast into the northeast, beginning at Douer, and passing by the middle of Kent ouer Thames beside London, by-west of Westminster, as some haue thought, and so forth by S. Albons, and by the west side of Dunstable, Stratford, Towcester, and Wedon by-south of Lilleborne, by Atherston, Gilberts hill, that now is called the Wreken, and so forth by Seuerne, passing beside Worcester, vnto Stratton to the middle of Wales, and so vnto a place called Cardigan, at the Irish sea. The third way was named Ermingstréet, which stretched out of the west northwest, vnto the east southeast, and beginneth at Menecuia, the which is in Saint Dauids land in west Wales, and so vnto Southampton. The fourth and last waie hight Hiknelstréete, which leadeth by Worcester, Winchcombe, Birmingham, Lichfield, Darbie, Chesterfield, and by Yorke, and so forth vnto Tinmouth. After he had caused these waies to be well and sufficientlie raised and made, he confirmed vnto them all such priuileges as were granted by his father.

Brennus marrieth with the duke of Allobrogs daughter, groweth into great honour, commeth into Britaine with an armie against his brother Beline, their mother reconcileth them, they ioine might & munition and haue great conquests, conflicts betweene the Galles and the Romans, the two brethren take Rome.

The third Chapter.

IN the meane time that Beline was thus occupied about the necessarie affaires of his realme and kingdome, his brother Brenne that was fled into Gallia onelie with 12. persons, bicause he was a goodlie gentleman, and séemed to vnderstand what apperteined to honour, grew shortlie into fauour with Seginus the duke afore mentioned, and declaring vnto him his aduersitie, and the whole circumstance of his mishap, at length was so highlie cherished of the said Seginus, delighting in such worthie qualities as he saw in him daillie appearing, that he gaue to him his daughter in marriage, with condition, that if he died without issue male, then should he inherit his estate & dukedome: and if it happened him to leaue anie heire male behind him, then should he yet helpe him to recouer his land and dominion in Britaine, béereft from him by his brother.

Brenne marrieth the duke of Allobrogs daughter.

These conditions well and surelie vpon the dukes part by the assent of the nobles of his land concluded, ratified, and assured, the said duke within the space of one yéere after died. And then after a certeine time, being knowne that the duches was not with child, all the lords of that countrie did homage to Brenne, receiuing him as their lord and supreme gouernour, vpon whome he likewise for his part in recompense of their curtesie, bestowed a great portion of his treasure.

Shortlie after also, with their assent he gathered an armie, and with the same ships came ouer into Britaine, to make new warre vpon his brother Beline. Of whose landing when Beline was informed, he assembled his people, and made himselfe readie to méete him: but as they were at point to haue ioined battell, by the intercession of their mother that came betwixt them, and demeaned hirselfe in all motherlie order, and most louing maner towards them both, they fell to an agréement, and were made friends or euer they parted asunder.

Brenne with an armie returneth into Britaine.

Brenne and Beline made friends by intercession of their mother.

After this they repaired to London, and there taking aduice togither with their peeres and councellors, for the good order and quieting of the land, at length they accorded to passe with both their armies into Gallia, to subdue that whole countrie, and so following this determination, they tooke shipping and sailed ouer into Gallia, where beginning the warre with fire and sword, they wrought such maisteries, that within a short time (as saith Geffrey of Monmouth) they conquered a great part of Gallia, Italie, and Germanie, and brought it to their subiection. In the end they tooke Rome by this occasion (as writers report) if these be the same that had the leading of those Galles, which in this season did so much hurt in Italie and other parts of the world.

They inuade Gallia and Italie.

After they had passed the mountaines, & were entred into Tuscan, they besieged the citie of Clusium, the citizens whereof being in great danger, sent to Rome for aid against their enimies. Whereupon the Romanes, considering with themselues that although they were not in anie league of societie with the Clusians, yet if they were ouercome the danger of the next hunt were like to be theirs: with all spéed they sent ambassadours to intreat betwixt the parties for some peace to be had.

Now Clusi.

Ambassadours sent from Rome.

They that were sent, required the capteines of the Galles, in the name of the senat and citizens of Rome, not to molest the friends of the Romans. Whereunto answere was made by Brennus, that for his part he could be content to haue peace, if it were so that the Clusians would be agréeable that the Galles might haue part of the countrie which they held, being more than they did alreadie well occupie, for otherwise (said he) there could be no peace granted.

Brennus answere.

The Romane ambassadours being offended with these words, demanded what the Galles had to do in Tuscan, by reason of which and other the like ouerthwart words, the parties began to kindle in displeasure so farre, that their communication brake off, and so they from treating fell againe to trie the matter by dint of sword.

The treatie of peace breaketh off.

The Romane ambassadours also to shew of what prowesse the Romans were, contrarie to the law of nations (forbidding such as came in ambassage about anie treatie of peace to take either one part or other) tooke weapon in hand, and ioined themselues with the Clusians, wherewith the Galles were so much displeased, that incontinentlie with one voice, they required to haue the siege raised from Clusium, that they might go to Rome. But Brennus thought good first to send messengers thither, to require the deliuerie of such as had broken the law, that punishment might be done on them accordinglie as they had deserued. This was done, and knowledge brought againe, that the ambassadors were not onelie not punished, but also chosen to be tribunes for the next yeare.

The Galles then became in such a rage (because they saw there was nothing to be looked for at the hands of the Romans, but warre, iniurious wrongs, and deceitfull traines) that they turned all their force against them, marching streight towards Rome, and by the waie destroied all that stood before them.

The Galles make towards Rome.

The Romans aduertised thereof, assembled themselues togither to the number of 40. thousand, and encountring with Beline and Brenne, neare to the riuer Allia, about 11. miles on this side Rome, were slaine and quite discomfited.

The Romans incountring with the Galles are ouerthrowne.

The Galles could scarse beléeue that they had got the victorie with so small resistance: but when they perceiued that the Romans were quite ouerthrowne and that the field was clearelie rid of them, they got togither the spoile, and made towards Rome it selfe, where such feare and terror was striken into the heartes of the people, that all men were in despaire to defend the citie: and therefore the senate with all the warlike youth of the citizens got them into the capitoll, which they furnished with victuals and all things necessarie for the maintenance of the same against a long siege. The honorable fathers and all the multitude of other people not apt for warres, remained still in the citie, as it were to perish with their countrie if hap so befell.

The Galles enter into Rome.

In the meane time came the Galles to the citie, and entring by the gate Collina, they passed forth the right way vnto the market place, marvelling to see the houses of the power sort to be shut against them, and those of the richer to remaine wide open; wherefore being doubtfull of some deceitfull traines, they were not over rash to enter the same; but after they had espied the ancient fathers sit in their chaires apparelled in their rich robes, as if they had bin in the senat, they reverenced them as gods, so honorable was their port, gravenesse in countenance, and shew of apparell.

The reverend aspect of the senators.

Marcus Papirius.

In the meane time it chanced, that Marcus Papirius stroke one of the Galles on the head with his staffe, because he presumed to stroke his beard: with which iniurie the Gall being provoked, slue Papirius (as he sat) with his sword, and therewith the slaughter being begun with one, all the residue of those ancient fatherlie men as they sat in their chaires were slaine and cruellie murthered. After this all the people found in the citie without respect or difference at all, were put to the sword, and their houses sacked. And thus was Rome taken by the two brethren, Beline and Brenne, 365 yeares after the first building thereof. Besides this, the Galles attempted in the night season to have entred the capitoll: and in deed ordered their enterprise so secretlie, that they had atchiued their purpose, if a sort of ganders had not with their crie and noise disclosed them, in waking the Romans that were asleepe: & so by that meanes were the Galles beaten backe and repelled.

The fourth Chapter.

THe Romans being thus put to their extreame shift, deuised among themselues how to reuoke Furius Camillus from exile, whom not long before they had vniustlie banished out of the citie. In the end they did not onelie send for him home, but also created him dictator, committing into his handes (so long as his office lasted) an absolute power over all men, both of life and death. Camillus forgetfull of the iniurie done to him, and mindfull of his dutie towards his countrie, and lamenting the state thereof, without delay gathered such an armie as the present time permitted.

A composition

In the meane time those that kept the capitoll (being almost famished for lacke of vittels) compounded with Brenne and Belinè, that for a thousand pounds weight in gold, the Romans should redeeme their liberties, and the said Brenne and Beline depart with their armie out of the citie and all the territories of Rome. But at the deliuerie of the monie, and by a certeine kind of hap, the Romans name was preserued at that time from such dishonor and ignominie as was likelie to haue insued. For some of the couetous sort of the Galles, not contented with the iust weight of the gold, did cast their swords also into the balance where the weights lay, thereby to haue ouer weight: whereupon the Romans refused to make paiment after that weight.

And thus whilest they were in altercation about this matter, the one importunate to haue, the other not willing to grant, the time passed, till in the meane season Camillus came in amongst them with his power, commanding that the gold should be had away, and affirming that without consent of the dictator, no composition or agreement might be concluded by the meaner magistrate. He gaue a signe to the Galles to prepare themselues to battell, wherevnto they lightlie agreed, and togither they went. The battell being once begun, the Galles that looked earst for gold, and not for battell, were easilie ouercome, such as stood to the brunt were slaine, and the rest by flight constreined to depart the citie.

Camillus disappointeth the Galles of their paiment.

The Galles ouerthrowne.

Polybius writeth, that the Galles were turned from the siege of the citie, through wars which chanced amongst their owne people at home, and therefore they concluded a peace with the Romans, and leauing them in libertie returned home againe.

But howsoeuer the matter passed, thus much haue we kept from our purpose, to shew somwhat of that noble and most famous capteine Brennus, who (as not onelie our histories, but also Giouan Villani the Florentine doth report) was a Britaine, and brother to Belinè (as before is mentioned) although I know that manie other writers are not of that mind, affirming him to be a Gall, and likewise that after this present time of the taking of Rome by this Brennus 110 yeares, or there abouts, there was another Brennus a Gall by nation (say they) vnder whose conduct an other armie of the Gals inuaded Grecia, which Brennus had a brother that hight Belgius, although Humfrey Llhoyd and sir Iohn Prise doo flatlie denie this same, by reason of some discordance in writers, & namelie in the computation of the yeares set downe by them that haue recorded the doings of those times, whereof the error is growen. Howbeit I doubt not but that the truth of this matter shall be more fullie sifted out in time by the learned and studious of such antiquities. But now to our purpose.

This is also to be noted, that where our histories make mention, that Belinè was abroad with Brennus in the most part of his victories, both in Gallia, Germanie, and Italie; Titus Liuius speaketh but onlie of Brennus: whereupon some write, that after the two brethren were by their mothers intreatance made friends, Brennus onlie went ouer to Gallia, and there through prowesse of his worthie prowesse, atteined to such estimation amongst the people called Galli Senones, that he was chosen to be their generall capteine at their going ouer the mountaines into Italie. But whether Belinè went ouer with his brother, and finallie returned backe againe, leauing Brennus behind him, as some write, or that he went not at all, but remained still at home whilest his brother was abroad, we can affirme no certeintie.

Titus Liu. Polydor.

Matth. West.

Most part of all our writers make report of manie worthie deeds accomplished by Belinè, in repairing of cities decaied, & erecting of other new buildings, to the adorning and beautifieng of his realme and kingdome. And amongst other works which were by him erected, he builded a citie in the south part of Wales, neare to the place where the riuer of Uske falleth into Seuerne, fast by Glamorgan, which citie hight Caerleon, or Caerlegion Ar Wilske. This Caerleon was the principall citie in time past of all Demetia, now called Southwales. Manie notable monumonuments are remaining there till this day, testifieng the great magnificence and rotall buildings of that citie in old time. In which citie also sith the time of Christ were three churches, one of saint Iulius the martyr, an other of saint Aron, and the third was the mother church of all Demetia, and the chiefe see: but after, the same see was translated into Menenia, (that is to say) saint Dauid in Westwales. In this Caerleon was Amphibulus borne, who taught and instructed saint Albon.

Fabian. This Belin also builded an hauen with a gate ouer the same, within the citie of Trinouant now called London, in the summitie or highest part where of afterwards was set a vessell of braile, in the which were put the ashes of his bodie, which bodie after his deceasse was burnt, as the maner of burieng in those daies did require. This gate was long after called Belins gate, and at length by corruption of language Billings gate. He builded also a kastell eastward from this gate (as some haue written) which was long time after likewise called Belins kastell, and is the same which now we call the tower of London. Thus Belin studying dailie to beautifie this land with godlie buildings and famous workes, at length departed this life, after he had reigned with his brother iointlie and alone the space of 26 yeres.

The fift Chapter.

Gurguintus. GVrguintus the sonne of Belin began to reigne ouer the Britains, in the yeare of the world 1596, after the building of Rome 380, after the deliuerance of the Israelites out of captiuitie 164 complet, which was about the 33 yeare of Artarerres Mnemon, surnamed Magnus, the seuenth king of the Persians. This Gurguint in the English chronicle is named Cozinbratus, and by Matthew Westmin. he is surnamed Barbirue, the which bicause the tribute granted by Guilthdag king of Denmarke in perpetuitie vnto the kings of Britaine was denied, he sailed with a mightie naule and armie of men into Denmarke, where he made such warre with fire and sword, that the king of Denmarke with the assent of his barons was constreined to grant essones to continue the paiment of the aforesaid tribute.

Matth. West. Gal. M.

Titus Liu. Polydor.

Gurguint constrained the Danes by force to pay their tribute.

Matth. West.

After he had thus atchiued his desire in Denmarke, as he returned backe towards Britaine, he encountred with a naule of 30 ships beside the Iles of Orkenies. These ships were fraught with men and women, and had to their capteine one called Bartholin or Partholin, who being brought to the presence of king Gurguint, declared that he with his people were banished out of Spaine, and were named Valenses or Baselenses, and had sailed long on the sea, to the end to find some prince that would assigne them a place to inhabit, to whom they would become subiects, & hold of him as of their soueregne gouernor. Therefore he besought the king to consider their estate, and of his great benignitie to appoint some void quarter where they might settle. The king with the aduise of his barons granted to them the Ile of Ireland, which as then (by report of some authors) lay waste and without habitation. But it should appeare by other writers, that it was inhabited long before those daies, by the people called Hiberienses, of Hiberus their capteine that brought them also out of Spaine. Polychron.

After that Gurguintus was returned into his countrie, he ordeined that the lawes made by his ancestors should be duelie kept and obserued. And thus administring iustice to his subiects for the tearme of 19 yeares, he finallie departed this life, and was buried at London, or as some haue at Caerleon. In his daies was the towne of Cambridge with the vniuersitie first founded by Cantaber, brother to the aforesaid Bartholin (according to some writers) as after shall appeare. Caius.

Guintolinus. GVintolinus or Quintilius the sonne of Gurguintus was admitted king of Britaine in the yere of the world 3614, after the building of the citie of Rome 389, and second yere of the 206 Olimpiad. This Guintolinus was a wise prince, graue in counsell, and sober in behauior. He had also a wife named Martia, a woman of perfect beautie, & wisedome incomparable, as by hir prudent gouernement and equall administration of iustice after hir husbands deceasse, during hir sonnes minoritie, it most manifestlie appeared.

It is thought that in an happie time this Guintolinus came to the gouernement of this kingdome, being shaken and brought out of order with ciuill dissentions, to the end he might reduce it to the former estate, which he carefullie accomplished: for hauing once got the place, he studied with great diligence to reforme anew, and to adorne with iustice, lawes and good orders, the Britith common wealth, by other kings not so framed as stood with the quietnesse thereof. But afore all things he vtterlie remoued and appeased such ciuill discord, as seemed yet to remaine after the maner of a remnant of those seditious factions and partakings, which had so long time reigned in this land. But as he was busie in hand herewith, death tooke him out of this life, after he had reigned 27 yeares, and then was he buried at London.

Sicilius. SIcilius the sonne of Guintoline, being not past seuen yeares of age when his father died, was admitted king, in the yeare 3659, after the building of Rome 430, & after the deliuerance of the Israelites out of captiuitie 218, & in the first after the death of Alexander. By reason that Sicilius was not of age sufficient of himselfe to guide the kingdome of the Britains, his mother that worthie ladie called Martia, had the gouernance both of his realme and person committed to hir charge.

Queene Martia gouerneth in hir sonnes roome.

She was a woman expert and skilfull in diuers sciences, but chiefelie being admitted to the gouernance of the realme, she studied to preserue the common wealth in good quiet and wholsome order, and therefore deuised and established profitable and conuenient lawes, the which after were called Martian lawes, of hir name that first made them. These lawes, as those that were thought good and necessarie for the preseruation of the common wealth, Alfred, or Alured, that was long after king of England, translated also out of the Britith tong, into the English Saxon speech, and then were they called after that translation Marchenelagh, that is to meane, the lawes of Martia. To conclude, this worthie woman guided the land during the minoritie of hir sonne right politikelie; and highlie to hir perpetuall renowme and commendation. And when hir sonne came to lawfull age, she deliuered vp the gouernance into his handes. How long he reigned writers varie, some anouch but seuen yeares, though other

Of Kimarus and his sudden end, of Elanius and his short regiment, of Morindus and his beastlie crueltie, all three immediatlie succeeding each other in the monarchie of Britaine, with the exploits of the last.

The sixt Chapter.

Kimarus. KImarus the sonne of Scilius began to reigne ouer the Britaines, in the yeare of the world 3657, and after the building of Rome 442, & in the first yeare of the 117. Olimpiad. This Kimarus being a wild yong man, and giuen to follow his lusts and pleasures, was slaine by some that were his enimies, as he was abroad in hunting, when he had reigned scarselie three yeares.

Fabian.

Elanius. ELanius the sonne of Kimarus, or (as other haue) his brother, began to rule the Britaines in the yeare after the creation of the world 3361, after the building of Rome 445, after the deliuerance of the Israelites 229, and in the fourth yeare of the Seleucians, after which account the bookes of Machabees do reckon, which began in the 14. after the death of Alexander. This Elanius in the English chronicle is named also Haran; by Mat. Westm. Danius; and by an old chronicle which Fabian much followed, Elanius and Kimarus should seeme to be one person: but other hold the contrarie, and saie that he reigned fullie 8. yeares.

Matth. West.

Morindus. MOrindus the bastard sonne of Elanius was admitted king of Britaine, in the yeare of the world 3667, after the building of Rome 451, after the deliuerance of the Israelites 236, and in the tenth yeare of Callander K. of Macedonia, which hauing dispatched Olimpias the mother of Alexander the great, and gotten Roxanes with Alexanders sonne into his hands, vsurped the kingdome of the Macedonians, and held it 15 yéeres. This Morindus in the English chronicle is called Morwith, and was a man of worthie fame in chiualrie and martiall doings, but so cruell withall, that his vnmercifull nature could scarse be satisfied with the torments of them that had offended him, although oftentimes with his owne hands he cruellie put them to torture and execution. He was also beautifull and comelie of personage, liberall and bounteous, and of a maruellous strength.

G. Mon.

In his daies, a certeine king of the people called Pictani, with a great armie landed in Northumberland, and began to make cruell warre vpon the inhabitants. But Morindus aduertised heerof, assembled his Britains, came against the enimies, and in battell putting them to flight, chased them to their ships, and tooke a great number of them prisoners, whome to the satisfieng of his cruell nature he caused to be slaine euen in his presence. Some of them were headed, some strangled, some panched, and some he caused to be slaine quicke.

The like may be thought of those Mureis or Moreanians of whom H.B. speaketh. Fabian.

¶ These people (whome Gal. Mon. nameth Pictani) I take to be either those that inhabited about Terrouane and Calice, called Morini, or some other people of the Galles or Germaines, and not as some esteeme them, Morauians, or Merhenners, which were not known to the world (as Humfrey Lhoyd hath verie well noted) till about the daies of the emperour Mauricius, which misconstruction of names hath brought the British historie further out of credit than reason requireth, if the circumstances be dulie considered.

But now to end with Morindus. At length this bloudie prince heard of a monster that was come a land out of the Irish sea, with the which when he would néeds fight, he was deuoured of the same, after he had reigned the terme of 8 yeeres, leauing behind him fiue sonnes, Gorbonianus, Archigallus, Eliodurus, Vigenius or Pigenius, and Peredurus.

Of Gorbonianus, Archigallus, Eliudurus, Vigenius, and Peredurus, the fiue sons of Morindus, the building of Cambridge, the restitution of Archigallus to the regiment after his depriuation, Elidurus three times admitted king, his death and place of interrement.

The seuenth Chapter.

Gorbomen or Gorbonianus. GOrbonianus the first son of Morindus succéeded his father in the kingdome of Britain, in the yeare of the world 3676, after the building of Rome 461, and fourth yeare of the 121. Olimpiad. This Gorbonianus in the English chronicle is named Granbodian, and was a righteous prince in his gouernment, and verie deuout (according to such deuotion as he had) towards the aduancing of the religion of his gods: and therupon he repaired all the old temples through his kingdome, and erected some new.

A righteous and religious prince.

He also builded the townes of Cambridge and Grantham (as Caxton writeth) and was beloued both of the rich and poore, for he honoured the rich, and relieued the poore in time of their necessities. In his time was more plentie of all things necessarie for the wealthfull state of man, than had béene before in anie of his predecessors daies. He died without issue, after he had reigned (by the accord of most writers) about the terme of ten yeares.

Cambridge by whome it was built.

Some write that this Gorbonian built the townes of Cairgrant, now called Cambridge, & also Grantham, but some thinke that those which haue so written are deceiued, in mistaking the name; for that Cambridge was at the first called Granta: and by that meanes it might be that Gorbonian built onlie Grantham, and not Cambridge, namelie because other write how that Cambridge (as before is said) was built in the daies of Gurguntius the sonne of Beline, by one Cantaber a Spaniard, brother to Partholoin, which Partholoin by the aduice of the same Gurguntius, got seates for himselfe and his companie in Ireland (as before ye haue heard.)

The said Cantaber also obteining licence of Gurguntius, builded a towne vpon the side of the riuer called Canta, which he closed with walles, and fortified with a strong tower or castell, and after procuring philosophers to come hither from Athens (where in his youth he had bene a student) he placed them there, and so euen then was that place furnished (as they saie) with learned men, and such as were readie to instruct others in knowledge of letters and philosophicall doctrine. But by whome or in what time soeuer it was built, certeine it is that there was a citie or towne walled in that place before the comming of the Saxons, called by the Britaines taines Caergrant, and by the Saxons Grancheſter.

This towne fell ſo to ruine by the inuaſion of the Saxons, that at length it was in maner left deſolate, and at this day remaineth as a village. But nere thereunto vnder the Saxon kings, an other towne was built, now called Cambridge, where by the fauour of king Sigebert and Felix a Burgundian, that was biſhop of Dunwich, a ſchole was erected, as in place conuenient ſhall appeare.

Archigallus.

ARchigallus, the ſecond ſonne of Pozindus, and brother vnto Gorbonianus, was admitted king of Britaine, in the yeare 3686, after the building of the citie of Rome 470, after the deliuerance of the Iſraelites out of captiuitie 255, and in the firſt yeare of Soſthenes king of Macedonia. This Archigallus (in the Engliſh chronicle called Artogaill) followed not the ſteppes of his brother, but giuing himſelfe to diſſention and ſtrife, imagined cauſes againſt his nobles, that he might diſplace them, and ſet ſuch in their romes as were men of baſe birth and of euill conditions. Alſo he ſought by vnlawfull meanes to bereaue his wealthie ſubiects of their goods and riches, ſo to inrich himſelfe and impoueriſh his people. For the which his inordinate doings, his nobles conſpired againſt him, and finallie depriued him of all his honor and kinglie dignitie, after he had reigned about the ſpace of one yeare.

He is giuen to nourish diſſention.

Elidurus.

ELidurus the third ſonne of Pozindus, and brother to Archigallus, was by one conſent of the Britains choſen to reigne ouer them in his brothers ſtead, after the creation of the world 3687, and after the building of the citie of Rome 471, after the deliuerance of the Iſraelites 256, & in the firſt yeare of Soſthenes king of Macedonia. This Elidurus in the Engliſh chronicle named Heſſder, or Eſoder, proued a moſt righteous prince, and doubting leaſt he ſhould doo otherwiſe than became him, if he did not take care for his brother Archigallus eſtate, a man might wonder what diligence he ſhewed in trauelling with the nobles of the realme to haue his brother reſtored to the crowne againe.

By this it ſhould ſeeme that Acliud ſhould not be in Scotland, contrarie to the Scotiſh authors.

Now as it chanced one day (being abroad on hunting in the wood called Calater) neare vnto Pozke, he found his brother Archigall wandering there in the thickeſt of that wildernelſe, whom in moſt louing maner he ſecretlie conueied home to his houſe, being as then in the citie of Aloud, otherwiſe called Acliud. Shortlie after he feined himſelfe ſicke, and in all haſt ſent meſſengers about to aſſemble his barons, who being come at the day appointed, he called them one after another into his priuie chamber, and there handled them in ſuch effectuous ſort with wiſe and diſcreet words, that he got their good wils to further him to their powers, for the reducing of the kingdome eftſones into the hands of his brother Archigallus.

After this he aſſembled a councell at Pozke, where he ſo vſed the matter with the commons, that in concluſion, when the ſaid Elidurus had gouerned the land well and honourablie the ſpace of three yeares, he reſigned wholie his crowne and kinglie title vnto his brother Archigallo, who was receiued of the Britaines againe as king by mediation of his brother in manner as before is ſaid. ¶ A rare example of brotherlie loue, if a man ſhall reuolue in his mind what an inordinate deſire remaineth amongſt moſtall men to atteine to the ſupreme ſouereintie of ruling, and to keepe the ſame when they haue it once in poſſeſſion. He had well learned this leſſon (as may appeare by his contentation and reſignation) namelie, that Nec abnuendum ſi dat imperium Deus, Nec appetendum, otherwiſe he would not haue beene led with ſuch an equabilitie of mind. For this great good will and brotherlie loue by him ſhewed thus toward his brother, he was ſurnamed the godlie and vertuous.

In example of brotherlie loue.

Archigallus again.

WHen Archigallus was thus reſtored to the kingdome, and hauing learned by due correction that he muſt turne the leafe, and take out a new leſſon, by changing his former trade of liuing into better, if he would reigne in quiet: he became a new man, bſing himſelfe vprightlie in the adminiſtration of iuſtice, and behauing himſelfe ſo worthilie in all his doings, both toward the nobles & commons of his realme, that he was both beloued and dread of all his ſubiects. And ſo continuing the whole tearme of his life, finallie departed out of this world, after he had reigned this ſecond time the ſpace of ten yeares, and was buried at Pozke.

Elidurus againe.

ELidurus brother to this Archigallus was then againe admitted king by conſent of all the Britaines, 3700 of the world. But his two yonger brethren, Vigenius and Peredurus, enuieng the happie ſtate of this worthie prince, ſo highlie for his vertue and good gouernance eſteemed of the Britains, of a grounded malice conſpired againſt him, and aſſembling an armie, leuied warre againſt him, and in a pitcht field toke him priſoner, and put him in the tower of London, there to be kept cloſe priſoner, after he had reigned now this laſt time the ſpace of one yeare.

Matt. Weſt. Brother againſt brother.

Vigenius and Peredurus.

VIgenius and Peredurus, the yongeſt ſonnes of Pozindus, and brethren to Elidurus, began to reigne iointlie as kings of Britaine, in the yeare of the world 3701, after the building of Rome 485, after the deliuerance of the Iſraelites 266 complet, and in the 12 yeare of Antigonus Gonatas, the ſonne of Demetrius king of the Macedonians. Theſe two brethren in the Engliſh chronicles are named Higanius and Petitur, who (as Gal. Mon. teſtifieth) diuided the realme betwixt them, ſo that all the land from Humber weſtward fell to Vigenius, or Higanius, the other part beyond Humber northward Peredure held. But other affirme, that Peredurus onelie reigned, and held his brother Elidurus in priſon by his owne conſent, forſomuch as he was not willing to gouerne.

Britaine diuided into two realmes.

But Gal. Mon. ſaith, that Vigenius died after he had reigned 7 yeares, and then Peredurus ſeized all the land into his owne rule, and gouerned it with ſuch ſobrietie and wiſedome, that he was praiſed aboue all his brethren, ſo that Elidurus was quite forgotten of the Britains. But others write that he was a verie tyrant, and vſed himſelfe verie cruellie towards the lords of his land, whereupon they rebelled and ſlue him. But whether by violent hand, or by naturall ſickneſſe, he finallie departed this life, after the conſent of moſt writers, when he had reigned eight yeares, leauing no iſſue behind him to ſucceed in the gouernance of the kingdome. He builded the towne of Pikering, where his bodie was buried.

Elidurus the third time.

ELidurus then, as ſoone as his brother Peredurus was dead, for as much as he was next heire to the crowne, was deliuered out of priſon, and now the third time admitted king of Britaine, who vſed himſelfe (as before) verie orderlie in miniſtring to all perſons right and iuſtice all the daies of his life, and laſtlie being growne to great age died, when he had reigned now this third time (after moſt concordance of writers) the tearme of foure yeares: and was buried at Caerleill.

A Chapter of digreſsion, ſhewing the diuerſitie of writers in opinion, touching the computation of yeares from the beginning of the Britiſh kings of this Iland downewards; ſince Gurguintus time, till the death of Elidurus; and likewiſe till king Lud reigned in his roialtie, with the names of ſuch kings as ruled betweene the laſt yeare of Elidurus, and the firſt of Lud.

The eight Chapter.

HEre is to be noted, that euen from the beginning of the Britiſh kings, which reigned here in this land, there is great diuerſitie amongeſt writers, both touching the names, and alſo the times of their reignes, ſpeciallie till they come to the death of the laſt mentioned king Elidurus. Inſomuch that Polydor Virgil in his hiſtorie of England, finding a manifeſt error (as he taketh it) in thoſe writers whome he followeth touching the account, from the comming of Brute, vnto the ſacking of Rome by Brennus, whome our hiſtories affirme to be the brother of Beline, that to fill vp the number which is wanting in the reckoning of the yeares of thoſe kings which reigned after Brute, till the daies of the ſame Brenne & Beline, he thought good to change the order, leaſt one error ſhould follow an other, and ſo of one error making manie, he hath placed thoſe kings which after other writers ſhould ſeeme to follow Brenne and Beline, betwixt Dunuallo and Pulmucius, father to the ſaid Beline and Brenne, and thoſe fiue kings which ſtroue for the gouernement after the deceaſſe of the two brethren, Ferrex and Porrex, putting Guintoline to ſucceed after the fiue kings or rulers, and after Guintoline his wife Martia, during the minoritie of hir ſonne, then hir ſaid ſonne named Sicilius.

Polydor.

After him ſucceeded theſe whoſe names follow in order, Chimarius, Danius, Morindus, Gorboniaus, Archigallo, who being depoſed, Elidurus was made king, and ſo continued till he reſtored the gouernement (as ye haue heard) to Archigallo againe, and after his death Elidurus was eftſoones admitted, and within a while againe depoſed by Vigenius and Peredurus, and after their deceaſſes the third time reſtored. Then after his deceaſſe followed ſucceſſiuelie Veginus, Morganus, Ennanus, Idmallo, Rimo, Geruntius, Catellus, Coillus, Porrex the ſecond of that name, Cherinus, Fulgentius, Eldalus, Androgeus, Urianus and Eliud, after whom ſhould follow Dunuallo Molmucius, as in his proper place, if the order of things done, & the courſe of time ſhould be obſerued, as Polydor gathereth by the account of yeares attributed to thoſe kings that reigned before and after Dunuallo, according to thoſe authours whom (as I ſaid) he followeth, if they will that Brennus which led the Galles to Rome be the ſame that was ſonne to the ſaid Dunuallo Pulmucius, and brother to Beline.

But ſith other haue in better order brought out a perfect agreement in the account of yeares, and ſucceſſion of thoſe kings, which reigned and gouerned in this land before the ſacking of Rome; and alſo another ſuch as it is after the ſame, and before the Romans had anie perfect knowledge thereof; we haue thought good to follow them therein, leauing to euerie man his libertie to iudge as his knowledge ſhall ſerue him in a thing ſo doubtfull and vncertaine, ſith reaſon of variance amongſt the ancient writers in that behalfe.

And euen as there is great difference in writers ſince Gurguintus, till the death of Elidurus, ſo is there as great or rather greater after his deceaſſe, ſpeciallie till king Lud atteined the kingdome: But as maie be gathered by that which Fabian and other whome he followeth do write, there paſſed aboue 185 yeares betwixt the laſt yeare of Elidurus, and the beginning of king Lud his reigne, in the which time there reigned 32, or 33, kings, as ſome writers haue mentioned, whoſe names (as Gal. Mon. hath recorded) are theſe immediatlie here named; Regnie the ſonne of Gorbolian or Gorbonian, a worthie prince, who iuſtlie and mercifullie gouerned his people; Margan the ſonne of Archigallo a noble prince likewiſe, and guiding his ſubiects in good quiet; Emerian brother to the ſame Margan, but far vnlike to him in maners, ſo that he was depoſed in the firſt yeare of his reigne; Pdwallo ſonne to Vigenius; Kimo the ſonne of Peredurus; Geruntius the ſonne of Elidurus; Catell that was buried at Wincheſter; Coill that was buried at Nottingham; Porrex a vertuous and moſt gentle prince; Cherinus a drunkard; Fulginius, Eldad, and Androgeus; theſe three were ſonnes to Cherinus, and reigned ſucceſſiuelie one after another; after them a ſonne of Androgeus; then Eliud, Vrianus. Edaicus, Clotinius, Gurguntius, Merianus, Bledius, Cop, Owen, Sicilius, Bledgabredus an excellent muſician: after him his brother Archemall; then Eldol, Red, Rodiecke, Samuill, Peniſell, Pir, Capoir; after him his ſonne Gligweil an vpright dealing prince, and a good iuſticiarie; whom ſucceeded his ſonne Helie, which reigned 60 yeares, as the ſaid Gal. Mon. writeth, where other affirme that he reigned 40 yeares, and ſome againe ſay that he reigned but 7 moneths.

Fabian.

There is great diuerſitie in writers touching the reignes of theſe kings, and not onlie for the number of yeares which they ſhould continue in their reignes but alſo in their names: ſo that to ſhew the diuerſitie of all the writers, were but to ſmall purpoſe, ſith the doings of the ſame kings were not great by report made thereof by any approued author. But this maie ſuffice to aduertiſe you, that by conferring the yeares attributed to the other kings which reigned before them, ſince the comming of Brute, who ſhould enter this land (as by the beſt writers is gathered) about the yeare before the building of Rome 367, which was in the yeare after the creation of the world 2850 (as is ſaid) with their time, there remaineth 182 yeares to be dealt amongſt theſe 33 kings, which reigned betwixt the ſaid Elidure & Lud, which Lud alſo began his reigne after the building of the citie of Rome (as writers affirme) about 679 yeares, and in the yeare of the world 3895, as ſome that will ſeeme the preciſeſt calculators do gather.

Polydor Virgil changing (as I haue ſhewed) the order of ſucceſſion in the Britiſh kings, in bringing diuerſe of thoſe kings, which after other writers followed Beline and Brenne, to preceed them ſo ſucceſſiuelie after Beline and Brenne, reherſeth thoſe that by his coniecture did by likelihod ſucceed, as thus. After the deceaſſe of Beline, his ſonne Gurguntius, being the ſecond of that name, ſucceeded in gouernment of the land, and then theſe in order as they follow: Merianus, Bladanus, Capeus, Duinus, Sicilius, Bledgabredus, Archemallus, Eldorus, Rodianus, Redargius, Samulius, Peniſellus, Pyrrhus, Caporus, Dinellus, and Helie, who had iſſue, Lud, Caſſibellane, and Nennius.

Of

Of king Helie who gaue the name to the Ile of Elie, of king Lud, and what memorable edifices he made in London sometimes called Luds towne, his bountifulnes, and buriall.

The ninth Chapter.

HEre note by the waie a thing not to be forgotten, that of the foresaid Helie the last of the said 33 kings, the Ile of Elie toke the name, bicause that he most commonlie did there inhabit, building in the same a goodly palace, and making great reparations of the sluces, ditches & causies about that Ile, for conueiance awaie of the water, that els would sore haue indamaged the countrie. There be that haue mainteined, that this Ile should rather take name of the great abundance of eeles that are found in these waters and fennes wherwith this Ile is inuironed. But Humfrey Llhoyd holdeth, that it toke name of this British word Helig, which signifieth willowes, wherwith those fennes abound.

Whereof the Ile of Elie toke name.

Lud.

After the decesse of the same Helie, his eldest son Lud began his reigne, in the yere after the creation of the world 3895, after the building of the citie of Rome 679, before the comming of Christ 72, and before the Romans entred Britaine 19 yeres.

A worthie prince.

This Lud proued a right worthie prince, amending the lawes of the realme that were defectiue, abolishing euill customs and maners vsed amongst his people, and repairing old cities and townes which were decaied: but speciallie he delited most to beautifie and inlarge with buildings the citie of Troinouant, which he compassed with a strong wall made of lime and stone, in the best maner fortified with diuerse faire towers: and in the west part of the same wall he erected a strong gate, which he commanded to be called after his name, Luds gate, and so vnto this daie it is called Ludgate, (S) onelie drowned in pronuntiation of the word.

London inclosed with a wal iohn Hard.

Fabian. Gal.Mon. Matt.West.

In the same citie also he solorned for the more part, by reason whereof the inhabitants increased, and manie habitations were builded to receiue them, and he himselfe caused buildings to be made betwixt London stone and Ludgate, and builded for himselfe not farre from the said gate a faire palace, which is the bishop of Londons palace beside Paules at this daie, as some thinke; yet Harison supposeth it to haue bin Bainards castell, where the blacke friers now standeth. He also builded a faire temple nere to his said palace, which temple (as some take it) was after turned to a church, and at this daie called Paules. By reason that king Lud so much esteemed that citie before all other of his realme, inlarging it so greatlie as he did, and continuallie in manner remained there, the name was changed, so that it was called Caerlud, that is to saie, Luds towne: and after by corruption of speech it was named London.

The bishops palace.

The name of Troinouant changed and called London

Beside the princelie doings of this Lud touching the aduancement of the common wealth by studies apperteining to the time of peace, he was also strong & valiant in armes, in subduing his enimies, bountious and liberall both in gifts and keeping a plentifull house, so that he was greatlie beloued of all the Britaines. Finallie, when he had reigned with great honour for the space of 11 yeres, he died, and was buried nere Ludgate, leauing after him two sons, Androgeus and Theomancius or Tenancius.

Of Cassibellane and his noble mind, Julius Cæsar sendeth Caius Volusenus ouer to suruey the coasts of this land, he lieth with his fleet at Calice, purposing to inuade the countrie, his attempt is bewraied and withstood by the Britains.

The tenth Chapter.

CAssibellane the brother of Lud was admitted king of Britaine, in the yere of the world 3908, after the building of Rome 692, and before the comming of Christ 58 complet. For sith the two sonnes of Lud were not of age able to gouerne, the rule of the land was committed to Cassibellane: but yet (as some haue written) he was not created king, but rather appointed ruler & protector of the land, during the nonage of his nephewes. Now after he was admitted (by whatsoeuer order) to the administration of the common wealth, he became so noble a prince and so bountious, that his name spred farre and nere, and by his vpright dealing in seeing iustice executed he grew in such estimation, that the Britaines made small account of his nephewes, in comparison of the fauour which they bare towards him. But Cassibellane hauing respect to his honour, least it might be thought that his nephewes were expelled by him out of their rightfull possessions, brought them vp verie honourablie; assigning to Androgeus, London and Kent; and to Theomantius the countrie of Cornwall. Thus farre out of the British histories, whereby it maie be gathered, that the yeres assigned to these kings that reigned before Cassibellane, amount to the summe of 1058.

Polydor.

But whether these gouernors (whose names we haue recited) were kings, or rather rulers of the common wealth, or tyrants and vsurpers of the gouernment by force, it is vncerteine: for not one ancient writer of anie approued authoritie maketh anie remembrance of them: and by that which Julius Cesar writeth, it maie and doth appere, that diuerse cities in his daies were gouerned of themselues, as hereafter it shall more plainlie apere. Neither doth he make mention of those townes which the British historie affirmeth to be built by the same kings. In deed both he and other Latine writers speake of diuerse people that inhabited diuers portions of this land, as of the Brigantes, Trinobantes, Iceni, Silures, and such other like, but in what parts most of the said people did certeinlie inhabit, it is hard to auouch for certeine truth.

But what Iohn Leland thinketh hereof, being one in our time that curiouslie searched out old antiquities, you shall after heare as occasion serueth: and likewise the opinions of other, as of Hector Boetius, who coueting to haue all such valiant acts as were atchiued by the Britains to be ascribed to his countriemen the Scots, draweth both the Silures and Brigantes, with other of the Britains so farre northward, that he maketh them inhabitants of the Scotish countries. And what particular names soeuer they had, yet were they all Scots with him, and knowne by that generall name (as he would persuade vs to beleeue) saieng that they entred into Britaine out of Ireland 330 yeres before the incarnation of our Sauiour.

Neuertheles, how generall soeuer the name of Scots then was, sure it is, that no speciall mention tion of them is made by anie writer, till about 300 yeares after the birth of our ſauiour. And yet the Romans, which ruled this land, and had ſo much adoo with the people thereof, make mention of diuerſe other people, nothing ſo famous as Boetius would make his Scotiſh men euen then to be. But to leaue to the Scots the antiquitie of their originall beginning, as they and other muſt doo vnto vs our deſcent from Brute and the other Troians, ſith the contrarie doth not plainelie appeare, vnleſſe we ſhall leane vnto preſumptions: now are we come to the time in the which what acts were atchiued, there remaineth more certeine record, and therefore may we the more boldlie proceed in this our hiſtorie.

More certeintie from hence forth appeareth in the hiſtorie.

In this ſeaſon that Caſſibellane had roiall gouernment heere in Britaine, Caius Julius Ceſar being appointed by the ſenat of Rome to conquer Gallia, was for that purpoſe created conſull, and ſent with a mightie army into the countrie, where after he had brought the Galles vnto ſome frame, he determined to aſſaie the winning of Britaine, which as yet the Romans knew not otherwiſe than by report. The cheefeſt cauſe that moued him to take in hand that enterprize, was for that he did vnderſtand, that there dailie came great ſuccours out of that Ile to thoſe Galles that were enimies vnto the Romans. And though the ſeaſon of that yeere to make warre was farre ſpent (for ſummer was almoſt at an end) yet he thought it would be to good purpoſe, if he might but paſſe ouer thither, and learne what maner of people did inhabit there, and diſcouer the places, hauens, and entries apperteining to that Ile.

Ceſars purpoſe.

Hereupon calling togither ſuch merchants as he knew to haue had traffike thither with ſome trade of wares, he diligentlie inquired of them the ſtate of the Ile: but he could not be throughlie ſatiſfied in anie of thoſe things that he coueted to know. Therefore thinking it good to vnderſtand all things by view that might apperteine to the vſe of that warre which he purpoſed to follow: before he attempted the ſame, he ſent one Caius Voluſenus with a gallie or light pineſſe to ſurueie the coaſts of the Ile, commanding him (after diligent ſearch made) to returne with ſpeed to him againe. He him ſelfe alſo drew downewards towards Bullenois, from whence the ſhorteſt cut lieth to paſſe ouer into Britaine.

Caius Voluſenus ſent ouer into Britaine.

In that part of Gallia there was in thoſe daies an hauen called Itius Portus (which ſome take to be Calice) and ſo the word importeth, an harbourgh as then able to receiue a great number of ſhips. Vnto this hauen got Ceſar all the ſhips he could out of the next borders & parties, and thoſe ſpeciallie which he had prouided and put in a readineſſe the laſt yeare for the warres (againſt them of Vannes in Armorica, now called Britaine in France) he cauſed to be brought thither, there to lie till they ſhould heare further. In the meane time (his indeuour being knowne, and by merchants reported in Britaine) all ſuch as were able to beare armour, were commanded and appointed to repaire to the ſea ſide, that they might be readie to defend their countrie in time of ſo great danger of inuaſion.

Iohn Leland. Polydor.

Vannes in Britane.

¶ Ceſar in his commentaries agreeth not with our hiſtoriographers: for he writeth that immediatlie vpon knowledge had that he would inuade Britaine, there came to him ambaſſadours from diuers cities of the Ile to offer themſelues to be ſubiects to the Romans, and to deliuer hoſtages. Whome after he had exhorted to continue in their good mind, he ſent home againe, and with them alſo one Comius gouernor of Artois, commanding him to repaire vnto as manie cities in Britaine as he might, and to exhort them to ſubmit themſelues to the Romans. He maketh no mention of Caſſibellane, till the ſecond iournie that he made into the Ile, at what time the ſaid Caſſibelane was choſen (as ye ſhall heare) to be the generall capteine of the Britains, and to haue the whole adminiſtration of the warre for defenſe of the countrie: but he nameth him not to be a king. Howbeit in the Britiſh hiſtorie it is conteined, that Ceſar required tribute of Caſſibelane, and that he anſwered how he had not learned as yet to liue in ſeruage, but to defend the libertie of his countrie, and that with weapon in hand (if neede were) as he ſhould well perceiue, if (blinded through couetouſneſſe) he ſhould aduenture to ſeeke to diſquiet the Britains.

which is more likelie as this behalfe as appeareth by the ſequel.

Caius Voluſenus diſcouereth to Cæſar his obſeruations in the Ile of Britaine, he maketh haſte to conquere it, the Britains de*fend their countrie againſt him, Ceſar after* conſultation had changeth his landing place, the Romans are put to hard ſhifts, the Britains begin to giue backe, the courage of a Roman enſigne-bearer, a ſharpe encounter betweene both armies.

The eleuenth Chapter.

CAius Voluſenus within fiue daies after his departure from Ceſar, returned vnto him with his gallie, and declared what he had ſeene touching the view which he had taken of the coaſts of Britan. Ceſar hauing got togither ſo manie ſaile as he thought ſufficient for the tranſporting of two legions of ſouldiers, after he had ordered his buſineſſe as he thought expedient, and gotten a conuenient wind for his purpoſe, did embarke himſelfe and his people, and departed from Calice in the night about the third watch (which is about three or foure of the clocke after midnight) giuing order that the horſſemen ſhould take ſhip at an other place 8 miles aboue Calice, and follow him. Howbeit when they ſomewhat ſlacked the time, about ten of the clocke in the next day, hauing the wind at will, he touched on the coaſt of Britaine, where he might behold all the ſhore ſet and couered with men of warre. For the Britains hearing that Ceſar ment verie ſhortlie to come againſt them, were aſſembled in armour to reſiſt him: and now being aduertiſed of his approch to the land, they prepared themſelues to withſtand him.

Voluſenus returneth.

Ceſar with two legions of ſouldiers paſſeth ouer into Britan.

The Britons readie to defend their countrie.

Ceſar perceiuing this, determined to ſtaie till the other ſhips were come, and ſo he lay at anchor till about 11 of the clocke, and then called a councell of the marſhals and chiefe capteines, vnto whome he declared both what he had learned of Voluſenus, and alſo further what he would haue done, willing them that all things might be ordered as the reaſon of warre required. And becauſe he perceiued that this place where he firſt caſt anchor was not meete for the landing of his people, ſith (from the heigth of the cliffes that cloſed on ech ſide the narrow creeke into the which he had thruſt) the Britains might annoy his people with their bowes and dartes, before they could ſet foote on land, hauing now the wind and tide with him, he diſanchored from thence, and drew alongſt the coaſt vnder the downes, the ſpace of 7 or 8 miles, and there finding the ſhore more flat and plaine, he approched neere to the land, determining to come to the ſhore.

Ceſar calleth a councell.

This was 8 bont day.

The Britains perceiuing Ceſars intent, with all ſpeed cauſed their horſſemen and charets or wagons, which which Ceſar calleth Eſſeda, out of the which in thoſe daies they vſed to fight, to march forth toward the place whither they ſaw Ceſar drew, and after followed with their maine armie. Wherefore Ceſar being thus preuented, inforced yet to land with his people, though he ſaw that he ſhould haue much adoo. For as the Britains were in readineſſe to reſiſt him; ſo his great and huge ſhips could not come néere the ſhore, but were forced to keepe the déepe, ſo that the Romane ſoldiers were put to verie hard ſhift; to wit, both to leape forth of their ſhips, and being peſkered with their heauie armour and weapons, to fight in the water with their enimies, who knowing the flats and ſhelues, ſtood either vpon the drie ground, or elſe but a little waie in the ſhallow places of the water; and being not otherwiſe encumbred either with armour or weapon, but ſo as they might beſtir themſelues at will, they laid load vpon the Romans with their arrowes and darts, and forced their horſſes (being thereto inured) to enter the water the more eaſilie, ſo to annoy and diſtreſſe the Romans, who wanting experience in ſuch kind of fight, were not well able to helpe themſelues, nor to keepe order as they vſed to doo on land: wherfore they fought nothing ſo luſtilie as they were wont to doo. Ceſar perceiuing this, commanded the gallies to depart from the great ſhips, and to row hard to the ſhore, that being placed ouer againſt the open ſides of the Britains, they might with their ſhot of arrows, darts, and ſlings, remoue the Britains, and cauſe them to withdraw further off from the water ſide.

The Romans put to their ſhifts.

The Britans aſtonied.

This thing being put in execution (according to his commandement) the Britains were not a little aſtonied at the ſtrange ſight of thoſe gallies, for that they were driuen with oares, which earſt they had not ſéene, and ſhrewdlie were they galled alſo with the artillerie which the Romans diſcharged vpon them, ſo that they began to ſhrinke and retire ſomewhat backe. Herewith one that bare the enſigne of the legion ſurnamed Decima, wherein the eagle was figured, as in that which was the chiefe enſigne of the legion, when he ſaw his fellowes nothing eager to make forward, firſt beſéeching the gods that his enterpriſe might turne to the weale, profit, and honor of the legion, he ſpake with a lowd voice theſe words to his fellowes that were about him; Leape forth now euen you worthie ſouldiers (ſaith he) if you will not betraie your enſigne to the enimies: for ſurelie I will acquit my ſelfe according to my ductie both towards the common wealth, and my generall: and therewith leaping forth into the water, he marched with his enſigne ſtreight vpon the enimies. The Romans douting to loſe their enſigne, which ſhould haue turned them to great reproch, leapt out of their ſhips ſo faſt as they might, and followed their ſtandard, ſo that there enſued a ſore reencounter: and that which troubled the Romans moſt, was becauſe they could not keepe their order, neither find anie ſure footing, nor yet follow euerie man his owne enſigne, but to put themſelues vnder that enſigne which he firſt met withall after their firſt comming forth of the ſhip.

The valiant courage of an enſigne bearer.

The Britains that were inured with the ſhelues and ſhallow places of the water, when they ſaw the Romans thus diſorderlie come out of their ſhips, ran vpon them with their horſſes, and fiercelie aſſailed them, and now and then a great multitude of the Britains would compaſſe in and incloſe ſome one companie of them: and other alſo from the moſt open places of the ſhore beſtowed great plentie of darts vpon the whole number of the Romans, and ſo troubled them verie ſore.

The fiercenes of the Britains.

The Romans get to land on the Engliſh coaſt, the Britains ſend to Cæſar for a treatie of peace, they ſtaie the Romane ambaſſadour as priſoner; Cæſar demandeth hoſtages of the Britains, the Romane nauie is driuen diuers waies in a great tempeſt, the Britiſh princes ſteale out of Cæſars campe and gather a freſh power againſt the Romans, their two armies haue a ſharpe encounter.

The twelfe Chapter.

Ceſar perceiuing the maner of this fight, cauſed his men of warre to enter into boates and other ſmall veſſels, which he commanded to go to ſuch places where moſt need appeared. And relieuing them that fought with new ſupplies, at length the Romans got to land, and aſſembling togither, they aſſailed the Britains a freſh, and ſo at laſt did put them all to flight. But the Romans could not follow the Britains farre, becauſe they wanted their horſſemen which were yet behind, & through lacking of time could not come to land. And this one thing ſeemed onelie to diſappoint the luckie fortune that was accuſtomed to follow Ceſar in all his other enterpriſes.

The Romans get to land.

The want of horſſemen.

The Britains after this flight were no ſoner got togither, but that with all ſpeed they ſent ambaſſadours vnto Ceſar to treat with him of peace, offering to deliuer hoſtages, and further to ſtand vnto that order that Ceſar ſhould take with them in anie reaſonable ſort. With theſe ambaſſadours came alſo Comius, whome Ceſar (as you haue heard) had ſent before into Britaine, whome notwithſtanding that he was an ambaſſadour, and ſent from Ceſar with commiſſion and inſtructions ſufficientlie furniſhed, yet had they ſtaied him as a priſoner. But now after the battell was ended, they ſet him at libertie, and ſent him backe with their ambaſſadours, who excuſed the matter, laieng the blame on the people of the countrie, which had impriſoned him through lacke of vnderſtanding what apperteined to the law of armes and nations in that behalfe.

The Britans ſend to Ceſar.

Comius of Arras.

Ceſar found great fault with their miſdemenor, not onelie for impriſoning his ambaſſador, but alſo for that contrarie to their promiſe made by ſuch as they had ſent to him into Gallia to deliuer hoſtages, in lieu thereof they had receiued him with warre: yet in the end he ſaid he would pardon them, and not ſéeke anie further reuenge of their follies. And herewith required of them hoſtages, of which, part were deliuered out of hand, and made promiſe that the reſidue ſhould likewiſe be ſent after, crauing ſome reſpit for performance of the ſame, becauſe they were to be fetched farre off within the countrie.

Ceſar demandeth hoſtages.

Peace being thus eſtabliſhed after the fourth day of the Romans arriuall in Britaine, the 18 ſhips which (as ye haue heard) were appointed to conuey the horſſemen ouer, loſed from the further hauen with a ſoft wind. Which when they approched ſo néere the ſhore of Britaine, that the Romans which were in Ceſars campe might ſée them, ſuddenlie there aroſe ſo great a tempeſt, that none of them was able to keepe his courſe, ſo that they were not onelie driuen in ſunder (ſome being caried againe into Gallia, and ſome weſtward) but alſo the other ſhips that lay at anchor, and had brought ouer the armie, were ſo pitifullie beaten, toſſed and ſhaken, that a great number of them did not onelie loſe their tackle, but alſo were caried by force of wind into the high ſea;

the reſt being likewiſe ſo filled with water, that they were in danger by ſinking to periſh and to be quite loſt. For the mone in the ſame night was at the full, & therefore cauſed a ſpring tide, which furthered the force of the tempeſt, to the greater perill of thoſe ſhips and gallies that lay at anchor. There was no way for the Romans to helpe the matter: wherefore a great number of thoſe ſhips were ſo bruiſed, rent and weather-beaten, that without new reparation they would ſerue to no vſe of ſailing. This was a great diſcomfort to the Romans that had brought ouer no proviſion to liue by in the winter ſeaſon, nor ſaw anie hope how they ſhould repaſſe againe into Gallia.

In the meane time the Britiſh princes that were in the Romane armie, perceiuing how greatlie this miſhap had diſcouraged the Romans, and again by the ſmall circuit of their campe, gelling that they could be no great number, and that lacke of vittels ſore oppreſſed them, they ſtale priuilie away one after another out of the campe, purpoſing to aſſemble their powers againe, and to foreſtall the Romans from vittels, and ſo to driue the matter off till winter: which if they might dò (vanquiſhing theſe or cloſing them from returning) they truſted that none of the Romans from thenceforth would attempt eſtſoones to come into Britaine. Ceſar miſtruſting their dealings, becauſe they ſtaid to deliuer the reſidue of their hoſtages, commanded vittels to be brought out of the parties adioining, and not hauing other ſtuffe to repaire his ſhips, he cauſed 12 of thoſe that were vtterlie paſt recouerie by the hurts receiued through violence of the tempeſt, to be broken, wherewith the other (in which ſome recouerie was perceiued) might be repaired and amended.

The maner of the Britains fighting in charets, the Romans giue a freſh ſallie to the Britains and put them to flight, they ſue to Cæſar for peace; what kings and their powers were aſſiſtants to Caſſibellane in the battell againſt Cæſar, and the maner of both peoples encounters by the report of diuers Chronologers.

The xiij. Chapter.

WHileſt theſe things were a doing, it chanced that as one of the Romane legions named the ſeuenth, was ſent to fetch in corne out of the countrie adioining (as their cuſtome was) no warre at that time being ſuſpected, or once looked for, when part of the people remained abroad in the field, and part repaired to the campe: thoſe that warded before the campe, informed Ceſar, that there appeared a duſt greater than was accuſtomed from that quarter, into the which the legion was gone to fetch in corne. Ceſar iudging therof what the matter might meane, commanded thoſe bands that warded to go with him that way forth, and appointed other two bands to come into their romes, and the reſidue of his people to get them to armor, and to follow quicklie after him.

He was not gone anie great way from the campe, when he might ſée where his people were ouermatched by the enimies, and had much a do to beare out the brunt: for the legion being thronged together, the Britains pelted them ſore with arrowes and darts on ech ſide: for ſithens there was no forrage left in anie part of the countrie about, but onelie in this place, the Britains iudged that the Romans would come thither for it: therefore hauing lodged themſelues within the woods in ambuſhes the night before; on the morrowe after when they ſaw the Romans diſperſed here & there, and buſie to cut downe the corne, they ſet vpon them on a ſudden, and ſlaing ſome few of them, brought the reſidue out of order, compaſſing them about with their horſſemen and charets, ſo that they were in great diſtreſſe.

The maner of fight with theſe charets was ſuch, that in the beginning of a battell they would ride about the ſides and skirts of the enimies hoſt, and beſtow their darts as they ſate in thoſe charets, ſo that oftentimes with the braieng of the horſſes, and craking noiſe of the charet wheles they diſordered their enimies, and after that they had wonne themſelues in amongſt the troops of horſſemen, they would leape out of the charets and fight on foot. In the meane time thoſe that guided the charets would withdraw themſelues out of the battell, placing themſelues ſo, that if their people were ouermatched with the multitude of enimies, they might eaſilie withdraw to their charets, and mount vpon the ſame againe, by meanes wherof they were as readie to remoue as the horſſemen, and as ſtedfaſt to ſtand in the battell as the footmen, and ſo to ſuplie both duties in one. And thoſe charetmen by exerciſe and cuſtome were ſo cunning in their feat, that although their horſſes were put to run and gallop, yet could they ſtay them and hold them backe at their pleaſures, and turne and wind them to and fro in a moment, notwithſtanding that the place were verie ſteepe and dangerous: and againe they would run vp and downe verie nimblie vpon the cops, and ſtand vpon the beame, and conuey themſelues quicklie againe into the charet.

Ceſar thus finding his people in great diſtreſſe and readie to be deſtroied, came in good time, and deliuered them out of that danger: for the Britains vpon his approch with new ſuccors, gaue ouer to aſſaile their enimies any further, & the Romans were deliuered out of the feare wherein they ſtood before his comming. Furthermore, Ceſar conſidering the time ſerued not to aſſaile his enimies, kept his ground, and ſhortlie after brought backe his legions into the campe.
